PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY, 1852.

SONNETS ON THE PARABLES.

BY REV. H. HASTINGS WELD

(See Plates.)

I.—THE TEN VIRGINS.

THE Bridegroom cometh! Hark, the midnight voice—
Go forth, ye faithful, meet Him and rejoice!
Vainly the thoughtless their neglect may sigh,
Who, when awakened by the warning sound,
In sad dismay, all unprepared are found.
Grant us, good Lord, that unction from on high,
By which, our lamps being filled with deeds of light,
We may so justly walk, that all who see
May glory give, O Father, unto Thee,
And we be found accepted in Thy sight!
Let us not hear the words, "I know you not!"—
But be our portion with the wise and blest
To enter, with Thy Church, the heavenly rest,
Nor, with the foolish, find the portal shut.

II.—THE SOWER.

BEHOLD, the Sower goeth forth to sow:
Some seed are cast upon the beaten way,
Whence they are stolen by the birds of prey;
Some upon stony places sudden grow,
But fade as sudden, for the lack of earth;
And some are strangled, even from their birth,
By thorns and briars. Others in good ground
Flourish and thrive, and in good fruit abound.
From wayside hearers Satan thus doth steal
The unheeded word. Thus others but awhile
Burn with a warm, but quickly fading zeal;
The thorns, earth's cares and riches, some beguile,
To lose the treasure, which the honest hold,
And bring with patience forth fruits many fold.

III.—THE TWO MITES.

AMID the crowd of ostentatious men,
Proud of their gifts, and seeking vain applause,
Intent upon their own, not Heaven's cause.
A widow, poor and sad, drew near. And when Her offering in the treasury she had thrown,
Two scanty mites, her living and her all.
Then did the Saviour on His followers call
To mark her gift. That widow, sad and lone,
Had, He declared, a richer offering made,
And more acceptable, than all beside:
Thus is humility preferred o'er pride,
And mild sincerity o'er vain parade.
Men but perceive the tinsel outward part,
While God discerns the treasure of the heart.

IV.—THE VINEYARD.

WHY stand ye waiting, idle, all the day?
Enter the vineyard, and whate'er is right
The Master will His laborers requite,
Nor strictly search their poor deserts to weigh.
His grace the measure is, His love the meed,
Else sad our fate, and helpless were our need.
At His decisions shall we dare repine?
His right to give His own shall we deny,
Or look upon His good with evil eye?
Oh, let us rather thank the grace divine,
That, whether in the morn we heed His call,
Or at the ninth, or at the eleventh hour,
We own our duty and adore His power,
He will alike be gracious unto all!

OUR HOPES.

BY HETTIE HAREBELL.

LIKE clouds upon the midday sky,
Which float in snowy wreaths away,
And as they slowly mount on high,
In airy forms their light display,
Then, quickly fading one by one,
Dissolve, and while we gaze are gone:

So rise our brilliant, buoyant hopes
From fancy's ever-busy cell,
And to their beauteous, fairy shapes,
Bind our fond hearts as with a spell,
Till, like the clouds, their beauties fade,
Leaving no joy their brightness made.

THE HAPPY FAMILY

BY ALICE B. NEAL.

(See Plates.)

WE were talking of the Reformation, and how sadly a spirit of skepticism had of late crept into German, as well as French, philosophy.

"But there is one thing," said a gentleman of the party, who had himself been educated at one of their famous universities; "do not be afraid of the Germans; their domestic life is their safeguard. So long as we see such devoted fathers and wives, such dutiful children, such peaceful family circles, there is no fear for that nation!"

And it is true, if we may believe travelers and writers. As a nation, they are distinguished for their household affinities; while the French have no word even to answer to our home. To go back to the very period we were speaking of. Look at the life of Luther, "the most German man of our history," as Henry Heine has called him. What attachment to his wife and children is evinced in those naïve and pleasant letters which have been preserved to us! Always thinking of them in absence, always wishing to be with them again; writing to "Johnny Luther" of the beautiful garden,

Sabre "good little boys wore golden coats," and shot with "little silver cross-bows;" and the affectionate messages to "Lippus and Jost," who were to be admitted with Johnny to the children's Paradise, if they learned and prayed diligently! Then, too, the very superscriptions to his wife, breathing a playful affection, very unlike the "Dear Sarahs and Janes" of modern husbands:—

"To my gracious Lady Katherine Luther, my sweetheart!"

"To the rich lady at Zulsdorf, Lady Katherine Lutherin; bodily resident at Wittenberg, and mentally wandering at Zulsdorf—my beloved, to her own hands!"

And yet again, "My dear Housewife, Katherine Lutherin, doctress, self-martyress. My Gracious Lady, for her own hands and feet!"

And now the peasant sits under the shadow of his own vine, or the scholar rests from his mental toil, in the warm, pleasant evenings, to watch the sunset streaming through the purple vineyards, with his wife nursing the "wee todlin' thing," and watching the play of the elder children, with a heart as full of love for them, and as thankful to the God who has thus bestowed on him "the best gift of his Providence," as was the Reformer's, when he yearned once more to see his "friendly, dear Kate Luther," and to have Johnny and Jost climb upon his knee, begging for further particulars about the lovely garden, where children could help themselves to "cherries, plums—and what plums!"—at discretion! "There is no fear for Germany." Surely not, while the purer pleasures of life are preferred, and good principles descend from the fathers to the children "unto the third and fourth generation."

Domestic happiness, so to speak, is a plant that thrives only by careful and tender cultivation. The seed of example is easily sown, for children are minute and close observers. If the wife has her proper dignity and respect, the mother may be almost sure of it, as her children come to be intelligent companions. And yet how does it happen that so few "happy families" are seen? and that, when such a one is found, it becomes not only a beautiful picture, but a rare example to us? In our own country, and our own generation, we have not time to be happy at home. The man of business remembers it as the resting-place of the past night, where he sat in a dressing-gown, with his feet upon the fender, and made mental calculations of the week's loss and gain. He looks forward to it, for it is quieter than his counting-house, and he can take his papers home this evening, and rectify the mistake in his cash account that has just annoyed him so much.

If the children are clamorous, they must be sent off to bed; he has no time for stories of the lovely garden. Gold and silver have other uses in his eyes than for the manufacture of "coats and cross-bows." What! sit an hour after dinner to watch the merriest game of romps that ever made the nursery ring with childish laughter! No, no! there is some one waiting at the store, or the northern mail is in; or, at the least, he will smoke his cigar in the counting-house, while he chats of the rise and fall of stocks with a neighbor. And the mother, thus left to be careful and anxious about many things—it would be a waste of the busy daylight to listen to the thousand and one questions which children ask, when their eager minds first begin to unfold in the light of reason, and "why?" becomes the preface of every inquiry.

But there is something before all this; something that closed the avenues of mind and heart between the husband and wife, before childish prattle and the patter of little feet sounded through the house. There was plenty of time in their first days of courtship. No lack of leisure to humor the whims of the pretty girl, who is now the faded wife. She could spend hours and days in practicing his favorite songs, or arranging the dresses he liked best to see, or reading the volumes he loved to discuss. To be sure, there is far more now to occupy the time and attention of both; but the will, as well as the way, seems wanting.

THE HAPPY FAMILY,

There is a saying, that "the wife ceases to be the divinity." In many cases, it is too true; and there are two prominent "wherefores" in the case. Ill-considered and ill-assorted unions are said to be the natural result of the present phase of society among us. The glamour of romance and fancy melts away into the sharp outlines of a commonplace reality.

"The idol is broken, the earth star fled."

But there is another evil too common in domestic life—the decline of those mutual delicate attentions that are the charm of all wooing between those whose tastes really assimilate, and whose characters might be moulded into one harmonious whole by the daily attraction of home life. It is the greater evil, that its approaches are so natural, so gradual, and so unsuspected. It is a lingering torpor of affection, not a sudden, distinctive blow; and indifference is its sure result, quite as destructive to domestic peace as any grievous fault that might mar the character of either party, and bring open warfare for this unnatural calm. Sometimes the wife expects too much. She is not content with the natural transition from the lover's unceasing study of her good will and pleasure, to the more quiet attentions of the husband. She is not contented with the change from "my own darling" to the habitual "my dear." She is inclined to grieve over it, to meet her husband reproachfully, and her tears too often fall "like vinegar upon nitre." Hear, then, what an old German writer says, since we allow that his nation is most happy in its social relations; one from whom we have before quoted, but whose charmingly good-tempered advice cannot be read too often:—

"Try to appear cheerful and contented, and your husband will be so; and when you have made him happy, you will become so, not in appearance, but in reality. The skill required is not so great. Nothing flatters a man so much as the happiness of his wife; he is always proud of himself as the source of it. As soon as you are cheerful, you will be lively and alert, and every moment will afford you an opportunity of letting fall an agreeable word. Good education is an immense advantage, and will greatly assist you, and your sensibility will become the noblest gift that nature has bestowed on you, when it shows itself in affectionate assiduity, and stamps on every action a soft, kind, and tender character, instead of wasting itself in secret repinings."

We should like to see the husband that could resist such household influences.

LORD CHESTERFIELD.

BY HENRY T. TUCKERMAN.

THERE is an epithet of frequent occurrence in the writings of Chesterfield which suggests the nature of his philosophy of life; it is the word shining, which he applies to oratory, character, and manners with an obvious relish. We have the greatest faith in the significance of language—especially in regard to the habitual use of certain adjectives as illustrative of individual opinions, temperament, and disposition. Brief sentences thickly interspersed with the first personal singular is a style indicative of egotism; dainty verbal quibbles of effeminacy, and a copious, prolonged, and emphatic combination of words, seem equally native to a full and earnest mind. It may be a fanciful idea, but this our experience frequently confirms—that the constant use of the word designating a quality is an instinctive sign of its predominance in character. Chesterfield's ideal of excellence was essentially superficial, for his praise of solid acquirement and genuine principles is always coupled with the assertion of their entire inutility if unaccompanied by grace, external polish, and an agreeable manifestation. He omits all consideration of their intrinsic worth and absolute dignity; their value to the individual, according to him, is wholly proportioned to his skill in using them in a social form. It is seeming, not being, he extols; rhetoric, in his view, far transcends reflective power; manners have more to do with human welfare than sentiment, and fact achieves more satisfactory conquests than truth; it is not depth, elevation, or extent, the permanent qualities—but those of a temporary kind, that belong to the surface of life, upon which he relies. Accordingly, to shine in oratory, conversation, and behavior, is to realize the highest points both of nature and study; the casual scintillation of reflected light is more attractive to him, because more dazzling to the eyes of the world, than that which is evolved from primal and indestructible sources. The eulogy of his biographer has, therefore, a literal justice when he says that Chesterfield was one of the most shining characters of the age. Thus we might be content that it should pass in a mere gallery of traditional portraits. But the theory upon which it was based, the system according to which it was formed, have been elaborately unfolded by Chesterfield himself with epistolary art; and, although he never designed publicly to advocate them, yet the fact that his letters have been not only for many years a manual of deportment, his name a synonym for attractive elegance, and his writings, within a short time, revised and edited by an English historian,* is sufficient reason for applying to him, and the school he proverbially represents, the test of that impartial scrutiny, challenged by whatever practically acts upon society, and exercises more or less prescriptive influence. Character may be divided into two great classes—the one based upon details, and the other upon general principle; and all history, as well as private experience, shows that elevated harmony and permanent influence belong only to the latter. And this is true of the various forms as well as the essential nature of character. The philosopher differs from the petit-maitre, and the poet from the dilettante, by virtue of the same law—the view of the one being comprehensive, and the other minute. In art, also, we recognize true efficiency only where general effects are aptly seized and justly embodied—the artist of mere detail ranks only as a mechanic in form and color. But the most striking truth involved in these distinctions is that the greater includes the less; the man of reliable general principles in literature, art, or life, is, in point of fact, master of all essential details; he combines them at a glance, or, rather, they insensibly arrange themselves at his will; he can afford to let them take care of themselves. The great sculptors and painters busied themselves only about the design and finish of their works, for intermediate details were wrought by their pupils; and if the overseer, whether of domestic or public affairs, establish order and integrity as the principles of his establishment, he need not give his time or thoughts to the minutiae of finance. If we apply this principle to social life, the sphere which Chesterfield regarded as the most important, a similar result is obvious. No one, even in that artificial world called society, ever achieved a satisfactory triumph by exclusive mastery of details. All that is involved in the term manners, is demonstrative, symbolic—the sign or exponent of what lies behind, and is taken for granted; and only when this outward manifestation springs from an inward source—only when it is a natural product, and not a graft—does it sustain any real significance. Hence the absurdity of the experiment of Chesterfield to inculcate a graceful address by maxims, and secure a winsome behavior by formal and minute directions, as if to learn how to enter a room, bow well, speak agreeably to a lady, dispose of unoccupied hands, and go inoffensively through the other external details of social intercourse, were to insure the realization of a gentleman. That character—as it was understood in chivalry by the old English dramatists, and according to the intelligent sentiment of mankind everywhere—is as much the product of nature as any other species of human development; art modifies only its technical details; its spirit comes from blood more than breeding; and its formula, attached by prescription to the body without analogous inspiration of the soul, is as awkward and inefficient as would be proficiency in military tactics to a coward, or vast philological acquisitions to an idiot. Yet Chesterfield, with the obstinacy that belongs to the artificial race of men, persisted in his faith in detail, would not recognize the law from which all genuine social power is elaborated, and apparently lived and died in the belief that the art of pleasing was the great interest of life, and an absolute means of success and personal happiness. All his views, habits, and career were impregnated with this artificial creed; phrenologically speaking, he was an incarnation of approbateness; his zest of life came through this his predominant organ, and, judging from consciousness, he believed it to be the only one in others which could be universally appealed to. Unblinded by self-love, he had but to reflect upon his own experience to realize the fallacy of his doctrine. Everywhere and always he consulted explicitly the oracle of public opinion, and conformed to it with a fanaticism unworthy his intelligence. He confesses to the very son whom he strove with such zeal to make the “glass of fashion,” that in college he was an absolute pedant, and thought great classical knowledge the test of all excellence; that, emancipated from the atmosphere of learning and thrown among young men of fashion, he led a life of slavery by conforming to habits which were alien not only to his constitution and tastes, but even to his desires; and that, in mature years, the requisitions of the beau monde held him in equal vassalage; while his old age, we are told, “was cheerless and desolate.” There are men who regard the artificial as a necessary evil in social life, while they repudiate it altogether elsewhere; but, in the case of Chesterfield, it was deliberately advocated as a general principle; it influenced not only his theory of manners, but his literary taste, political opinions, and entire philosophy. Thus he laid aside the Anglo-Saxon direct and robust temper, and gave in so completely to French manners and superficiality, that, in Paris, he was considered one of themselves, and prides himself upon the distinction. In literature, the only branch which he thoroughly appreciated was oratory, and that chiefly for the rhetorical artifice to which it gives scope. Not as a noble inspiration founded on loyalty to instructive sentiment, or aimed at the cause of humanity, but as an elegant accomplishment whereby to exercise influence and gain applause, did Chesterfield cultivate oratory. It seems perfectly natural that he should excel in its studied graces, and equally so that such a cold virtuoso as Horace Walpole should have preferred him to Pitt. It is, too, not less characteristic of such a man that he should choose diplomacy as a profession. Believing, as he did, only in elegance and cunning, in politic self-control, veiled with agreeableness, the “smooth barbarity of courts” was admirably fitted at once to employ his ingenuity and gratify his refined selfishness. Thus devoid of earnestness on the one hand, and wedded to artificial graces on the other, we cannot wonder that, in his view, Dante, the most intensely picturesque of poets, could not think clearly; and that Petrarch, the beautiful expositor of sentiment, would appear only a love-sick rhymist; nor can we reasonably feel surprise that he quoted Rochefoucault and Cardinal de Retz with emphatic respect, while he could be only facetious in his allusions to Milton and Tasso. Among the books he most cordially recommends his son are a treatise on the Art of Pleasing, and the "Spectacle du Nature"—the very titles of which reveal his dominant ideas—for the end of being, in his opinion, was to please, at whatever sacrifice of honesty, comfort, or truth; and nature to him was but a spectacle, as life itself was a melodrama. He distrusted the motives of Fenelon, and thought Bolingbroke admirable. Even in more highly-prized classical attainments, which we should imagine were endeared by personal taste, the same reference to external motive appears. He admires the study of Greek chiefly because it is a less common acquisition than Latin; and the translation of striking passages of eloquence as a means of forming style and storing the mind with desirable quotations. Indeed, in his view, the process of culture, instead of an end, was a means—not to perfect or enrich the individual character, but to obtain the requisites of social advancement. In accordance with his faith in the details of outward conduct, and obtuseness to the influence of the great natural laws of character in their social agency, Chesterfield advocated power over others as the lever by which to move away the impediments to personal success; not that legitimate power decreed by original superiority, and as certain in the end to regulate society as gravitation the planets—but a studious, politic, and artificial empire won by dissimulation and attractiveness. In urging this favorite theory upon his son, he seems to have been unconscious of the painful discipline involved in the process, the long and weary masquerade, and the incessant danger of losing, in a moment, the influence gained by months of sycophancy; neither does he take into view the wholly unsatisfactory and unreliable nature of the relations thus established; and fails to see the inevitable result of the short-sighted policy of detail—in the temporary sway thus acquired; the permanent is sacrificed to the immediate, and, by addressing the most insatiable and capricious of human propensities, his system entails not an hour, but a life of social fawning. He recommends the study of character in order to discover the ruling passion, and then a skillful use of his key-note in order to play upon the whole for private benefit; forgetting that, as in the case of the indignant prince, a suspicion of such base friendship will lead to scorn and rejection—"Do you think I am easier to be played upon than a pipe?" To this watchful observation he would have united a power to conceal our own emotions in order to give no advantage to our companion, and a facility in appealing to self-love as the best means of throwing him off his guard. The temper, the opinions, the tastes, and even the most gentle and noble sentiments, are to be kept in uniform abeyance; self-possession and adroit flattery are the two great requisites, in his view, for success in life; distrust of others the guarantee of personal safety; and the art of pleasing the science of the world. History, philosophy, and the prevailing instincts of enlightened humanity teach another lesson. These maxims, so often quoted as sagacious, are, in fact, extremely shallow; instead of seeing more deeply into human nature, Chesterfield only saw its superficial action. If there were no sphere for character but promiscuously-filled elegant drawing-rooms, no more stable law operating on society than fashion, and no method of acting on human affairs but that of diplomacy, such advice would have a higher degree of significance. It applies to but few of the actual exigencies of life, and has reference only to partial interests; all men should be social adventurers, and all women aim exclusively at social distinction, to give any general utility to precepts like these. They are essentially temporary and occasional even when true, and utterly false when elevated into principles of action. Hence we deny Dr. Johnson's assertion that, setting the immorality of Chesterfield's letters aside, they form the best manual for gentlemen; the character repudiates the term; its elements are no more to be "set in a notebook" than the spirit of honor or the inspiration of art. The views of Chesterfield, practically carried out, would make a pedantic courtier or a courteous pedant; they trench too much upon the absolute qualities of manhood to leave substance enough in character upon which to rear enduring graces; they omit frankness and moral courage—two of the most attractive and commanding of human attributes—and substitute an elegant chicanery incompatible with self-respect, upon which the highest grace of manner rests; their logic is that of intrigue, not of reason; their charms are those of the dancing-master, not of the knight. Their relation to a true philosophy of life is no more intimate than the conceits of the Italians to the highest poetry, or the scenery of a theatre to that of nature, for to cultivate grace of manners is not to supersede, but only to give expression to, nature in a certain way; it is not imitation from without, but development from within.

"For God's sake," writes Chesterfield, "sacrifice to the graces; keep out of all scrapes and quarrels; know all ceremonies; maintain a seeming frankness, but a real reserve; have address enough to refuse without offending; some people are to be reasoned, some flattered, some intimidated, and some teased into a thing." By his own statement, this course secured him only a life of refined servitude and a desolate old age, for the official dignity he enjoyed was pettishly abandoned from disappointment as to its incidental benefits. It is not, however, in a moral, but in a philosophical view, as a question of enlightened self-interest, that we demur to the authenticity of his doctrine. Its real defect is narrowness, the exaggeration of certain principles of action, an inharmonious view of the relation between character and behavior, an undue importance attached to secondary interests—in a word, an artificial system in absolute contradiction to prevalent natural laws; and it is chiefly worthy of refutation, because, instead of being advanced as a judicious formula in specific instances, or details of conduct to be acquired once and habitually exercised afterwards, it is presented as a great leading principle, and a regular system altogether expedient and universally applicable, which can be true of no theory either in literature, art, or life, which is based on mere dexterity and address, for Jesuitism can no more permanently advance the interests of society than it can those of religion, science, or any real branch of human welfare.

Chesterfield's editor dwells upon his classical learning and his benevolent policy while Lord Lieutenant in Ireland, where his rule is declared to have been second only in its benign influence to that of Lord Ormond; but neither of these graces seems to have originated in disinterested impulse. His acquisitions were chiefly valued as a means of display, and sources of an efficient culture; and he advocated schools and villages to civilize the Highlands after the Rebellion, instead of more cruel measures, because, on the whole, clemency was the most politic course to pursue. It was this barrenness of soul, this absence of manly enthusiasm—and fanatical reliance on the technical facilities of society—that deprived both the career and the precepts of Chesterfield of all claim to cordial recognition. A friend may have spoken of him with literal truth when he declared that he possessed "a head to contrive, a tongue to persuade, and a hand to execute" in masterly style what he attempted; but the beauty and desirableness of these endowments are much lessened when we perceive that the exquisite machinery was set in motion by motives so entirely selfish, and its action regulated by views destitute of intellectual scope and generous sympathies; when we hear the man thus gifted declare that "a never-failing desire to please" is the great incentive of his mind, and that the finest mental and moral qualities cannot win his love to one awkward or deformed.

Chesterfield, like all votaries of detail, repeats himself continually; he announces, with oracular emphasis in almost every letter, proverbs of worldly wisdom and economical shrewdness with an entire confidence in their sufficiency worthy of old Polonius, of which character he is but a refined prototype. The essence of these precepts is only a timid foresight utterly alien to a noble spirit. What, for instance, can be more servile than the maxims—never to give the tone to conversation, but adopt it from the company, and that no business can be transacted without dissimulation? Conformity and adaptation were his avowed means of success—the alpha and omega of his creed; both useful and sometimes necessary alternatives in social intercourse, but always inferior and secondary—never primal and enduring. When allowed to supersede the loftier and more genuine instincts, they not only fail of their end, but are absolutely incompatible with the character of a gentleman. Not by such a course did

Sidney, Raleigh, Mackintosh, Robert Burns, or any one of nature's nobility, impress and win their fellow-creatures, but rather by ingenuous self-assertion, mellowed and harmonized by kindly and sympathetic feelings, that gave a grace "beyond the reach of art" to their conversation and manners.

But Chesterfield's disloyalty to nature and devotion to artifice are more signally betrayed in his views of the two great sources of actual refinement in social life—music and women. The first may be considered as the natural language of the soul, the cultivation of which is one of the most available means of acquiring that harmonious development and sense of the beautiful which round her angles and elicit the gentle influences of human intercourse. Chesterfield peremptorily forbade his son to cultivate music, at the same time that he strove to preach boorishness out of him by rules of breeding—a process which might have been vastly facilitated by the study of any one of the fine arts for which he had the least tendency. But even in gallantry—not to profane love by thus designating his idea of the relation of the sexes—even in that which owes its zest and utility to gratified sympathies, he leans on the broken reed of prescription and expediency, counseling his son to choose a fair companion, not as a being to inspire, through natural affinity, his sentiments and conduct, but as an approved model and guide in fashionable life. How little did this shrewd man of the world know of the benefit, even to the manners, of an intelligent youth, derivable from even one reality in his social relations! Indeed, from the affectionate disposition that appears to have belonged to Philip Stanhope—his good sense and general acquirements—the only chance for him to have realized his father's hopes in point of expression, bearing, costume, address, and all the externals of character, would seem to have been a genuine attachment. He was so organized as to be unable to attach that importance to the graces his father adored, which would lead him to court their favors; for this he needed the stimulus of a powerful motive, and such an one would have been naturally supplied by a real devotion to a fine woman; or the effect of such a feeling would have gradually softened and elevated his tone and air so that he would have become as insinuating as his elegant parent desired, and that, too, from instinct and not by rule. The great evil of teaching the details of behavior is that, even when acquired in all their perfection, there is a want of unity in the result; they are exercised without the crowning grace of all manner, from the rhetorician's gesture to the courtier's salutations—unconsciousness. There is no happy fusion between manhood and manner; the one hangs objectively on the other like two parts of an ill-adjusted machine.

Nature is apt to vindicate herself upon the ultra-conventional by entailing disappointment upon their dearest hopes. Her laws are as inexorable as they are benign. Chesterfield seems to have been more in earnest in the education of his son than in any other object in life; but true parental affection had little to do with this assiduity; he constantly reminds him that he has no weak attachment to his person, that his pecuniary supplies depend upon the respect paid to the instruction he receives, and that the estimation he will hereafter enjoy from his father will depend upon the degree in which he realizes the expectations formed of him. In all this we see only a modification of self-love, but no true parental feeling. The object of all this solicitude well repaid the care lavished upon his mental cultivation, but he never became either elegant or fascinating; his good qualities were solid, not shining, and his advancement was owing to his father's personal influence. The latter's will is characteristic; he provides that, if his son ever engages in the vulgar amusement of horse-racing, he shall forfeit five thousand pounds to the Dean of Westminster, who is satirized in the compliment—for Chesterfield thought himself overcharged by him in a pecuniary transaction, and wished to leave this evidence of his reliance upon his grasping disposition.

During his life, a high position and good sense enabled Chesterfield to reap advantages from polished and sagacious urbanity, which naturally led to an exaggerated estimate of its value under less auspicious circumstances. Having studied with marked success at Cambridge, through the influence of a relative he was appointed gentleman of the bedchamber to the Prince of Wales, and afterwards elected to Parliament by the borough of St. Germain in Cornwall. His first speech established a reputation for oratory, and is described as quite as remarkable for able reasoning as for elegant diction. He seems to have retained the good opinion thus acquired while in the House of Lords; to his father's seat in which assembly he duly succeeded. His judicious management, while ambassador to Holland in 1728, saved Hanover from a war, and, for this service, he was made knight of the Garter. Subsequently he filled, with apparent success, the offices of lord steward of the household in George the Second's reign, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and Secretary of State. Upon resigning the seals, he retired from public life, and deafness soon confined him to books and a small circle of acquaintance. The prestige of official rank, and the allurements of an elegant address having passed away with his life, we must turn from the orator and statesman to the author for authentic evidence of his character. His fate in this regard is somewhat curious. The elaborate speeches and sketches of character which he gave to the public have, in a great measure, lost their significance. The style of writing has so much advanced since his time that we recognize in him no such claims to literary excellence as his contemporaries awarded. His name is now almost exclusively associated with his letters to his natural son—letters written in the most entire parental confidence, and with the vain hope of converting, by specific instructions, an awkward and apparently honest-hearted and sensible fellow into an accomplished, winsome, and shrewd man of the world. It has been said, in excuse for the absolute stress laid upon external qualities in these letters, that the youth to whom they were addressed was lamentably deficient in these respects; but there can be no doubt that they form the most genuine expression of Chesterfield's mind—the more so that they were never intended for the public eye. By a not uncommon fortune in literary ventures, these estrays and waifs of private correspondence alone keep alive the name and perpetuate the views of Chesterfield.

It would be unjust not to ascribe the worldly spirit and absence of natural enthusiasm in those epistles, in a degree, to the period that gave them birth. It was an age when intrigue prospered, and wit, rather than sentiment, was in vogue. There was a league between letters and politics, based wholly on party interests. It was the age of Swift, Pope, and Bolingbroke. The queen governed George the Second, Lady Yarmouth the queen, and Chesterfield, for a time, Lady Yarmouth. Agreeable conversation, an insinuating manner, and subtlety of observation, were then very efficient weapons. High finish, point, verbal felicity, the costume rather than the soul of literature, won the day. Neither the frankness and undisguised overflow of thought and feeling that mark the Shakspearian era, nor the earnest utterance and return to truth ushered in by the first French Revolution, existed; but, on the contrary, that neutral ground between the two periods, whereon there was the requisite space, leisure, and absence of lofty purpose, to give full scope to the courtier, the wit, and the intriguer. It was, comparatively speaking, a timid, time-serving, partisan, and showy epoch. The spirit of the times is caught up and transmitted in Horace Walpole's letters, and quite as significantly embodied, in a less versatile manner, in those of Chesterfield.

Instead, therefore, of regarding courteous manners as a mere necessary appendage to a man—a convenient and appropriate facility, like current coin, or the laws of the land—Chesterfield attempts to elevate them into the highest and most comprehensive practical significance. He would have manner overlay individuality, and goes so far as to declare that a soldier is a brute, a scholar a pedant, and a philosopher a cynic without good breeding. If, for the latter term, feeling were substituted, those and similar broad inferences would be far more correct. Some of the greatest brutes, cynics, and pedants we encounter in the world are perfectly well-bred; they refuse an act of humanity with a graceful bow, smile good-naturedly while exposing the ignorance of a sensitive companion, and engross, with an affable and even respectful air, all the privileges at hand. It is common to see a Frenchman salute, in the most polite manner, those who enter a public conveyance, pass round his snuff-box, and entertain the company with agreeable remarks; but, if it suits his pleasure, he will, at the same time, gormandize a reeking pâté, put on his night-cap and snore, or refuse to yield his seat to an invalid, with a complacent egotism that would astonish an American backwoodsman, who, without a particle of Monsieur's external courtesy, obeys the laws of chivalric kindness from instinct and habit. "The understanding is the voiture of life," says Chesterfield, and, apparently, he infers that it is to be put at random on any track, and to move at any speed which the will of the elegant majority dictate—an axiom wholly at variance with that independence which some one has nobly declared to be the positive sign of a gentleman. Absence of mind in company, so often the indication of superiority, he considered only as evidence of weakness; and so enervated was his taste that he preferred the cold proprieties of the artificial French stage to the violated unities of robust English tragedy. It is characteristic of such a man to believe in chance more than truth; and his unconquerable love of play accords with the blind philosophy that controlled his life. His conceit of knowledge of human nature was based upon the most inadequate and one-sided observation; he associated chiefly with women of fashion and men of state, and, therefore, saw the calculating and vain, not the impulsive and unconscious play of character. For the game of conventional life, therefore, are the best of his maxims adapted. In that latent sphere of truth and nature, familiar to more ingenuous and genial spirits, where candor, intelligent sympathy, and spontaneous taste luxuriate, they are as irrelevant as they are unnatural.

DUSK.

BY EMILY HERRMANN.

THE dusk sweeps down from eastern hills
That skirt our valley-land;
The wind, like a shivering beggar, steals
Where wintry forests stand,
Or plucks from the beech her fluttering robes,
With a bandit's ruthless hand.

The kitten purrs by the kitchen hearth,
Where red flames leap about,
And above the sound of blazing wood
Is the noise of fowls without;
They're sheltering in our back-porch roof
From racoon's midnight rout.

I sit me in quiet; the light is gone,
The work falls from my knee,
While the scratching sound of a pencil goes
O'er the paper merrily;
Yet Anne has sought in a magazine
For pleasanter company.

Old pussy starts up with matronly grace,
Her soft white ears she pricks

At a rumbling sound, that is followed soon
By a time-piece striking six;
Then gravely on, like a human thing,
It moves with even "ticks."

The shadows creep over the ceiled wall,
Where the muslin curtain 's drawn,
As a hymn steals on my quietness,
Like spring-days' freshening dawn;
And still the little Yankee clock
Keeps sturdily ticking on!

The firelight, thrown o'er vacant chairs,
Reveals the wintry gloom
That shrouds the stars, and pleasant grass,
And flowers, in one wide tomb—
The while that summer-gladden dwells
Within our household room!

Than dimness on the eastern hills
I know of a sterner token;
Disease and death enclosed us round,
Yet left our band unbroken;
Our Heavenly Father kept us safe—
For this His praise be spoken!

Praise for the light in every eye,
Through all the changing weather;
Praise for the love that nerves our hearts,
And binds them close together!

'Tis spoken for a sheltered home,
Where we in peace may meet,
And for our lighted winter hearth,
Amid the driving sleet.

We praise Him for our smiling land,
Stern foe of rude disorder,
Who greets the poor of every clime
Within her own green border.

Who, mid her ample forest-robes,
A place and home provides them,
Till states grow up, and call her blest
Above all folk besides them.

Praise for her free and fertile soil—
So generous in the tilling—
It fills each home with summer gifts
Amid this tedious chilling.

Praise for the dew on springing grass,
Where merry insects leap,
The reaper's song, the rushing scythe,
The corn-shocks on the steep.

But most we bless Him for the word
Of love to us that 's given,
To span the dusk of human hearts
With radiant hues of Heaven.

This sunshine on the stormy clouds
Of grief, or care, or crime,
Causes to spring, in shadiest paths,
Great light at evening-time.

AUNT TABITHA'S FIRESIDE.

No. IV.—THE OLD CEDAR CHEST.

BY EDITH WOODLEY.

"MAY I come in, Aunt Tabitha?" said Paul, at the same time rapping with his knuckles against the door of a little back parlor.

"Yes, child, if you want to. Lizzie, open the door."

"How snug and comfortable you look!" he said, as he entered.

"Yes, I had a fire kindled here, 'cause I wanted to look over some things in the old cedar chest."

"How lucky I am! I have had a longing to get a peep into that chest ever since I was allowed to eat my meals without a bib? I have imagined it to contain all sorts of things, but I believe my ideal fell short of the real. If I were the owner of all it contains, I might set up for a virtuoso."

"I hope you 'll al'ays try to be vartuous, whether you are the owner of it or not; but I can tell you that there is nothin' in it of any great vally."

"I suppose that Lizzie and I may look at anything we please?"

"To be sure you may."

Unconditional liberty being granted, the fingers of Paul and Lizzie were at once wandering amid a chaos of dilapidated fans, some of them radiant in pictorial embellishments, others in all the glory of tiffany and spangles; broken plumes, which, having waved and nodded over the brow of their greatgrandmother, afterward did the same piece of service for their spinster aunt; and satin slippers, with heels so high that the fair wearer, in order to maintain a true equilibrium, must have possessed the dexterity of a rope-dancer.

Interspersed with these were well-burnished, worn-out thimbles, nat-pins with bead-like heads, silver and steel shoe buckles, and odd halves of scissors which, as they lay gleaming in the lamp-light, had a savage and ominous appearance, calling up associations widely diverse from the clipping of lawns, laces, and linens, the matching of the ends of silver-flowered ribbons, or the cutting off of a used-up needleful of thread.

But something Paul took to be a letter, which he found lying at the bottom of the chest, excited his curiosity much more than these relics of industry and finery of the days which were gone. It was folded in the form of a square, except that one of the angles was rather acute, into which the superscription was crowded, as if ashamed to be seen. He saw that it was his aunt's name, and, holding it up to his view, he said—

"You told us we might look at everything; may we also look into everything?"

"Yes, I s'pose you may," said his aunt, sharply eyeing the letter.

All at once she recognized it.

"If that ain't funny!" said she. "I thought I burnt that 'ere letter at least twenty years ago."

"Who wrote it, aunt?" said Paul.

"La! little Markey Beel, I s'pose. He was a harmless little soul as ever breathed the breath of life, but had a softish place in his head."

"He was one of your old beaux, was he not, aunt?" asked Lizzie.

"Get out with your nonsense, child. What do you expect that the sparks, or the beaux as you call 'em, ever wanted to write to me about?"

"The same as they would to other handsome girls," said Paul. "I have often wondered why so handsome a woman as you are should have remained in single blessedness."

"I can easily satisfy your curiosity on that score. Those that would have me I wouldn't have, and those that I would have, wouldn't have me."

"The reasons you give are certainly conclusive; but I am afraid that you were rather too particular."

"I don't think I was a bit too much so. The first suitor I ever had was little Markey Beel, that writ that 'ere letter you are holdin' in your hand. I was only fifteen years old, and all the gals—I amongs the rest—thought he was dreadful handsome; and so he was arter a sartain fashion. His face was as delicate as a woman's—clear red and white, for you see he was larnin' the tailor's trade, and so worked under kiver. There 's no knowin' but that I should 'ave had him if he had stayed where he was; but the man he was sarvin' his time with went off down below, and Markey had to go with him. I wouldn't engage myself to him; but, arter a while, I consented to correspond, though I told him that I shouldn't write him anything but friendly letters. It was full three weeks before I received a letter from him, arter he went away, which I begun to think was kind o' strange, seein' he was so airnest about writin'! Now brother John—that's your father, you know, Paul—was al'ays tormentin' me about Markey, and, as I sat readin' the letter, John stole up behind my chair, on tiptoe, and peeped over my shoulder. The first warnin' I had of his bein' there was his burstin' right out a laughin'. I knew in a minute what he was laughin' at, for, though I didn't pretend to any great larnin' myself, I could spell a leetle better than Markey could, for he never would study when he went to school."

"Do let Lizzie and I read it, aunt," said Paul.

"I don't know as 'twould be raly right; but here—Markey has gone off to the Ohio country, and the last I heern tell of him he was called a good citizen, and was gettin' along nicely. He married Sally Place—a purty, harmless little soul as ever lived. It isn't likely that she would ever set a river afire, if she should undertake it; but that put her on an equal footin' with Markey."

"As this speech of Aunt Tabitha was considered an indirect consent to Paul's request, he opened the letter, where, occupying one side of a half sheet of foolscap, was displayed the following, of which it may be premised the chirography was quite equal to the orthography:—

ASTEAMED FRIND,

I dont no but whought yule think strange I havent rit to you afore, but Ive hen sick with the slough fever, and it made my hed feel so week I larsent rite for fear twould make it feel weeker. Ive thot on you over and over agin, and tried to hink to myself whought you were doin. Sumtimes it seemed to me that you wor rite afore my face and eyes spinnin linnin close by the back winder, and then I thort to myself, if I had wings like an eagle, Ide fly in less than no time, and peerch rite down on the winder sill close by you. Then agin, set at night, when I set kinder sollum-like, miditten, I seam to see you plain as day milkin the cows in the barn yard, and then I long to peerch myself ite on to the west eend of the ridge pole of the barn where I could look down on you. I hope and pray, my asteamed frind, that twill never be your ortin to have a slough fever, for nobody nose whought an ugly thing it is if they never experienced it. Rite soon, and let me no if you are enoyin the great blessing of health, also if Sally Place cose yet if she is cummin down here to larn a milliners trade. I will now close with two lines of poetry rit by a poet.

Idle walk three times round the market place,
To get wun look of your sweet face.

I remain your lovin frind and

Yours to sarve,

MARK BEEL."

"Did you answer Mark's letter?" inquired Lizzie, when she and Paul had finished reading it.

"Yes, I writ him a line or two, jest to answer his question about Sally Place. If it hadn't been for my word's sake, I wouldn't done even that, for rother John teased and tormented me so about that terrible 'slough fever,' that I wished Markey had been in Guinea afore I'd ever agreed to correspond with him."

"Father was right in teasing you, I suspect," said Paul; "for, as diseases are sometimes hereditary in family, I should have considered it a sad affair to have had half a dozen cousins liable at any moment to be seized with such a terrible disease as the 'slough fever,' especially if attended with such symptoms as a longing to sit on ridge-poles."

"Well, one thing is hereditary, sartain, and that is nonsense, for you are exactly as nonsensical as your father was when he was of your age."

"I shouldn't wish to take after a better man; but come, aunt, let us hear who was your next beau," and, as he spoke, he took up what appeared to be the ivory head of a cane.

"If that ain't curious!" said Aunt Tabitha.

"What is curious?"

"Why, that you should light upon that cane-head, jest as you asked who was my next beau. I had no more idee that it was in the land of the livin' than I had that Markey's letter was."

"Whose cane did it belong to?" said Lizzie.

"Why, old Beau Benner's, as folks call him. You and Paul have seen him many a time. He was a mighty spruce-lookin' chap when he was young, al'ays walked with a cane, and wore his hair powdered and tied in a queue. And you'd sildom see him without a red waistcoat and white-topped boots. Well, you see he took kind of a fancy to me, and invited me to go with him to the general trainin'. There were as many as eight or ten couples of young folks goin' from our place—brother John and his intended, Jim Pringle and his gal, Peter Barton and his sister Dolly, and a good many besides. The trainin' was to be about a dozen miles off, so it gave a chance for a good ride. Well, you see that private houses were open to entertain people on sich a great occasion; and, as the trainin' was to begin purty airly in the mornin', we all concluded it would be best to go the night afore, for fear we shouldn't be in season to see the sham fight. Moses Benner kind o' took the lead in sich things, in them days, and he contrived it so that we all met in one place, and, when we started, there was a nice long string of horses and shays, I can tell you. Moeses and I went in the first shay, brother John and his intended in the next, and the rest follered on arter in reg'lar order. We arrived at head quarters in grand good season, and we gals had a nice large room all to ourselves, where we could fix our ruffles and ribbons as much as we were a mind to.

"You see I was al'ays a mighty airly riser, and so were John's intended, and Dolly and Esther Barton, who lodged in the same room with me, so that long afore sunrise we were all up and dressed out in style, so that all we should have to do, when 'twas time to go to see the trainin', would be to clap on our bonnets and shawls. We sot ourselves down by the winders, but there wan't a single soul stirrin'. It wan't a great while, however, afore we seed Moeses Benner come out of the hotel, where he and some of the other sparks that calc'lated they were the tip-top, put up. You see it had jest begun to be the fashion for young men to wear tassels to their boots, and Moeses, who al'ays carried everything to extremes which belonged to dress, had a pair to his as large agin as the common size, and with such long cords to 'em that they swung out, every time he stepped, the matter of three or four inches. Well, there wasn't a soul in sight, so I s'pose he thought he'd practise a few of the airs and graces such as he calc'lated on when the people were round so that they could see him. So he hild up his head so fur that it seemed as if he was lookin' arter somethin' in the sky, flourished his cane, and stepped short and quick so as to make his boot-tasseis fly out. Once in a while he would look down to see if they flew out to his mind, but the major part of the time he kept his eyes turned up to the sky, and, take him all in all, he looked and acted more like a nateral fool than it's ever been my lot to see a body in the whole course of my life.

"As ill luck would have it, there was a nice, honest-lookin' old cow layin' on the side of the road, that hadn't got her nap out, and as Moses was walkin' along, grand as if he thought the ground wasn't good enough for him to step on, he came plump agin the poor old cow, as much to her surprise, I guess, as to his. Moses, of course, went down, while the innocent cause of his disaster made all haste to get up. He follered her example as soon as possible, and with his handkercher wiped off the mud and dirt from his buff-colored pantaloons and the sleeves of his coat as well as he could. The gals laughed some I guess, and I wasn't slow to jine 'em, I can tell you. When he called to wait on me to the trainin', Dolly Barton put on a mighty long face, and said to him, jest as grave and sober as if she had been a judge, 'I hope, Mr. Benner,' says she, 'that you were not seriously injured by your fall this mornin'.' The land, how red the critter turned, while he muttered over somethin' to himself, what we couldn't tell exactly, but it sounded as if he said that he wa'n't much hurt."

"'I am glad to hear it,' said Dolly, 'and I hope the poor cow came off as well as you did; but I don't think you did right to disturb her mornin' slumbers.'"

"By this time the curiosity of the young men in company with Moses was purty well roused up, so Dolly, lookin' all the time as demure as if butter wouldn't melt in her mouth, went on to tell the whole story in sich a funny, queer way, pretendin' all the time to pity Moses dreadfully, so as to set us all to laughin' in spite of ourselves. If Moses hadn't been a fool, he would 'ave jined us, but, instead of that, he looked as 'shamed as a dog. He didn't hold his head dreadful high the rest of the day, I can tell you, which was a lucky circumstance, I thought; for, if he had walked in the same kind o' style as when he was practising his airs and graces airly in the mornin', something worse might have happened than his stumblin' over an old cow. Well, he waited on me round to see the trainin', and home to my father's door, and that was the last of it."

"But how came you by this ivory cane-head?" said Paul.

"Why you see when I arrived home, afore he helped me out of the shay, he leaned his cane up agin the side of the house, and went off and forgot it. It stood in the entry a long time, but he neve called for it, and so arter your father was married and you 'd got to be old enough to ride stick horses you spied out the cane one day, and ever arter that it sarved you for a horse. You used it purty rough I guess, for you soon got the head off; but how o' airth it come to be in the old cedar chist I neve shall know."

"And were these two the only ones you wouldn't have?" asked Paul.

"La! no indeed. 'Twould be a tedious undertakin to give you a list of 'em all. Among others, there was Jabe Hardick, and when I tell you that he is full as handsome now as he was in his young days you'll have some idee of his looks."

"He is certainly no Adonis now," said Paul.

"He was most dreadful hard favored, but he was well to do in the world, and I tried desp'rate hard to like him, and I begun to think I should succeed when one day brother John said to me, 'Tabitha says he, 'if you marry Jabe, you must sow a good lot of saffron in your garden.' 'Why?' says I, jest innocent as a lamb. 'Cause,' says he, 'you'll have to give him a good dose of saffron-tea as often as once a day, sartain, to keep his ugly looks from strikin' to his stomach.' Well, if you'll believe me, I never could see poor Jabe arterward, but that the saffron-tea popped right into my head, so that I could hardly laughin' right out in his face. Well, he kept lookin' worse and worse to me, and afore long gin him the mitten. It didn't quite break his heart as he pretended it would, for in six weeks arterward he was married to Darcus Townner. There, I've told you enough about my old sparks for once, don't ask me to say another word."

LIFE.

BY HELEN C. LEWIS.

Oh, 'tis a weary thing to live
When the silver tide of youthful feeling
Grows dim with the touch of sorrow's tone,
And the lonely heart can find no rest
From the dreary storm of life!

When the hopes that once so brightly shone,
But linger in memory, and the flowers,
That once on our pathway bloomed so sweet,
Lie faded and scentless, and all are gone—
Gone to return no more!

Oh, 'tis a blissful thing to die
When the soul is sick of this empty show,
And the spirit is longing to be at rest,
Where care comes never, and all is peace,
In that far-off land of love!

Is it a sin to long for death
When the music of life has lost its charm?
When all that we love to Heaven have gone,
Can it be sinful then to say,
I would I were with them there

THE EMIGRANT FAMILY; OR, THE SECRET OF SUCCESS.

BY MARY S. B. SHINDLER (LATE MRS. DANA).

It was just about the hour of noon, on a clear winter's day, when a stanch vessel, which had weathered several severe Atlantic storms, approached, with all sails set, the noble harbor of Charleston, South Carolina. The ship was crowded with passengers, young and old, rich and poor, joyful and sad; a heterogeneous mass of human beings. Upon the quarter-deck stood many a merry group, who, having just thrown aside their motley sea attire, and dressed themselves in clean and wholesome shore equipments, could scarcely restrain the buoyancy of spirits called forth by the occasion. Many, after a longer or shorter sojourn in foreign lands, were now returning home to greet their numerous friends, while others were eagerly anticipating the pleasure of a speedy introduction to novel scenes and new and valuable acquaintances.

The pilot, who was to conduct the vessel over the somewhat dangerous bar at the entrance of the harbor, had jumped aboard from his little craft about an hour before, and was now strutting to and fro with a consequential air, in all the pride of absolute authority, and giving his incessant orders with voice so stentorian that it might almost have been mistaken for the thunder of great Jupiter himself.

But neither with the passengers of the quarter-deck, nor with the consequential, round-bodied little lot, has this veracious history anything to do; and, therefore, turning our backs as civilly as may be upon le bon ton of the vessel, we will straightaway introduce ourselves into the steerage, and look about us as well as the darkness will allow. We do not propose to favor our readers with any specimens of "high life below stairs," "romance in humble life," or the like, but intend to deliver "a plain, unvarnished tale," and relate circumstances none the less interesting for being natural and unbelabored.

In the gloomy recesses of the steerage, a scene of the same nature with that which had already been enacted in the cabin was now going forward, only in an aggravated form. There was scrubbing and scolding, there was combing and cursing, there was dressing and dubbing. Obstreperous little ones, who evidently did not understand the character of the times upon which they had fallen, nor comprehend the reasons why they should not still be allowed to enjoy their liberty, and revel in their accustomed filth, gave loud and hearty tokens of their wounded sensibilities, and danced and kicked, and screamed with continually increasing vigor, till manfully for their hitherto-accorded rights, and heroically disputing every inch of ground.

Yet, amid this scene of dire confusion, there were some calm hearts, and composed, though careworn, countenances. There was one family, consisting of seven persons, which a discriminating observer would immediately have singled out from all the rest. Amid the general turmoil, their quiet demeanor, and the look of lofty resignation which sat upon their faces, could not fail to attract, nay, even to rivet, the attention of the bystander. We shall, for the sake of convenience, bestow upon them the fictitious name of Clarke. There were, as I have said, seven persons, the father and mother, one daughter of seventeen, and four boys, of the ages of nine, seven, four, and two years respectively. They were an Irish family, possessing all the lofty enthusiasm of their countrymen, together with more than a common share of quiet, unostentatious fortitude. The mother was one of a thousand; for, though the father was by no means destitute of a strong and lofty tone of character, she it was especially, who, like a ministering angel, comforted them in sorrow, strengthened them in weakness, and aroused them from despondency. Possessing, naturally, a superior mind, she had secured for herself a remarkably solid education, and thus appeared far above the humble station in which she was now moving. She was indisputably the mainstay of the family, their unyielding bulwark. We shall hereafter learn the secret of her strength.

Among the passengers, there was yet another of a somewhat different stamp; but our history includes him likewise. Patrick Mulligan was a free-hearted, open-handed, high-souled young man; a genuine Irishman, unsuspecting and improvident, possessing far more heart than head, far more heartiness than heedfulness. You could not help liking Patrick, as you looked upon his open, ruddy Irish face; and, especially, as you gazed into his round, clear Irish eye—that peculiar eye, so characteristic of the nation—the heart of the spectator, if he had a heart, would unconsciously go forth to greet him. In his own country, he had been a neighbor of the Clarks; and now, both father and mother being dead, he had joined their fortunes, and was cared for by Mrs. Clarke as if he had been her own dear son. She found him wild and wayward, it is true; but what cannot judicious kindness accomplish? It was Mrs. Clarke's fervent belief that nothing could stand before it; that no heart, however wickedly disposed, could resist its constant influence. Now, this Patrick Mulligan was the undeclared lover of Bridget Clarke.

So now behold the vessel arrived; all her passengers ashore; all quietness where, so late, confusion reigned supreme. The Clarke family, with young Mulligan, had domesticated themselves in obscure lodgings in that portion of the city called "the Neck." Nor were they without their sufferings. A succession of misfortunes had befallen them, both before and since they left their country: bad crops; long sicknesses, and corresponding doctor's bills; deaths, funeral expenses; and, finally, a shipwreck, with its terrible losses—all these had come upon them, so that now they found themselves in a strange land, destitute of even the necessities of life.

But they lost no time, and wasted no strength in complaining: this would have been madness, nay, suicide; and, so far from helping them out of their troubles, would have been an infinite aggravation to them. If work was anywhere to be had, they were determined to find it; and, when they had found it, faithfully and cheerfully to do it. But where were they to procure employment? To whom were they to apply? It was not the case in Charleston, as in the northern cities, that the poor, in their extremity, could wend their way to intelligence offices, and perchance find employment. So they knew not what steps to take; but, "at any rate," they said among themselves, "we can but try." "The man who tries," said Mrs. Clarke, "has already more than half succeeded." Accordingly, one morning, after a poor and scanty breakfast, Mr. Clarke and Patrick sallied forth together in search of work.

Meanwhile, the mother took her seat upon a log by the empty fireplace—for chair or fire had they not—and patiently darned and patched the whole long morning through; occasionally raising her eyes to give a look of encouragement to Bridget and the boys, who were poring over a few tattered books, and trying their best to teach and to be taught. By and by, the allotted tasks being over, the boys threw aside their books, and tried, for their mother's sake, to get up one of their merry plays. Still, the morning wore heavily away. The sensation of hunger is no very pleasant one; and this, considering what they had eaten for the three preceding days, they could not help feeling. Yet Hope whispered to them all, "By and by, our absent ones will return; and who knows what good tidings they may bring?" Twelve o'clock arrived—they could plainly hear the strokes of a neighboring clock—one, two, three o'clock had come, and they had not returned. Mrs. Clarke looked pale and exhausted, but calmly resolute. No human eye could discern the conflict in her soul, the obstinately intruding anxieties, the frightful imaginings, nor the strong resolving, the earnest petitioning. She pressed her pale lips closely together, and strove to smile.

At length, at nightfall, came the wanderers home; but they brought nothing with them; nothing, not even hope; and Mrs. Clarke was obliged, as usual, to console and encourage them all. "Never mind," said she, "let us go supperless to bed; we may get something to do to-morrow."

"Always to-morrow! always to-morrow!" said her husband, quite impatiently, as he sat on one end of the log, and buried his face in his hands. "To-morrow will not help us to live to-day."

The children, poor little creatures, controlled their emotions manfully for a time; but, hearing now their father's complaining tones, they all began to cry, though silently, and without any ostentation.

"You had better go to the baker's at the corner, father," said Mrs. Clarke, addressing her husband; "tell him frankly our sufferings, and entreat him, for the love of Heaven, to let us have a loaf to keep the children from starving. Tell him we'll be sure to pay him some time or other; for God has not utterly forsaken us, and we'll come out of our trouble yet."

"Mother, I cannot!" replied the husband. "The dark hour is on me now, and I haven't the heart to speak to a human being."

"Well, I have, father," said Mrs. Clarke, soothingly, and yet decidedly. "I'll go to the baker's myself. Sit you there, honey, and do what you can to keep the children warm. Don't cry, darlings; mother'll come back soon, and, maybe, fetch a loaf of bread with her."

So saying, she departed, wrapping, ere she went, an old, faded blanket-shawl around the two youngest children, as they sat huddled together on the floor. Many prayers went with her; for, as I said before, she was the ministering angel of the family, and always inspired them with strength for the present, and hope for the future. It was Saturday night, and there was a crowd of people in the baker's shop; but she resolutely entered, and took her stand to wait her turn for being served. There was that about her, however, which, at first sight, inspired respect; and so the shopman soon addressed her with—

"Well, madam, what will you have?"

"I would have bread for my starving children," replied the woman; "but, sir, I have no money. Let me have some bread," she continued, her voice beginning to falter—"let me have some bread, for the love of Heaven, and I'm sure we'll be able to pay you hereafter. If not, God will reward those who help the needy."

The shopman looked at her sternly, and shook his head; but he quailed before the agonized glance of her searching eyes.

"No," he said, at length; "I work hard to support my own family, and I have nothing to give to beggars."

Mrs. Clarke drew herself up to her full height, and replied, firmly, though without the slightest appearance of resentment—

"I am no beggar, sir. I ask you for bread, with the promise of future payment, if not from me, from Heaven."

She spoke with all the eloquence of unmitigated agony, and her eye kindled as she raised her thin, pale hand to Heaven. The crowd had unconsciously gathered round her, and were watching the scene with the most intense interest; for there is something in genuine feeling which at once finds its way to the universal human heart.

The baker seemed to waver in his stern resolution, and laid his hand upon a loaf of bread which was upon the shelf; but his evil genius was soon again at work.

"I cannot do it," at length he said. "I've been imposed upon so many times that I have been obliged to make a rule not to give to people whom I do not know. I would not be doing justice to my family, if I gave a loaf of bread to everybody who chose to ask for it."

Mrs. Clarke said nothing for a moment; but, at length, she replied—

"Oh, sir! may you never know what it is to ask for a morsel in God's name, and be refused! But, sir," she continued, "I cannot even now believe that you are in earnest; I cannot think that you will let us starve! For the love of God, sir, do not send me empty away!"

She had conquered! The baker took three large loaves from his shelf and handed them to her, while she, with her eyes now full of tears, could only articulate, "God bless you, sir!"

Heaven helps those who help themselves. As Mrs. Clarke turned to leave the shop, more than one kind hand was stretched forth with its offering. Some offered money, and some offered bread. Having enough for present necessities, however, she declined these offerings with many thanks. "But," added she, "we are strangers, and do not know where to get employment. If you can help us to get work, we will thank and bless you." And then, having given information where they could be found, in case any one had work to give them—such work as could be done by men, women, or children—she bowed kindly to all around her, and quickly sought her home.

Over the short space between the baker's shop and her humble dwelling, she rather flew than walked. Oh, what relief and joy was she carrying to her household! How quickly the children dried their tears, and ran to ease her of her precious burden!

"God is always with you, mother," said her husband. "What is the reason you never fail in that which you set out to do?"

"Because, father," she replied, "I endeavor to be always sure that I am doing what is right; and that assurance gives me courage. I nearly came home to-night, though, without any bread."

"But you put your trust in God, mother," said the husband, "and made another trial. Wasn't that the way?"

"Yes, I have strong faith in God, and in man, too," replied the wife. "It is because we do not expect to find goodness in our fellow-men, and do not encourage its development, that we no oftener find it. In more senses than one, I believe that 'he that seeketh findeth.' If a man seeks for evil in his fellow-men, he is sure to find it; and, on the other hand, if he seeks and expects goodness, that finds he likewise. I would not lose my faith in human nature for the world; it has carried me through many a discouraging encounter. But I never yet have found the heart that had not some soft, tender spot about it, which could be reached by judicious means."

"You never gave me up, Mrs. Clarke," chimed in Patrick Malligan, munching, meanwhile, a crust of bread. "You never gave me up, though everybody else did. If it had not been for your unwearied patience, your kindness, your trust in me when there seemed little ground for trust, where would I be now? What would I be? Och, Pat, my darlin'! ye owe ivrything to Mrs. Clarke!"

"I begin to think you are right, mother," said Mr. Clarke, "in thinking better of men than I do. I begin to think your philosophy is a sounder one than mine; at all events, it brings forth better fruits. I have some faith in God, but very little, I confess, in men."

"Now, father," said Mrs. Clarke, "I'll tell you how I reason about it. Man was originally made in the image of his Creator, and it becomes us to do all we can to restore that lost or hidden likeness. Now, I am constantly on the watch for it; I believe it is there, though so unquestionably dimmed, nay, almost effaced. By continually addressing myself to the principle of goodness, if there is the smallest remnant of it left, I am sure to find it. We are now in a strange land; but, I tell you, we shall find friends, and rise yet out of this gloomy abyss into which we seem to have fallen. I am sure of it. Even this night I have seen indications of it; and, depend upon it, on Monday morning some of those kind persons I saw in the baker's shop will come to offer us employment and the means of living. Ah, my children!" she continued, turning to the little group, who, having satisfied their appetites, were gazing earnestly into their mother's speaking countenance—"ah, my children, the secret of all the success I have ever had in life has been my faith in God and in my fellow-men; and just so far as I have lost this compound, though not inharmonious, faith, has my evil star been in the ascendent."

NOTE.—I am happy to be able to state that the above cheering prediction was abundantly verified.

VICISSITUDES OF FORTUNE.

A FRAGMENT FROM A TRUE HISTORY.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF SCHILLER

ALORSTUS, Count of G, was the son of a citizen of rank, engaged in ish service. The terms of his happy genius were unfolded, at an early age, by a liberal education. While still very young, but with a mind furnished with substantial attainments, he entered into military service with the sovereign of his land. Being a young man of high merit and of still higher expectation, it was only for a short time that he remained unknown to his master. G was in the full ardor of youth; the sovereign was also young: G was enthusiastic and enterprising; the sovereign, who was likewise so, loved such characters. Endowed with a rich vein of wit, and possessed of a copious fund of knowledge, G had the happy faculty of giving animation to his conversation, and of brightening up, by an always equable jovialty, every circle in which he mingled. He enjoyed the rare felicity of being always able to infuse a charm and life into every subject which presented itself to his consideration. The sovereign knew well how to appreciate in another excellent qualities which he possessed in a high degree in his own character. Everything that he undertook, his pastimes even, had an air of greatness. Though obstacles arose to impede his progress, they did not intimidate his spirit; and, though disappointments beset his path, never were they known to overcome his perseverance. The worth of these qualities was heightened by a commanding figure; his full form was a living picture of blooming health and Herculean strength, animated, as it was, by the lively play of an active spirit. In his features, gait, and bearing, there was apparent a natural majesty, which was finely softened by a noble look of intelligence. If the prince had reason to be charmed by the spirit of his young companion, it is no wonder that his susceptibility was captivated irresistibly by such an alluring exterior. Similarity of age, and harmony in their pursuits and characters, in a short time established a relation between them which possessed all the strength of friendship and all the fervor of impassioned love. G advanced with the utmost rapidity from one post of honor to another; yet these outward marks of regard seemed to fall far short of expressing the position which he really occupied in the heart of his sovereign. With astonishing rapidity and luxuriant growth, his good fortune continued to advance and mature, while the creator of it was his adorer, his ardent friend. Not yet two-and twenty years of age, he found himself elevated to a height at which those individuals even who have elsewhere experienced the greatest prosperity usually terminate their career. But his active spirit could not long rest in the dalliance of indolent inanity; he could not long continue to be satisfied with the glittering pageantry of a follower after the shadow of greatness, while he felt that he had sufficient courage and power to gain and enjoy it in its substance. While the sovereign was eagerly following the rounds of pleasure, the young favorite literally buried himself beneath statutes and books, and devoted himself with untiring application to the duties of his station. He finally became so expert and skillful in business, that every transaction, even though not of the highest importance, if it required prudence and care, passed through his hands. From being a companion of his amusements and pleasures, he soon became first counsellor and minister, and finally master, of his sovereign. His power soon became so great that the only access to the prince was through his favor. He conferred all offices and honors; all rewards were received from his hands.

G's prosperity came in too early youth; he had advanced to such a height of honor by too rapid strides to enjoy it with moderation. His success gave predominance to his love of honor; from contemplating himself at such an elevation, his ambition became giddy and headstrong. No sooner had he reached the last summit of his wishes than his usual discretion deserted him. He became infatuated, by observing the humble deference which was paid him by the first of the land, by all those even whom birth, consideration, and the gifts of fortune had rendered so very much his superiors. The condescension which even gray heads showed to him, so young a man, intoxicated his pride; while the unlimited power which he had gained soon caused a certain harshness to become apparent in his bearing. This want of mildness had been a characteristic in him always before, and it continued to cling to him, even through all the vicissitudes of his fortune. There was no labor which he would not undertake for the sake of gratifying his friends; no service, which he could render, was too great for them to claim of him. His enemies, however, must fear and tremble at his power. As he far overstepped the ordinary bounds of benevolence on the one hand, so he fell very far short of due moderation in his revenge. He made little use of his influence to enrich himself; he preferred to make many prosperous who, out of gratitude, would be bound to pay homage to himself as the creator of their fortunes. It was caprice, however—not a sense of justice—which directed him in the choice of the subjects of his favor. By a haughty, imperious bearing he estranged from himself the hearts of those whom he had most obliged; while he, at the same time, had the misfortune to transform his rivals and secret enviers into just so many implacable enemies.

Among those who watched every movement that he made with eyes of jealousy and envy, and already were preparing in secret the instruments with which to effect his overthrow, was a certain Piedmontian count, Joseph Martinengo, one of the sovereign's suit. G, regarding this individual as a creature wholly inoffensive and entirely devoted to his interest, had advanced him by his own influence to this station, which he allowed him to hold at the pleasure of his master. In exchange for this position, which he had occupied previously himself, and of which he now began to grow tired, he with too great willingness accepted an office whose character was higher and more substantial, whose duties were more onerous and engrossing. He was wont to regard this man as a work of his own hand, which he could degrade again to the nothingness from which he had raised it, at any moment when he should deem it proper. He was consequently living in the firm assurance that the count would serve him as well out of gratitude as from fear. This caused him to fall into an error precisely similar to the one which Richelieu committed when he allowed the young le grand to be the playfellow of Louis the XIII. But, without being able to correct this error with Richelieu's spirit, he was doomed to contend with a more artful enemy than the one which the French minister had encountered. Instead of appearing elated at his prosperity, and allowing his benefactor to feel that he must now spare him, whether he would or not, Martinengo daily became more cautious and circumspect in his deportment. He strove to maintain the appearance of dependence, and, by pretending to be thus submissive and humble, he was constantly becoming more closely united to the creator of his fortune. At the same time, he did not neglect to use, to their full extent, the opportunities which his position afforded him of being often in the company of the sovereign; indeed, he allowed no occasion of gradually advancing himself in favor, and of making himself necessary and indispensable to him, to pass unimproved. In a short time he was intimately acquainted with the mind of his master: he had spied out every approach to his confidence, and unobserved had insinuated himself into his good graces. The Italian was putting in practice all those arts and subtrefuges which the minister, from a noble pride and natural elevation of soul, had learned to despise. Indeed, in order to the attainment of his end, he did not scorn to make use of the very lowest means. It soon became apparent to him that the man with whom he was dealing nowhere needed a guide and an assistant so much as in the road to vice. He was, at the same time, well aware that nothing more effectually contributes to a bold, unshrinking confidence between individuals, than a mutual knowledge of the secret weaknesses in each other's character. Accordingly, he set himself to work to awaken passions in the prince which, until then, slumbered in his bosom in silence. At such a crisis, he would urge himself upon him, in order that he might become by this means his confidant and abettor. He allured him to such places of debauchery as afforded the fewest witnesses, and where he would be least likely to meet with associates who would become privy to his excesses. By this means he led him imperceptibly to repose secrets in himself, a third of which he took care to reject. He thus succeeded finally in establishing the infamous plan of making his fortune on the moral debasement of the sovereign; and that, too, while the secret was an essential means to its success. He thus gained the heart of the sovereign, before G allowed himself even so much as to suspect that he shared his master's confidence with another.

It is a matter well calculated to excite surprise that a change of such momentous importance should have escaped the usually penetrating eye of G. He was, however, too conscious of his own worth to regard, even so much as in imagination only, such a man as Martinengo as his rival; while the latter was too cautious, too much on his guard, to draw his opponent from his proud security by any want of discretion in himself. The very same error that had caused thousands before him to slip on the smooth surface of a sovereign's favor, also precipitated G from his dazzling height—an overweening confidence in himself. The secret alliance between Martinengo and his master caused in him no disquiet. It was with feelings of pleasure that he bestowed on a man just coming into notice a fortune which, at heart, he despised himself, and which had never been the aim of his exertions. The friendship of the sovereign had possessed a charm for him only so long as that alone could advance him in the way to the highest power, and his guide had no sooner enabled him to reach the long-wished-for eminence than he carelessly allowed him to fall behind.

Martinengo was not the man to be satisfied with a position of so subordinate a character. At every advancement which he made in the favor of his master, his aims became bolder and his wishes more extended, until his ambition finally began to aspire after a position of a more substantial and satisfying nature. The artful character of assumed subordination, which he had always until now maintained towards his benefactor, was constantly becoming more burdensome to him in proportion as the increase of his consideration more fully awakened his pride. The bearing of the minister towards him did not become refined in a degree corresponding to the rapid advancement which he was making in the favor of the sovereign; indeed, it often seemed apparent enough that his opponent so regulated his behavior as to humble his rising pride by a salutary reference to his origin. Consequently, this relation, which was such a restraint upon his actions and so contradictory to his feelings, finally became so irksome to him that he went to work in earnest and devised a plan to end his uneasiness at once by the overthrow of his rival. Under the impenetrable veil of dissimulation, he brooded over this plan until he had brought it to full maturity. Not yet, however, had he the assurance to venture to measure himself with his rival in open conflict. Though the first bloom of the favor which G had enjoyed was past, for all this his influence was very formidable. It dated its origin too far back, and had planted its roots too deeply in the affections of the young sovereign, to be so readily eradicated from his bosom. The least circumstance, even the most trivial incident, would be enough to restore it to its original freshness and strength. Such being the case, Martinengo was well aware that the blow which he was to inflict must be an annihilating blow. What G had lost perhaps in his sovereign's love he had gained in his reverence: the more the latter withdrew himself from the affairs of government, the less readily could he dispense with the services of the man who took care of his interests, even those connected with the finances of the country, with the most faithful devotion and conscientious exactness. Thus in former days he had been dear to the prince as a friend, but now he was important to him as a minister.

What the particular means were by which the Italian succeeded in his design has remained a secret known to but few: the only persons privy to it were they who experienced the blow, and they by whom it was inflicted. It is supposed by some that he laid before the sovereign the original of a secret and very suspicious correspondence which G had maintained unquestionably, as it would appear, with a neighboring court. Whether these documents were genuine or counterfeit is a point on which there is a diversity of opinion. But, as there was a possibility of his having been really engaged in such a correspondence, the courtier reached his end by taking a step of such a fearful nature. G appeared in the eyes of his sovereign the most ungrateful of creatures, the blackest of traitors; and his crime was regarded as so free from all doubt, that he believed himself authorized to proceed immediately against him, without further investigation. Everything was discussed and arranged between Martinengo and his master with the deepest secrecy: so quietly was everything conducted, that G, not even once from a distance, observed the thunderstorm that was gathering over his head. He remained in this fatal security until the awful moment in which, from an object of universal reverence and envy, he was doomed to sink to an object of the deepest pity and of universal compassion.

When the decisive day had come, G repaired, as was his wont, to the place of parade. From an ensign-bearer he had risen, during the course of a few years, to the rank of colonel. Even this elevated position was but a modest name for the dignity of the ministerial office, with which he was in fact invested, and which elevated him above the first in the land. The parade-ground was the place where his pride received universal homage, where in one brief hour he enjoyed a greatness and pre-eminence in comparison with which the remainder of the day seemed a burden. On these occasions, the first in rank approached him with timidity, nay, almost with reverence, and those who were not absolutely certain of his good will, with anxiety and trembling. Whenever the sovereign himself happened to be on the ground, he always found himself beneath his vizier in consideration. The power of the latter was very considerable; it was so dangerous to incur his displeasure that not even the friendship of the former proved availing. This very place, where he had been wont heretofore to be honored as a god, was now chosen as the stage for the awful exhibition of his humiliation.

With a careless air he entered the well-known circle which, as ignorant of what was to happen as himself, opened before him this day, as usual, with every mark of respect, waiting his orders. It was not long before Martinengo appeared, accompanied by several adjutants; he was no longer the pliant courtier, full of low bows and smiles. Impudent, and with the pride of a clown, he resembled a lackey who had just become his own master. He stalked towards him with a proud, haughty step, and, with his head covered, stopped in front of him, demanding his sword in the name of the sovereign. It was handed to him with a look of silent consternation. Seizing it, and resting the end of the bare blade upon the ground, he broke it in two by a single tread, and let the pieces fall at the feet of G. The signal was no sooner given than the adjutants both fell upon him; one hastened to cut the cross of the order from his bosom, while the other pulled off both epaulets as well as the rest of the uniform, and tore the cord and plume from his hat. During the whole of this frightful performance, which proceeded with incredible rapidity, there was not to be heard, in an assembly of more than five hundred men who stood about in a dense mass, a single utterance, a single respiration. With pale countenances, with swelling hearts, and in a deathlike stupor, the multitude stood in a circle around him; while he, in this awful situation—a strange sight, combining the grotesque and the terrific—endured for a time what no one can experience except at the place of execution. A thousand others, situated as he was, would have been stretched senseless on the ground by the force of this first fright; his more powerful nervous system and his strong soul enabled him to endure the dreadful sensations of this frightful state to the end, and to exhaust all its terrors.

Scarcely was this operation ended when they conducted him through the midst of innumerable spectators to the outer extremity of the parade-ground, where a covered carriage stood in readiness to receive him. He was ordered in silence, by a gesture, to mount the vehicle; an escort of hussars attended him. The rumor of this proceeding meantime had spread through the whole town; every window flew open, every street was filled with the inquisitive. They rent the air with their shouts, as they followed him with their eyes; his name was repeated amid the alternate exclamations of ridicule, of ill-concealed joy, and still more of heartfelt compassion and sympathetic grief for his misfortune. He finally found himself in the country, freed from the gaze of impertinent curiosity: but here a new cause of alarm awaited him. They soon turned the carriage from the main road into an unfrequented path, long since deserted by men; it was the way to the place of execution, towards which they conducted him slowly, as they had been expressly commanded by the sovereign. After causing him to feel on this road all the anguish of the tortures of death, they again changed their course and sought a public road. In the scorching heat of the sun, without refreshments, without exchanging a word with a fellow-being, he passed seven dismal hours in that carriage, which finally stopped just as the sun was disappearing in the west. They had reached the fortress, the place of his destination, which was to be his future abode. A fast of twelve hours and parching thirst had finally overpowered his gigantic nature. Bereft of consciousness, he was lying in a state intermediate between life and death. They drew him from the vehicle while he was entirely insensible of the whole transaction, and lowered him into a frightful pit beneath the ground. The first object that presents itself to his view, upon his again opening his eyes to a new life, is the gray wall of a dismal prison. He can scarcely distinguish surrounding objects, as his abode is but faintly lighted by a few straggling beams from the moon, which, penetrating a few narrow fissures, fall upon him to the depth of nineteen fathoms. By his side he discovers some miserable bread, as well as a water-cress, and near by a bundle of straw for his bed. He remained in this situation until the following mid-day, when a shutter at length opened and two hands became visible. From this opening there is let down to him in a suspending basket a fresh supply of the same kind of food that he found here on the preceding day. During the whole of this terrible change in his fortune, pain and anxious solicitude now, for the first time, wrung from him a few questions: "How came I here? What crime have I committed?" But no answer came from above; the hands disappeared, and again the shutter closed. Not allowed to see the face of a fellow-being, not even to hear a human voice, without any explanation in reference to this dreadful change in his condition, in equal fear and uncertainty as regards both the future and the past, revived by no warm rays of light, refreshed by no wholesome air, beyond the reach of all assistance, and, what is the most painful of all, unremembered in the general sympathy of mankind, in this place of condemnation he counts four hundred and ninety days of woe by means of that detestable bread, which was let down to him one mid-day after another in mournful uniformity. But a discovery which he makes on the very first day of his being in prison fills his cup of misery to the full. He recognizes this place. He was himself the one who, under the influence of feelings of low revenge, had it repaired but a few months before, in order that he might punish a deserving citizen, by throwing him into it and leaving him there to languish. The object of his resentment was a worthy officer, who had been so unfortunate as to draw upon himself his displeasure. By his own inventive cruelty he had furnished himself the means of rendering his stay in this prison a period of horror and anguish. It was not long before this that he made a journey to this place to inspect the building and hasten its completion. To increase his misery to the utmost, the very officer, an old colonel of high worth, for whom this prison was intended, is appointed successor in office to the lately deceased commander of the fortress, and thus from being the victim of the minister's revenge, he becomes the master of his fate. He was thus deprived of the last sorrowful consolation, the ability to pity himself; and such was his situation now that, however roughly fortune might handle him, he could never accuse her of injustice. To the poignant feeling of his misery was added a raging contempt of self, and what always proves the bitterest pain to proud hearts, the mortification of depending upon the generosity of an enemy to whom he had not shown the least kindness.

But that upright man was too noble to indulge in a low revenge. The severity which his instructions made it necessary for him to exercise towards his prisoner cost his philanthropic heart innumerable pangs; but as an old soldier, accustomed to follow the letter of his order with blind fidelity, he could do no more than pity him. The unfortunate individual found a zealous assistant in the person of the preacher for the garrison at the fortress. Moved to pity by the misery of the man so strangely confined, an account of which he had but lately learned through vague and unconnected rumors, he resolutely resolved to attempt something for his benefit. This estimable ecclesiast, whose name I unwillingly suppress, believed that his pastoral labors could be more serviceably employed in no way than in being made subservient to the good of an unfortunate man, who could be assisted by no other means.

When he found that he could not prevail upon the commander of the fortress to relax his severity towards the prisoner, he hastened to proceed to the capital himself, that he might there in his own person urge his petition upon the sovereign without intervention. He prostrated himself before him, and besought his compassion for the unfortunate man; he urged that he was now in prison, languishing without hope, perhaps already near despair, and deprived of the benefits of Christianity, from which not even a criminal can be debarred, though guilty of the most monstrous crimes. He claimed a free access to the prison with all the intrepidity and dignity imparted by the consciousness of fulfilling one's duty: he said that the prisoner would listen to him as a penitent, and that he felt responsible to Heaven for the salvation of his soul. The good cause for which he pleaded made him eloquent; time also had already broken, in a measure, the first indignation of the sovereign. He granted his request to be permitted to gladden the prisoner with a spiritual visit.

The first human countenance that the unfortunate G beheld after a period of sixteen months was the face of his friendly helper. In his pitiable state of wretchedness, he thanked the only friend who lived for him in the world; from the days of his prosperity not one remained to cheer him in adversity. The visit of the preacher was to him like the appearance of an angel. I cannot describe his emotions. He became more calm, and his tears flowed more gently, when he saw a human being weep over his condition.

Horror seized the spiritual functionary as he entered this pit of murder. His eyes sought a man—and a hideous form, awakening in the beholder a sensation of terror, crept out of a corner towards him at his approach. The place bore more resemblance to the lair of a wild beast than to the abode of a human creature. A pale form, a mere skeleton, bearing the image of death, stood before him; all color of life had fled from his face, on which grief and despair had ploughed their deepest furrows. His beard and nails had, through so long a neglect, grown to an enormous length; his apparel too, from his wearing it so long, was half decayed; while the air, in consequence of an entire want of purification, had become infected. Thus he found this favorite of fortune involved in miseries, all of which the health of his iron frame had withstood. Rendered still more determined by this spectacle, the preacher hastened to the governor of the fortress to obtain for this poor unfortunate being still another favor, without which even the first would have been granted in vain.

When this officer again excused himself on the ground of the explicit terms of his instructions, the benevolent philanthropist magnanimously resolved upon a second journey to the residence of the sovereign, in order to claim his benevolence once again.

He explained to him how he should be obliged to violate the dignity of the sacrament (which he could never do), if he administered any holy ordinance to his prisoner before he was restored to the condition and privileges of a man. This was also granted, and from that day he first began to live again like a human being.

G spent many years more in that fortress but in a condition far more endurable after the brief summer of the new favorite's influence was past, and other ministers had succeeded him in office, who treated the prisoner humanely, or at any rate had no feelings of a revengeful nature to satisfy upon him. After an imprisonment of ten years, the day of his deliverance finally came: but there was no legal investigation, no formal acquittal. He felt his freedom as a free gift from the hands of benevolence; and at the same time that he was liberated he was commanded to leave the land forever.

The information which I have been able to collect, and that was only through oral reports, fails me at this point of his life; I consequently find myself obliged to pass over a period of twenty years in silence. During this time, G engaged in foreign military service, and began his career anew; fortune finally conducted him again, even among strangers, to the same dazzling summit from which he had fallen in so frightful a manner in his fatherland. Time, that sure friend of the unfortunate, which works a slow but always unerring justice, finally took up his case also. The years of impulse and passion were already past in the sovereign; and humanity now began to acquire gradually a worth, and to possess an interest for him as his hairs whitened. While just on the verge of the grave, there was awakened in him an ardent longing for the favorite of his youth. In order to compensate the gray hairs of the old man, as much as he could, for the grievances which he had heaped upon the prime of his manhood, he kindly invited the exile back to the home of his younger days. It is not strange that even in G's heart too there had returned long since a silent yearning for his native land. Their meeting was affecting; their greetings were as if they had parted but yesterday for the first time; they were warm, and yet full of disappointed hopes. The sovereign stood and gazed with a reflecting look upon that countenance, with whose lineaments he was so familiar, and which for all that appeared so strange. It seemed as though he counted the furrows which he had dug himself upon the face of his early friend. With a searching, scrutinizing look, he sought to find once more in the countenance of the old man the beloved features of the youth; but what he sought, he could no longer find. They soon forced themselves into a cold and formal intimacy. Shame and fear had severed their hearts forever. A sight which constantly recalled his own gross act of hasty indiscretion could never more prove pleasing to the sovereign; and G himself could no longer love the author of his misfortune. For all that this was the case, he was consoled and calm, and looked upon the offence as one rejoices over an unpleasant dream that is past.

It was not long before G was seen again in possession of all his former honors; the sovereign, moreover, restrained his secret aversion, in order to render him a brilliant requital for the past. But could he indeed give his heart again to him who had destroyed it forever for all the enjoyments of life? Could he restore to the decrepit old man years of hope and promise? Or could he devise for him a fortune which would in any wise requite the robbery which he had committed upon his youth?

For nineteen years more, he enjoyed this serene evening of his life. Neither misfortune nor years had been able to quench in him the ardor of his youthful feelings, nor wholly to obscure the joviality of his spirit. When in the seventieth year of his age, he still continued to grasp after the shadow of a good which he had full possession of at twenty. He finally died. He was still commander of that same fortress *, where the state's prisoners were usually confined. It is but natural to suppose that he would have exercised towards them a kindness and moderation whose worth he ought to have learned to value from a dearly-bought experience. It is strange to say, however, that he treated them harshly and peevishly, and that it was an ebullition of anger against one of them that finally brought him to his end in the eightieth year of his age.

PLEASING THE PARISH; OR, THE MINISTER'S WIFE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MISS BREMER'S VISIT TO COOPER'S LANDING," "GETTING INTO SOCIETY," "SIGNS OF GENTILITY," "BOARDING-HOUSE POLITICS," ETC. ETC.

THE congregation of St. John's Church had been for some months without a rector. Many had applied, it is true, for the vacant situation; for it was one of the most wealthy and influential in the diocese, and the salary was three thousand a year. Add to this Christmas presents, and marriage fees (there was a vast proportion of young people, and a Washington or Saratoga campaign always resulted in three or four engagements at the very least), and you had as comfortable a position as a clergyman, who had renounced "the pomps and vanities of this wicked world," could desire.

The church itself was an expensive building, in the very extremity of the florid Gothic. The long windows were filled with stained glass of many colors, giving every shade and tone to the faces of the congregation in the different hours of the day. Thus the sharp features of Mrs. Skimpton—wife of one of the most influential vestrymen, who had a pew in the very front ranks of the middle aisle, that her devotion might be known of all men—were tinged with ruby red in the morning, saffron color during sermon time, and presented a livid blue aspect in the afternoon service. The organ was new and powerful, the choir the best that could be trained, the pulpit almost dazzled your eyes with gilding and crimson velvet, and the chandeliers flashed with an incessant glitter. Therefore the vestry of St. John's Church were as cautious as their position required, in selecting a new rector to take the place of the Rev. Dr. Naylor. It was a great pity, some were inclined to say, that he had been suffered to leave at all—he was so excellent a rhetorician, so graceful an orator, such a charming guest at a dinner-party, always quoting Timothy's example as he took his sherry wine, and was very complimentary to the hostess over Burgundy. But St. John's Church prided itself on resisting the innovations of Oxford, and Dr. Naylor was long suspected of inclining thereunto. Finally, to the horror of half the congregation, he appeared in the pulpit with his surplice, an indication not to be trifled with. Miss Little declared that "it gave her a perfect chill," and "she couldn't tell, for her part, where it would end." Mrs. Tuttle remarked, at a meeting of the Dorcas Society, of which she was president, and Mrs. Skimpton secretary, that "it was no more than she had been expecting for some time." And finally, the vestry were goaded into politely requesting "their late beloved rector" to resign.

But now the pulpit was no longer vacant. The bishop was not to be invited for the future to marry the wealthy members of the congregation, or the city missionary to bury its dead pensioners. The choir were once more in full practice of Rossini, the organist of Mendelssohn; and a new soprano had been engaged at four hundred a year—a sum greater, he it remarked, than many a faithful and zealous country clergyman receives in his laborious vocation.

The new rector was drawing crowded congregations. It was music to hear him read the church service, one declared. Another had never listened to more eloquent speaking than his sermons. Visitors from St. Peter's, St. James's, and Epiphany crowded the aisles in the afternoon, and a great inquiry had been made for vacant pews by families recently removed to the city. Every family in the congregation were ready to welcome Dr. Stone under their roof until his household should arrive, and twenty-seven urgent invitations to dinner were declined in one day. The great wonder was, how he should have cultivated such grace and elegance of manner in the country; for this was his first advent in city life. He had been a professor in a theological seminary for several years past; but his literary tastes and triumphs had drawn him from this comparative obscurity. Henceforth he was not to blush unseen.

To tell the truth, he had very little idea of the furor he was creating. He was much more interested in the arrival of his young wife to her new home than in any proffered attention to himself. He thought more of the souls than the establishments of his congregation, strange as it may seem, and cared for the effect of the truth upon them, rather than the eloquent periods which unfolded it, the natural language of his pen. He had felt some scruples in declining one great charge to accept of another equally important, but had decided upon city life, influenced not a little by the predilections of his wife; though he would have been shocked had any one proved to him that he had listened to such an earthly consideration.

All his friends wondered when the quiet, unobtrusive Dr. Stone had married the daughter of one of the most influential men in the country, scarcely two years before. But Mary Elliot was intellectual as well as beautiful, and found no other congenial society in her native village. So, in the process of time, the reverend doctor's eyes were opened to the fact that "Their friendship turned out To be love in disguise;"

and they were married. Thus Mary Elliot, the petted, flattered, only daughter, became the wife of a grave theological professor, and was now to enter on a new sphere of city life.

The house in — Place was selected by Mrs. Tuttle. Every one knows that it is at once an aristocratic and a quiet neighborhood. "Just the thing for a clergyman," said Mrs. Tuttle. "So central, in the midst of such fashionable society, and only eight hundred a year." Dr. Stone looked on vaguely, and seemed to consider what Mary, himself, and Etta, the baby, were to do with all those large rooms, and why the "fashionable society" was deemed important to a clergyman. However, he candidly confessed to Mrs. Tuttle, at whose house he then was, that he knew nothing about such matters, and left housekeeping entirely to Mary. Mrs. Skurpton lived directly opposite. That was pleasant, for Mary had never been away from her mother before, and Mrs. S. had paid him a great deal of motherly attention. As for upholstery, Mary must settle that, too, with Mrs. Tuttle's advice, and so he locked the new house, put the key in his pocket, and felt a great deal more settled than he had done in the morning.

Miss Little was ushered into the drawing-room of No. — Street, at a very early hour. So early, that a glimpse of the breakfast-table, still standing, had been caught in passing through the first floor. It was a dismal, stormy November day, and Miss Little was attired accordingly. She was one of the sisterhood so peculiar to large congregations, who seem at once the keepers of the rector's conscience, and the principal patrons of the parish school. They are always au fait to the scarlet fever from which the children suffer; can tell you where the rector's wife intends to pass the summer; and have the bishop's appointments at their fingers' ends. They are usually in mourning for a distant relative, and take decided views on all points of church controversy. Miss Little, in distinction to her name, was tall, and somewhat masculine. She carried a bag with a steel clasp, which shut with a very decided snap, and had served in its day to emphasize many of its owner's remarks. Whatever dissent Miss Little tolerated, there must be none from the views which she advanced.

On this particular morning, she was evidently disturbed at being kept in waiting. At first, she seated herself in the centre of the apartment, and cast her eyes up to the cornice, as if in profound meditation. But five, ten minutes passed, and, no one appearing, she commenced an active reconnoitre of the apartment, turning over every book on the centre-table, inspecting jealously the folds of the curtains, tracing the pattern of the wall paper, and feeling the embossed cover of the piano forte, as if inwardly deciding upon its price. This survey ended, she relapsed into a quick meditative walk, bounded by the mirrors at either end of the room, treading on every alternate crimson flower of the carpet, and carefully avoiding the blue leaves, as if some hidden danger lurked beneath.

At length the door opened, and Miss Angelica Tuttle appeared in her mamma's stead. "Mamma begged to be excused for a few moments; the children were such a bore. All children were," said Miss Angelica, with a languid shrug of her fair shoulders. Miss Little's assent was given with a corresponding pantomimic movement.

"I wanted to see you, too, though, my dear. You know how much we depend on you when there is any charitable movement. I suppose you have heard we have concluded on a fair for the Dorcas Society, to be held the week before Christmas. What post shall I put you down to? There's the cake table now—Goodfellow has promised to furnish it at cost. It would be quite suggestive, you know; cake and rings, and all that sort of thing. Of course, we shall have ring cakes; it is always a good speculation."

"The cake table!" said Miss Angelica, musingly.

"Or the post-office. You can write charmingly, I know. Now you needn't blush, and deny those letters from Cape May last season in the Drawing-Room Journal were yours. Think what a sensation you could make through that paper window; and you may choose your own clerks."

The post-office appointment seemed likely to be accepted; but, at the same time, the word "sensation" seemed to call out a burst of latent enthusiasm, which quite dispelled the languid manner Miss Angelica, the eldest of eight children, thought proper to affect.

"Oh, Miss Little, did you see our new rector's wife last Sunday? Isn't she sweet? She stayed two days with us, while the upholsterer was getting the house ready. I would have sent you word; but she particularly requested no one should call, she was so fatigued."

"Lovely!" responded Miss Little. "I came on in the boat with her, and had the pleasure of being the first member of the congregation introduced. She will be a great acquisition to our Dorcas Society."

"And the Female Auxiliary," chimed in Mrs. Tuttle, who had just emerged from the nursery, as might be gathered from the stains on her not very orderly morning-dress. It was finely printed with a kind of palm pattern (the fingers being, in some instances, included), in molasses and gravy toast. "I shall depend upon her taking an active part in the Female Auxiliary Society, for the evangelization of Southern Italy."

"Her bonnet was very becoming," added Miss Angelica. "It was one of Lawson's, too. She bought it on her way through New York. I was glad of it; for I do like a variety of bonnets in church. Now, last winter there were eleven in the middle aisle from Miss Wharton's—I can always tell a bonnet—five from Miss M'Connells, and four from Mrs. Burke's. One gets so tired of the same style."

"She seems a devoted mother," Mrs. Tuttle found space to throw in. "And her little girl was quite a model to my young people."

"Such curls!" said Miss Angelica.

"Such eyes and color!" said Miss Little.

"A lovely Maria Louise blue—the bonnet, not the curls."

"And plays, I'm told," said Miss Little. "She will give such a tone to society! Quite another thing from poor Mrs. Naylor, who scarcely dared to venture an opinion in her husband's presence. His 'my dear!' was the most chilling thing I ever listened to."

"And her rude, unmannerly boys," added Mrs. Tuttle. "As bad as my own, every bit of it. Nobody knows what a trial she must have had."

"I should think you could judge," dutifully suggested her eldest born.

But the aside was lost, as both the elder ladies rushed forward to welcome Mrs. Skimpton, who was announced just at that moment. The new arrival was informed that "she was just the person wanted;" "her visit would save a call in — Place;" "now she could decide at once who should be invited from St. Paul's." "Mrs. Tuttle was always glad to welcome her, but particularly so just then."

Mrs. Skimpton was to take charge of the refreshment table. For fairs immemorial this had been Mrs. Skimpton's post. Her "eternal vigilance" had saved many an extravagant waste, in the shape of heaped-up plates and cream at discretion. She could make change to half a cent; always furnished the hams from Mr. Skimpton's own grocer, at cost price; therefore no one ever thought of questioning her undoubted right to so important an appointment.

And then Mrs. Stone was reverted to; and Mrs. Skimpton, whose chamber overlooked Dr. Stone's study windows, gave testimony that they were the most devoted people she had ever known; and she, in particular, had such a pleasing way of asking advice. It was she—Mrs. Skimpton—who had suggested a damask Venetian pattern for the stair carpet, and blinds instead of curtains. "Curtains were always in the way somehow."

"Of neighbors, certainly," added Miss Angelica, innocently.

"So much depends on a rector's wife!" said Mrs. Skimpton.

"Yes, indeed," responded Miss Little.

"She ought to be—well—in some degree, amiable, I may say," added Mrs. Tuttle.

"And willing to be advised," remarked Mrs. Skimpton.

"Not too old, or too dowdy," said Miss Angelica, with a glance at her own stylish dressing-gown in the opposite mirror.

"Now Mrs. Stone is all this," continued Mrs. Skimpton; "and I, for one, have taken her by the hand. I shall suggest that she puts an oil cloth, instead of a carpet, upon the dining-room floor."

"I wonder if she has a soprano, and who was her teacher. She will appreciate the choir so entirely. Poor Mrs. Naylor never did. To think of her saying she preferred 'Old Hundred' to the 'Hymn from Zampa!'" Miss Angelica was musical.

Fortunate Mrs. Stone! As this was the reception among strangers she had so much dreaded. Every tongue was loud in her praise. Visitors poured in from every circle in the congregation. The second Saturday evening, she was obliged to empty the two card-baskets for the third time. The calls already amounted to two hundred! Many a motherly lady had resolved, with Mrs. Skimpton, to "take her by the hand." Miss Angelica was not the only young person who intended to patronize her. She had already been solicited to join eleven charitable associations, and had been elected a manager of the "Union Benevolent."

It is a fact, which many congregations never take into account, that a minister's wife, in common with the humblest parishioner, may have individual preferences, founded on her taste and cultivation, or the associations to which she has been accustomed. Moreover, she finds no more time in the twenty-four hours, neither is she in any degree exempt from the infirmities of our nature, in the shape of colds, toothache, or neuralgia. A call from a fashionable congregation does not provide an infallible housekeeper, warranted to procure and manage good servants; and tradespeople do not become a miracle of promptness in a parsonage, sooner than when surrounded by the atmosphere of an ordinary dwelling.

Mrs. Stone's first offence was sending word that she was "engaged," to some eleven o'clock visitors. Mrs. Skimpton waylaid them at a preliminary meeting of the Dorcas fair, and informed them Mrs. Stone was all the while only standing in the doctor's study, talking as unconcernedly as possible. Mrs. Clarke, who happened to be among the minor families, and, of course, very tenacious of her position in church society, considered it a direct and positive insult. Miss Allen, who had accompanied her, curled her lips with the remark that, "if they had only been carriage people, they'd have seen where the engagement was!" Both ladies immediately became bitter and open opponents of the numerous party ever sounding the praises of the rector's wife, and the story, with alterations and additions, was told at every subsequent gathering, thus bearing that leaven of uncharitableness against which the beloved apostle so eloquently warns his "little children." There is, unfortunately, a culmination to all popularity, and the decade soon commences. The magnificent Victoria Regia is the noblest of all blossoms, but a day finishes its short-lived glory, though hundreds flock to see and to admire.

Mrs. Stone wondered, in gentle humility, when the sound of her husband's praises and her own was echoed in her ear by her new acquaintances and friends; and her husband wrote a most eloquent and fervent discourse upon Christian fellowship. It was the outpouring of a full and grateful heart; no one could doubt it, as they looked into his beaming face. The choir sang the well-known chant, "Behold how good and how pleasant a thing it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." It was quite a little jubilee, and the pure voice of the rector's wife was heard joining, with deep feeling, in the joyful chorus.

Surely, if peace and love are the highest points of the Delectable Mountains, nearest unto the Heaven towards which they ever rise, it is a strange thing that we do not oftener seek to stand in the calm, clear atmosphere that bathes their summits!

Fairs, for church objects, are very good things, no doubt. They awaken an incredible amount of latent industry in the young ladies of the congregation. They give an increase of trade to the trimming stores where materials are purchased, and afford a great many people an opportunity to be charitable, and, at the same time, to obtain undersleeves, cuffs, night-caps, children's socks, and aprons, the products of the aforesaid industry, at a very low consideration, much cheaper than they could be furnished at the small shops kept by industrious widows, who depend upon the sale of these very articles for the maintenance and education of their children. Then, if their reduced custom obliges the petty shopkeeper to seek open charity, the Dorcas Society is sure to send, after much solicitation, the half ton of coal, and the scanty garments made and provided for such contingencies. Of course, they have no reason to complain. They are not supposed to be sensitive on the subject of receiving alms, or to make any internal reflections upon the wisdom, not to say justice, of the course pursued. The poor, God help them! are far too busy to allow time for moralizing.

It was unpardonable in Mrs. Stone to reason for them. Mrs. Skimpton listened to her with ill-disguised horror. She had called, expecting a zealous co-operation. She read the by-laws of the fair that was to be, the annual report of the society, including the disposal of soup tickets, and, though it was understood as a mere matter of form, of course, came for the sanction of the rector and the approval of his lady. Mrs. Naylor, despite her shortcomings, had always been active on these occasions. Mrs. Stone, with her leisure and her winning address, could, no doubt, do wonders. Of course, she was not expected to sew, explained Mrs. Skimpton; only to be present at the various meetings, and make herself and the movement generally popular. "For there were some ladies in the church so obstinate and so narrow-minded as to object to fairs!" Therefore they especially counted on her countenance.

Mrs. Stone had seen but little of city life, she said, but was already made sorrowful by the amount of want and misfortune she could not relieve. There was something to her very sad in the sight of those little shops, in which fancy articles were sold. They seemed to tell of a last effort to keep a little family undivided. It made her very heart ache to pass them at night. The solitary lamp in the window shedding such a feeble light over the dingy muslins and cheap ornaments displayed there, and then the tired-looking woman behind the counter, stitching away as rapidly as her fingers could fly, and looking up with such an eager, craving look, if the jingle of the little bell announced a customer. She had heard of the Dorcas Society, and somehow, though she could not pretend to judge for others, it seemed as if its members would make a happier arrangement if they contributed money instead of time, and employed poor women to make the garments they distributed to those who could not, for ill health or care, assist themselves at all.

"But," urged Mrs. Skimpton, blandly, "there are many young ladies now—your young friend, Miss Tuttle, for instance—who have no purse of their own, and can still give time."

"Do they not choose their own wardrobes?" asked Mrs. Stone, quietly. "And one expensive dress or ornament less might furnish the means."

Mrs. Skimpton's thin features grew sharper still by extension. What heresies! and from such a source! She could scarcely refrain from an instant explosion; but she still hoped, by Miss Little's assistance, to overcome Mrs. Stone's scruples. Unfortunately, as she was obliged to confess it, many would be influenced by the expression of opinions more than one already held.

But Miss Little's visit proved equally unsuccessful—Mrs. Stone remaining firm, though gentle, in her resolution to avoid taking an active part in the proposed charity. The very next day, the steel clasp was shut with an undeniable negative snap when some young ladies looked up from the mysteries of embroidering bronze toilet slippers, to propose doing a pair for Mrs. Stone, and making a new set of hands for the doctor.

"They might as well work for Queen Victoria at once, for all the thanks they would get," she said. "Mrs. Stone preferred to pay for all she wore; and it was well her husband had a large salary, the way she managed affairs!"

It was an undoubted dash of vinegar upon the fire of enthusiasm Mrs. Stone had kindled. Meek little Miss Brown, who had made the proposal, and who, withal, was the youngest of the Sunday School teachers at St. John's, bent over her sewing with flushed cheeks and a mist before her eyes, which interfered not a little with the accuracy of her stitches. Miss Angelica Tuttle was also observed to have changed her phrases of adulation to a minor key, to say the least. Mrs. Clarke plainly declared that she never did like her from the first; and "poor, dear Mrs. Naylor's" forgotten virtues were paraded once more in open day, as the "sainted Maria" of some recently-married widower is held up for the correction and edification of her unfortunate successor.

Two hundred visits are not to be returned in two months, unless the whole of one's time is devoted to that specific object. It may answer for a young bride, who has a Honiton veil, an India shawl, and a new equipage to display; but for the wife of a clergyman, with a recently organized household, fond of her nursery, and obliged to entertain visitors at all hours, and on the slightest notice, it is a task in which even the most social would fail. Mrs. Stone, with a natural shrinking from new faces, and a round of pleasant household occupations, did her best; but still the formidable list diminished slowly, and, when the fair actually opened, there were many of her visitors that she knew only by name. As her declining to act in the matter had not extended to opposition, she concluded, by Dr. Stone's suggestion, to visit the hall in which it was in progress, thinking it would be an excellent opportunity to apologize to some, and renew her acquaintance with others. She had not been blind to the apparent coldness of many ladies of the congregation, for some weeks past, and her letters home, which before were filled with grateful expressions for the undeserved love and kindness she had received, avoided instinctively the mention of her social experience. It is a very humiliating confession to make, that of declining popularity; one we do not care to whisper even to ourselves; and Mrs. Stone silenced any such suggestions by condemning herself as over-sensitive and exacting.

No taste or expense had been spared to make the grand saloon attractive. It was richly draped, and filled with stalls containing every variety of articles that are ever congregated on such an occasion. The toy tables, the cake, the trinkets made it a children's paradise, and their eager little faces were clouded with their first lesson, perhaps, in the value of money, finding themselves unable to purchase everything with "three pips and a levy." Greedy little speculators they were, debating between the attractions of mintstick and the more lasting pleasure of "food for the mind," as presented in the veritable history of "Simple Simon," with colored plates. There were young ladies, accustomed to consider "shop girls" as of another order of beings from themselves, bargaining and wheeling the sale of a giant doll, or a cambric and lace toilet table. Mrs. Jenkins, who treated her servants with less consideration than her carriage horses, was most obsequious in her attentions to the merest "fip customer," as she dished up the ice cream, or made change with an insinuating smile. It was a beautiful lesson of democracy—Walnut Street, as it were, walking hand in hand with Kensington, and Washington Square growing affable to Second and South.

Miss Angelica Tuttle was the first to recognize the presence of Mrs. Stone, who had entered quietly, unattended by her husband, who was to join her at nightfall. She had quitted her exclusive domain, the post-office, the mails having been detained, that is, at present being "made up" by her assistants, and was making a tour of the room to see who was likely to call for letters in the course of the evening. A journey of leisure with business purposes.

"You have a very beautiful room," said Mrs. Stone, admiringly. "I hope you make out well."

Miss Angelica vouchsafed a half stare, and answered, very pointedly, "they had used both time and money, and hoped Mrs. Stone did not consider it an unpardonable waste of either."

This was but the first shot of a constant harassing fire, to which the rector's wife was subjected in her progress through the room. Miss Little, at the book table, pretended not to see her, and devoured the index of the last church magazine with praiseworthy industry. Mrs. Clarke wondered how she could find time to visit fairs, as she had none for seeing visitors.

"Or returning calls," added Mrs. Jenkins, whose name stood conspicuously near the head of the unfortunate list.

It was quite a relief, at this moment, when quiet Miss Brown came with a glass of jelly, and a request that she would come behind her table and eat it. Miss Brown established her visitor very pleasantly in a recess, and returned to the vending of needle-books. The uncomfortable brusqueness of Mesdames Clarke and Jenkins was, in a measure, forgotten, as Mrs. Stone watched the scene before her; nor did she, at first, notice a lady who came from a neighboring table and took possession of the other vacant seat a few moments after. Fairs are great innovators upon formality, and the unknown lady bowed and smiled when she saw she had a neighbor.

"Quite an animated scene," was the commonplace with which the conversation began.

"Very," returned Mrs. Stone, pleasantly.

"I don't belong to St. John's parish," continued the sociable little woman; "but I always go where I think I can do good. To tell the truth, though, I'm more than half inclined to leave. I never heard so many uncharitable things said in my life, as they manage to talk over about their rector and his wife."

Mrs. Stone gave a slight start of astonishment.

"I don't think it looks well—do you? Just now, Miss Angelica Tuttle came to my table and said Mrs. Stone was in the room. I should like to get a glance at her. Miss Angelica says, 'any one that dresses as she does, to talk about her extravagance!' And Mrs. Clarke says she's a perfect aristocrat, and visits only the carriage people in the church. Then that Mrs. Skimpton, with her whining way—'Oh, my dear, you should set her a lesson of charity! I'm sure she needs it, condemning those older and wiser than herself, as she does, wholesale!'"

The lively speaker managed to imitate Mrs. Skimpton's solemn tones most admirably, and Mrs. Stone, kept silent by surprise, and, it must be confessed, a momentary feeling of anger at the injustice thus displayed, rose to leave the sofa.

"Well, I declare, I'm as careless as ever," said the lady. "You may be Mrs. Skimpton's most intimate friend, for all I know. But I can't help it. I came away because I was boiling over with indignation; for, though I never saw poor Mrs. Stone, and never expect to, I can't bear backbiting, and I told them so. How would she feel towards them, and they working for charity! To tell the truth, that's my only objection to fairs. In the morning, before people come, and at meal-times, they have nothing else to do but get together and talk over their neighbors. You ought to have heard the way they went on about the Stones when they first came. Nobody was half so good, or charming, or elegant. As for Dr. Stone, they sainted him at once, and were for getting his life insured, for fear he'd be translated!"

"Excuse me," began her listener, still moving towards the outer saloon.

"Oh no. I see you're offended. Excuse me, I ought to say; but really I can't help it. My heart always runs away with my tongue; and to hear that doll of an Angelica Tuttle go on so!"

It was an unexpected relief to find Dr. Stone looking for her as she passed the screen. She longed to get home and think it all over, and comfort herself with the recollection that she had never intended an offence. But, in ignorance of what she had suffered, he wished to make a tour of the room, and she was obliged to accompany him. Then he had an engagement to meet the vestry, and it was no time to broach so uncomfortable a subject; and so she took little Etta upon her knee, and passed a cheerless, miserable evening, that had left its traces upon her face when her husband returned.

It was a new ground to him. He had lived apart from detraction so long, that he did not know how to meet it. "I don't think they can intend to be unkind," he said. But he prayed more earnestly that night for a forgiving and patient spirit.

The clouds still cast a heavy shadow when the morning came, and, jaded by the impertinent neglect of a servant she would not discharge, because she knew her to be homeless and friendless, Mrs. Stone shrunk, with almost a nervous dread, when a visitor was announced, and a card, with a name she did not recognize, was placed in her hands. She could not decline the visit; and she was glad she had not done so, when she saw the gentle face of her visitor, an elderly lady, with all the grace, if not the animation, of youth.

She enfolded the hand Mrs. Stone extended in both her own, and drew her to the sofa beside her.

"You must not look on me as a stranger," she said, "for I am one of your husband's parishioners; though we pass very little time in the city. The quiet of our country house suits me best, at my age; and last Sunday was the first time I have had the pleasure of listening to Dr. Stone. I came to see you this morning, my dear," continued Mrs. Lovel, the name upon the card Mrs. Stone was still nervously bending. "I happened to overhear a conversation last evening that I knew would fret you; and I should have introduced myself then, only I thought it better to see you alone. You must excuse Mrs. Dale. She had not the least idea whom she was speaking to."

Mrs. Stone's face flushed with the recollection.

"Don't think me meddlesome. But I'm somewhat older than you, recollect, and I have daughters of my own among strangers; and, in fact, I felt so sorry for you, I could have taken you to my heart there."

In spite of her attempt at composure, the rector's wife felt her lips tremble, as she listened to these kind words.

"You are very good, Mrs. Lovel, I'm sure," she said.

"I've seen the rise and fall of a great deal of church popularity in my day, my child. I know about what you have gone through with as well as you can tell me. So I've come to offer my friendship and advice—not about carpets or furniture, though," she added, smiling. "So, to begin as a mentor, let me tell you there's only one safe course. Act yourself, and don't defer to any one's opinion in matters that only concern yourself. If you begin to arrange your house by Mrs. Skimpton's card, Mrs. Jenkins may take exceptions, and if you patronize Miss Tuttle's dress-maker, Miss Allen will consider you a fright. If you give to Mrs. Tuttle's benevolent societies and not to Miss Little's, one of the ladies will be certain to consider you mean; and it will be an unpardonable offence, should you choose to pass an evening with a friend out of the parish, if you have declined an invitation within its limits. You must not care about these matters. Be courteous to every one, but let them understand you consider that you have still a right to your own opinion. If your aunt presents you with a hat from Lawson's, and you choose to wear it, do so, even if comments are made. You see I've inquired out your capital offences."

"Oh, how contemptible in them!" exclaimed Mrs. Stone.

"That's very much like anger, I'm afraid," said Mrs. Lovel; "though I grant you have cause to be provoked. Now I don't counsel insubordination, remember, or actual rebellion. I only assert that the rector's wife is not church property, and people have no more right to manage her family than she has to interfere with theirs. You have the ordeal to go through; but, if you're not obstinate and haughty on the one side, or weakly and timorous on the other, it won't do you any harm. By and by, you will begin to make valuable friends, and then you will have a real home among us; and be happy, I hope."

"You are very kind, Mrs. Lovel," was all Mrs. Stone could say. Her visitor's manner was so like that of her own mother. She could have begged her to stay when she rose to take leave.

"You will always have a true friend in me, my child; and you must come and pass a quiet Christmas week with Mr. Lovel and myself, at Elmwood—that is, if you like old people—and we will talk these matters over more leisurely. Meantime, I'd keep my blinds down when Mrs. Skimpton's are up, and not exert myself too much to entertain Miss Tuttle. She catalogued your wardrobe the day you were so good as to show her your bridal dress. I know she begged to see it. Good by, good by; don't come into the air with that cold." And good Mrs. Lovel was gone, leaving a conviction of her sincerity in kind-heartedness with the sorely-tried wife of the rector.

PERSONS AND PICTURES FROM THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

ELIZABETH TUDOR AND MARY STUART.

BY HENRY WILLIAM HERBERT, AUTHOR OF "THE ROMAN TRAITOR," "MARMADUKE WYVIL," "CROMWELL," "THE BROTHERS," &c. &c.

THE greatest and most fortunate of queens—the loveliest and most hapless of women. They might have been friends and sisters, as they were sister queens of one fair island, then, for the last time, divided; fortune and fate, and that worst curse of sovereigns as of nations, religious dissension, rendered them enemies; and, as in such case ever must be, the weaker of the two was shipwrecked in the strife. They were, moreover, nearly akin; and this, which should have been a source of amity and good will, was, on the contrary, the cause of rivalry, hostility, suspicion, and finally of the death of one, and of a dark blot on the escutcheon of the other.

Elizabeth, the second daughter of the most arbitrary and absolute king who ever sat upon the throne of England, Henry VIII., and of his favorite wife, who was the people's favorite also, ascended the throne of England—after the successive deaths of her brother Edward VI., a weak minor, and her elder sister Mary, a hard-hearted bigot, whose memory is to this day a reproach to England and accursed of her people—amidst the general acclamations and sincere delight of all classes. Her accession had been long looked forward to as the oil that was to assuage the troubled sea of contending factions, the sweet balm that was to heal the wounds of persecution. She found a people nearly, if not absolutely, united; for the barbarities of Mary, while they had but increased the zeal, and added the prestige of martyrdom to the cause, of the Protestants, had alienated the moderate Catholics; and, indeed, disgusted all classes of Englishmen, with whom religious toleration, and even indifference, has been a more usual phase of the public sentiment than anything leaning towards cruelty or coercion. Thus, both religious parties greeted her advent to the throne, and that sincerely; for the Catholics apprehended, as a body, no severe retaliation from the hands of a princess known to be moderate and politic, rather than sullen and rash; and the Protestants were too happy at obtaining quiet, peace, and toleration, to desire in their turn to become persecutors. Compassion, moreover, was a further sentiment in her favor; for she had conducted herself with rare prudence during her sister's reign; and the imminent and instant peril in which she lived until Mary's death had rendered her an object of general sympathy, even among the Catholic party.

She came to the throne at the age of twenty-six years, the whole of which time she had passed in a subordinate, always humiliating, and often dangerous, position. No adulation of courtiers, no loud lip-loyalty of shouting thousands, had fostered her youthful mind's worst passions. Neglected, scorned as illegitimate, imperiled as heretic, she had lived with her studies, had communed with herself and the world of the mighty dead, more than with modern men or manners. Her tutor had been the famous Roger Ascham; and, although the education which he bestowed upon her was, of a surety, what we should now deem better suited for the male than for the female sex, it cannot be denied that it was such as befitted one who was to fill the place of a king in England, and to contend against the greatest powers and princes of Europe for her own crown and her country's liberties.

Already, when she climbed the steps of that proud throne, had she learned one mighty lesson, had proved herself capable of one grand triumph: *major adversis she had shown herself already; the harder task lay yet behind, to exhibit herself, as so few have done of mortals, par secundis.†

* Superior to adversity. † Equal to prosperity.

In person she was tall, well formed, and majestic rather than graceful in carriage and demeanor; her features, which it were impossible to call handsome, were still striking from the great intelligence and power of mind which they evinced; and, although her hair was, in truth, of that hue which men call red, there were not wanting poets—according to Homer, they should have been gods—to celebrate it in immortal verse as golden. To conclude, it may be said that Elizabeth, even as a private woman, would probably, in any society, have attracted attention by the graces of her person only; although, assuredly, no one in his senses would have dreamed of calling her beautiful, or of choosing her as his wife for her personal or mental loveliness. Her character is a strange one; and one, especially, that cannot be summed up in a sentence. In order to attempt to do so, I must be paradoxical, and assert that, in her virtues, she was purely masculine, and feminine only in her vices. Of male virtues she lacked not one; of female virtues she scarce possessed any. She had courage, fortitude, patience, shrewdness, sagacity, was not without a sort of lion-like generosity, and would not have deserted a friend, or betrayed her country, to be the winner of eternal empire. Gentleness, softness, tenderness, compassion, mercy, sympathy—of these words she scarce seems to have known the meaning. Dependence, trust, reliance, save in herself and her own matchless powers, she knew not. Yet, of the smaller feminine vices, she had full measure and overflowing. Vain as the silliest coquette that flirts and languishes her hour in any modern ball-room; capricious as the moon, and yet more changeable; irascible as the dead sea; jealous, exacting, amorous at once and cold, fawning with the cat's velvet touch, and anon scathing with the tiger's unsheathed talons.

Her passions were her armory; fatal to others, powerless against herself. Her love of power was her ruling masculine propensity. To it, manlike, she sacrificed affection, the love of progeny, the delights of home; yet, womanlike, she pined for them, even while she sacrificed them; and, doubly womanlike, she hated all those who adopted and enjoyed them; and avenged, upon more than one of her best servants, his entering on the, to her forbidden, pleasures of the married life, with a malignity and spite that, on any other grounds, are inexplicable. As a man she had been, perhaps, the greatest who ever trod the earth; for, as I have said, all her vices, all her crimes, arose from the natural strugglings and eruptions of a feminine nature, smothered beneath the iron will, and conquered by the indomitable ambition, of a masculine mind. Yet that feminine nature was ineradicable still, and was only the more distorted and depraved as it was wrested the further from its true and legitimate direction.

As a woman, in private life, had she closely resembled what she was in public, she had been simply hateful, odious, and contemptible; but probably she had not been such. As it is, the fairest way of judging her appears to be, as Hume has observed with his usual shrewdness, to consider her simply as a person of strong common sense, placed in authority over a great nation in very dangerous times, and doing her duty to that nation manfully always, and, in the main, honestly and truly; but, by the very etis and vigor with which she devoted herself to public, unfitting herself for private, life; and therefore, in her private relations, unamiable, imperious, cruel, false, capricious, and a tyrant unto death.

Nursed, from her cradle to her womanhood, in the rough arms of adversity, she was thenceforth to her death the child of authority and fortune. Yet did she live, did she die happy?

Her rival, Mary, was in all respects nearly her opposite. Her father, James V. of Scotland, was the son of that unhappy James IV. who fell at Flodden, and Margaret, the eldest sister of Henry VIII., and therefore was the first cousin of Elizabeth. He espoused the Duchess of Longueville, the sister of the great Duc de Guise, and the others of that powerful and almost regal house, which, during so many reigns, in truth held the reins of the French government; and, after a disturbed and unhappy reign, being defeated, through the disaffection of his nobles, at the battle of Solway, by a mere handful of English spears, fell into a hopeless languor and decline, so that his life was despaired of. At this sad juncture, news was brought to him, he then having no living issue, that his queen was safely delivered; whereon he asked, was it a male or a female child? and, being informed that it was the latter, he turned his face to the wall, exclaiming, as it is said, "The crown cam' wi' a lassie, and it will awa' wi' a lassie;" and, in a few days, expired, leaving those last prophetic words as a sad legacy to his infant heirless.

No sooner was James dead than, precisely as he expected, Henry determined on annexing Scotland to the English crown as an appanage, by means of a marriage between his young son Edward and the infant princess; and, at first, fortune seemed completely to favor his plans. By means of the Scottish nobles, many of whom, and of high rank, had fallen into his hands at the disastrous rout of Solway, he succeeded in negotiating this marriage. The Cardinal Primate of Scotland, Beaton, who had, it is said, forged a will in the name of the late king, appointing himself regent, with three other nobles, during Queen Mary's minority, was overpowered and committed to the custody of Lord Seton; while James Hamilton, Earl of Arran, was declared governor. It was thereafter agreed that the queen should remain in Scotland until she should reach the age of ten, when she should be sent to England to be educated and betrothed to the Prince of Wales. Six hostages were to be delivered to Henry for the faithful performance of this contract, and it was stipulated that Scotland, notwithstanding its union with England, should retain all its own laws and privileges.

Well had it been for the young princess, well for her native land, well for the world at large, had that contract held good! Long years of intestine strife, the curse of religious factions rabidly warring amid the feuds of hostile houses, the savage bickerings of rival clans, the fierce and persecuting zeal of ignorant and intolerant preachers, had been spared to Scotland; nay, even to England, it may be, the miseries and civil wars, induced by the accession of the hapless and imbecile House of Stuart, in its most odious and imbecile member, might have passed over; and, assuredly, that infant queen had escaped a life of misery, a death of horror.

Scotland was, however, at this time altogether Catholic; the reformation, which soon afterwards outstripped with rampant strides its progress in the neighboring kingdom, taking the hard, stern rule of Calvin, instead of the mild form of Lutheran dissent, had scarcely drawn as yet to any head. Naturally, therefore, the Pope and the whole of Catholic Europe, fearful of the spread of Henry's recent heresy, were willing to go every length to preserve Scotland to the discipline of the true church. Beaton escaped from custody; the ecclesiastics lent him all their power; the hereditary jealousy of England was revived among the martial Scottish nobles; the hostages were denied; although the captive nobles had been suffered to go free on their parole of honor, which they all broke, with one honorable exception, Kennedy, Earl of Cassilis, who, true to his word, returned and surrendered himself to Henry—an honorable action, honorably rewarded by that monarch, who at once set him free without condition. Enraged beyond all bounds of moderation by this duplicity, Henry threw himself into the arms of the emperor, declared war at once on Francis and on Scotland, and waged it unremittingly, but with varied success, during the remainder of his life.

After Henry's decease, and the accession of Edward, the Protector Somerset prosecuted the Scottish war with such ability and success that, after the victory of Pinkie Cleugh, one of the most disastrous to the Scottish ever fought on the soil of Scotland, it was perceived at once, by the queen dowager and the French party, that the only safety for their cause lay in transporting the young queen to France. Even the rival faction was brought to accede to this plan, by the consideration that the presence of the queen was the real cause of the English war, and by the natural animosity created, among the warlike and high-spirited nobles, by the devastating and cruel war which raged incessantly on the frontiers. When little more than six years old, then, the queen was conveyed by Villegaignon, with four galleys under his command, to France, where she was at once betrothed to the dauphin, son of Henry II., of France, and Catharine de Medicis, afterwards, for a short space, Francis II.

This was the commencement—this, in truth, the cause, of all her subsequent misfortunes, of all her crimes, of all her sorrows, of her long imprisonment, and of her miserable death. A queen of Scotland, she was brought up from her earliest childhood, to all intents and purposes, a French woman. Queen of a country which, ere she returned to dwell in it, and nominally to rule it, had become obstinately, bigotedly, zealously, I might almost say fiercely, Calvinistic, she was brought up, from her earliest childhood, an ultra Catholic—a Catholic of the school and house most detested by the Protestants throughout Europe, “the bloody stock,” as the Covenanters termed it, “of the accursed Guises.” Queen of a country whose inhabitants were, by their physical nature, grave, stern, solemn, precise, and whom the new tenets rendered surly and morose, she was brought up, from her earliest childhood, a queen, as it were, of love and beauty, a creature of levity and mirth, a being to whom music and minstrelsy, the dance, the pageant, the carousal, and the tournament—things abominable and rank in the nostrils of her puritanic lieges—were as the breath of life. Last, and not least, queen of a country the most rigidly moral in Europe, except in the article of feudal homicide and vengeful bloodshedding, she was brought up in a land where to love par amour was scarcely held dishonorable to either sex; where poisoning, in the most artful and diabolical methods, was an everyday occurrence; where, in a word, adultery and murder were the rules, and not the exceptions of society.

On this period I have been compelled to dwell, to the detriment, I am aware, of the picturesque-ness of my narrative; for it is, if I mistake not, the clue and the key to all that follows.

On the accession of Elizabeth to the crown of England, Mary, then but sixteen years of age, was already married to Francis, the dauphin of France; and, failing Elizabeth and her issue, was next in true line of blood, as granddaughter of Margaret, Henry VIII.'s eldest sister; although that wilful and capricious monarch had passed their house in his testament, and settled the succession on his second sister's posterity. And here it must be remembered that, in one of his wicked freaks, Henry had caused Elizabeth to be declared, by act of Parliament, illegitimate, and, in his unaccountable caprice, though he afterwards caused the succession to be entailed on her after Edward and Mary, he never would permit the repeal of the act of illegitimacy.

Consequently, Elizabeth being illegitimate, Mary was, by the strict letter, de jure, Queen of England. And on this pretext, Henry II., at the instigation of the Guises, forced his son and Mary, nothing loth, to assume both the arms and title of King and Queen of England. A woman so jealous, and a sovereign so shrewd, as Elizabeth, was not to be misled or deluded as to the object of such a measure. She knew that this pretension was intended, on opportunity, to be converted into a challenge of her legitimacy, and title to her crown.

From that moment she was seized with the keenest jealousy against Mary; the jealousy of a queen, and of a woman, wronged in the tenderest point, in ether quality, her crown disputed, and her honorable birth denied. To this were also added the true small woman's jealousy and spite against a woman fairer, more beloved, more graceful. For Mary was, indeed, lovely beyond the poet's, painter's, sculptor's dream of loveliness; the perfect symmetry of form and stature, the swanlike curve of the long slender neck, the inimitable features—and yet, by Hans Holbein, how admirably imitated!—the smooth expanse of the bland forehead, the penciled curve of the dark brows, the melting lustre of the deep hazel eyes, the luxuriance of the rich auburn tresses, are as familiar to us all, of this distant day, as though we had ourselves beheld them; and, to this hour, at the mere name of Mary Stuart, not a man's heart, who has a touch of romance or chivalry within him, but beats something quicker, as if he were in the very presence, and breathing the very atmosphere, of superhuman beauty. And these glorious gifts, these, too, were Mary's enemies—in the end were, perhaps, her judges, executioners.

But my limits warn me that I must not linger by the way. Henry II. fell, in a tournament, by a chance thrust of the splintered truncheon of a lance in the hand of Montgomery; and Francis II. was, for a little space, the King of France, and Mary was his queen, and, for that little space, the happiest of the happy. But still, alas! for her, she quartered the three English Lions with the Fleurs de Lis of France—still adhered to the fatal style of Queen of France and England!

In proportion as the Scottish character, when left in repose, is calm, grave, resolute, and thoughtful, so is it, when agitated by persecution, or lashed into anger, vehement, enthusiastic, bigoted, savage, in its mood. And such it had now become on both sides. The rage was terrible, the hatred inveterate, the strife incessant; and, as is usual in equally balanced civil or religious factions, each looked abroad for aid—the Catholics to France, the Protestants to England. And, on the instant, discerning her peril while it was yet far aloof, sagacious, prompt, and possessing the advantage—immense in warfare—of proximity, Elizabeth lent aid so prompt, so powerful, and so effectual, that the French auxiliaries were compelled to evacuate Scotland, never to return thither in force; and that the reformers gained such an ascendancy that they were never again, for any considerable period, overawed by the Catholic party, which thenceforth waned in Scotland daily.

By these most wise and politic steps, Elizabeth not only secured the safety of her own realm against the peril of a joint French and Scottish war, brought to bear on her only assailable point, the northern marches, and her own title against the claims of Mary, but she created for herself a powerful party in the heart of the sister kingdom, by which she was regarded—as, indeed, she was in Switzerland, Holland, Germany, nay, in the Huguenot provinces of France herself—as the friend and protectress of the Protestant religion.

Her conquering fleet and army compelled the treaty of Edinburgh, in which it was stipulated, among other provisions highly favorable to England, “that the King and Queen of France should thenceforth abstain from bearing the arms of England, or assuming the title of that kingdom.”

At this critical moment, Francis II. died of a sudden disorder, and Mary was left a lovely, youthful widow of nineteen. She desisted, it is true, after the death of Francis, from bearing the arms of England; yet, with inconceivable obstinacy and pride, she refused to ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, thereby giving mortal and personal offence to the powerful and most unforgiving of queens or women.

Shortly after this event, her residence in France being rendered unpleasant by the demeanor of the queen mother, who hated her, she determined to return home, and asked, through D'Oisel, the French ambassador, a safe conduct through England to her own dominions. This Elizabeth very naturally refused until she should ratify the treaty of Edinburgh, and so demonstrate that she had relinquished her injurious pretensions to the crown of England.

Stung to the quick, high spirited, and full of youthful fire, Mary delivered a reply to Throckmorton, the English ambassador, which, though mingled with courteous expressions, savored too much of a defiance to have any effect but that of increasing the animosity and indignation of Elizabeth, who at once equipped a fleet, with the avowed intent of putting down piracy in the channel, but, doubtless, with the real purpose of intercepting Mary on her homeward voyage.

Phrase it as they might, the kinswomen were now rival queens, rival beauties; for Elizabeth, too, fancied herself a beauty. The cousins were thenceforth—until death, that great disseverer of friendships, that sole conciliator of feuds, should separate them—mortal enemies.

A fog favored her evasion; and the galley which bore her sailed unchallenged through the centre of the English fleet. It is said that she was affected with a strange melancholy, a dim foreboding of future woe, as she sailed from Calais. She gazed on the land which had, in truth, been her country, until its outlines were lost in the haze of falling night; and then, ordering her couch to be spread on the deck al fresco, commanded the pilot to awaken her should the coast be in sight at daybreak. The night was calm and breezeless, and the ship had made so little way that the first sunbeams fell upon the sand hills nigh to Calais. Her parting words are yet remembered with which she bade farewell to the land in which alone she knew one hour of happiness: “Adieu, belle France; adieu, France, bien chérie! Jamais, jamais, ne te je reverrai plus!”

Her sad forebodings were but too fatally confirmed; the sullen, mutinous brutality of the Calvinistic rabble, the fierce and atrocious insolence of John Knox, the rude and unknighly ferocity of the reforming nobles rendered her court a very dungeon. Although she made no effort to restore the ancient religion, or arrest the march of reformation, her own profession of the Romish creed condemned her in the eyes of those stern religionists; and her very graces and accomplishments, her youthful gayety and natural love of innocent pleasures, caused the ranting preachers of the Calvinistic Church to denounce her, to her face, as a "painted Jezebel," a "dancing Herodias," a "daughter of Belial;" and it is, doubtless, to their unprovoked insolence and unchristian fury that must be ascribed her after errors, indiscretions, vices, and—the word must be written, for it is history, not fiction, that I am now writing—crimes.

Who knows not the dreadful provocations she received—the cruel and ungrateful neglect of the stupid and unworthy Darnley—the base and bloody butchery, before her eyes, of the "Italian minion," Rizzio—when, to the woman's natural weakness, was added the debility of one about to be a mother?

Who knows not the horrible catastrophe of the Kirk of Field, and Darnley's miserable murder, contrived, unquestionably, by that black-hearted wretch, Bothwell, thereafter Duke of Orkney?

Who knows not the sad and guilty tale, how the confederate lords first called on her to punish, then recommended her, under their written signatures—such of them, at least, as could write—to marry, that same Bothwell? How he abducted her by force, and then set her free unscathed? How she espoused him, and was then dethroned, and imprisoned in the dreary fortress of Lochlurn, by the very lords who had counseled her to wed him; by her own base-born brother, the wise, but wicked, regent Murray? How she escaped thence by the devotion of George Douglas, fought the disastrous battle of Langside, only to see her last friends fall around her, battling to the last in vain for Mary and the Church, for "God and the Queen," their chivalrous, their loyal, and their solemn war-cry?

She fled to England, to Elizabeth, who had shown sympathy thus far, shown even generosity, in her behalf, and interposed her offices to deliver her from imprisonment; though she had hesitated to declare war on the regent, fearing, as she avowed, lest open war should drive him to extremity. In this I believe she spoke truly. For it suited not her policy to allow the spectacle of subjects dethroning a lawful sovereign to come before the eyes of the world.

When once, however, she had the hapless Mary in her power, all generosity, all sympathy, all scruples vanished. Elizabeth was no longer the sister queen, the cousin, and the ally. No; if not yet the embittered and jealous woman, the enemy determined on her victim's death, she was, at least, simply and solely, the Queen of England; the resolute, hard-minded, politic, ambitious queen, with her country's interests pre-eminent, above all things, at her heart; the woman, who—to use her own noble words delivered to her troops at Tilbury, when the vast arms of the Invincible Armada were outstretched to encircle her England, and the unconquered infantry of Castile were reveling already, in anticipation, in the beauty and the wealth of London—if she were a woman, "had yet the heart of a man within her, and that man a King of England."

In the first instance, it is probable that, in persuading Mary to undergo the degradation of standing trial for the assassination of her husband, against her own rebellious subjects, her object was solely to gain the eminent position of being selected arbitress between a sovereign realm and its dethroned and fugitive princess; and that she had, as yet, decided nothing of her future movements.

Mary's grand error, or rather the grand error of her counselors, was the submitting to the trial, under any show or pretext. As to the trial itself, it seems to have been conducted fairly, so far as we can judge; and, as it was broken off by Mary's own action, we must admit that it was going unfavorably for her. Yet it is difficult not to doubt, not almost to believe, that the letters, produced so late in the day by the regent, were, as they are always alleged by Mary's defenders to have been, forgeries.

In this state of the case, the trial being broken off by Mary's own refusal to proceed, Elizabeth dismissed the regent, pronouncing no judgment on the cause, refused to see Mary, or receive her as a queen; and subsequently committed her, first, to honorable free custody, then to close custody, and, lastly, to strict and absolute imprisonment.

What could she do? What should she have done?

She could have received her in her court as a sister, an honored and invited guest. Against this was the plea that she could not extend the hand of friendship to one suspected, and almost convicted, of petty treason in the assassination of a husband.

She could, perhaps, have reinstated her ex et armis in her own seat of power. Against this was the plea that she could not, in common policy, beat down a Protestant power for the benefit of a Catholic power, a friendly Scottish power for the benefit of a hostile French power.

She could have dismissed her, as she claimed to be dismissed, and suffered her to return to her loved, her almost native, France. Against this was the plea that she could not, in justice to herself, to England, permit a princess almost French to return to hostile France, in order to set forth anew—as undoubtedly she would have set forth—her title to the English crown; and to enforce it, perhaps, by a united crusade of France and Spain, now closely allied, against the liberties, against the religion, of England.

What should she have done?

Alas! what should she? Had they been both private persons, the question is answered without a thought: she should have been generous, and dismissed her. But have kings—they to whom the charge of the life, the happiness, of millions is intrusted—have kings the right to indulge in the luxury of generosity, when that generosity must needs entail destruction on thousands alive and happy? I answer confidently, they have not the right. But Elizabeth was not generous. She imprisoned her fallen rival, cruelly, for long and weary years; unjustly, in accordance with right and law—justly, in accordance with true policy, and the welfare of her own country and the world at large.

The question of the execution is less doubtful. That Mary was privy to Norfolk's, to Babington's plot is, I fear, proved beyond a doubt. It was a question of life and death between the two, and nothing but the axe or the knife could end it. The axe ended it; and we cannot, I think, regret the catastrophe, however much we may deplore the fate of the lovely, the miserable, the deeply-injured Mary—however much we may condemn the perfidiousness, the cold-blooded duplicity, the bitter malignity, the hard-hearted policy of Elizabeth.

Yet she, too, was avenged. For who can doubt that the death of Elizabeth—agonized by secret remorse, refusing sustenance or aid of medicine, groaning her soul away in undiscovered sorrow for ten whole nights and days of unknown anguish, perishing like a gaunt, old, famished lioness, in despair at the deeds herself had done—was more tremendous fiftyfold, and fiftyfold less pitied, than that of her disrowned rival?

THE FIRST AND SECOND MARRIAGE.

BY F. E. F., AUTHOR OF "A MARRIAGE OF CONVENIENCE," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

"Vanity—all is vanity, saith the preacher."—ECCLES.

"You'll do it for me, then?" asked, or rather said, Clara Heywood to her cousin Frank; for it was spoken in a tone that showed that she was accustomed to have her slightest wish attended to.

"I'll do mon possible," replied the young man, gayly.

"Your 'possible.' " she exclaimed, with a slight accent of scorn, turning her full bright eyes upon him. "Any man can do that."

"And who can do more?" he inquired, laughingly.

"George Herbert would be glad of the opportunity to do the impossible," she replied. "So, when your 'possible' fails, let me know; and I've only to call upon him." It was spoken both proudly and carelessly, as one who knew her power where, at the same time, she cared little to please.

"Take care, Clara," said Frank, earnestly.

"Take care of what?" she asked, somewhat haughtily.

"You know what I mean," he replied in the same tone. "You know your power over Herbert, and it's cruel to encourage him."

"I encourage him!" she replied, turning her flashing eyes upon her cousin. "I thought you knew me better, Frank."

"Surely, if to walk with a man, and talk to him, sing to him, play chess with him, accept his flowers, and praise his poetry—in short, receive devotions breathed in the very spirit of homage—is not encouragement, I do not know what is," replied Heywood. "Indeed, Clara, I've known you to keep men of greater pretensions at a greater distance. In fact, I've sometimes almost doubted what you did mean. And if, Clara, I, who, as you say, know you so well, have at times looked on in surprise, you should not wonder if Herbert himself should be misled; and, I repeat it, if you mean nothing, it's cruel in you to trifle with him thus."

"You surely do not mean," she replied, "that Mr. Herbert presumes upon my kindness. I have treated him, as you say, with a degree of civility that I certainly should not have accorded to one of higher claims; but he has no pretensions to presume upon, consequently I concluded I could not be misunderstood."

"Possibly he does not rate his claim so low," replied Frank. "He is a man of talents, and knows it, for modesty and merit are not always hand in hand; and, besides, dazzled and entranced as he is by your grace and beauty, it is asking almost too much of any man to expect him to see the line—which, after all, broad and strong as you think it, is yet an imaginary one—that separates you. You talk to him with interest and animation"—

"Certainly," she interrupted; "for he has decided talents. I know no man who converses so well, consequently he interests and amuses me; but, because I talk to him with pleasure, it does not follow that I can forget, for a moment, what is due to myself."

"Then it's a pity," said her cousin, "that you could not, at the same time, remember what is due to him."

"Due to him! Why, how strangely you talk, Frank!" she replied. "Pray what is due to him? A young man without family, or fortune, or position, what can he expect? A man who, I suppose, scarcely knew what a lady born and bred was before he knew me. Really, if it were not that we are situated just as we are in the country for a few weeks, I should not even take the notice of him that I do. But, after we leave here, I shall probably never see him again; and, if I have derived some pleasure from his society, and he has rendered my stay here more endurable than it would otherwise have been, I consider the obligation as more than repaid. I have given him some glimpses of another world of which he had no knowledge before, some tastes and views"—

"Which he had much better been without, Clara," interrupted Frank. "You have, in short, fired his heart and turned his head—no small mischief to any man; but when it comes to a man of genius, of susceptible temperament, the evil is incalculable. With an ordinary man, hope being destroyed, love dies away and leaves no vestige. But when the impression is as vivid in the brain as the heart, when the idol has been idealized, the traces left are indelible, stamped in burning bitterness, or graven in deep melancholy, according to the temper of the man. And thus to embitter, perhaps exhaust, the best feelings of a man's nature is surely to do him a great wrong. That you are the first high-bred, finished woman Herbert has ever met on an intimate footing makes the impression all the fresher, keener. His tastes are all instinctively refined and elegant. The torch was ready, and you have applied the light. You may pass away and forget him, or only remember with a smile the enthusiastic homage rendered to your powers by a son of genius; but not so will it be with him. He will not readily comprehend that you have thus drawn upon his better nature and sported with his affections, merely pour passer le temps, till Mrs. Rutledge could join you. And, if I mistake not, the knowledge, when it does come, will make a most unhappy impression on him."

"Oh, nonsense!" she answered, laughing. "Men don't break their hearts and die of love. He'll survive it."

"He will," Frank replied. "But you have given him a beau idéal he will probably never be able to attain; while, at the same time, you will have destroyed his faith in woman. With a quickened imagination and a chilled heart, I very much doubt whether Herbert will ever be as happy a man as he was before he knew you. You have crossed his path like a vision, to leave him cold and fastidious."

"Well," she replied, quietly, "that will only prevent his marrying some common woman, as most men of talents do. I like to see a man critical. If I have given Herbert elevated and refined views of woman, I think he is greatly indebted to me."

"Refined are very different from elevated views," replied Frank.

"One of your distinctions without a difference," she replied, a little impatiently.

"The difference of the moral from the intellectual," he rejoined; "and none can be greater."

"Ah!" she exclaimed, suddenly interrupting him, "is that the sound of wheels? I hope it's Mary. It is!" she continued, joyfully, as she threw up the window.

And, in fact, it was Mrs. Rutledge, the sister, whose delay upon the road, owing to the illness of a child, had detained Miss Heywood at the pretty village of C—, where, with some friends, she awaited her arrival, to continue their northern tour. Thus accident had thrown her in the way of George Herbert, who was residing there as a student at law. In the impatience and lassitude of this sudden pause in her journey, Clara Heywood would have hailed almost anything or anybody as a godsend that served to beguile the time that hung so heavily on her hands; consequently, it is not surprising that, discerning, with the quick discrimination of one used to society, the superior gifts of young Herbert, she graciously accorded him much of her time, careless and thoughtless of consequences to him. Highly cultivated herself, his conversation really interested her; and accustomed as she had been to admiration, and cold as she was by nature, and worldly by education, she was yet woman enough to be pleased and flattered by the homage of the young student. For he was a man of genius, and his admiration had the freshness, the glow of poetry as well as passion, to which she had not been accustomed among the men of the world by whom she had been surrounded. That she, beautiful and high-bred, should at once become his "life's star," the realization of his visions, the actual of his ideal, the spirit of his dreams, followed as a matter of course. Impressible as all men of genius are to externals, he absolutely knelt in spirit before the shrine of her beauty; and, proud of his mental superiority, he would readily have bowed before one less brilliant, who drew forth and appreciated his intellectual gifts. Thus she excited his imagination and stimulated his vanity, and, in the ardor of passion, he gave himself up to his feelings, unchecked by fear or thought. Modesty formed no part of his character, and he was too ignorant of the world to be diffident. No doubts therefore clouded his present, and no thought dimmed his future; for, had he paused to think, he must have known that hope itself was hopeless, as, could he even have won his idol, he had no shrine wherein to place it, no niche, however small, for his statue. Poor student as he was, he had scarce enough to maintain himself during his studies; for the reputation he so clearly saw in the distance, and the fortune he was so confident of making, were yet "to be" won and "to be made." He little knew the ambitious, high-spirited nature of the beautiful being he idealized, if he supposed that, even with fairer prospects and a more smiling present, he would have stood any better chance than he did under existing circumstances. Clara Heywood was as haughty as she was high-bred. Pride of birth and place was more powerful with her than pride of talent or beauty. No glories of a setting sun could have made her forget the mists of a cloudy rising. She was a proud woman; but her pride was of the "earth, earthy," and touched, as the darker edges of her mind were, with the light of a bright imagination, it was only to illumine, not elevate, her character.

Herbert had now, however, an opportunity of seeing some of those shades of feeling which circumstances had hitherto thrown in the background; for, with Mrs. Rutledge, arrived a party from the South, among whom there were one or two men of the position and stamp Clara valued. The change in her manner was marked. She not only turned at once from Herbert to address herself to them, but the tone was different. There was a retenu of manner which she had never thought worth while to show to a poor student, but which she instinctively assumed in coming in contact with those whose station commanded her respect. But with her reserve there was more of excitement; little things marked the change. She dressed, not more, for her taste was perfect, but differently. The colored morning dress gave place to the finest white negligé, edged with delicate lace, and the gossamer breakfast-cap was replaced at dinner by a water-lily; in short, it was evident that now there was some one worth dressing for, and Herbert saw that the easy friendliness with which she had treated him, and which had so captivated him, was anything but flattering to his pride. Mr. Ashfield, the principal person in the group, and the one to whom Clara chiefly addressed herself, was a distinguished-looking man, one who had traveled much, and bore the stamp of being one of "fortune's favorites." A fair portion of understanding, with a good education, and much knowledge of the world, rendered him, upon the whole, agreeable. Not that his powers of conversation could be at all compared to Herbert's, for his mind was originally of a much inferior tone, and his acquirements superficial in the extreme. But he was au fait to all the fashionable gossip of the day, had heard Jenny Lind, and could talk of the last new opera, knew the styles of the different composers and artists; and so Clara turned carelessly from Herbert, or listened half listlessly, half impatiently, to the poetical and literary disquisition that had before interested her, as from themes for which she had now no time. He was stung to the quick, not more, however, by her manner to himself than by her manner to Ashfield, for it let in a flood of light upon his mind that inflicted anguish almost intolerable to his irritable and excited temperament. He felt, for the first time, the power of position. Talents without the stamp of fame he saw were, with these worldlings, valueless, and the mortifications of a quick and sensitive vanity were not the least among his sufferings. He sometimes foolishly thought to lower Ashfield in Clara's eyes by attacking some of his assertions, and exposing the fallacy of his arguments; but, whenever he did so, she quickly turned the scales by throwing her brilliant powers of ridicule or wit on Ashfield's side, covering his deficiencies, and often even bringing him off victorious. Herbert became irritable, and often lost his temper on these occasions, when Mr. Ashfield would look at him in calm surprise, as if he thought him a very ill-bred young man, and then, turning away, address him no more. In all discussions on fashionable topics, Herbert was, of course, left out; and this quietly passing him by as one out of the clique, not belonging to the same sphere, hurt him perhaps more than all the rest. The gay world at once assumed an importance in his eyes it had never had before. What was fame in futurity with only poetry for the present, when coolly looked down upon and distanced by a mere man of fashion, and slighted by the bright, but scornful, eyes of beauty?

His gods were dashed to the ground, and inferior idols raised in their place.

Mrs. Rutledge's child recovered, and the party resumed their journey; and Clara passed on, unconscious and careless of the misery she had inflicted, and the mischief she had done.

CHAPTER II.

"And this, too, is vanity."—EccL.

"Don't forget, Fanny," said Miss Hastings to her sister, "to send a card for this Mr. Herbert with the Harpers' invitations."

"Oh, I am glad you put me in mind of it," replied her sister. "Mary introduced him to me the other night, and it would have been a slight, I suppose, to omit him."

"As the Harpers have announced the engagement, and are introducing him to all their friends, of course, they would be hurt by any want of attention to him; and it certainly would be rude not to include him when inviting them."

"Of course. I am glad you mentioned it, or I should have forgotten all about him. Who is he? Do you know?"

"No; only what Mrs. Bolton told me, that he is a young lawyer, and that the family like him very much."

"Where did they pick him up?" continued Miss Hastings. "I never heard of him before."

"I don't think he has been here long," replied her sister. "Tom Harper happened to meet him somewhere, and was pleased with him, and introduced him to his family."

"What sort of a match is it for her?" pursued Miss Hastings.

"I don't know. Mrs. Bolton did not seem to think much of it. He is poor, just starting in his profession."

"What made the Harpers take him up so, I wonder?" returned the other.

"They say he is very clever, quite remarkable, indeed. Mr. Harper thinks he has more talent than any young man he knows now at the bar."

"What in the world, then, made him fall in love with Mary Harper, I should like to know?" exclaimed Miss Hastings, in a tone of surprise. "She is as plain and unattractive a girl as I know. How odd that she should have captivated a man of talents!"

"Oh no, nothing is odd in the way of matrimony," replied her sister, laughing; "particularly if a man of talent is one of the parties. Did you ever see one that did not make an extraordinary match? They all marry little, commonplace dowdies."

"So they do. But still I cannot understand it," pursued Miss Hastings.

"No," continued her sister, in the same tone of banter; "it's one of those mysteries not to be penetrated in this world."

"Are they to be married soon?" asked the elder sister.

"Not for a year, I understood. He's poor, and she has nothing, you know. Here, give me the card, and let me inclose it, and then there'll be no mistake about it."

This conversation took place some eight months or a year after we last saw George Herbert in C—. The Hastings were one of the gayest families in the great metropolis of New York, where Herbert had established himself soon after he passed his examination. Accident had made him acquainted with young Harper, who had introduced him to his family. The position of the Harpers was such as to make their acquaintance very gratifying to Herbert. Their fashion was unquestioned, and their name among the best, and, though there was no particular interest attached to any one individual of the family, yet Herbert sought their society with eagerness.

Plain and unattractive as Mary Harper had been pronounced to be, she was yet not devoid of sensibility, and she soon became captivated with the brilliant powers of the young lawyer. Herbert, still chafing under the keen mortification of Clara Heywood, was not insensible to the charm of being treated with so much attention by such a family as the Harpers'. A connection with them would at once open the gates of that paradise, the fashionable world, that he had lately learned to prize so highly. He offered himself, and was accepted. Hence the "mystery" that puzzled Miss Hastings so much. She knew not that men of genius have the same weaknesses that fall to the lot of more obtuse mortals. And when they do, the very fierceness of their organization makes them the more susceptible to external influences.

Herbert's was not a vigorous, manly mind. It took too much the impress of his character, which was weak. He knew himself superior to those whose admiration he coveted, and yet he coveted it not the less. He was not in love with Mary Harper; but he was proud of his engagement. He was happy in his gratified vanity; though, had she been a Mary Brown, he would hardly have helped her across the gutter. Mr. Harper liked the young man; and, though he would have been glad if he had had some money, yet he knew enough of the world to know that, with such talents, he could not fail to make his way in his profession, and would probably, in the end, prove an excellent match for his daughter. His consent was therefore given, with only the stipulation of a year's delay before the marriage.

Mary was as happy as the purest and most perfect love could make her. Need we add more?

The engagement being announced, Herbert was introduced and invited wherever the Harpers visited; and, in the course of a few weeks, he found himself as freely launched in "good society" as if he had been a born and bred member of the "charmed circle." The diffidence with which he entered, arising from a remembrance of Clara Heywood and Mr. Ashfield, soon yielded to the animating influence of flattery. He was not only received, but well received. His reputation for talents, and his powers of conversation, procured him respect and attention. He was going to marry Mary Harper, and no one cared whether he was poor or rich. He was brilliant, and that was enough for those who gave parties and wanted agreeable men. He looked round him, and soon felt his value, and thought, like Mr. Bumble, that he had "gone cheap." Clara Heywood had, as her cousin had prophesied, crossed him like a vision, to leave him cold and fastidious. And worse than that, she had destroyed his faith in those about him. He believed them all as cold and worldly as she, whom he looked upon as a type of her class, and his was not that earnest nature that keeps itself above the ordinary level. Here, indeed, he fell short of it; for, in looking upon others as heartless, he had become so himself.

There is a sort of poetical justice that Nature exacts from those who undervalue her claims. What the individual is not willing to render to the mass, he is before long generally found wanting himself. Of the worldly crowd whom he gazed on with contempt, there were few as worldly as himself. But this very fastidious coldness gave him self-possession and success. His fine sense of the beautiful made him at once critical and enthusiastic. He paid little attention but to those pre-eminent for something—wit, beauty, music; some claim, and that decided, they must have, to win his notice. But, when the gift was marked, no homage could be more enthusiastic and delightful than that he rendered. People quoted, and beauties courted him.

Mary Harper was proud of her young lover. She was too generous to harbor a thought of jealousy, and she gloried in his rising reputation. But ere many months had passed by, even her confiding nature could not but feel uneasy pangs. In fact, Herbert was growing careless. He had never loved her; and now, as he saw how easy a thing it was to win that which he had coveted, a position in society, he regretted the sacrifice he had made. Not that he valued the thing less; only the price he had paid for it. He felt his engagement irksome. He regretted it; and, regretting, relaxed in his attentions to Mary, which, in the blindness of a devoted, but not sensitive, affection, she did not see. From inattentive, he became positively careless. Still, she could not credit the truth. There was such anguish in the thought that she could not bring herself to look it steadily in the face.

The year elapsed, and Herbert let the anniversary of his engagement pass in cold silence, trusting that Mary would be roused to break the tie that bound him. But she did not. She explained it to herself on the ground of prudence. Herbert could not afford to marry yet, and was too proud to own it. She clung to the engagement.

From not loving her, he grew almost to hate her. He dared not openly break himself. Her family and position were such that he was unwilling to incur the odium he must draw upon himself in the déshonneur by taking such a step. Besides, though a cold, he prided himself upon being an honorable man. If she insisted on it, he would marry her, though love her he would not pretend to. And valuing himself on such a code of honor, he rather looked upon himself as a victim to his high-toned, gentlemanly feelings, to which poor Mary's happiness—of which he never thought—was to be the sacrifice. Little as the attention was with which he treated Mary, still he was obliged to give her some, and with that little she was resolved to be content. Had she been a spirited girl, she would not have borne it, nor ought she. But she shut her eyes, and sealed her own doom. Herbert could no longer postpone the evil day. Mary would not break the engagement, and he could not.

His last effort was when he appealed to her to name the day. He spoke of his poverty, of the hard lot that awaited one bred, as she had been, in luxury, as his wife. But, coldly as it was said, she trusted that it was only proudly felt. Her generosity was touched when her spirit should have been roused. In short, she was wanting in that dignity of character for which nothing feminine can atone. She could not acknowledge his indifference, and would not see his coldness. She said the fate that awaited her was her own choice.

In a better spirit, Herbert prepared for his marriage. A very small house, suited to his means, and large enough, had love been there, was taken, and Mr. Harper furnished it. The wedding took place amidst festivity and fashion. The bridegroom was remarked as being careless and looking cold; the bride as seeming anxious, but still happy. There were clouds upon his brow, but she would chase them away. She trusted to love and time to make him all she would have him. And then what she would not or could not understand in the awkwardness of his temper, she put down, womanlike, to the "peculiarities of genius."

CHAPTER III.

"That which is crooked cannot be made straight. And that which is wanting cannot be numbered."—Ecc.

As a married man, Herbert continued very much the same as before in society. What time was not given to his profession was spent chiefly in the gay circle of which he was a favorite and brilliant ornament. He was very little at home, as little as he could help. He was naturally luxurious, hated small rooms, low ceilings, and shabby furniture. Hated being waited on by a female servant—in short, hated all the details of small means. He had been used to them always, certainly; but that does not reconcile people any the more to what they don't like, though those who know nothing of the matter suppose it does. The houses of the rich were open to him always, and there were club rooms, spacious and free, and pleasant avenues, to escape the perpetual remembrance of a limited income, which his own house forced upon him. His wife did her utmost to win him to love and home; but she failed.

She had married him against his will, and he resented it. She was gentle, and loving, and kind; but she did not gratify his vanity, and he did not love her the better for the privations they were compelled to endure together. She had no beauty nor mental superiority to supply the place of external charms, and he took no pains to cultivate her tastes, though he felt himself sacrificed, because they had no sympathies in common. Cold and careless from the first, he grew irritable, and often even rude. Heart-stricken and mortified, she tried, poor thing! every device that affection could suggest to make home attractive. There was no sacrifice that ingenuity could invent, to make their little income embrace some of the luxuries as well as necessities of life, that she did not make. His little household was in the neatest order, and his table was supplied with delicacies that nothing but her personal exertion could have secured with their small means. In short, his tastes and comforts were studied with the most sedulous care, only to make him more selfish and exacting.

Had she known her own rights, and turned upon him with spirit, the effect would have been better. But that an inward consciousness prevented. Humbled by the conviction, which was forced upon her at last, that her husband did not love, she bitterly acknowledged to herself that she should have admitted the fact before. She could not conceal from herself now that she had married him in spite of his own wishes; that he had tried to break off, and she would not. But for that, an outraged love might have roused to another course. She would have felt indignant as well as aggrieved, and remembered what she, as Mary Harper, had sacrificed in becoming Mrs. Herbert. The deep consciousness, however, that her husband would gladly have spared her the sacrifice of becoming his wife, quenched every spark of womanly spirit. She scarcely felt herself his equal, and made herself his drudge. A fatal error. Brilliant as he was in society, many pitied him for having such a little dowdy wife. Indeed, he pitied himself. He was eloquent on the subject of "imperfect sympathies," and talked sadly and beautifully of a life that was

"aimless" There were never any personal allusions in his remarks, and perhaps he even did not mean others to apply them; for he talked from the abundance of a poetical imagination and discontented mind, which he mistook for the sadness of a heart that knew no resting-place. He had no sense of duty, no sense of anything that required sacrifice; only a deep sense of his own gifts, and that, somehow, his destiny had not been fulfilled.

Such merits as his wife possessed he did not appreciate—her patience, her gentleness, her exertions. How she would sew! What rows and rows of stitching she would put upon his linen, and how beautifully she did it! And, if he noticed at all what she was doing, he only thought she liked it! Better would it have been for him, a thousand times, and infinitely better for her, if his wife had been a different woman. Such qualities as she had were worse than thrown away upon him, for they only spoilt him. Had she played the harp and sung, though she never touched a needle and neglected his comforts, he might have been sometimes cross, but he would never have despised her. Had he married Clara Heywood, he would have been a better man; for, in admiring her, he would have known what was her due.

Had he been proud of his wife, he would have exerted himself more cheerfully in the path of duty; and even his small home would have borne a different aspect, had the wife who presided there been one whom others admired. But he was growing absolutely ashamed of Mary, as the consciousness of not pleasing rendered her diffident, and consequently awkward, and the little air she had had as Miss Harper she now lost from her want of intercourse with society. Nothing tells sooner on a woman's appearance than a too close application to domestic duties; and, when you add to that a poor and common wardrobe, a woman must be elegant, indeed, who still retains her air of superiority. The grace that rises superior to a calico frock and the kitchen is truly grace of the rarest and finest quality. What then was poor Mary's hope of looking anything but the spiritless, over-served little drudge that she was?

The birth of a daughter was a vent at last for the mother's overcharged heart. She loved the child almost to idolatry. But to the father she brought no addition of love or happiness. He turned away almost in disgust from the little red thing that squalled so. A girl, too! and he hated girls. Had it been a boy, he might have felt some tenderness for the mother, while he indulged in pride in his child. But a poor, puny, crying little girl took no hold on his heart.

"How you cough, Mary!" said her husband to her.

"Yes," she replied. "I have taken cold."

"Do take something, then, and stop it. Can't you?"

It was spoken in impatience, for the sound jarred upon his ear. There was no tenderness in the tones, no kindness for his wife's suffering that suggested the remark.

The child was delicate, and night after night Mary paced the nursery with it in her arms, trying to soothe its pains, and still the cry she feared might reach its father's ears. And thus the cold, instead of growing better, settled in a little hacking cough, that irritated Mr. Herbert's nerves, while it wore out his wife's lungs. She grew daily paler and thinner; but she uttered no sound of complaint, and only when she thought of her baby her pale lips quivered, and the mother's heart rose within her. But she felt that her doom was written down, and she had no spirit to struggle against it. Her father's family she knew would receive her child, and to a sister's love she felt she could confide it. Her constitution and heart were alike broken, and Herbert knew it not.

The physician was the first that called his attention to the fact of his wife's failing health. He was both startled and shocked; for there is something in the near approach of death that appeals the most heartless, unloved though the object may be. Herbert was attentive and kind now, and would have done all in his power to save her. But it was too late.

Fortunately, his sensibilities were not taxed long, or he might have felt, with Mr. Dubster, that she was a "tedious time dying." But he had scarce time to rally from the first shock he received on learning her situation, ere her rapidly sinking frame told him the sad story was near its close. Something like remorse was mingled with the horror he felt in the final separation of himself and wife. He had taken her "to love and cherish till death do us part." And how had he fulfilled his vow? He hung over her in anguish, and she smiled gratefully, while breath was ebbing fast; and relying on higher promises and brighter hopes than earth could have afforded her, "after this painful life ended," her spirit passed in peace.

Those who had voted Mrs. Herbert a dowdy during her life, pitied her now she was dead. Some even said her husband had been unkind to her, which others, again, indignantly denied.

"I don't suppose he beat her, Fanny, when I say he was unkind," said Charles Hastings to his sister; "but, if to neglect a woman is not to be unkind, I don't know what you call it."

"How do you know that Herbert neglected his wife?" warmly rejoined the young lady.

"He never was at home," replied the brother. "He was forever at clubs, or in society, and she never was with him."

"Well, perhaps she did not want to go," returned Fanny. "What pleasure could she find in society? A dull, ugly, little thing."

"Your plain, little people like society as well as others," remarked Hastings. "Because they give no pleasure, it does not follow they receive none. Society is to them a kind of spectacle; they like to see how people dress, and what they are doing. They don't go to talk, but to look."

"But think what a bore to be taking such a person with one," urged Miss Hastings.

"If such a person happens to be one's wife," answered Charles, "I think she has a right to go in society if she likes it."

"But he was ashamed of her," continued Fanny.

"Ashamed of her!" exclaimed Hastings. "And what right had he to be ashamed of her? He was not obliged to marry her, and if he chose"—

"But there, Charles," interrupted his sister, "I think you are mistaken. I believe Herbert did his best to get rid of his engagement; but Mary Harper would not let him off."

"That's bad," said the young man, emphatically. "That makes a difference."

"I believe it was nothing but a sense of honor that made him marry her," continued Fanny.

"It's a pity his sense of honor could not have carried him a little farther, and made him treat her well after he had married her. Commend me to the honor that marries a woman to make her unhappy afterwards!"

"I always pitied him," pursued Miss Hastings. "He is such an agreeable man."

"Oh, he's agreeable enough," said her brother, dryly.

"You don't seem to like him, Charles?"

"No," he replied; "he's a cold, selfish fellow."

"Cold!" she repeated. "Why, Charles, he is one of the most enthusiastic men, I know."

"Enthusiastic! Yes," replied Hastings. "He is in ecstasies, I grant you, with exquisite music; but a man may be a cold, selfish fellow for all that. And, if he leaves a poor little wife stitching at home, while he is indulging his elegant tastes abroad, I think he is."

"I never heard Herbert express a sentiment that was not noble and beautiful," continued Miss Hastings, warmly.

"He talks well, no doubt of that," said her brother. "He has talent enough."

"Depend upon it," persisted his sister, "that, if he had made a more congenial marriage, he would have been a different, and perhaps a better, man."

"I've no doubt of that," replied her brother. "He always gave me the impression of a man that had met some early disappointment. If that be so, and he has been forced to marry against his inclinations, there's some apology for the man. Not to get the woman one wants, and be obliged to take one you don't want, must put a gentleman's temper to rather an unpleasant trial, certainly. I wonder whom he'll marry now," he pursued.

"Oh, don't begin to talk already of his marrying again," said Miss Hastings, quite shocked. "I met him yesterday with such a weeper on his hat, in the deepest black from his head to his boots, looking as sad and widowerlike as possible."

"He'll be more interesting than ever," said her brother, a little sarcastically.

"But he really looked sad."

"I dare say," replied Hastings. "Herbert is just the man to have his imagination strongly affected by death. I should not be surprised if, by this time, he fancied he had been very much attached to his wife, and the most devoted of husbands. Besides, decency prevents his going in society at present. He cannot even show himself at the clubs, and no doubt he finds it dull enough in that little house of his by himself."

And this was pretty much the truth. Herbert was eminently a social man, and, cut off at once from all the pleasures he had been accustomed to, he found his lonely home gloomy and sad, indeed, when he returned to it after the business of the day. The intense silence and solitude where Death had so lately reigned impressed him with a sense of desolation that was almost intolerable. He suffered, and thought that he mourned. If he deceived others, he deceived himself. But it was his imagination that was in affliction, his fancy in mourning, not his heart; for, in his saddest moments even, he never yearned for his child.

CHAPTER IV.

"I said, in mine heart, 'Go to, now! I will prove thee with mirth, therefore enjoy pleasure.' And, behold, this also is vanity."—ECCLES.

"Whom do you think I met at Stanhopes last night, Fanny?" asked Charles Hastings.

"Whom?"

"Herbert!"

"Herbert! What, is he out again? Oh, how soon!"

"Bless you, do you think a man is never to show his face again, because he happens to lose his wife?"

"But she has been dead so short a time!" replied the sister.

"It's a year, or near it," returned her brother. "Oh, he has done very well—behaved himself better than I expected."

Miss Hastings still looked dissatisfied, for women do not easily reconcile themselves to these changes; but so it was, Herbert had entered into society again, and with a zest that was new to him. The dull year he had passed in comparative solitude had sent him back to the gay world with a freshness and animation of feeling not so rare in widowers as one would wish. He had always been singularly under the influence of society for one of his superior endowments. He had been sensitive to its opinion, and anxious for its applause. In short, he had not been early used to it, and consequently always overvalued it. He had entered it a young and unknown man, introduced through the influence of the Harpers; then as a married man, with the drawback of a wife, who embarrassed him; and now, free and flattered, his society courted, the world all before him where to choose. In the effervescence of the first excitement, he believed he had but to throw his handkerchief and "bless contending beauties."

The man's head was turned, which was the truth: no doubt a delightful state of being, though very absurd. He meant to marry again, and this time to gratify his tastes. He looked about him to find a woman who combined everything in one beautiful whole. Youth, beauty, music, were essential; grace and elegance not to be dispensed with; added to which he must have family and fashion.

He flirted with several, and, though nearly caught once or twice by the force of flattery, fortunately for both parties, he somehow escaped, after having given rise to hopes which, as the fancy passed, he did not feel himself at all bound to follow up.

"Who is that?" asked Herbert, one night, eagerly, as the youngest daughter of Mr. Howard entered a ball-room where he was.

"A daughter of Howard's," answered the person he addressed. "Handsome, I think, and decidedly stylish. Shows her blood."

Herbert followed with his eyes the statuelike-looking young creature who passed by him. She was rather pale, with delicate and finely-chiseled features, a well-formed head, and beautifully set upon her shoulders. The throat and shoulders were exquisite, and the whole air was thoroughly aristocratic. The marble was evidently Parian, and the workmanship of the highest finish. Most persons thought her too cold, some said she was inexpressive, and Herbert turned from them in impatience, as if thought and feeling would have disturbed the calm exclusive air he admired so much.

He solicited an introduction, and was presented. The young beauty received him in the same distant manner she received others, and evidently knew no difference between Mr. Herbert and the group of fashionable idlers who gathered quickly round her. He asked her to dance, and she declined. He took a seat upon the ottoman beside her, and tasked his powers to the utmost to amuse her. But on "the impassive ice the lightnings played." She smiled sometimes, but never thawed. A manner so new and unexpected piqued him. He redoubled his efforts, changed his style, passed from wit to poetry, touching many subjects as he glanced along with a rapidity and brilliancy that delighted those about him; he seemed, Prometheus-like, to have stolen fire from Heaven to animate his statue; but with very little effect. Once or twice she raised her eyes with an expression, a faint look, of something lighting up within, but it died away again; and, before long, she said to some one—

"Will you tell papa I am ready to go when he is?"

Presently Mr. Howard came up and said—

"Do you wish to go, Florence?"

"Yes," she replied, languidly, and as if quite unconscious of the presence of those before her, "I am very tired." And, rising, put her arm in her father's, and, bowing slightly to the group who surrounded her, left them, without an idea that she had been guilty of any rudeness.

Had she told Herbert that she was weary of him, the thing could not have been more decided. But, though he was piqued and mortified, he was not angry. It was evident she meant no rudeness. There was no shade of scorn in her manner, but merely a perfect oblivion, or rather an utter unconsciousness of other people's feelings, or even presence.

"Who is that Mr. Herbert, papa?" she asked.

"A lawyer," he replied. "Considered, I am told, the most rising man of the day. Did you find him agreeable?"

"He talks so much," she replied, wearily, as if the quantity had oppressed her.

"But very well, they say," continued her father.

She did not answer. She was fatigued. Herbert had kept her attention on the stretch; and she did not like being excited; she was not used to it. And when her father told her Herbert was a lawyer, she supposed talking so must be professional, and thought it, consequently, in bad taste.

She was as new to Herbert as he was to her; but with this difference, that she caught his imagination, and she had none to be caught.

She was quite different from the beau idéal he had created for himself. She had no talents. On the contrary, she seemed to despise them. It was the business of artistes, people who were paid, to sing and play. When ladies and gentlemen wanted music, they should go for it to the opera. She appeared to think conversation a condescension, and that no lady talked much, or with animation, without compromising herself. She smiled only occasionally, and never laughed. And this decided disinclination to entertain anybody only gave her, in Herbert's eyes, an air of exclusive refinement that accorded perfectly with her delicate and alabaster beauty. He felt that she was to be placed on a pedestal, and he willingly did homage at her shrine.

Cold as she was, however, she was not altogether insensible to his powers. She was as much flattered as it was in her nature to be by his admiration, for she saw that others thought it a matter of pride to win his notice. But when she first heard their names associated together in the fashionable gossip of the day, she started almost indignantly, and asked herself at once, "Could a Howard marry a self-made man without family?" and her spirit promptly answered, "No!" for the Howards were a race that prided themselves on their name. Why, few could have told; for they had little else to be proud of. There had been two or three generations of them, weak, well bred, and handsome, with some money and no talent; but, somehow, they fancied that the name was a patent of nobility.

When the first shock was over, however, and she became accustomed to the idea, Herbert's intimacy with them seemed insensibly to ennoble him, too

Her cold pride was gratified by the distinction that attached to her lover, and her father, knowing he was a very rising man, encouraged his attentions.

The difficulty of the pursuit enhanced, to Herbert, Florence's value; and, besides, he was weak enough to prize the name they so much valued themselves upon. He liked the idea of entering a connection so large and influential. His vanity, as well as his imagination, was excited, and he threw all he had of heart and soul in the pursuit.

It is not a woman's nature, however cold she may be, to turn insensible from the flattery that falls from the lips of genius, and Florence listened, and sometimes smiled, and sometimes sighed, for her feelings were in a strange state of contradiction to each other. She liked him, and yet he was not the kind of man that suited her taste. She was proud of him, and yet felt that it would be a condescension to marry him. She imagined that she would be losing taste. She preferred a gentleman to a man of genius, and she was not quite sure that Herbert could be the former, as he had not been born in the frozen circle of which she was one of the most delicate icicles. Could she only, like an English dame of rank, have kept her separate title, or even, like a Frenchwoman, retained the née Howard, it would not have been so hard. But to merge all the Howard in the Herbert, was a trial she felt keenly. But still she could not make up her mind to refuse him. She could not dispense with attentions so distinguished, nor dismiss flattery so delightful, and, when the offer came, it was accepted. Not accepted as a young girl should accept her lover, with her whole heart and soul, but with doubts and drawbacks that were not quite forgotten even in his presence.

The marriage took place in the course of a few months, in all "the pomp, the triumph, and the revelry" that the Howards delighted in. Brilliant entertainments, recherche dinners, and exclusive matinées were given from one end of the connection to the other, on the occasion. The fair bride, shod in delicate lace, which looked like a frost-work suited to the frozen spirit it shrouded, received these attentions in silent, but perfect satisfaction.

Proud of his beautiful bride, and gratified by the manner in which he was received by her family, Herbert was brilliant with happiness. His imagination, always impressive to externals, threw a charm over fêtes which, in themselves, if stripped of ornament and fashion, he would have found dull in the extreme. Family parties, composed of insipid, cold, silent people, who have no ideas to communicate, would have been deemed by him an intolerable infliction but for the refinement of air, the elegance of dress, the brilliancy of light, and the glitter of fashion and style.

The most fashionable bride and bridegroom, however, must soon fall into the quiet routine of everyday life, and then the true qualities of heart and mind begin to develop themselves. Herbert's second establishment was very different from his first.

When he had married Mary Harper, he was just starting in his profession, but now he was more than half way up the ladder, and, though far from rich, yet making a good income. But his present house, though a palace to the one that Mary had thought large enough for every imaginable happiness, was yet very inferior to the one Florence had been accustomed to under her father's roof. Mr. Howard, though a man of fortune, had not more income than he wanted—for rich people have so many wants—and, therefore, when his daughters married, they only brought expensive tastes and helpless habits as their dowry. Florence had no idea of money; but she was accustomed to every elegance of wealth, and now looked around her in cold surprise at the absence of the superfluities she had deemed things of course.

Herbert was mortified to see how strongly she felt the contrast, for she had no idea of concealing her sentiments, and "the childlike unconsciousness," as he had termed her utter regardlessness of other people's feelings, and which had rather been a grace before, was anything but pleasant now to a man of his keen and sensitive temperament, when turned upon himself in domestic life. And, if she missed many things she had been accustomed to, he began to feel the loss of others he had hardly been aware of while he had them. Mary had taught him unconsciously to depend upon her affection, though at the time he had not valued it; but now he missed the love that had anticipated every want, and ministered to every whim. He had been the first, almost, it may be said, the only person in the family. His inclinations and his comforts had been studied with anxious care; and he missed, in Florence, not only the thousand and one little comforts his self-indulgent nature required, but the love that had prompted them.

Florence loved him as much as it was in her cold nature to love any one; but it was not in her nature to wait on anybody. She did not know what it was to make sacrifices, and she never consulted any human being's feelings in her life before her own. If he wanted to go to the opera when she felt inclined to stay at home, she quietly refused, perfectly unconscious of the unpleasant surprise she occasioned to one who had been accustomed to have his slightest invitations accepted with a gratitude that was almost humiliating. If he complained of any deficiency at table, it was calmly deemed the cook's affair, in which she had no lot or part. If the buttons were absent from his wristbands, she heard the announcement of the fact in the same spirit that she might if he had complained of the absence of a witness in a cause; and, when he asked her to mend a glove, she told him her work-box was up stairs.

Herbert was hasty and irritable, and sometimes spoke quickly; and, when he did, he was not so quickly forgiven. If he had temper, so had Florence. But his was the kind that vented itself in words; while hers took refuge in silence. And this always conquers the other.

The same distinction characterized all their faults and failings. His were active, hers passive. He was excitable, easily influenced. Heaven and earth could not have moved her. Had she been a woman of high-toned feelings and strong sensibility, she might have done much to redeem him; for his imagination and taste were of that fine order that impelled him to respond to the beautiful in the moral as in the physical world. The very poetry of his nature would have secured Florence his affection, if her character had been in keeping with her beauty; and, selfish as he was, love would have elevated and purified him. True, earnest feeling had been the great quality in which he had been deficient; but Florence was not the person to gain influence over him. He grew somewhat afraid of her, it is true, for the cold temper, as we have said, always masters the irritable one; but, beautiful, high bred, and refined as she looked, the undercurrent of her character was commonplace in the extreme. There was not a generous touch in her; and, in her way, she was as exacting as Herbert. She took no pains to keep his affection, and she resented losing it. She never made an effort to make home agreeable; but still she was indignant if he spent an evening at the club. She took no interest in the subjects that interested him, nor made an attempt to understand the public affairs in which he frequently took a large share. And yet nothing vexed her more deeply than to have him address any conversation on such topics to other women. Not that she was jealous, for Herbert was no flirt, and she knew it. But he talked well, and was naturally fond of society, and was very apt to enter with spirit in conversation with any one, man or woman, who could understand him. But woe be it to him if it happened to be a woman, for his wife scarcely spoke to him for a week after! And many an uncomfortable day he passed, in the early days of their married life, in consequence of a pleasant hour passed at an evening party.

If Florence did not improve her husband, she at least conquered him; and those who had known him during his first marriage looked on in surprise to see him, then so irritable and exacting, now governed by the dropping of an eyelid, or the compression of the lips, or some little movement almost imperceptible to bystanders, but yet most expressive in their silence to one who understood them. Florence's eyes never flashed, nor her voice altered, but, from the tip of her shoulder to the motion of her fairy foot, her whole being was eloquent with cold displeasure.

Herbert could not love her; but he watched her lightest movement, for he still loved his own quiet and peace.

Could Mary Harper have believed that this man was the same who was once her husband? If spirits return wrath, how would hers have been appeased could it have seen his punishment now?

And yet we wrong you, Mary Harper, even in the supposition! Your gentle, unoffending heart never roused to anger even here, when clogged with earth! The mortal did not need to put on immortality to forgive. But who, "unwhipped of justice," can wrong such a spirit? Is there not a retribution even here for the selfish soul that asks all and gives nothing? Was Herbert happy? If the first wife wept, the second avenged her.

THE MORNING OF THE HEART.

BY W. WALLACE SHAW.

"Soft as a bride the rosy dawn
From dewy sleep doth rise,
And, bathed in blushes, hath withdrawn
The mantle from her eyes;
And, with her orbs dissolved in dew,
Bends, like an angel, softly through
The blue-pavilioned skies." AMELIA B. WELBY.

See! above yon mountain's brow
The roseate hue
Of early morning tinges now
The ether blue,
And stars that shone so purely bright
Upon the calmness of the night,
Now, slowly fading, leave their light
Upon the dew.

See! the lark is soaring high
Above the hills,
And, like bright threads of silver, lie
The mountain rills
Beneath the light of dawning day.
Through forest glades they wind away,
While all the air the linnet's lay
With music fills.

Op'ning rosebuds lend the breeze
Their odors rare,
That gently whispers 'mong the trees,
"Away with care!"
How calmly beautiful the dawn
Comes stealing o'er the dewy lawn,
While nature's minstrels pour sweet song
Upon the air!

Blushing brightly now, sweet flowers
Unfold their leaves,
The mountain sprite, for morning hours,
A garland weaves.
"Blest power of sunshine, genial day,
What balm, what life is in thy ray!
A warmth comes with thy transient stay
That ne'er deceives.

Now there 's music thrilling sweet
Within my heart,
While hope and peace there seem to meet,
No more to part;
And now, within my inmost soul,
A joy, new-born, hath found a goal,
And waves of sunlight o'er me roll,
'Tis now the morning of the heart!

COSTUMES OF ALL NATIONS.—THIRD SERIES

THE TOILETTE IN TURKEY.

CHAPTER I.

LET us transport our readers to the shores of the East—the land of the Sultan—the far-famed city of Stamboul. Here, within the closely-guarded chambers of the harem, mid the perfume of thousands of flowers, the soft rippling of fountains, and the sweet melody of voices, “Fashion” still holds undisputed sway. Within the gorgeous chamber, secluded from the gaze of all but her immediate attendants, sits the Eastern beauty, the Rose of the Garden, the Pearl of the Ocean. Paintings and gildings adorn the walls; carpets of the richest dyes are laid over the floors; silken sofas and couches, whose softness invites repose, are scattered around; and near them lie cushions, glittering in satin, velvet, brocade, and embroidery, and tassels and fringes of gold and silver. To describe her beauty, and the dress of Eastern ladies, let me borrow the gifted pen of Lady Wortley Montague:

“On a sofa, raised three steps, and covered with Persian carpets, sat the kihaya’s lady, leaning on cushions of white satin embroidered; and at her feet sat two young girls about twelve years old, lovely as angels, dressed perfectly rich, and almost covered with jewels. But they were hardly seen near the fair Fatima, so much her beauty effaced everything I have ever seen; nay, all that has been called lovely in England or Germany. She was dressed in a *caftan of gold brocade, flowered with silver, very well fitted to her shape, and showing to admiration the beauty of her bosom, only shaded by the thin gauze of her shift. Her drawers were pale pink; her waistcoat green and silver; her slippers white satin, finely embroidered, her lovely arms adorned with bracelets of diamonds, and her broad girdle set with diamonds. Upon her head a rich Turkish handkerchief of pink and silver, her own fine black hair hanging a great length, in various tresses, and on one side of her head some bodkins of jewels.”

Such was the dress of the lady of the deputy to the grand vizier, above one hundred years since, and such is still the dress of the Eastern women; for, though fashion frequently changes the color of their garments, and the materials of which they are composed—now bidding the fair recluse array herself in pale blue silk, now in deep crimson, then again in white muslin, fine as the spider’s web, pure as the untrodden snow, still the form of the garments never changes, and has been the same for hundreds of years

Lady Wortley Montague, who, while residing in the East, adopted the costume of the country, thus describes her own dress in a letter to her sister, then in England:—

“The first part of my dress is a pair of drawers, very full, that reach to my shoes, and conceal the legs more modestly than your petticoats; they are of a thin rose-colored damask, brocade with silver flowers. My shoes are of white kid leather, embroidered with gold. Over this hangs my smock, of a fine white silk gauze, edged with embroidery. This smock has wide sleeves, hanging half way down the arm, and is closed at the neck with a diamond button. The antery is a waistcoat, made close to the shape, of white and gold damask, with very long sleeves falling back, and fringed with deep gold fringe, and should have diamond or pearl buttons. My caftan, of the same stuff as my drawers, is a robe exactly fitted to my shape, and reaching to my feet, with very long, straight, falling sleeves. Over this is my girdle, of about four inches broad, which all that can afford it have entirely of diamonds or other precious stones; it must be fastened before with a clasp of diamonds. The curdee is a loose robe they throw off or put on, according to the weather, being of a rich brocade (mine is green and gold), either lined with sable or ermine; the sleeves reach very little below the shoulders. The head-dress is composed of a cap called talpack, which in winter is of fine velvet, embroidered with pearls and diamonds, and in summer of a light silver stuff; this is fixed on one side of the head, hanging a little way down, with a gold tassel, and bound on either with a circle of diamonds (as I have seen several) or a rich embroidered handkerchief. On the other side of the head the hair is flat, and here the ladies are at liberty to show their fancies; some putting flowers, others a plume of heron’s feathers, and, in short, what they please. But the most general fashion is a large bouquet of jewels, made like natural flowers; that is, the buds of pearl, the roses of different colored rubies, the jessamines of diamonds, the jonquil of topazes, &c., and so well set and enamelled ’tis hard to imagine anything of that kind so beautiful. The hair hangs at full length behind, divided into tresses braided with pearl and ribbon, which is always in great quantity.”

The above is considered a perfect description of the indoor costume of an Eastern lady of quality; but, when they go abroad, they are all obliged to wear two dresses, called murlins; these form a complete disguise, one covering all the face, except the eyes, the other quite concealing the head-dress. Besides these, a farigee is worn to hide the figure; it has straight sleeves, reaching to the ends of the fingers, and, wrapping round them, perfectly conceals the dress and shape.

All Eastern women, whether of high or low degree, wear drawers: indeed, the poorer classes only wear these and a shirt. Yet, though half naked, no one is ever seen without a veil; which, even from the time of Rebecca, has been considered a necessary part of female dress; and all but the very poorest contrive to possess some jewels, for ear-rings, bracelets, and necklaces.

Although there is a chapter in the Koran which strictly prohibits adorning of the person with gold, silver, and jewels, silks, and costly robes, the Turks do not seem to pay the slightest attention to the admonition; for men, as well as women, only esteem their attire in proportion to the expense lavished upon it.

The fair imprisoned inmate of the harem, whose life glides away in all the dull monotony of seclusion, whose only means of cheating the lagging hours is by employing them in embroidery, or in watching the graceful movements of the dancing girls, may be pardoned for devoting so much time to the amusements of the toilette.

In Bulgaria the women wear on their heads a cap somewhat resembling a mitre, ornamented with pieces of money; it covers the forehead, and the hair, plaited with shells, hangs down the back. The robe is long, and fastened round the waist by a girdle; the surcoat, which closes tightly round the throat, with a bow of ribbon in front, is curiously embroidered, and often adorned with jewels. Over this garment is worn a loose robe, not unlike a great coat; it is shorter than the under vest, and has long sleeves, which, though wide at the top, become tight below the elbow to the wrist: this garment is open underneath the arms as far as the bottom, and the sides are united with large bows of ribbon, placed at distances from each other. The slippers are very low in the quarters, and made high upon the instep.

In Wallachia the women of high rank wear splendid silk or satin robes, often embroidered or brocaded in gold and silver. The upper garment is full and long, with long tight sleeves: it is not confined at the waist, but hangs quite loose; it is open at the bosom, and shows a splendid jeweled stomacher, and is generally trimmed all round with fur. Beneath it is an embroidered vest, with a collar of precious stones and velvet encircling the throat. On the head is a cap of fur, made something in the shape of a turban.

The young girls wear their hair flat on the temples, and twisted in a broad plait behind, interspersed with flowers. The silk jupe reaches to the feet; the bodice is sufficiently open to show an ornamented stomacher; the sleeves are tight to the hands, and a colored scarf, after circling the waist, falls to the feet.

As stays are unknown in these countries, a slim waist is never seen, and a French élégante would be shocked at the clumsy tournure of a Wallachian belle.

In Lady Craven's "Journal," we have an account of her reception at the Wallachian court. She says, "In the corner sat the prince, dressed and attended à la Turque; over his head were ranged the horses' tails, the great helmet and feather, the magnificent sabre, and other arms with which I had seen him parade the streets at Constantinople.

* * * I was then summoned to an audience with the princess: she was sitting à la Turque, with three of her daughters by her. There were twenty ladies in the room, one of whom, instead of a turban, had a high cap of sable put behind her hair, that was combed up straight over a kind of roll: this head-dress was far from being ugly or unbecoming. The princess told me that it was a lady of Wallachia, and that the cap was the head-dress of the country."

MYRA BELL; OR, SECOND LOVE.

BY I. W. BRYCE.

CHAPTER I.

"And this I learned, too, from the dove—
To die, and know no second love!"

"THEY tell me, Kate," said Charles Calvert to his beautiful cousin, as they strolled through the flower garden at Oak Lawn, one bright morning in June—"they tell me that young Harry Layton is attentive to Myra Bell."

"Yes, and I certainly wish him success; for my sweet little Myra deserves a good match, and Harry is said, with more reason than is usual in such cases, to be the paragon of the neighborhood."

"You surely do not think such a thing as their engagement possible?"

"And why not, cousin mine? Have you any previous claims to urge upon her heart?"

"By no means. But Myra is a girl, I imagine, who would marry only for love; and, alas! she has no heart to bestow."

"Oh, you allude to her affair with Rupert De Lancey?"

"To be sure I do."

"And do you hold that, because a woman has been jilted by a heartless knave, she may not love a true man?"

"I hold, fair cousin, that, in a sincere bosom, the affections, once blighted and crushed, are not so easily renewed. Nor would an honorable mind like Myra's exchange a broken heart for a loyal and true one."

"I deny your premises, to wit, that Myra's affections are blighted, or that her heart is broken."

"Why, surely she loved De Lancey?"

"Yes; while she found him all that her fancy had painted."

"And would you have her love again, ere one brief year has thrown oblivion over her ill-fated passion? Is such the constancy of woman's heart?"

"Come, no slander upon woman's constancy, or I shall launch forth in full tide of invective against man's treachery. I mean that, because Myra found her idol of clay, it is no reason why the sentiment of devotion, which is one of the holiest instincts of our nature, should be destroyed forever in her breast."

"Then you believe in second love?"

"Your question is not altogether a fair one. I am certainly an advocate of constancy; and there is something very sacred to me even in the memory of a pure and holy affection, which has brightened our happier days, and, long cherished, has entwined itself with our every sympathy, until it grew and became a part of us. The shrine of such a love, once erected in our heart of hearts, may well be dedicated to one only object."

"Then you would have success the criterion of constancy. Why, Kate, you would spoil the prettiest romances that were ever written or acted, by such a cold, calculating sentiment."

"And those same romances have spoiled the happiness of many an honest heart capable of blessing others, and enjoying itself the choicest blessings of life, in its appointed sphere of conjugal and domestic affections. Out upon that false sentiment which condemns a pure and noble heart, with its untold treasures of rich affections and sympathies, to pine in sickly dalliance with despair, because an error of judgment, or a freak of fancy, has sent its devotions to an unworthy object! Must a heart that was made for love wither, in its spring-time of freshness and bloom, from treachery or disappointment? Forbid it, every principle of rational happiness, of true and purified enjoyment!"

"But does not your doctrine, fair cousin, tend to impair that faith in the constancy of love which gives its ideal charms, and elevates it into a worship?"

"On the contrary, it rather vindicates the sentiment as too pure and holy to suffer from treachery and deceit; of too divine and immaculate a nature to perish, when baffled, like baser passions."

"You argue well, Kate; but yet there is a charm in changeless love that still holds the imagination captive."

"And did I speak of true love as changeable, Charles? I only contended against the despotic rule of what I think a false sentiment. The constancy of mutual love is beautiful and holy in my eyes; and where our affections have met a full response in the sympathies of a congenial heart, and especially where we have been blessed with its long companionship, I hold a second love as great a sacrilege as yourself, though I will not deny that it may exist."

"Well, well, my sweet cousin, you and I will not quarrel about love; nor pretty Myra Bell either, for whom I wish a bright and happy fate. But see, John has brought the horses round. Shall we take our gallop as usual? I promise not to cast one wistful glance at Myra Bell's handsome cottage as we pass," said Charles, with a playful emphasis.

"Out upon you, Mr. Impudence!" replied his cousin, blushing slightly, and tapping him with her whip, for she was equipped for the ride. "What wonderful magic, think you, there lies in your glances?"

Leaving the cousins to their morning ride, and to renew their edifying discussion, if they pleased, we will look into as lovely a little cottage as was ever the abode of innocence, peace, and happiness.

In a neatly furnished apartment, from which, through the latticed casement, you might look out on the prettiest imaginable little flower garden, were two persons. The one a man advanced in years, of mild, calm, and dignified appearance, whose broad, intellectual brow was unwrinkled, save by the lines of thought, and the lustre of whose dark eye was undimmed, though the snows of winter were fast covering his fine classic head. Adam Bell was a scholar, and somewhat of a dreamer, yet, withal, a very deep philosopher. The vanities of earth he despised, while he cherished, with assiduous care, those gentle sentiments, true feelings, and noble sympathies which minister to the peace and happiness of the heart far more surely than the false excitement of pleasure and ambition. In early life he had married happily, prospered in the world, and enjoyed those fluttering promises of the future with which Fortune so often tempts us to essay the perilous "heights where Fame's proud temple lies;" but reverses and disappointments soon taught him their lesson. The loss of fortune, and the ill health of his beloved companion, induced him to retire, not a soured misanthrope, but a sobered philosopher, from the pomps and vanities of the world. Husbanding his remaining resources, he purchased the quiet cottage where he now resided, and where he had enjoyed years of supreme bliss with his adored wife, who faded gently and quietly from his side, like a cherished flower, exhaling the fragrance of her long and devoted love to surround him in the gentle affections of an only and most beautiful daughter.

In such a death there was no shock; and the sadness caused by his bereavement was so sweetly mingled with the hope of a reunion hereafter, as to rob his grief of half its poignancy. In Myra he beheld—each lineament and feature complete—the counterpart of her whose memory he adored; and, for his daughter, he was content to live on, that he might guard and shield her youth from care, and pluck, as far as might be, the thorns of disappointment and sorrow from her future pathway. And now, as he sat at the open casement, through which the fresh morning air came, apparently intent on his book, his eye wandered, ever and anon, from the bright flowers without to the brighter being within, who glided noiselessly about the room, occupied with her domestic affairs, and unconscious of the thoughtful attention which was bestowed upon her. It was not without uneasiness that Adam Bell noticed an air of preoccupation, and almost sadness, in his sweet daughter, and a keen pang shot through his heart as he heard the half-smothered sigh which escaped her.

"Come here, Myra," said he, "and see how your favorite rose tree has revived from last night's shower."

Awakening from the rather unpleasant reverie which had been gradually stealing over her, with scarce an effort, Myra dispelled the shadows from her brow, and, her face beaming with affection placed herself on a low stool at her father's feet.

"Oh, how beautiful!" she exclaimed. "I did not think my poor rose-bush would bloom again this summer."

"Bright or bloom upon the flower, or the human heart, are His, who ever deals gently with the tenderest," said the old man, reverently.

"I feel it, my father," answered his daughter, gazing fondly in his face with tearful eyes, blue as the violet whose perfume they enjoyed.

"And yet, Myra, you are sad. Are you sure there is no drop of bitterness left in that young heart to rankle hereafter?"

"Quite sure, dear father; although some sadness is natural to the heart which finds its ideal destroyed. And yet I think no more of him."

"Say not its ideal destroyed, but its idol a false one, my child. That mental standard of perfection which we set up as the model of all that is worthy and noble in human character, and which we call our ideal, is formed rather by our own sentiments and feelings than from any experience or example of human nature which is before us; yet it is the very foundation of all our respect or admiration for our fellow-beings, the key to love and friendship, and sad is the heart whose ideal is destroyed! But, my dear Myra," continued the fond parent, somewhat more playfully, "if not of him—the base, the worthless—of whom was my daughter thinking so pensively, almost sadly?"

There was perfect confidence between the father and daughter; yet the eyes of Myra drooped an instant, and the rich color suffused her face, such is the sensibility of a pure young heart to the exposure of its feelings, even to the eye of affection.

"Nay, I did not mean to startle or grieve you; but you cannot suppose, my own darling, that, in aught which touches your happiness, my eyes slumber. There, that blush has answered me; and I may give Harry Layton a favorable answer," said Adam Bell, bending to caress the beautiful head that rested on his lap.

At this moment the sound of horses' feet was heard in the avenue that led from the high road, and the bark of Myra's little spaniel, who was basking in the sunshine on the front verandah, announced early visitors.

"Come, my love, there is your friend Kate. I saw her pass, in company with her cousin, half an hour since, and doubtless she is coming to pay you a morning call. Hie to your chamber, and smooth down those troubled thoughts, while I receive them."

It was, indeed, Kate and Charles, the former having remembered, during their ride, that she had not yet invited Myra to a fête which was to be given the next week on the occasion of her birthday. She therefore insisted upon her cousin accompanying her, "even at the risk," she said, in playful badinage, "of exposing poor little Myra to the dangerous glances of such a wonderful lady-killer."

They were received with a dignified courtesy and kind welcome by Adam Bell, which Charles afterwards declared to exhibit the most distinguished demeanor he ever met with; and, in a few minutes, Myra appeared, blooming as one of her own beautiful roses, to greet her friend, and to receive Charles, without the slightest embarrassment.

The invitation was given, and, after a glance at her father, who signified his approval, accepted by Myra; and, after spending an hour very pleasantly, the cousins took their departure.

In the evening Harry Layton came, conferred a few moments with Adam Bell in his library, and then, in company with him, joined Myra in the parlor the happiest of men. The old man, with his book, soon drew off to his corner, and left the young lovers to that elysium which they, who have once felt it, know beggars all description.

CHAPTER II.

RUPERT DE LANCEY was a young man of good birth, ample fortune, and considerable intellect. Though proud and ambitious, he possessed courteous and affable manners, which won him more regard than his character really deserved, and made him, where no occasion forced the display of his real nature, a universal favorite. His person was even more attractive than his demeanor, for he possessed the highest order of masculine beauty. A broad and prominent forehead, somewhat narrower, however, at the temples than was consistent with perfect symmetry, around which curled, in short, natural ringlets, his rich and glossy brown hair; dark blue eyes, of sparkling brilliancy, in which only the practiced regard of a physiognomist could have detected the wavering, vacillating glance which denoted sickliness of purpose; a mouth indicative of firmness, as well as great sensibility, but the character of which also expressed great voluptuousness, especially in connection with his rather fleshy and projecting chin; and a nose slightly aquiline, with finely-curved nostrils, made up a face unusually prepossessing. De Lancey had been educated with high sentiments of honor, and would have reprobated deceit and treachery as soon as any one; but, with many a great and noble quality, he was beset with the weaknesses of pride and vanity, and their almost inseparable concomitant, changeableness of purpose; for, where they demand a sacrifice, strong must be the mind, and firm the heart, which refuses it.

Such was he who won the first regards of Myra Bell. Upon the guileless nature of her father, who, with all his experience, could never learn suspicion, the frank, free manners, and pleasing exterior of the youth had early made an impression, which paved the way to unrestrained social intercourse, and thus gave him the opportunity of enjoying much of Myra's society. It was not vanity alone which made Rupert her admirer, or induced him to seek her heart, no one, with a touch of gentle feeling at his heart, could have witnessed unmoved her expanding beauties of mind and person. Nor was it the mere fascination of the eye, nor the graceful flatteries of his constant homage, which charmed Myra; her esteem was won through her father's incautious praise. And, although no formal engagement existed between them, yet their future union was looked on as a matter of course, not only by Myra's father, but by friends and acquaintances, and even the relations of Rupert, who, though not altogether satisfied with the match, offered no opposition.

The awakening of Myra Bell from her first dream of love was sad and bitter, indeed; but less painful and enduring was the blight that fell upon her heart under the strengthening influence of her father's wise, Christian philosophy, and gentle, soothing counsels. The desertion of Rupert De Lancey, like his wooing, was not so pointed as to leave him without a plausible defence of his conduct, and would not have afforded even the watchful father an excuse to tax him with his treachery, but for the occasion of some light raillery on the part of his gay companions, to which, in a fit of pique and vanity, he replied, scornfully—

It is true, he was ashamed of such unbecoming language almost as soon as he uttered it; but, if he repented, he could not forego the treacherous purpose at his heart. Another passion had taken possession of his soul. His vanity and his ambition had both been excited, and he was ready to sacrifice faith, and truth, and love, such as he was capable of feeling, upon their altar, even though he crushed the life out of that gentle heart which had trusted its happiness to his keeping. And what was the cause of this change? The arrival of Kate Welden, a beauty, an heiress, and a distinguished belle, at the mansion of her uncle, Colonel Warren, of Oak Lawn.

Kate was an orphan, and had resided, since the death of her parents, with her guardian in the city; but, on the occasion of that gentleman and his family taking a foreign tour, she accepted the invitation of her uncle, Colonel Warren, to make his house her home, as she did not wish to accompany them. She was just of age, and there were, of course, no objections on the part of the former guardian, and, turning over to her the immense estate he had managed honorably and well, and of which she appointed her uncle her agent, he resigned his charge.

Fame heralded the advent of the heiress, and among the most eager to lay his homage at her feet was Rupert De Lancey. His vanity had always led him to wish to be first among his companions, and he could not bear the thought that so brilliant a prize should fall to another. Perhaps even his admiration for Myra was not free from this governing sentiment, for she was certainly the belle of the neighborhood before Kate Welden came, and many still thought her title to that distinction unimpaired. The two young ladies, however, instead of experiencing feelings of rivalry, became fast and affectionate friends.

From the time when Rupert made the ungenerous and ungently speech about Myra, as if conscious that his own bareness was known to her, he ceased his usual visits; and, the remark coming to the ears of Adam Bell, the old man sought an interview, from which De Lancey would fain have shrunk, if he dared. The conduct of the father on that painful occasion was calm, dignified, and open, while that of the recreant lover was full of prevarication and shuffling, though his language was plausible and respectful.

"Young man, you say there was no positive engagement between yourself and my daughter. This, perhaps, is true; but when you tell me you never sought her affections under the guise of love, that you never taught her to look upon you in any other light than that of a very dear friend, you utter a falsehood which your own conscience condemns."

"Most happy would I be, sir, to make any sacrifice which would convince you of my truth, or contribute to your daughter's peace of mind, which I regret that one so worthless as I should have injured, however unintentionally," said Rupert, in a slight tone of mockery. "And, as for the idle words I uttered"—

"Peace, sir! there is no sacrifice that would be accepted. My daughter would scorn your hand now as I do your character. And, for myself, I would sooner lay her young head in the grave than consign her to the arms of a villain whose smooth brow and oily tongue conceal so base and lying a heart!"

"Sir!" exclaimed De Lancey, in fierce passion, for the taunt stung him to the quick. "But for your age!"—

"Peace, again I say, fool! It is not my age, but conscious guilt, that paralyzes your heart. Yet go! I would not forget that I am a Christian as well as a father. Adam Bell despises and forgives you, and his daughter will do the same."

Rupert De Lancey did not linger; and, for a long time, the bitterness of that interview, to which were truly added the pangs of conscience, wrung his heart.

Poor Myra! the cloud which obscured the fair horizon of her hopes was dark indeed, and the night of her despair, if brief, was full of agony; but, thanks to him who educated her heart in a truer school of philosophy than is taught by idle romance, and to Hix who "tempers the wind to the shorn lamb," the cup of bitterness passed from her, and the false light she had worshiped faded from her vision, which became calmer and clearer from the storm that had broken over her. It was at this period that she met Harry Layton, and the mysterious growth of true love sprung at once in her heart, whose best affections seemed of late blighted and withered. It was long before Myra would acknowledge to herself the interest he inspired, and she trembled at her own emotions as she asked herself the nature of that interest. Notwithstanding the precepts of her father, she shrunk from what almost appeared the sacrilege of second love, and that so soon after the deep disappointment of her first choice. But all her doubts were soon resolved; and when Harry poured forth, in the genuine eloquence of true feeling, the story of his devotion, how different seemed his language, how much more sincere and manly, than the strained compliments and sugared flatteries with which Rupert De Lancey had amused her young fancy!

And, with the thought of him, came a sinking of the heart she had never before felt. "Would Harry Layton, so good and noble himself, be content to take her affections second-hand from such a source?"

"No, no, Harry!" she said, and tears almost choked her utterance. "You could not value a heart that had already loved and been scorned."

"Never, Myra, did you truly love that base, unmanly wretch! Fear not; I know all. It was only your fancy which his facile address captivated; your heart was untouched, save with devotion for its own ideal, which for a moment he seemed to fill. Fear not, dear Myra; be but mine, and you shall soon learn of me that you never truly loved him."

The lesson was a pleasant one both to master and pupil, fulfilling the former's promise indeed.

And how sped the wooing of Rupert De Lancey? How prospered his suit to the fair Kate? Unfortunately for him, the citadel of her heart had long since yielded to her cousin, Charles Calvert, to whom, with the full approbation of their uncle, whose favorite and heir he was, she was already betrothed; and, still more unfortunately, even had she been "fancy free," with that knowledge which experience alone can give, and that nice sagacity which characterizes the female perception, she had measured the depths of his character, and appreciated him accordingly. Moreover, his treachery to Myra was not unknown to her.

Kate Welden was a girl of bold and daring spirit, although her heart was full of tender sensibilities; and, while she was true and steadfast in her affections, her conduct sometimes suffered in the estimation of those who look not beneath the surface for one's intentions. Thus she not unfrequently subjected herself to the imputation of coquetry, when she had only resolved to punish some vain and presumptuous coxcomb who had victimized one of her sex. This same determination she had taken in regard to De Lancey, and, though Charles Calvert did not altogether approve of her intention, he was by no means jealous, but only sought to dissuade her from motives of prudence in regard to her own reputation.

"Go along, Cousin Charles, and flirt with every pretty face in the county, if you please; but let me alone to punish this knave, which I am determined to do."

"Is there not some vanity in that, fair cousin mine?"

"By no means, my gentle mentor. It is not my poor beauty, but my rich estate which captivates him. And, as for the damage to my reputation by coquetry, which you are so kind as to hint at, why you must e'en marry me the sooner, and take it under your own charge, if you are apprehensive about it."

"That is certainly an irresistible bribe to let you play the madcap once more," said Charles, gallantly. "So it must be as you choose."

Thus stood matters on the evening of the fête at Colonel Warren's, save that Kate had received several calls from De Lancey very graciously, and, without exactly encouraging him, certainly allowed him to go off with a very self-satisfied notion of his probable success.

CHAPTER III.

THE fête at Colonel Warren's was a splendid and brilliant one, indeed. The spacious halls of his large, elegant mansion were beautifully decorated, and lighted to perfection. The exquisite gardens were hung with colored lamps, and, with the graveled walks and commodious summer-houses, afforded a pleasant retreat from the heat and glare of the rooms to those who were fatigued with dancing, or desirous of a quiet tête-à-tête. A gay and happy assemblage of bright and cheerful faces did honor to the birthday of the fair Kate Welden; and, with music and dance, and innocent revelry, the joyous hours sped rapidly on. Many a charming face was there, and many a graceful form glided through the mazes of waltz or cotillon; but peerless above all others were the two friends, Kate Welden and Myra Bell.

Each was the type of a different style of beauty, and almost faultless was the model. Dark as the raven's wing was the glossy hair braided over the full intellectual brow of Kate; while the auburn tresses of Myra fell in luxuriant ringlets from her small, beautiful head. Black eyes, that flashed with fire, or melted in languor, and a rich olive complexion, through which the mantling blood showed like the blush on the sunny side of a ripe peach, characterized the splendid beauty of the one; while the blended lily and rose tints, with orbs of calm and heavenly blue, distinguished the soft and winning loveliness of the other. The former was tall and stately as Juno, the latter light and graceful as Hebe. Many a tribute of admiration did they elicit, and much difference of opinion did their appearance excite as to the respective merit of their different styles. No one, perhaps, viewed them with more indescribable emotion than Rupert De Lancey—not even Charles Calvert or Harry Layton, who had become friends and confidants. A strange and mixed feeling of hope and regret stole over him.

"After all," mused he, "if I am disappointed of the heiress, what a prize have I lost! The more lovely, far the more lovely, of the two. True, the other is a splendid creature; but there is something too fierce and haughty in her beauty: while my own Myra is an angel, if there ever was one on earth. I wonder if there is anything in that young Layton's attentions? Pshaw! No! She cannot have forgotten me so soon; though I do not half like her manner to-night—it is too calm and self-possessed. There is neither love nor the sense of injury in her cool eye when it encounters mine; yet on Layton she bestows the same look of quiet confidence that once was mine. By Heaven, I could not brook that fellow's rivalry! Yet, what claim have I? To me she is lost forever! Nay, not so; if the heiress jilts me, which I half wish she would, and half think she may, from certain indications to-night, I will recant my errors, and throw myself at Myra's feet for forgiveness, and be happy in her dear love, which I never knew till now had so deep a hold on my heart."

And, in this uncertain mood, De Lancey sought the side of Kate Welden, from whom a gracious reception awaited him. To his proposal that they should seek the cool air of the gardens, she yielded a flattering assent; and, when they had reached a remote arbor, she seated herself, and, without speaking to her companion, turned her large eyes, full of soft languor, upwards, to gaze at that peerless orb which poets delight to apostrophize, and lovers to look on.

"A lovely night!" said De Lancey, breaking the silence, in a low, musical voice.

"And a night for love!" responded Kate, half soliloquizing.

"Then, brightest and most beautiful, accept its sincere homage from your most devoted admirer!" breathed Rupert, passionately, as he sank gracefully to his knee.

"Sir! Mr. De Lancey!" cried Kate, starting back.

"Nay, dearest Kate, hear me! I love, I adore you! From the first moment your glorious beauty burst upon my sight, I have been your captive! Yet not the captive of your beauty alone, but equally enamored of the bright intellect which beams from those eloquent eyes!"

"You make love well, Mr. De Lancey," said Kate, dryly.

"Nay, cruel girl, would you mock me? Are you, indeed, the heartless coquette fame speaks of, who can sport in the agony of a true heart?"

"Of a true heart, never! Its lightest sorrow, caused through conduct of mine, would grieve me deeply."

"Then, why this derision of my love? Why thus scorn the proffer of an honorable passion from me?"

"Because yours is not a true heart! Think of Myra Bell!"

"Ah! is it that idle story which stands between me and my hopes? Believe me, I never wronged her. A mere child, with whom I had been in daily intercourse for years, who conceived a foolish attachment for me, which I was the first to undeceive her of. Nay, dearest Kate," continued he, seeing she had relaxed somewhat of her sternness; "it was I, not she, who suffered from the contretemps. Credit no word of it; but believe me that never—no, never—was my heart touched by love till by the magic of your loveliness! Be mine, beautiful creature, and the ardent devotion of a life shall repay the rich boon you grant! If there be anything worthy or noble in my soul, as I have dreamed there is, be it yours to call it forth and direct it to great objects; and to you, my inspiration and my hope, shall be dedicated all the triumphs of my future career!"

He paused, and, perceiving his fair listener drooped, as if with suppressed emotion, believed he had conquered. With rapture, he caught her hand, and was about to pour forth his thanks, when it was promptly snatched away, and, with a wild, gay laugh, Kate sprung up from her seat.

"Ha! ha! Mr. De Lancey, now I understand you! It is only a private rehearsal you are treating me to. Pray, sir, when do you make your first appearance? I shall certainly attend; for you give great promise of success. What is to be your character, Claude Melnotte or the Apostate?"

"Enough, lady!" said Rupert, rising, in ill-concealed rage and disappointment. "Cruel me no more with your scorn! Believe it was a mere play of gallantry, if you will."

There was a depth of anguish in his voice which made Kate half repent her conduct, and she turned to speak with some purpose of softening the blow; but he was gone. When she again met him in the hall, the almost kindly glance of her eye, in answer to his deprecating look—for Kate felt some remorse at the part she had played—reassured him; and Rupert De Lancey became once more the bright and fascinating cavalier, who, it would scarcely be thought, would plead in vain to beauty.

There are some hearts upon which no salutary lesson can be impressed, when vanity and selfishness urge them on, and moral principle is wanting to control their desires. Such was Rupert's. The failure of his designs upon the hand of Kate Welden, and the mortifying exposure he had endured, did not deter him, the moment he believed her silence secure, from pursuing purposes in regard to Myra, in the event of his ill success with the heiress.

It was the first time they had met since the unhandsome conduct of Rupert, and, if he expected any weakness on the part of Myra, he was greatly mistaken. Her reception of him—for she did not pretend to avoid him—was calm, quiet, and lady-like. No emotion betrayed itself in cheek or glance; and, as he expressed it to himself, there was "neither love nor the sense of injury in her cool eye, when it encountered his." Yet the vanity of Rupert De Lancey would not be convinced that he could be so soon forgotten. When he again approached Myra, she was talking to Charles Culvert.

"Will Miss Bell favor me with her hand for a cotillion?" he asked, in his blindest tones.

"If you wish it," she replied, quietly.

"Can you doubt it?" And he bent a meaning glance upon her, as he offered his arm.

"Not the present set," said Myra, carelessly, without replying either to look or word; "I am engaged to Mr. Calvert. The one after, if you choose."

With eager and animated regards, Rupert watched her through the dance; and, when he claimed her hand at the close of the set, he thought she never looked half so beautiful.

But few moments were allowed for conversation ere the music again struck up, and the requisitions of the dance, with the unwillingness of his partner to listen to anything of the past, gave De Lancey but little chance to urge his suit. When the cotillion had finished, however, he proposed to get an ice for her, and Myra, having really no other engagement, and seeing no familiar face near her, could not well refuse. Fate favored De Lancey, for the door near which they stood opened on a small vine-covered portico, with convenient seats, and they had scarcely placed themselves, before a movement in the crowd left that part of the room vacant, and they were once more alone.

To say that Myra Bell felt perfectly at her ease would be too much, for she had already perceived, on the part of her companion, a purpose to enter into some explanation, which she would gladly have avoided. It is true, she thoroughly despised him now; but there are memories of love which, even when the passion has faded, and the object is scorned, cannot be altogether destroyed. Poor Myra, however, had no choice, and could only nerve her heart for the trial she would fain have been spared.

"Myra," said Rupert, in his dulcet voice, when he perceived they would be uninterrupted.

"Sir," with calm dignity, "to other than my near friends, I am Miss Bell."

"And are we enemies, Myra?"

"It needs not a distinction, sir, which would argue more importance in the feelings between us than I am disposed to admit. We are strangers, sir, or, if you please, mere acquaintances."

"Strangers, Myra! Can it be that such a wide gulf is between hearts once so fondly knit together?"

"And who made it, sir?" demanded she, with rising scorn.

"The rash, intemperate passion of your father, and perhaps my own foolish pride," replied he, with bold hypocrisy.

"'Tis false! Your own base, fickle nature alone was to blame," said she, rising with dignified mien and flashing eye, her slight form swelling into heroic proportions. "But cease these insulting importunities. Let me pass!"

"Nay, Myra, you must hear me; though for the last time," said he, with subdued and touching pathos, respectfully and gently detaining her. "Think you that a rash word, or a hasty action should destroy forever the brightest hopes of the human heart—the first dream of pure, unchanging love? Is that exalted and divine passion so weak that it cannot withstand a moment's anger—just anger at a grievous fault, perhaps—against the object of its devotion? Has forgiveness no part in its principles? Must a single error doom the heart that has loved truly and fondly for years to misery and despair? Nay, hear me!" continued he, passionately, for she made an impatient movement to be gone. "I love you! I have always loved you! In bitterness and anguish have I repented my fault. In wretchedness must I pass the brief period of my life, if you will not listen to and forgive me. My own, my adored Myra! hear, and answer me!"

And, as she strove to pass him, he sank on his knees and caught her hand to detain her.

"Do hear the gentleman out, my love," said a clear, silvery voice near them at this moment. "But you need not trouble yourself to answer him; for it is only some private theatricals he has gotten up to assist my poor entertainment to-night. He has already gone through the self-same scene with me in the garden to-night!" And Kate Welden stepped forward.

Who can picture the debasement of feeling that overwhelmed Rupert De Lancey at this interruption? Releasing the hand he had taken, he bowed his head in shame and humiliation, while Myra, glad of escape, took refuge at the side of her friend.

"Come, dear," said the gay girl, leading her away. "Let us leave him to study some more interesting character; his present one is somewhat 'stale and unprofitable.'"

And, when they had gone, Rupert De Lancey rushed madly from the house, his brain on fire and his heart like ice.

Whether the lessons he received have corrected the faults of his character we do not know, for he shortly left the neighborhood, as it was said, on "a foreign tour." We scarcely think the school a good one; and, perhaps, when he returns, he will only add another to the empty-headed fops who ape the follies, not the virtues, of European society, and are American in nothing but their birth, which they affect to despise.

The same day saw Kate Welden and Myra Bell united to those they had chosen both from love and esteem. Kate passed much of her time in the great city, where she was still acknowledged as an ornament to the society in which she moved; but ever the bright summer hours found her again at Oak Lawn, or the favorite guest of the "dear little cottage," where her "sweet Myra" lived, in the unbroken and unregretting happiness of SECOND LOVE.

KEZIAH JONES'S APPLE BEE.

BY NOADIAH BUCKTHORN, M. D.

PART I.

It was a mild day in the latter part of November—a day which properly belonged to Indian Summer: for some reason it was not forthcoming at that season; so it claimed and received a place just as autumn was about to hand over his books to the “ruler of the inverted year.”

“Mr. Gulic,” said Mrs. Jones, standing in the kitchen doorway, and looking towards the hired man who was taking up the last cabbage in the garden, “Mr. Gulic,” said Mrs. Jones, elevating her voice so that it might overcome the obstacle presented by eight rods intervening space, “I want you to do an errand for me this morning; I want you to go to Mr. Hall’s for me.”

Mr. Gulic gave intimation by a nod that he comprehended the nature of her wants, and proceeded to finish his work, saying—

“I knew something out of the common line was wanting as soon as I heard the Mister. It is Ben, at other times. I have no objection to going over to Hall’s—none whatever, especially since Becky is at home.” He accordingly went to Mrs. Jones and received his instructions.

This said Mr. Benjamin Franklin Gulic was a tall, heavy-built Yankee, about twenty years old, who had made good use of his eyes as well as his teeth during the greater part of that period. He worked by the year for Mr. Jones. He was the adviser, and, to a great extent, director of his employer, who had not the enterprise, self-reliance, and talent for command which characterize most of those whose republican liberties with the king’s English mark them as belonging to New England.

Mr. Gulic did not move his feet rapidly—on the principle that large bodies move slowly—but he moved them a good distance at each step, and, consequently, he was ere long at Mr. Hall’s door. The door was open to receive the rays of the morning sun. On the threshold lay a dog, dreaming with his eyes half open or half shut, as the reader may prefer; opposite the door, in a Windsor arm-chair tilted against the wall, sat Mr. Hall, a stout, oak-faced, gray-headed man, reading his newspaper, which he held out before him at arm’s length, his spectacles being about twenty years too young for him. Mr. Gulic paused for a moment, and cast a contemplative look at the dog—perhaps he was comparing his condition with that of a hired man—then applied the knuckle of his middle finger to the door-post, producing a sound somewhat louder than that produced by the carpet hammer of the housewife, at the blow subsequent to that bestowed upon her left thumb instead of the nail head.

“Walk,” said Mr. Hall, very skillfully combining a growl with an articulate sound.

“Which way?” asked Ben.

“Which way you will,” said the old man, still not taking his eyes from the paper.

Ben walked in, and, having waited in vain for an invitation to be seated, he concluded to take a seat without an invitation. The chair which he selected as the instrument for carrying his conclusion into effect gave way under the pressure of the “too solid flesh,” and the law of gravitation, operating with democratic impartiality, drew him towards the centre of the earth till the strong maple floor arrested his progress. The crash and the catastrophe did not divert the old man’s attention from his paper. Ben amused himself by putting the parts of the demolished chair in place, or, to use his own expression, “by setting the trap for somebody else.” He had ample time for this, and also for tracing the journey of a wasp on the wall, before Mr. Hall folded his paper, raised his spectacles on his forehead, and uttered, in a slightly interrogative tone, the words—

“Folks well?”

“They was well when I came here: I should think it likely that they are sick by this time.”

A slight movement about the corners of Mr. Hall’s mouth showed that a smile was hovering in the vicinity. It came as near lighting on his lips as he usually permitted one to come.

“What is an apple-bee?”

“It is somewhere about half way between a honey-bee and a bumble-bee.”

Mr. Hall was accustomed to affect great ignorance of all things pertaining to youthful sports and merry-makings: veritable tradition, however, related that he was famous in his young days for exploits in that line; hence Mr. Gulic thought he gave him “such an answer as he deserved.” Probably he thought so himself; for another smile made signals, but did not fairly heave in sight.

“I s’pose I can have the things?” said Ben.

“All your empty tin pans.”

“They’ve got milk in them.”

“I should like to see one of your empty tin pans with milk in. It would be about as curious as your way of welcoming a neighbor.”

“Who is going to be there?”

"Everybody and some others, and I shouldn't wonder if Mr. Hall were to be there: but give me the pans, or they 'll have a coroner's jury together on my account."

Mr. Hall went to the stairs leading to the cellar, and said, "Mamma, you're wanted."

"I can't leave the kettle; who wants me?"

"Miss Jones wants to borrow your tin pans."

"She can have them."

"Where are they?"

"I know where they are," said Ben; "they stand leaning against the south side of the house like a line of opposition suns." So saying, he proceeded at once to the locality, and, gathering up the shining utensils, he was moving towards home, when a slight hem from behind a sheet hung on a clothes-line, caused him to stop. Behind said sheet stood Miss Rebecca Sabina Hall, usually called Becky. She appeared to be busy with the clothes-pins, which, however, did not seem to need any attention. That she was standing there for the express purpose of exchanging words with Ben, we would by no means affirm; but the fact was she did exchange certain words with him, as will appear perfectly evident when we proceed with the narrative.

"Did you wash all these clothes?" said Ben, pointing to the array of shirts, sheets, and various articles mentionable and unmentionable which hung on the lines extending from tree to tree, and from post to post, and from fence to fence.

"I did," was the calm reply of the capable female.

"They are done first rate—come over early, won't you?"

"Who are coming?"

"Everybody."

"Did Miss Ogden say she would come?"

"Yes."

"Are Mr. Green's folks coming?"

"They are gone away, you know."

"O, yes, so they are. I don't like to go where there are so many."

"The more the merrier. All the young folks will be there; Foster is going to shut up store and come."

"It is no matter whether he comes or not. I suppose I must come or give offence."

"Don't forget to come early."

He then went his way, saying to himself, "You will be fierce enough to go, now that you know that the white-fingered merchant is to be there—he is not a merchant; nothing but a clerk. If I do work out by the year, I'll have more money at the end of the year than he will have. Take him, if you want him. I ask no favors of you."

Now Mr. Benjamin Franklin Gulic was a man of truth and veracity in all his statements made to others: his statements made to himself, especially when they related to Becky, could not be depended upon; in fact, they were often the very reverse of truth; they were so in the present case. He did ask most earnestly the favor of her affections, and a life-interest in her person. How it was that he could speak the truth so conscientiously to others, and lie so egregiously to himself, we shall not attempt to explain. It is our business, as historians, to furnish facts for the philosophers to work up into systems.

We will now give some account of preparations strictly appertaining to the home department.

Mrs. Jones was in favor of having the Bee in the kitchen, and brought forward many weighty arguments in support of her position. But the result proves that there is no arguing against facts. The fact was that Miss Ellen Ogden—who had spent several months in an incorporated city, and had thus become the arbitress of gentility to the village—had, at the last gathering at her house, not only occupied the "front room," but actually fastened the door leading from said front room to the kitchen. It was not opened even to admit the bearer of sundries for the refreshment of the visitors. He was, therefore, obliged to go round to the front door. On his way there, bearing a large waiter heavily laden with crockery, glass, cake, and sweetmeats, he walked into an external cellar-way, making a descent of about six feet in a single step. There was a crash of crockery, and a loud utterance of some very unnecessary and inharmonious expletives, and a still louder peal of laughter from old Mr. Ogden, who sat in the kitchen chimney corner. The old gentleman was no friend to genteel innovations.

Miss Ellen Ogden's example was, therefore, conclusive against having the young folks in the kitchen. They must occupy the "front room." The room must, therefore, be prepared; and, as the evening would doubtless be cool, it was necessary to have a fire lighted there.

The fire was lighted about the middle of the afternoon; but the smoke manifested a very unaccommodating, and in fact quite a rebellious, spirit. Instead of ascending the chimney, it pursued an opposite course. It most irreverently took possession of all parts of the room, and rolled itself up in folds near the ceiling, as if to get out of Keziah's reach.

Some very combustible materials were then procured, and a blaze was produced, in the hope that it would prove more tractable. Alas! it caught the spirit and followed the example of the smoke, and with increased energy and insolence. Its first act was to fly into Keziah's face, as she was kneeling on the hearth kindly fanning it into existence. It then reached its forked tongue almost to the middle of the room, and then curled it over the mantel-piece to the great peril of a curiously-wrought paper basket, the visible proof of Keziah's attendance at a select school. It then seemed smitten with a sudden impulse to examine the chimney; whereupon the chimney took fire, to the infinite terror of Mrs. Jones, who was sure the house would be burnt, with all things animate and inanimate thereunto appertaining. To make sure of saving something, she seized a heavy iron kettle filled with water, and carried it so far from the house that it would not be likely to be set on fire by the falling sparks.

As soon as the chimney was fairly on fire, both the flame and the smoke seemed to think all the fun lay in that direction. They accordingly went up the chimney as steadily as if they had never gone anywhere else. The smoke in the room, receiving no reinforcement, stole quietly out of the open door, and disappeared as quickly as possible.

The room was then put in order; a table was placed in the centre, and all the chairs in the house, except one for Mr. Jones, were ranged close to each other around the walls of the room.

By "early candle-light" about twenty girls were assembled. They were as talkative as it may be supposed twenty girls, in a room without their mothers or men, would be. "Why don't the gentlemen come?" was asked mentally by more than one. At length footsteps were heard approaching. The girls who happened to be standing took their seats. All the chairs on the side of the room opposite the door were, in a moment, filled with maidens as demure, for the time being, as the most precise could desire. Suddenly there was a loud stamping on the door-step, a very energetic mode of divesting one's boots of snow or dust, preparatory to an entrance. The stamping, and the faint knock which succeeded, were followed within by a most profound silence, which was broken only by the suspirations of one whose ideal beauty of form was manifestly either the hour-glass or the wasp. Keziah opened the door, and the young gentlemen found themselves in full view of an unbroken line of silent beauty, in the face of which they were expected to advance. They faltered—each pressed his neighbor to go forward. No little confusion was apparent. Among other truths then and there illustrated, was the important one that geometry cannot claim a monopoly of angles. After some delay, an entrance was effected. The chairs opposite the girls were secured. The door was left open. No one seemed disposed to risk the loss of his post by rising to close it. Some of the ladies wore short sleeves, that is, had bare arms—the monumental alabaster smoothness of which was seriously affected by the ingress of the cold evening air. A daring fellow at length arose and closed the door.

Along the lines thus formed there was a silence as deep and almost as expressive as that which sometimes precedes a battle. After a while, there were some whisperings on the part of the girls, and a suppressed giggle; but the young men preserved a profound silence and a most praiseworthy gravity. The seats seemed somewhat harder than those to which they had been accustomed; and it was pretty plain that most of them wished they had left their hands at home.

A rap, as with a walking-stick, was heard at the door. "That is Mr. Foster," whispered one. Miss Becky blushed at the sound either of the knock or the name. Keziah opened the door, and Mr. Benjamin F. Gulic stood before her, dressed in his best. He walked in with as much dignity as if he had come from California instead of the chamber over the kitchen. He sat down, and, for a moment, imitated the gravity of his peers. He then turned to the most solemn one present, and asked him what was the state of the moonshine. No answer was given; but the question greatly lightened the pressure of the constraint under which all present labored. Conversation began, at first, indeed, in whispers, but soon several spoke out loud.

"I was under the impression," said Mr. G., "that this was to be an Apple-Bee, but I don't see the apples."

"Bring them on," said one of the boldest; "let us have something to do."

Ben and Keziah then brought a corn basket full of apples, which were placed on the table. A tin pan was given to each damsel. The young men then distributed the apples, and the work of paring began. As there were no pans for the gentlemen, it was necessary for each one to sit beside a lady, and drop his parings into the pan, which held a place of greater or less security upon her lap. A better contrivance for a tête-à-tête was never devised.

PART II.

Mr. Benjamin Gulic had managed to secure a seat by the side of Miss Rebecca Sabina Hall, and was paring with great skill and rapidity, letting the parings fall into the pan, which was in or rather on the fair one's lap. This of course rendered it necessary that he should sit very near her.

"When are Mr. Foster's folks coming home?" said Becky.

"Can't say," was Benjamin's laconic reply.

"Do they trade a good deal at their store?"

"Can't say."

"I should not think it would do to shut up the store."

Mr. Benjamin Gulic did not see fit to intimate whether he did or did not agree with her in opinion. He saw that her mind was running on Mr. Foster, the popular clerk; that she was speculating on the probabilities of his coming to the Bee.

"How thick you pare your apples!" exclaimed Becky. "Keziah, Mr. Gulic is paring your apples all away!"

Keziah was too much occupied with her partner to heed the remark.

"Get somebody to pare with you who can suit you better," said Ben, in a low voice. He then rose and left the room, under the pretence of procuring a fresh supply of apples. He walked forth and took a survey of the stars, though not usually given to astronomical speculations. "That girl," said he to himself confidentially, "that girl," we do not quote his words accurately, for we wish to make them a little more complimentary to the lady than they really were, "wants to know why that soft-handed and soft-headed clerk isn't here. She may have him, and see if tape and molasses will keep her in as good case as the northern farm would."

The northern farm was expected to come into Mr. Benjamin F. Gulic's possession in the spring. Like a sensible man, he was desirous of finding some one whom it might be made over to with him "jointly."

"I'll let her alone," said Benjamin to himself; and, fearing lest his ear should fail to catch the remark, he repeated it several times with great distinctness. Having thus finished his communications to himself, he seized a basket of apples, and returned to the scene of operations. In placing it on the table, which we have already said was in the centre of the room, the table was overthrown. This caused the overthrow of several girls with tin pans full of apples in their laps. Table, pans, girls, and apples were thus mingled in sweet confusion on the floor, while shrieks of affected terror and shouts of unaffected laughter filled the house, and brought Mr. Jones to the door of the apartment. A grim smile was upon his lips as he surveyed the scene, and a profound silence followed his appearance.

Ben picked up the table, the young men picked up the girls, and the girls picked up the pans, and the girls and young men together picked up the apples, during which operation many heads were accidentally brought in contact, and, what was very remarkable, it was invariably a male and female head that came in contact. It must have been something in the combs.

A more definite and satisfactory account of the cause of the overthrow of the table can be given. During Mr. Gulic's absence, Mr. Foster entered and seated himself in the chair left vacant by the side of Miss Becky. The sight of him in that place had no tendency to compose Mr. Gulic's nerves and to increase his physical strength, while it had a tendency to increase both the gravity of the apples and of his countenance. Accordingly, when the basket was set on the table, it overthrew it.

When order was restored, paring was resumed. Mr. Foster retained his seat by Miss Becky, and, with a silver knife, daintily proceeded in the work; he was evidently afraid of soiling his hands. Benjamin took his place by the side of a very quiet girl who was always behind somebody. It was plain that he was not pleased with the exchange of seats and of partners. He did not sit so near Miss Mills as he did to Miss Becky. He pared slowly, silently, and thickly.

But, however great may have been his loss, it was counterbalanced by Miss Becky's gain. She was manifestly delighted with the exchange. She talked and laughed very loudly, though her partner's ideas of gentility led him to speak in a tone little elevated above a whisper. This was both pleasant and painful to Miss Becky. It was pleasant as indicative of confidential communications: painful, as it made his complimentary remarks inaudible to the company. She was driven to the necessity of asking him, in a tone adapted to set ears a listening, "What did you say?" and again to repeat some of his remarks with a large exclamation point after them. By this means she managed to convey to Ben and to others "what was going on between them."

Ben at length determined, as a means of self-defence, or of retaliation, to appear to enjoy his position. As a preliminary, he brought his chair nearer to that of Miss Mills, and leaned over further, so that his parings might fall nearer the centre of the pan. He put forth his best skill in paring, and made a few general observations, which were replied to in a very sweet tone of voice. Ere long they found themselves talking sense, as he afterwards said—a fact that evidently throws the date of our history somewhat into the past. He began to feel better satisfied with the exchange he had made, and was stimulated to carry on two somewhat distinct trains of thought—the one necessary to the conversation with Miss Mills, the other relating to a comparison of her qualities, personal, mental, and social, with those of Miss Becky. The latter led himself occasionally to make irrelevant replies to Miss Mills' remarks.

By ten o'clock, so busily had both male and female fingers been employed, the apples were finished and set aside, the table restored to its usual place, and it was proposed to proceed to play—not cards, city reader, but several exceedingly exciting and innocent games which you know nothing about. Several were proposed, but they were all objected to by Miss Sophia Stebbins, who had been one quarter at a boarding-school, for which (extras included) her father had paid $25 50, as not sufficiently intellectual. This threw quite a shade over the prospect; for the Yankee, as is well known, is a logical animal, and it is more than suspected that the intellectual and the logical are nearly allied. If a thing is not intellectual, it is not logical, and if it is not logical it is not to be done. The Yankee prefers the logical to everything—except money.

Miss Sophia was asked to name a play. She remarked, in reply, that her taste was no rule for others—she was peculiar. Miss Benson (the mistress of the boarding-school) thought her remarkably peculiar. She must confess she should prefer some literary conversation to anything else.

"So should I," said Mr. Gulic, gravely. "If I knew where to find it, I would go and get a basket full."

This remark made Miss Sophia's face very red, and all the rest of the company very good natured. It was followed by an explosion of laughter, which was followed by sundry plays in which the intellectual young lady gradually became more and more interested. Finally it was voted nem. con. to have a game of hide-and-seek. The hiding and the hunting were in couples. Miss Becky and Mr. Foster were together, and so were Miss Mills and Mr. Gulic. Mr. Gulic had two things to attend to. One was to secure a good hiding-place for himself and partner, and the other to observe that of Miss Becky and Mr. Foster. The latter took possession of a small pantry, which was known in Mr. Jones's establishment by the name of pie-pantry. They remained in it for some time—until, overhearing the expressed purpose of the seekers to search it, they stole out, and entered silently an apartment which had already been examined. Mr. Gulic, shrewdly suspecting that they would return to the pie-pantry, entered it, and placed in the only chair it contained a pumpkin pie, which was made not in an ordinary tin, but in an earthen vessel which formed the section of a sphere. The depth of the pumpkin was an inch and a half in the centre, from which point it shoaled gradually to the circumference. As Mr. Gulic had foreseen, Becky and her companion re-entered the pantry. A shriek was soon heard, which caused Ben to seize a candle, and rush to see what was the matter, or, rather, to speak with strict accuracy, to let others see. The demolished pie, and Miss Becky's soiled dress, revealed the cause of the outcry. For a moment there was a contest between a feeling of sympathy for the poor girl's discomfiture, and a sense of the ludicrous; the latter prevailed, though, to their credit it must be spoken. Sundry of the girls were taken with sudden fits of coughing, and others were seized with an insatiable desire for water, which led them to go in search of it in divers very improbable places. Miss Becky at once set out for home; she was attended by Mr. Foster—a partial recompense for her mishap.

An animated discussion of the question, "How came the pie in the chair?" took place. Mr. Gulic took no part in it. Some one suggested that it was placed there when taken from the oven, and its weight was in the way of elevating it to a shelf. As no better explanation was offered, it was accepted, just as the larger portion of our historical facts are.

After this interlude, the game of hide-and-seek was renewed with increased vigor. Miss Stebbins, with the magnanimity becoming a superior mind, condescended to engage in it heartily. In the course of this second game, Mr. Gulic and Miss Mills concealed themselves in a clothes-press. If the reader is a Yankee, he knows what that term means; and if he is not, here is proof positive that he knows less than a Yankee. Ben and his partner concealed themselves in a clothes-press, and, of course, were in total darkness, and in very close contact. Ben felt a great fluttering, and was on the point of asking what it was, when he found that it was the poor girl's heart. It occurred to him that it was very doubtful whether Becky had any heart to flutter. Many thoughts rushed through his brain while he was in that press, pressed close to the side of Mary Mills. She was slimmer and handsomer than Becky; had a softer voice and a milder eye; she did not pretend to live without work; everybody said she was not proud; and yet she was always as neat as a pink. What a fool he had been that he had not thought of her before! How grateful she looked when he brought those early apples to her sick mother! How good she looked when she watched day and night by Mrs. Allcut's sick child!

"All found but Ben and Mary," said a loud voice;

"where are they?" Ben drew a little nearer to Mary, whose heart fluttered still worse. She made a slight effort to move a little from him, but as she was firmly planted against the wall, which did not give way, the effort was not successful.

"I won't hurt you," whispered Ben; "you are the last being in the world I would hurt."

Whether Mary lacked confidence in his veracity, I cannot say; but she made another effort to get further off, which resulted (as such womanly efforts often do) in a closer contact.

"They are in the clothes-press," said the voice above alluded to. "They are not up stairs, and they are not down cellar, nor in the long room, nor pantry, nor anywhere else, and so they must be here." It was at length suggested to the seeker, who remained at the door of the press, that he should examine the premises in question, and thus test the truth of his reasonings, which suggestion he proceeded to act upon. As he was entering, Miss Mills made an effort to pass out, and as Ben made an effort to detain her till they were fairly discovered, there was a struggle, during which Mary's cheek came very near Ben's face. In considering the matter at a subsequent period, when he was cool, and consequently his judgment unbiased, he remarked to himself, confidentially of course, "It is reasonable to suppose that, under the circumstances of the case, I must have kissed her—indeed I have very little doubt about it—in fact, I remember it distinctly."

There is always some considerable excitement connected with the breaking up of a party like the one under consideration. There is always some embarrassment among the rustic gentlemen when bonnet and shawl time comes. He who can walk up boldly to a lady, and proffer his services to see her home, is regarded with envy. Now Miss Mary Mills, as I have said, was always behind some body, and, of course, she would not be one of the first to receive an offer of attendance home. It happened, on this occasion, that she was the last one accessible, and that Ben was left to go with her. It was with more than ordinary embarrassment that he offered her his arm, and, though she accepted it, she kept at a very respectful distance from him as they walked along towards her mother's humble dwelling. Ben felt that he had a great deal that he wanted to say to her, but did not know what to begin with. He thought of saying "the moon is most down;" but, as they were walking towards the west, it was to be presumed that she was already as well convinced of that fact as she would be after his most solemn assertion. He thought of many other things, but in every case some valid objection presented itself, so that, though they had half a mile to walk, they reached the door stone before a word was spoken. Ben began to grow desperate, and at length succeeded in asking, in by no means a musical tone, "Shall you be at home to-morrow evening?"

"No, I am going away to-morrow," said she, in a voice so sweet and plaintive that a mist gathered over Ben's eyes.

"Where to?" said he, too much interested in the matter to pay much attention to the manner of his phrase.

"To Western New York."

"How long are you going to stay?"

"Till next spring."

"What for?"

"To teach school. My mother's health is too feeble to work as she does. I am offered as much as we can both make by our needles here. She is to board this winter, and not take in any work, but take care of her health."

"Don't go."

"I must."

"You must not—[—]" There is no telling what Ben might have said, if the door had not opened and Mrs. Mills had not appeared.

"Good night," said Mary.

"Good night," said Ben; and he went home to pass a sleepless night.

The next morning he went early to Mrs. Mills, under pretence of purchasing her corn.

"Why did you not tell me sooner that you were going?" said he to Mary.

"I told you as soon as it came natural for me to do so. I did not suppose you felt any particular interest in my movements."

"But I do, and I can't bear to have you go"—and a tear broke out of bounds and ran across his cheek.

"The stage has come," said Mrs. Mills.

"Good-by, mother," giving her a fervent embrace. "Good-by, Mr. Gulic," extending her hand.

Ben walked by her side to the stage, saying, on the way, "Take care of yourself, and don't feel uneasy about your mother. I will take as good care of her as if she were my own mother." Mary gave him a look of thanks, which, as he afterwards said, he got framed and hung up in his memory. He kept his promise in regard to Mrs. Mills. Perhaps he made her write to her daughter a little more frequently than was perfectly convenient; but the accounts of his fidelity to his promise, which the letters contained, prepared Mary, on her return in the spring, to consent to his having a legal right to call Mrs. Mills mother—a right which he assumed in advance. Early in April they jointly took possession of the Northern farm.

MODEL COTTAGE.

A Dwelling for a Small Family.

Accommodation.—Here, Fig. 2, we have a colonnade, which serves as a porch; a vestibule, a; a parlor, b; a kitchen, with a stair to two bedrooms in the roof, c; a bedroom on the ground floor, d; a pantry, e; two closets, f, g; and water-closet, or pantry, h. The two bedrooms over c and d may be lighted by dormer windows, and by the small opening seen in the upper part of the gable end.

Construction.—The platform on which this dwelling is built is sustained by masonry, which, on three sides, supports the columns of the veranda or colonnade. These columns may either be of stone, of brick, stuccoed, or of timber; in either case, set on stone plinths, and with stone caps. The roof should be slated, with large courses at the gable ends, terminating in pinnacles. The chimney tops are plain, like the columns.

The garden, Fig. 3, containing about three-fourths of an acre, is here shown surrounded by a hedge. This hedge might, in many cases, be formed of fruit-bearing shrubs, such as plums, apples, sloes, service or mountain ash, the berries of which afford an excellent spirit; or elders, the berries of which make a well-known wine. Whichever description of fruit-bearing plant is used, the branches must be pruned with a knife, and not clipped with shears; because clipping, by producing an exuberance of weak, young shoots, prevents the plants from forming blossom buds. If it should be desirable to have a very formidable fence, the hedge might consist of two rows; the inner one of fruit-bearing plants, and the outer one of hawthorns or hollies. There is scarcely any situation, either on hills or by the sea-shore, in which the elder will not thrive, and its fruit is always valuable.

The mode of laboring and cropping the ground may be as follows: trench compartment i three spits deep, and plant with the cabbage tribe: manure and dig k, and plant with potatoes; trench l two spits deep, and sow with root crops, such as turnips, carrots, parsnips, onions, &c.; manure and dig m, and crop with peas, beans, and kidney beans. According to this rotation, in the second year, i will be manured and dug only, and will be under potatoes; k will be trenched two spits deep, and under root crops; l will be manured, dug, and under leguminous plants; and m will be trenched three spits deep, and under the cabbage tribe. Thus, a new stratum of soil will be brought up to the surface every other year: in the first year, what was the bottom becomes the top; in the second, the top is turned over; in the third, the middle becomes the top; and, in the fourth, this middle is turned over. Manure is applied every second year. This is enough to give a general idea of how a garden ought to be labored, manured, and cropped.

The smaller compartments may be cropped as follows: a, with gooseberries; b, with currants and raspberries; c, with strawberries; d, with asparagus; e, with sea-kale; f, with tart rhubarb; g, with Jerusalem artichokes; and h, with perennial, or what is called Good Henry spinach (Chenopodium Bonus Henricus). The border which surrounds the garden may be devoted to the smaller crops, such as salads, herbs, &c.; and to early crops, such as peas and potatoes. The space immediately surrounding the cottage should be ornamented with flowers and flowering shrubs. The trees at the corners of the compartments should be standard apples, pears, cherries, and plums.

THE PHILADELPHIA RIDING SCHOOL.

We have been requested to give a more ample description of the celebrated riding school alluded to in our article in the July number,* and with pleasure re-sume a subject which is of so much importance to the health of our fair countrywomen. Much is due to Mr. Craig, the proprietor of the establishment, for the liberality and perseverance with which he has presented every inducement to the study of horsemanship, for the past ten years, to ladies who have carried with them a taste for this most admirable accomplishment to homes in distant parts of the country. It is a centre from which much good has gone forth, and, as such, is well worth the attention of our lady readers. The school was established, as nearly as we can discover, about 1846, and, though various others have been commenced, meantime, none have survived the same term of years. About three years ago, the present beautiful building was completed, and since then the classes have continued to increase in size and excellence.

As we enter the second floor, we find a gallery well warmed in winter, as, indeed, the whole building is, and furnished with comfortable settees. Here we are at liberty to place ourselves, no matter whether we have a friend among the pupils or not, and watch the animated scene. Every now and then, a bevy of fresh arrivals come gayly up from the principal entrance, and ascend to the dressing-room just above us, where, in the multitude of skirts and hats, you would wonder how they ever find their own. But it is done; and the robing is accomplished amid jests and merry laughter, for they are all on speaking terms, at the least in class, though the acquaintance need not be considered as such out of doors, unless the young ladies please. This apartment has the usual complement of shelves, hooks, and mirrors; for many make an entire toilet, and come down arrayed in hat and habit, as if for the road. There is no particular etiquette upon this point observed, save that, in the height of the season, when the classes are full, we notice fewer bonnets and more hats, habits instead of sacques, and gauntlets for gloves. Indeed, the class has anything but uniformity in costume, as they stand here before us, while the horses are led into the centre of the arena by careful grooms, each properly accoutred with side-saddle, reins, etc., precisely as if for the road.

Now the discussion commences; for every lady has, of course, her favorite horse, which she is particularly anxious to ride, and particularly sure "Mr. Craig won't give" to her. Some go into raptures over the trot of "Night," the canter of "General," or "Romeo's" delightful rack. But the signal is given, and now one after another gathers up her skirt, takes whip and reins in her right hand, and, placing her left foot in her teacher's hand, springs to the saddle. No mistakes, no slips, no awkwardness; they vault as lightly as if they belonged to the Ravel troupe, and some of them with quite as much grace. And here be it remarked, that mounting, though the easiest point in equestrianism, often seems the most difficult to a beginner. She is so afraid she shall slip, or commit an awkwardness, that she loses all her confidence, when, if the escort understands his part, it is no less easy, after one or two trials—if not easier—than entering a carriage gracefully. Nevertheless, it is a point that tells the practiced rider. Watch that pale-faced school-girl in the gray skirt—how timidly she approaches her horse!—from behind, too, as novices are apt to, being less afraid of heels than teeth! She puts her hand to the horn of the saddle, forgetting all about her reins, until reminded of them by Mr. Craig. See, she has her whip in her left hand—and how she blushes when asked what she intends to do with it there! But, at last, she is in her seat; and, drawing her reins loosely through the wrong fingers, of course, her horse moves at his own gait to the side.

Here is another—that tall, fine figure in the green habit. How boldly she walks up to the head of her steed, patting the smooth neck that arches with the recognition, and talking all sorts of cajoling flatteries to the "good fellow!" "fine fellow!" as she does so. Of course, he understands her—the tone, if not the words—and winks good-naturedly, as much as to say, "Oh, I know you; none of the awkward squad, that's certain." But Mr. Craig is waiting; and, taking her reins in her right hand, she vaults to her seat, changes the reins to her left in an instant, and rises unassisted in the saddle to arrange her dress properly; then, drawing her reins perfectly straight in the centre, leaving the curb lighter than the other, she moves the horse forward with a single steady pressure of the reins.

Now all are mounted, and walking their horses, a cavalcade of twenty or more, around the area, nearly two hundred feet in length, and fifty in width. All this space has its soft flooring of clean tan, is lighted from the roof, as well as side windows, thus giving a perfect ventilation, a most desirable thing in such a hall. Now faster and faster, to a gentle rack, past the Wissahicon views upon the wall—for we have paintings in oil the whole length—and gallery of interested spectators. The lookers-on have increased in number. There are cousins, uncles, and fathers. Lovers, too, who are looking forward to the next summer's happy rides, in privileged tête-à-tête, through shady lanes and under sunset skies. The canter commences, and murmured comments arise. ■

"Do look at Anne, how well she holds herself! I had no idea she rode so well!"

"That little girl in the crimson polka is just the one to ride 'Tom.' She's not afraid to use her whip."

"Oh, see, Mr. Craig strikes Miss Jenkins' horse! Dear me, what an obstinate creature! And see how pale she is!"

"Well done, Sallie! That trot is perfect! Rise a little more, my dear. There—easier—that's it." And the admiring father leans over the railing to watch Miss Sallie, as she disappears down the bride path.

Here comes our timid school-girl, the identical Miss Jenkins, perfectly white with nervous fear, and clinging to the horn of the saddle—a habit we so well remember to have been scolded a whole term for, and the most natural bad habit in the world. Mr. Craig is riding beside her, now scolding, now coaxing, now ridiculing. Oh, well, she will grow braver in time. But look! Miss Sallie sweeps along, green habited, black beavered, rising gracefully in the saddle, not so high as to be jockeyish, and looking perfectly at home on her well-managed steed. She has not touched her whip since she mounted; nor does it hang in a perpendicular line in her right hand, as does little Miss N.'s. How Mr. Craig has lectured the last lady for the ungraceful fashion!

The hour is not quite up; but we must go. Even now others are arriving to take the places of those now in the ring. The rapid canter, in which horse and rider formed so brilliant a kaleidoscope, is subsiding into a quiet walk, and we must leave for morning engagements; though the present class will linger to criticize, good-naturedly, and perhaps admire, their successors, learning their own faults by contrast as well as example.

So much for a hasty sketch of a morning lesson in our best riding school; the best in the country, so far as our experience and observation are concerned. There is no excuse for its pupils, if they are not accomplished horsewomen; and for those of our readers who cannot have the advantages which it offers, we would suggest that firmness and gentleness are the two essentials in managing a horse as well as a child; and, like many ladies we know, they may be coaxed when they cannot be driven. But we may have more to say on this matter at a later day; for, as we have so often said the accomplishment is one for which American women should be distinguished above all others, their peculiarly fragile and delicate frames needing its bracing and strengthening effects.

BENEDICTUS.

BY R. T. CONRAD.

The Lord giveth and the Lord taketh away: Blessed be the name of the Lord.

BLESSED be Thy name forever,
God of mercy, God of might!
Of all gracious gifts the giver,
Of all life the Lord and Light!
Bless Thee for the rest of even,
Bless Thee for the joy of day;
Peace on earth, and hope of heaven—
Blesséd ever, blesséd aye!

Not for these alone, O Father!
Bless Thee, not for joys alone:
For the griefs that round me gather,
For my misery and my moan;
Bless Thee, with a bowed heart's blessing,
For the good that seems the ill:
Whether chast'ning or caressing,
Bless Thee, Father, bless Thee still!

Bless Thee for the awakening sorrow,
Weeping o'er the early dead,
Tearful night and mournful morrow,
Sinking heart and aching head!
Bless Thee, Lord, for thou dost love me
When with sickness thou dost smite;
Bless Thee for the clouds above me,
'Tis Thy mercy makes them bright!

Blest the tempest o'er me sweeping,
For o'er Thee the storm hath swept;
Blest my weariness and weeping—
Let me weep, for Thou hast wept!
Bless Thee! every grief 's a token
Calling me to Thee away;
Break, my heart! for thine was broken;
Bless Thee ever, bless Thee aye!

Bless Thee, for the soul that yearneth,
With a lowly love for Thee!
Bless Thee, for the love which burneth
Thine, in life and death, to be!
Bless Thee, for the life which liveth,
Vapor-like, to pass away!
Bless Thee, for the death that giveth
Life to bless Thee, Lord, for aye!

NEEDLES.

THE following very interesting article will, we are sure, please our lady readers. All of them, no doubt, use the needle, but few are aware of the trouble of making it.

The art of needle-making, in many of its departments, presents much that is generally, or, to use a term commonplace enough, popularly interesting to a large class of readers; yet remarkably little is known as to the manner in which the tiny article in question is produced; and, of the immense number of the "needle-using population," but a small proportion have a due conception of the operations and processes through which a needle goes, from its rough form to the beautifully polished instrument used oft "by ladye fair, and maide of low degree." Our illustrations represent a needle in its various stages of progression: in noticing these, we shall attempt to describe the nature of the operations, in detail, as fully as the very limited space at our disposal will admit of. Brief as this must necessarily be, we trust that it may be worthy of a small corner—in keeping with the tiny article of which it treats—in the boudoir of the lady, or the little wall-nook or humble book-shelf of the peasant-girl's home

Needles, as all our readers are aware, are made of steel, the steel being made into thin wire, of a diameter proportionate to the fineness of the needles to be made. As the wire is brought to the factory in circular bundles, the first operation is untying them and cutting the wire into certain determinate lengths. A pair of shears, of rather large dimensions, are fixed to the wall of the cutting-shop, having the blades uppermost; one limb is fastened, the other is loose. The workman is provided with a gauge, by which the length of the wire to be cut off is determined. Uncoiling the bundle of wire, he puts the end into the gauge, and placing the series of wires forming the thickness of the coil between the blades of the shears, he presses against the loose limb with his thigh, and, by moving the coil up and down to assist the cutting action, he speedily severs the lengths from the coil. Proceeding thus, he cuts off a series of lengths till the coil is exhausted: out of one coil, he may thus obtain as many as 40,000 distinct wires. The coil being circular, it is evident that each individual wire must partake somewhat of its curvilinear shape; in fact, each is far from being straight. Fig. 1 is a fac-simile of the wire at this stage. As one of the requisites of a needle is that it shall be straight, the next process is to straighten all the wires. Supposing two of the curved wires in Fig. 1 to be placed in the palm of one hand, and rubbed quickly, backwards and forwards, by the fingers of the other, a slight straightening would ensue; but, if the needles were removed to a hard flat surface, as a table, the operation would be much facilitated. If, however, a dozen or two of wires were to be placed on the table, and so kept as to lie close to one another, and then rubbed, the pieces, rolling one upon another, would soon be straightened, as the round part of one would roll upon the flat part of another, and thus, by the continuance of the process, the whole wires would be straightened. This is, in fact, the rational of the process carried on at this stage of the manufacture. Two rings of iron are provided, some three inches in diameter, half an inch broad, and the same thick; these are placed a distance apart, on a flat stone slab, some eighteen or twenty inches from the ground. The distance between the rings is such that, when the wires are placed within them, the ends are flush or even with the outer surfaces. Supposing a number of wires are placed thus, sufficient to fill the interior of the rings one-half of their diameter or so; the whole are fastened tightly in, and placed in a furnace and heated to a red heat. They are then taken out, placed on the slab, and the fastening removed, so that all the wires are free to move one upon another. The workman then takes a piece of curved iron, some inch and a half broad, and half an inch thick: he places the curved or convex side of this on the top row of wires between the rings, and, pressing forcibly by means of his hands at either end of the iron, works the rings briskly backwards and forwards on the slab. By this means the wires are kept rolling upon each other, and continually shifting their places, thus presenting a new portion of their surfaces to the action of their neighbors. The shifting of the wires may easily be ascertained by inserting a piece of cold wire, which, being black, is easily observable among its red neighbors. Near the bottom of the ring, in a few seconds it will be seen at the top, its course being distinctly traced, winding its eccentric way amongst the others. When cold, the wires are all straight, as shown in Fig. 2.

The next operation is the pointing. In order to save time, each wire is long enough to form two needles; each is therefore pointed at both ends, as seen in Fig. 3. The grindstones by which the wires are pointed are of small diameter, not more than ten or twelve inches, but they revolve at an immense velocity, the moving power being generally water-wheels. Each grinder sits on a low stool, in front of the grindstone, a small trough of water being placed before him. Taking up sixty or one hundred needles, according to their quality, he places them on the palm of the right hand, so that the ends project over the length of the forefinger. Next placing the left-hand fingers on those, the thumb grasping the back of the right, he is enabled so to move the whole range of wires that they may rotate with ease on their axes, and yet without rolling over one another. He then applies the points of the wires to the rapidly revolving grindstone: if he held them always in one direction, the action of the stone would be such that the points would be beveled off like chisels; but by the fingers he makes them all to revolve, thus giving to each a gently tapering and perfectly round point. As the wires are apt to project unequally over the finger, thus presenting one wire longer than another to the grindstone, the workman every now and then strikes the points gently against an upright flat-faced piece of timber, somewhat in the same manner as a person shuffling a pack of cards makes them all even by knocking their ends upon the table. On the wires becoming red-hot, the workman dips them into the trough of water placed before him. A brilliant stream of fiery sparks is continually passing from the points. The matter thus evolved being inhaled into the lungs of the workmen, formerly rendered them a peculiarly short-lived race. The deleterious products are now, however, by the use of a powerful fan, drawn away from the zone of respiration as soon as they are produced. The trade is now as healthy as any other. The operation of grinding is exceedingly interesting; and presents an exemplification of the dexterity attainable by long practice in any one branch; but this remark is equally applicable to many other departments in the manufacture of needles. A good workman can point upwards of 10,000 in an hour. It is amusing to see the rapidity with which he will take up a handful of wires, point an end of them all, and turning them so as to present the other ends to the stone, lay them aside perfectly pointed at both ends.

The wires thus pointed are next taken to the "stamping shop," and here the wire first gains its approach to a needle. Each needle is to be rounded at the head, and have a hole made there, called the eye, as also an indented channel on each side, called the "gutter" of the head; the stamping makes the round form, and marks the place of the eye-hole. A wooden-framed stand, or table, is provided, with a massive anvil, on the upper surface of which is placed a die or design in intaglio, similar to that shown in Fig. 5; a weight is suspended by a rope over a pulley placed above the table, and plays between two vertical guides; the same design as in the die is made on the lower surface of the weight, but in relief, or protruding from the surface. The lower end of the rope sustaining this weight is provided with a stirrup, in which the workman can place his foot. Standing before the table, he takes a number of needles in his left hand, and with his right places each wire exactly in its centre on the lower anvil or die, and letting the weight drop suddenly, by raising his foot, the design is impressed on the centre of the wire, on both sides, as seen in Fig. 4. Fig. 5 is an enlarged view of the centre part of the wire. The round circles are the places through which the eye-holes are to be punched; they are very slightly indented at this stage, merely enough to denote their situation. By depressing his foot, the workman lifts the weight, and places another wire on the die, allowing the weight to drop suddenly, as before: the impression is made, and the wire cast aside, to be replaced by another, and so on. So rapidly is the process gone through, that it is actually inducive of an optical deception. The workman takes each wire from his left hand, places it upon the die, withdraws it, and throws it aside to take up another, so very quickly, that a quick-eyed witness of the operation actually believes that it is but one and the same needle that the operator is moving out and in. Considerable nicety is required in the stamping, as each wire is to be placed so that it will be struck exactly on the centre; the chief guide to aid him is the eye; and so rapidly does he become aware of its being wrong-placed, that he arrests the fall of the weight at any particular point of its descent: indeed, the facility with which he can do this by the immediate action of the foot is not the least remarkable matter observable in this department.

The eye-holes are next to be punched. This operation is generally performed by little boys. A small screw-punch is used for this purpose. The lower end of the punch is provided with two projecting points placed at a distance from each other, exactly equal to that between the indentation formed in the wire, through which the eye-holes are to be made. The little operator, taking a number of the stamped wires, spreads them out like a fan, and placing each one on the centre of a small slab, brings down the upper slab, which makes the holes in the wire forming the eyes. This is a very nice operation, as the slightest misplacement of the wires, so that the centres were not in the right places, would involve the spoiling of each, from the punches passing through wrong places. To guide the operative, a small indentation is placed in the lower slab, or bed; into this the wire is placed: by means of this, a delicacy of touch, and a quickness of the eyesight, almost every wire is placed on the slab, and properly punched in the exact places.

Each of the wires has two moulded parts, gutters, and eye-holes in the centre; the next operation is the dividing of these so as to form two needles. Figures 6 and 7 show the needle in this stage previous to the dividing. Figure 7 is an enlarged view of the centre of Fig. 6. The first step in dividing the wires is what is termed "spitting," that is, passing a fine steel wire through the eyes of perhaps a hundred wires; as there are two eyes, there are also two wires; when they are all thus spitted, by bending them backwards and forwards between the hands, they are broken in the centre, one-half remaining on each wire. Before dividing them, however, the protuberances on either side, as seen in Figures 4, 5, 6, and 7, are filed off, by placing the wires (spitted) on a convex block, keeping them tight thereon by means of a leather band, while the workman uses a smooth file. When broken, each needle has a square head, as in Fig. 8. It is nicely moulded by means of a very small grindstone, as seen in Fig. 9.

We have thus far traced our piece of wire to a very respectable-looking needle; but, much as it would be prized by a savage, it is by no means fit for use in civilized countries; to make it so, it has to undergo many processes: these we shall attempt to describe very briefly. The needle, at the stage we have arrived at, is so soft that it can be bent between the fingers as easily as a piece of lead of the same diameter. They therefore require to be hardened. Previous to the hardening, the "soft-straightening" is to be gone through. This operation is meant to restore the straightness of each needle, lost by the repeated processes which it has gone through, as "pointing," "stamping," &c. The "soft-straightening" is simple. The operative sits at a bench having a flat surface. Placing the needles parallel to one another on this, he presses a convex piece of iron on each of the needles, rolling it over and over, until it is straightened. So quickly is the operation effected, that a good workman may straighten upwards of three thousand needles in an hour. The straightened needles are then hardened by being heated to redness in an oven or furnace, and suddenly plunged into cold water or oil. This makes them so brittle that they can be broken as easily as glass. They require, therefore, to be "tempered." This is effected by placing them on a hot plate, and moving them about so as to present each needle in succession to the action of the plate. As soon as they have all acquired a particular color, they are removed. When cold, they are then beautifully elastic. As they are, however, slightly distorted by the action of the heat, each needle is straightened by giving it a tiny blow with a tiny hammer on a small steel anvil. This process is necessarily tedious. It is called the "hard-straightening."

The needles, though now properly tempered, are still rough and unpolished on their surface: to obviate this, and make them bright, is the next of the series of operations. The process is termed the "scouring." A strip of canvas is laid on the table, and an immense number of needles are placed on this, all parallel to one another; a pretty large allowance of soft soap, sweet oil, and powdered stone found in the neighborhood of Redditch, is then placed over them, and the whole tightly wrapped and corded up into a shape as seen in Figure 10. A considerable number of these bundles being prepared, they are placed beneath a moving table of wood, working to and fro in a wooden bed. The needles by this means are rubbed one against another, until, in process of time, they are smoothed and partly polished on their surface. After being subjected to the action of this machine, the rolls are untied, and the needles washed; they are then replaced in the canvas, and tied up with a fresh supply of soft soap, oil, and emery, and subjected to the action of the scouring machine. This is repeated several times, till they are perfectly smooth. After being washed for the last time, the needles are placed among some dry sawdust, and worked to and fro in a peculiarly-shaped copper tray till they are all perfectly dry. At this stage, a very curious operation is observable: the needles being mixed up with the sawdust, it becomes a matter of importance to separate them with rapidity; this is effected in a manner as simple as it is effectual. The tray in which the needles and sawdust are placed tapers up to an edge, which has no margin, thus affording a place over which matters can pass without obstruction. The workman moving the tray rather rapidly up and down, causes the needles and sawdust to approach the edge: the sawdust being lightest, flies off, the needles remain; but such is the dexterity of the workman that, although the needles are seen glancing half over the edge, still it is an exceedingly rare occurrence for one to pass completely over: thus, in less time than we have taken to write the above half a dozen lines, the workman can separate thousands of needles from their attendant sawdust. As may be supposed, the needles, from this rough proceeding, are lying in all imaginable positions. To make them parallel to one another is the next operation. This is easily effected by placing them in an oblong tin tray, and giving it a peculiar shake; in a remarkably short space of time some thousands are parallelized. But, although they are parallel to one another, still they are wrongly situated for subsequent operations—the head of one may be next to the point of another; it is necessary that the heads of all should lie one way, the points another. To attempt to do this by singling out each individual needle, would be a hopeless task where millions have to be operated upon. By a very simple contrivance—we may say machine, for it saves labor—the operation is effected most rapidly. A small piece of linen rag is wrapped round the forefinger of the operative, and, placing a few thousands of the parallelized needles before her on the table, she passes the covered finger along one side of the heap, the finger of the other hand on the other side; the needles having their points at one side stick into the linen rag; these are placed by themselves. In this way all the needles with their heads lying one way are left by themselves.

The next operation is "drilling" the eyes. From the nature of the operation of "punching," the holes are rather rough and uneven: it is to remove this, and to countersink the holes, so that the sharp edges may be taken off, that the operation of drilling is gone through. As the needles by this time are hard, they have to be softened by the application of heat, so that the drill may not be spoiled by the hard metal. For this purpose, a number of needles are placed on a bar of iron, with their heads projecting over the edge a short distance: these are then applied to a red-hot bar, which reduces the temper of the needles, causing the head to assume a beautiful ly blue color: this process is called the "bluing." A number of the blued needles are next taken by the driller—generally a little girl—and placed behind a flat steel bar, with their heads projecting slightly above its upper edge. The operative sits exactly in front of a little drilling-lathe, in which a small drill is placed, and made to revolve rapidly. The needles are brought one by one before the point of the drill: the drill not only cleans out the eye, making it internally smooth, but it also countersinks the outer edge of each. Some idea of the extreme nicety of the operation may be obtained, when it is remembered that the variation of a hair's breadth, in the presenting of the eye of the needle to the point of the drill, would result in the complete spoiling of the article; yet such is the amazing rapidity with which the drilling proceeds, that a dozen will be drilled in as many seconds: in fact, it is difficult to believe, on first witnessing the operation, that the needles are really drilled.

The needles are then taken to the poli-hing-room, where they are beautifully polished by being held to the periphery of revolving wheels, covered with buff leather. The needles are taken up in a dozen or so at a time, and first held by the points and the upper ends, then by the heads and the pointed ends: the whole surface of each needle is thus rapidly polished. They are next counted and put up in little blue papers, twenty-five in each, labeled, and tied up in bundles for sale. We have thus briefly traced the manufacture of a needle from its rough state to its final condition. As an instance of the many processes through which a needle of the best quality goes, we here append a list of them:—

- 1, wire received; 2, weighed; 3, gauged; 4, cut; 5, rubbed; 6, counted; 7, pointed at first end; 8, washed; 9, cut back; 10, pointed at last end; 11, examined; 12, counted; 13, washed; 14, weighed; 15, annealed; 16, stamped; 17, pressed; 18, spitted; 19, filed; 20, broken; 21, heads filed; 22, oil burnt off; 23, soft-straightened; 24, evened; 25, counted; 26, hardened; 27, evened; 28, strappet; 29, tempered; 30, weighed; 31, examined; 32, picked for crooks; 33, hard-straightened; 34, counted; 35, scoured with seven emeries, washed and evened between each; 36, washed and dried; 37, weighed; 38, evened; 39, headed; 40, weighed; 41, ground (at points); 42, weighed; 43, scoured again with one more emery, and glazed; 44, weighed; 45, washed and dried; 46, weighed; 47, evened; 48, headed; 49, picked for waste and broken points, flecked, and crooked; 50, weighed by count; 51, set; 52, examined; 53, weighed for drillers; 54, blued; 55, drilled; 56, rubbed; 57, weighed from drilling; 58, examined; 59, rounded by finishing; 60, finished once; 61, rubbed; 62, finished again; 63, rubbed; 64, examined; 65, counted in twenty-fives; 66, papered; 67, labeled; 68, tied up; 69, collected; 70, packed up.

MY ENGAGEMENT.

BY D——.

WHAT a glorious, airy, light hearted creature I should be! and more, what a free and easy, happy fellow I am!—and so I ought to be, I'm sure; indeed, I think I am! Yes! there can be no doubt of that, for everybody says I am, and of course to disappoint everybody, by a direct and wilful appearance or thought to the contrary, would be stamped as the last extremity of obstinacy, and as a capital offence against the sacred institution of public opinion.

I am engaged!

It is so odd. The sensation is so indescribable! perhaps funny would be the better word with which to christen my feelings, which are continually overpowering me like a restive horse, by getting the bit, like my thoughts, into his mouth, running away with me through an inexplicable and tangled-up maze of something indistinctly happy in the future, and finally disposing of me by throwing me over his head into a dry pond of sober muddy matter of fact. An acute realization of the gross and plodding earthiness of our natures, not by any means a pleasing substitute for the etherial bricks and mortar palaces built up previously in my dreamy wakefulness.

Everybody appears to look at me, as if I was somebody else, and not at all in my own proper form, but bought and paid for, and dearly sold at the price. Indeed, I am constantly convicting myself of identifying a double with my future career, by reckoning up expenses for two adults instead of one, multiplying boarding and washing bills by two, working out economical plans of housekeeping, and calculating mysterious sundries (never heard of before in my singleness, but which will suggest themselves now), by every rule in or out of the arithmetic. I find myself growing very curious about the probable cost of dressing a woman up for the period of twelve months, and rush at the conclusion that shaving at your barber's is a luxury easily to be dispensed with, and the money better applied, with a few, a very few, dollars added (a box of cigars less in the year), to the purchase of a summer shot silk, or a crape shawl, or a winter drawn bonnet for the double previously referred to. This double of myself creeps upon my thoughts everywhere, and at all times. No place has a charm to free me from its influence. It is the tangible echo I hear, see, ay, and feel in every act or part of my daily life. It is the shadow of my existence, but a shadow to me all sunshine, and a light of new hope, breaking through and clearing away the clouds of the weary and graceless past. And as I thus am, a chastening tone, a permanent one, I hope, comes soothingly over this new being of mine, and I walk on, a prouder and happier man, among my kind.

How came this change about? I am engaged!

It is settled, and from the muster roll of jolly, rollicking bachelors (what libelous titles, I think, now!) I am expunged; yet with the commiseration of the entire body, who feel sorry that I should have thrown myself away, after all the awful examples I ought to have profited by, but give me their best wishes for all that, with a powerful side hint about inviting them to the wedding, which they are pleased to style as the sacrifice of the stray lamb. They malignantly attempt to destroy my nervous system, by saying that "marriage is a dreadful speculation, much worse than investing in steamboats, or touching flour; some men have made the thing pay, but, as a general rule, it was much safer to stand from under." And so they go on, but it does not continue with me long. I am (my single self) generally conceded to be in the past tense. I feel of the plural number very strongly indeed, and possess the active knowledge of having done something which has produced this change, of being in a chrysalis state, and of being about to change into some other mysterious creation, about which I have an immense amount of curiosity, but no fear at all.

Effie is the name of the double. I think it a fond name; but then everybody under an engagement thinks the same, so that it goes for nothing. Effie is not handsome, that is, she is not as the world of criticism would style handsome, and I am almost selfish enough to prize her the more highly for it. But then her beauty is grafted upon her heart, in her trusting faithfulness, and her abiding love. Effie is the double, my other self, and we are engaged! None ever think now of saying, "Call in and see us some evening," without tacking on to the end of it, "and bring Effie with you." Effie is identified with me in all. She is worked up into the very dough of my daily crust.

I have been away from town for a few weeks, and everybody seems changed. In that time (there being an understanding of a long engagement between Effie and myself) Effie's mother has been informed of the fact, and has thawed considerably; indeed my life, before I went away, might be said to have been thoroughly frozen over, save in one green and sunny spot of perpetual summer, and, in short, that I was vegetating in a Lapland winter of rigid, supercilious, constrained courtesy, relieved periodically by sharp north-westerners of cloudy looks. In these Lapland times there had been a short, stout young man, with an unlawful display of highly starched shirt, ruled with red stripes, like a ledger, who was once my friend, and then my rival. He was rich, or would be, and on this contrived to leave me alone without a friend to back my suit. All went over to him, and so tried to crush down and mar my existing happiness as to do nothing, in their shallowness, more than to bind Effie closer to me, and excite my pride, which, as it fed and fattened upon their opposition, was all sufficient of itself to shatter their idle intrigues.

But I am engaged to be married now, and I feel softened to all; for Effie says, gently, that "I ought to feel so," and I know her to be right. This feeling extends to the short, stout young man in the ledger-ruled shirt, though in all probability we shall never become reconciled by speech, and I have an idea that, like myself, he does not wish it. He still calls on Effie's mother, to inquire after her health, as he says; but I know the poor fellow's chief charm is that which circles around my Effie. My Effie! What a happy possessive feeling is conveyed in those two words! The old room is still thronged at night. We were a merry set who used to meet in that warm, cozy parlor, before the spirit of marriage crept into our thoughts and divided us; when Effie's laugh would ring up the echoes from every corner, and animate us with her joyfulness without preference! Those were happy days and evenings, but the presiding fairy of the ring will soon be missing in her accustomed place.

* * * * *

We are sitting in the pleasant old chamber, Effie and I, alone. Her hand is resting fondly on mine, yet not so but that she can take it away quickly when the door opens; for, although we are engaged, the modest blood mounts as thought to her forehead at a hint of it from a stranger. She has not yet got quite used to it. She is looking up earnestly, but not sorrowfully, in my face, for I am speaking seriously.

"Effie, how strangely, how almost foolishly we began to love!"

"No, not foolishly. Is it folly to love me? You shall not say foolishness," she interrupts me with.

"Without thinking," I continue, "that we were not rich enough in the world to marry."

"Rich enough in our own love, which will never change," she answers.

I say that "such reads very well in poetry, but the wealth held in such sentiments cannot be transferred as good deposit to the bankers." I then tell her that all I have to depend upon is my salary for the present, whatever may be in the future. Then, after she has pressed my hand, and leaned over to let me kiss her, thinking only of the present, and wanting no other banker than me, where she can present her lips as notes for hard cash in kisses, I go on. I put down, quite methodically, the amount of my salary, and very imposing and great it looks in figures, which is much more than it ever did to me in the hard material, always having had the happy knack of being ahead of my account at the year's end. From this, I deduct the boarding for two, and the mysterious sundries, which Effie agrees to with a half-smothered smile; this done, we discover that we have a surplus, not a large amount, to be sure, but still quite a respectable sum for contingencies, as Effie remarks with such a wonderful air of confidence as makes me feel prouder of her than ever.

As I said before, people have changed since my return; some are the same, but these are few, who evidently wish I had never returned, for which kindness of course I am profoundly grateful. But then, I don't care for them, and I let them see it. Effie and I are left alone now, and, as we are sitting together, people, as they enter, slide across the carpet for anything they may want, moving like mysterious and quiet spirits, diving into corners with studied abstraction, to rush impetuously out by the door afterwards, in a manner which was at first alarming from its utter novelty, but which is perfectly agreeable now, and very delicate, as I think. No more notice is taken of us than if we were the offspring of the invisible boy and girl, enjoying the attributes of our parents. No! we are there as a matter of course, and, being there, have as much right to be studiously undisturbed as anything most sacred among the household furniture, or the family Bible, which has never been opened since a patriarch of the tribe, aged one hundred and four years, departed this land for a better, some five years since. In the matter of births, Effie's family has left off business so long that the record has slightly paled. It seems to be perfectly understood that we are arranging little matters, though what little matters are so arranged, and to what extent, I never could perfectly satisfy myself. It is a glorious privilege, however, and comes particularly sweet and welcome to me after the iciness of my earlier wooing.

As we thus sit to talk for hours, and happy listening hours they are to both, we indulge in visionary creations; and they speak to us of joy and a straight path onwards. Who may blame us? It is happiness to escape from the trammels which bind us down to life, to soar above, where, if fancy does delude us sometimes, she well repays us by the passing forgetfulness of self.

Effie is continually recounting the glories of, and has a painfully retentive memory connected with, the future of a married sister with large handsome black eyes. She is a walking inventory of the whole stock, and I have a dreadful impression that she has got it written out somewhere, and carefully studies it, with an ultimate view to a fac-simile establishment. I may be wrong, but I have a fearful presentiment that it is so. Effie's account at times is so glowing, so rapturous in describing the immense advantages of certain articles over others, to say nothing of the saving by having them, and how tasteful, indeed elegant, they look, that she only pauses when I can no longer control a laugh at her mahogany mania. The apartments of the black-eyed sister are represented as so truly magnificent, that I am half inclined, sometimes, to confound it with a fabulous temple or castle of the past ages, and transform the black-eyed sister into a fair young virgin torn ruthlessly from her mother's arms by a grim ogre, ultimately changed into a handsome young prince. It is something so amazing, with its hundred little things in detail, as only to be looked on admiringly at a safe distance by my plodding self, and not at all a place to trust myself in without great personal danger. I feel that. It causes me to think of my perspective brother-in-law as a Cæsus, or as of one who has drawn an immense prize in a lottery, or as having a secret and inexhaustible mine somewhere in the bowels of the earth, unknown to mortal. In short, a thousand fancies connected with those rooms flit before my confined vision. But, however much I reflect, I still listen, and it pleases Effie; and, though perhaps a smile will steal over my features, in very spite, as she rattles merrily on. I listen still, and believe devoutly, as she would have me do, in the establishment of the black-eyed sister.

Sometimes I look serious, as in one instance when I doubted the absolute necessity of a writing-chair covered with red velvet. Then Effie slyly pouts her plump little lips for a moment, only for a moment though, for I press them gently down with my finger in that time, which so changes the pout into a glad bright smile, as to make it seem almost impossible she should ever look otherwise, it sits so well upon her.

She says she knows I think her extravagant, but she is not, and is not telling me about all those fine things because she wants them. No! I ought to know she would be content with what I chose, and I must not think so any more, to make her unhappy.

And then—I don't know why, except to spoil her the more—I look at the door, and, hearing nobody outside, kiss her, which seems to square all old accounts very satisfactorily, and we proceed to open a new one forthwith.

Again, but not so frequently as of the others, and I don't know why, we speak of another sister and her husband, who live in the country, and of their happiness. And Effie, if she has received a letter from her, takes it from the desk to read to me, where she says that she is so purely happy in her husband and her rural home; and that her love is so increasing that, if it so continues, in a few years she will not be able to tell how much she will love him. This sister (I call her "Star," because of the brightness of her eyes—good eyes are an inheritance in Effie's family) and her husband were all of the family that stood by me in friendship in my love days, and I am grateful, and like to talk of them.

And we speak of their home, and Effie tells me that "Star's" furniture did not cost, oh! not near so much as that of the handsome black-eyed sister. But then, in answer to my question, she says it looks almost as well, and is so tastefully arranged, and so neatly kept, that it looks for all the world like a little fairy home, and "Star," the good spirit, always busling about to set everything to rights. Then I say—

"Yes! Effie; and, believe me, the best spirit this world produces is such a wife as 'Star.' The good spirit who brings peace to her husband's hearth, confiding happiness to his heart, and a trust in goodness unto death."

We are both silent for a minute, and I think I see a tear, quite a little twinkling tear, trickle down over her cheek, before I feel it plash upon my hand, and she looks up tearfully, yet smilingly, and murmurs, as she nestles her head upon my breast—

"Let us pray to God that we too may have that happiness."

"Amen!" I reply, and after a time of communicative silence, we try to think of something else.

For some time past Effie has been busy in her attentions to numerous rolls of fine linen and muslin, by which I infer that she is thinking of our engagement in a very serious and grave light indeed. But when I enter on my nightly visit, it is a subject of general remark, at which Effie of course colors up very redly, that a greater portion of the attention due to the linen is transferred to me, and that a subdued tit-a-tit over the backgammon board has far more charms than the mysteries of the cross stitch or plain hemming. When the handsome sister comes in, as she does often in the afternoon, we are very chatty, but rather stiff withal, for we both remember the past. Her husband also comes, and we meet in the streets, but we never speak, for we too remember well the past, and cannot forget it if we would. Effie says she wishes we were friends, and I tell her "so we shall be some day; the best." But this does not satisfy her, although I find it impossible as yet to change my feelings to one who had been the most opposing of all, when he should not have been, and the firmest and most powerful friend of the short stout young man. This I say to her mildly, for on it I am firm. And Effie, seeing me determined, and, for all my mildness, somewhat flushed, does not reply for some seconds, but then gently whispers that we two men are too proud, and that we ought to be reconciled as brothers; upon which, I mentally ejaculate—curse his pride—but promise, as I mean, to bear good peaceable relations to all. So that is dismissed.

There is another man, so curiously mixed up with our engagement that sometimes I find it impossible to tear him away from the web which it has woven about all who knew us, and were of our daily communion, that I look upon him almost as a part and parcel of it. He was also against me, and on the side of the short stout individual; but now I hear from Effie that he wishes to renew old associations.

We never passed a word of anger, and yet we cooled, became estranged, and so parted. But he is coming over with the others. Let them come! Against them all, alone, I won the prize I played for, and the warm blood, almost boiling as I write now, pushes ever to my head as I exult in my victory.

It was a triumph well worthy to be connected with Effie, and I feel now, stronger than ever, how unworthy in comparison is my affection to hers, which outlived their united persecutions.

I am digressing.

This man I had always liked. I admired him. He was superior to all the men I knew most intimately, and I would dwell in my thoughts upon his arguments as a wrecker watches every wave for waifs. I think he knew this. In the evenings, since our coolness sprung up, I have caught him smiling when I turned round quickly, and at other times, when I have spoken, I have detected him looking at me not unkindly. He is a man of vast information, and has been a mystery to me, for a long time, who cannot remember anything. It very often occurs to me, I know it is sheer nonsense, and yet it does suggest itself, that he has a familiar imp, crammed with an entire encyclopedia of knowledge, constantly in attendance upon him. Viewing him as the friend of my opponent, the short stout man, I look upon him as a prize fighter may look upon the bottle-holder of his defeated adversary—a part of the fight, a negative principal forced into the ring, with the misfortune of wearing the losing man's colors.

* * * * *

It is morning—a pert, biting, snappish winter's morning. Everything is great-coated and comforted, except the poor (God help them!); even the houses are hiding in wrappings of snow. Effie, and I, and he (the Cyclopædia) are sitting by the stove. Cyclopædia and I entered together, but he yielded the reserved seat by Effie. She is forming some hieroglyphical characters of white silk braid upon a little flannel, something not unlike, in form, to a watchman's coat cut down to the smallest possible dimensions, but which, upon inquiry, I find to be a "Jenny Lind night-cap" for the black-eyed sister.

I say Oh! and think that the family Bible, honorably mentioned before, may soon have a pen and ink addition to the register. The Cyclopædia grins behind the book he is pretending to read, and I flatly refuse to believe in the night-cap.

Then Effie says, with much subdued laughing, hidden by her handkerchief, and some enticing little pouts, that I ought to be ashamed of myself (as of course I am immediately), and threatens the heaviest punishment, at which the Cyclopædia grins again.

Effie commences again on her cabalistic figurings in silence, and I fall into a sweet reverie. I look at her there, and picture out boldly, on the canvases of my thoughts, a bright harmonious landscape of the hopeful future, peering, as I do so, so far into the perspective hereafter, as to trace the softened, warm, and mellow tints which might grace our old age, so that we might re-read the history of our earlier life, and say, with heartfelt reverence, that we had continued to love, and that our love had not been a silly conceit.

He is yet by the stove, looking upon the book, not reading it. Occasionally I feel him snatching hurried glimpses at my face. I know he is trying to follow my thoughts, but I have had my dream out, and I could defy Lavater.

Effie touches me gently with her foot, and looks almost imploringly from me to him. I reflect for a moment. I know the meeting has been arranged, and half dislike the contrivance; but then I think again that he has been very kind to Effie while I was away. I rise from my seat, and holding out my hand to him, cross over to where he is sitting, and say—

"We have too long been separated in that good feeling which should exist between us; let all be forgotten, and let our hands join on a new friend ship."

"Not on a new," he says; "no, on the old friendship let us join our hands. Not on a new, for I have always felt warmly towards you, and have earnestly regretted the estrangement."

Then Effie, half crying for very joy, joins us, and says she is so happy; which she proves directly after, by engaging vigorously in the pleasant hand-shaking. We all ask questions, and give answers in a breath, and present a triangle of involuntary motion, not at all singular in appearance to ourselves, but presenting doubtless an eccentric spectacle to anybody else, especially to the short stout young man, who happens to call in incidentally, and who, as he opens the door unexpectedly, and finding the opportunity not favorable to a quartette, disappears very suddenly indeed.

Cyclopædia looks significantly at Effie, but not at me, for he possesses feelings too acute to make light of the heart's best impulses: so the short stout young man is not spoken of, but is respected. Even I am compelled to respect him, for is not his offence, in my eyes, that which has brought me my chief happiness, a love of Effie? But then I won't say, there's the difference.

Before we sit down, Effie's mother comes in, all mottled with the cold, but fresh and healthy from the keen frosty air, and after thoroughly warming herself by the stove, joins with us in hoping that all is over, and that old friends may once more be old friends, so to continue. Then, leaving the room for a few minutes, she returns softly with a happy smile on her pleasant good face, and a detachment of curious small glasses, guarding a welcome bottle of her nonpareil cordial, only brought out on great occasions. And is this not one? she thinks. The cordial is discussed and praised, as it deserves to be; and Effie insinuates, slyly, that she has been learning to make it, which of course incites a great deal of merriment about her apprenticeship to housekeeping. Thus we laugh and jest about others, as well as ourselves, and sit there, a very merry group, all the morning.

Thus, I am engaged! Everything conspires to whisper assurances of good fortune to my hopes. When I shall be married, having received the consent of her mother, or when Effie expects to be taken home to the little palace we are continually furnishing and peopling with our two expectant little selves, I know not. Whenever I am ready, Effie says. But this I know, that, through all my waking and dreaming moments; in my visitations of despondency, for I have these too; in my moments of sanguine expectation, I feel the spirit of Effie with me. It entwines round my heart as a protecting angel might will it so, and urge me on to increased exertion for her sake. It comes upon me most strongly as I lay down upon my bed at night stillness. Its influence works there upon my soul with its unallied holiness; and, as I sink deep into the pillow before sleep steals over me with its heavy pressings, I believe that I have obeyed the mandate of the God-head, in assuming the responsibility which every man should; and I murmur with her name a prayer, that I may to the end of my life act honorably up to my good resolves.

THE PIONEER MOTHERS OF THE WEST.

BY MRS. E. F. ELLET.

CATHARINE SEVIER.*

THE first advances of the English into the great valley of the Mississippi were across rugged mountains and through unbroken wilds, few or none going by the way of the Lakes or the Gulf till the present century. Pioneer parties came from Virginia and North Carolina at irregular intervals from 1565 to 1769, forming "settlements," "camps," and "stations," in what is now East Tennessee. Some of the earliest emigrants were from Raleigh and Salisbury, in North Carolina, and settled first upon the Watauga River. In one of these parties from the Yadkin River came Samuel Sherrill, with his family, consisting of several sons and two daughters. One of these daughters, Susan, married Col. Taylor, a gentleman of considerable distinction; the other, Catharine, became the second wife of Gen. Sevier, and is the subject of this memoir. Mr. Sherrill's residence was finally upon the Nola Chucka, and known as the Daisy Fields. He was a tiller of the soil, a hard-working man, and "well to do in the world" for an emigrant of that day; but he was also skilled in the use of the rifle, so that it could be said, "Sherrill can make as much out of the ground and out of the woods as any other man. He has a hand and eye to his work; a hand, an eye, and an ear for the Indian and the game."

Buffalo, deer, and wild turkeys came around the tents and cabins of those "first settlers." A providence was in this that some of them recognized with thankfulness. These settlements encroached upon the rights and hunting-grounds of the natives; and although some had been established and permitted to remain quite undisturbed for several years, yet when Capt. James Robertson arrived from Virginia, in 1772, with a large party of emigrants, and selected lands on the Watauga, he endeavored to secure an occupation with the approbation of the Indians; therefore he effected a "lease" from the Cherokees of all the lands on the river and its tributaries for eight years.

Jacob Brown, with his family and friends, arrived from North Carolina about the same time with the Sherrills, and these two families became connected by intermarriages with the Seviars, and ever remained faithful to each other through all the hostile and civil commotions of subsequent years.

The family of Seviars came among the very earliest emigrants from Virginia, and aided in the erection of the first fort on the Watauga.*

With few exceptions, these emigrants had in view the acquisition of rich land for cultivation and inheritance. Some, indeed, were there, or came, who were absconding debtors or refugees from justice, and from this class were the Tories of North Carolina mostly enlisted.

The spirit of the hunter and pioneer cannot well content itself in permanent location, especially when the crack of a neighbor's rifle, or the blast of his hunting-horn, may be heard by his quick ear; therefore did these advanced guards often change their homes when others crowded them at miles distance.

It must be remembered that these advances into the wilderness could only be made by degrees, step by step, through years of tedious waiting and toilsome preparation. And thus, though they had a "lease" from the Indians, a foothold in the soil, stations of defence, and evidently had taken a bond of fate, assuring them in the prospect of rich in-

* The following memoir of the wife of one of the most distinguished among the pioneers of the West, was written by A. W. Putnam, Esq., of Nashville, at the request of Mrs. Ellet, for another volume of "Women of the American Revolution." Mr. Putnam was personally acquainted with Mrs. Sevier, and has received additional information by letters from her children and acquaintances, and from other authentic sources. The sketch was read, previously to publication, before the Historical Society of Tennessee, and received with high approbation.

* Valentine Xavier (the original family name), the father of John Sevier, was a descendant from an ancient family in France, but born in London, England; emigrated to America; settled on the Shenandoah, Va.; thence to Watauga, N. C.; and finally settled on the Nola Chucka, at Plum Grove.

heritances for their children, they could not all abide while the great West and greater Future invited onward.

Richer lands, larger herds of buffaloes, more deer, and withal as many Indians were in the distance, upon the Cumberland and Kentucky Rivers. The emigrants advanced, and they "took no steps backwards." In a few years they were found organizing "provisional governments" upon the "dark and bloody ground" of Kentucky, and at the Bluffs, the site of the beautiful capital of Tennessee. And these Watauga and Nola Chucka pioneers are the leading spirits throughout.

In the first Cherokee war of 1776, the early settlements were in great danger of being destroyed. The prowling savages picked off the emigrants in detail, and, though somewhat successful in these aims, they resolved to attack the settlements and stations at different points on the same day—in June, 1776. But they were so defeated in the battles of Long Island, and at the Island Flats, on the Holston, and in their attack and siege of the Watauga Fort, that a happy change was wrought, and hopes of quiet were encouraged.

The attack on the latter station was conducted by an experienced Indian chief, Old Abraham, of the Chilhowee Mountain region. This was a fierce attack, but the fort fortunately held within it two of the most resolute men who have ever touched the soil of Tennessee, and to whom East and Middle Tennessee were subsequently more indebted than to any other men who have ever lived—James Robertson and John Sevier—they having then no higher titles than captains. Some thirty men were under their command or direction.

The approach of the Indians had been stealthy, and the first alarm was given by the flight and screams of some females, who were closely pursued by the Indians in large force. One of the women was killed, and one or two captured. In this party of females was Miss Catharine Sherrill, daughter of Mr. Saml. Sherrill, who had moved into the fort only on the day previous.

Miss Sherrill was already somewhat distinguished for nerve, action, and fleetness. Although at other times she proved herself to "know no fear," and could remain unmoved when danger threatened, yet on this occasion she admits that she did run, and "run her best."

She was very tall and erect, and her whole appearance such as to attract the especial notice and pursuit of the Indians; and as they intercepted the direct path to the gate of the fort, she made a circuit to reach its enclosures on another side, resolved, as she said, "to scale the walls or palisades." In this effort, some person within the defences attempted to aid, but his foot slipped, or the object on which he was standing gave way, and both fell to the ground on opposite sides of the enclosure. The savages were coming with all speed, and firing and shooting arrows repeatedly. Indeed, she said, "the bullets and arrows came like hail. It was now—leap the wall or die! for I would not live a captive." She recovered from the fall, and in a moment was over and within the defences, and "by the side of one in uniform."

This was none other than Capt. John Sevier, and the first time she ever saw him. This was the beginning of an acquaintance destined in a few years to ripen into a happy union, and to endure in this life for near forty years. "The way she run and jumped on that occasion was often the subject of remark, commendation, and laughter."

In after life, she looked upon this introduction, and the manner of it, as a providential indication of their adaptation to each other—that they were destined to be of mutual help in future dangers, and to overcome obstacles in time to come. And she always deemed herself safe when by his side. Many a time did she say: "I could gladly undergo that peril and effort again to fall into his arms, and feel so out of danger. But then," she would add, "it was all of God's good providence."

Capt. Sevier was then a married man, his wife and younger children not having yet arrived from Virginia.

In 1777, Capt. Sevier received a commission from the State of North Carolina, and was thus decidedly enlisted in the cause of American independence; and, not long after this, he was honored with the commission of colonel, bearing the signature of George Washington.

In 1779, his wife died, leaving him ten children. Several of the eldest were sons, who had come with their father to gain and improve a home in the wilderness. They were trained to arms and to labor. He had selected land on Watauga and Nola Chucka, his chosen residence being on the latter stream, and for many years known as Plum Grove. His first wife's name was Susan Hawkins, of Virginia.

In the year 1780, Miss Sherrill and Col. Sevier were married, and she devoted herself earnestly to all the duties of her station, and to meet the exigencies of the times. It may well be supposed that females spun, wove, and made up most of the clothes worn by these backwoods people. Girls were as well skilled in these arts as were the boys in such as more appropriately belonged to their sphere and strength.

Not long after the marriage, Col. Sevier was called to the duty of raising troops to meet the invasion of the interior of North Carolina, under Tarleton, Ferguson, and other British officers. Preparations were hastily made, and the various forces assembled which fought the important battle of King's Mountain. Col. Sevier had three sons and one brother in that engagement. This "favorite brother, Joseph, was killed, and one son wounded." These sons were then between the ages of sixteen and twenty-one. Boys were early taught to use the rifle with skill. This was the formidable weapon in pursuit of game, and in all the Indian wars.

It was always a source of much gratification to Mrs. Sevier, and one of which she fondly boasted, that "among the first work she did after her marriage, was to make the clothes which her husband and three sons wore the day they were in the memorable and important battle of King's Mountain." And she would say: "Had his ten children been sons, and large enough to have served in that expedition, I could have fitted them out."*

In the course of years, Mrs. Sevier became the mother of eight children, three sons and five daughters; and thus Gen. Sevier was the father of eighteen children, all of whom maintained good characters, were "given to hospitality," lived comfortably and usefully, although none of them acquired great wealth.

Mrs. Sevier was often left alone to manage domestic affairs, not only within doors, but without.

The life of Col. Sevier was one of incessant action, adventure, and contest. The calls of his fellow-citizens, and the necessities of the times, withdrew him frequently from home. The history of the Indian wars of East Tennessee, of the settlement of the country, and of the organization of the State Government, is the record of the deeds of his life. No commander was more frequently engaged in conflicts with the Indians with equal success and such small loss of his men. And yet it is a notable fact that he enjoyed, to a remarkable extent, the respect of the tribes and chiefs with whom he contended. It is a known historical fact that he had taken to his own home, on the Chucca, a number of Indian prisoners, where they were treated with so much kindness by his wife and family that several of them remained for years, although they performed very little work, and this wholly at their option. The influence of Mrs. Sevier was intentionally and happily exerted upon these captives, that it might tell, as it did, upon their friends within "the nation;" and the family, no doubt, enjoyed more protection than otherwise they could have expected.

Col. Sevier acquired a sobriquet among the Indians, which was some evidence of their familiarity with and attachment to him, and probably of advantage. As long as he lived they called him "Chucca Jack." They had one for Mrs. Sevier also, which is now not remembered.

The Tories were the worst enemies, and perpetrated more damage to Col. Sevier's property than did ever the Indians; and from them Mrs. Sevier had repeatedly to hide most of her small stock of household articles. She usually remained at the farm, and never would consent to be shut up in a blockhouse, always saying—

"The wife of John Sevier Knows no fear."

"I neither skulk from duty nor from danger."

And we believe this was emphatically true. We have seen her in advanced age—tall in stature, erect in person, stately in walk, with small, piercing, blue eyes, raven locks, a Roman nose, and firmness unmistakable in her mouth and every feature.

She was able to teach her children in the exercises conducive to health and usefulness, to nerve, and to action. Few could outrun her, or leap to greater distance, and none could, with equal grace and facility, placing the hand upon the mane of a spirited horse, and standing by his side, seat herself upon his back or in the saddle. She had the appearance and used the language of independence, haughtiness, and authority, and she never entirely laid these aside. Yet was not her pride offensive, nor her words or demeanor intended heedlessly to wound.

It could be said of her, without any question, that she "reverenced her husband," and she instilled the same Scriptural sentiment into the minds of his children. The very high respect and deference which one of her dignified appearance ever paid to him, no doubt had a favorable influence upon others; for, though he was a man of remarkable elegance of person, air, and address, and of popular attraction, yet it must be confessed that she contributed much to all these traits, and to his usefulness and zeal in public service. She relieved him of his cares at home, and applauded his devotion to the service of the people.

Her reply to those who urged her "to fort," or to take protection in one of the stations, was, "I would as soon die by the tomahawk and scalping-knife as by famine! I put my trust in that power which rules the armies of Heaven, and among men on the earth. I know my husband has an eye and an arm for the Indians and the Tories who would harm us, and though he is gone often, and for weeks at a time, he comes home when I least expect him, but always covered with laurels. * * If God protects him whom duty calls into danger, so will He those who trust in Him and stand at their post. * * Who would stay out if his family forted?"

This was the spirit of the heroine—this was the spirit of Catharine Sevier. Neither she nor her husband seemed to think there could be danger or loss when they could encourage or aid others to daring, and to duty, and to usefulness.

Col. Sevier at one time advised her to go into the fort, but yielded to her respectful remonstrance.

"At one time the Tories came to her house and demanded her husband's whereabouts, and finally avowed their intention was to hang him on the highest tree in front of his house; but that if she would tell them where he was, she and her children should be safe." Of course she refused to give them the information.

One man drew a pistol and threatened to blow

* The private orderly, or memorandum-book of Col. De Poister, on whom the command devolved after Ferguson was killed on King's Mountain, and who ordered the surrender, was, with other papers, handed to Col. Sevier. This book was presented to the writer by Mrs. Gen. Sevier and her son, G. W. S., after the writer's marriage into the family.

out her brains if she did not tell, or, at least, give up all the money she had.

"Shoot! shoot!" was her answer. "I am not afraid to die! But, remember, while there is a Sevier on the earth, my blood will not be unavenged!"

He dared not—he did not shoot. The leader of the gang told the man to put up his pistol, saying, "such a woman is too brave to die."

She knew some of the party, and that they were noted thieves and Tories.

"At another time they came to her smokehouse to carry off meat. She took down the gun, which her husband always left with her in good order, and told them: 'The first one who takes down a piece of meat is a dead man!'"

They could not mistake her resolution. Her tone, manner, and appearance avowed clearly enough that she uttered no vain warning; that she "knew her rights and dared maintain them." They left without taking anything.

Some of their negroes were stolen and never all recovered, being taken into the Indian nation by the Tories, and thence to Savannah or Charleston while in possession of the British. There was a mortal enmity between some of the active Tories and the Seviers, resulting in the hanging of some of the former on two occasions.

It fell to the lot of Mrs. Sevier to do acts of hospitality and kindness to some of this set and their descendants many years after the war. And these kindnesses she performed, although she acknowledged that she felt at the same time the spirit of revenge ranking in her bosom. "Some of them," she would say, "and, perhaps, all their children, may make worthy people and good citizens if they are not kept continually ashamed and mortified by being reminded of their bad conduct or of their Tory origin."

The sick and wounded soldier ever found a welcome and nursing at the home of Sevier. The supplies for many of his Indian expeditions were from his own private means. His wife, sons, and servants were remarkably successful in raising corn and hogs, and cheerfully were these given to the furtherance of the great objects in hand.*

All her life long was Mrs. Sevier distinguished for her kindness and liberality to the poor. Towards children she was gentle, though she had an appearance and manner which prevented them from giving that annoyance they are apt to do to the aged.

* When the paper currency of North Carolina was so depreciated that a $100 bill would rarely buy "a pone of corn-bread and slice of ham," and many persons would not take it at all in exchange for provisions or other property, the soldier could always purchase an ample supply at a fair estimate at Plum Grove, and thus by sales of lands, personal property, and, perhaps, in satisfaction for his military and public services, did the "old Continental currency" accumulate in the desk of Gen. Sevier to a sum of between $200,000 and $300,000, which, with his papers, were left in the hands of his son, the late Col. G. W. S., of Tenn.

It was usual with her to keep a supply of maple-sugar and cinnamon-bark in her spice-box, from which she would gratify them, and then wave them kindly away. This motion of her hand was expressive, and easily understood.

In the conflict of authorities and the civil and personal contests which grew out of the establishment of the "State of Franklin," of which Gen. Sevier was elected Governor, his wife added to his and her own favorable reputation.

His house became the place of general resort. It was proclaimed open and free to all the friends of the rights of self-defence and independence, and the impressive dignity and noble bearing of Mrs. Sevier made a deep and lasting impression upon all who resorted to that home for counsel, aid, or hospitality. And when a returning sense of justice, and the revulsion of public sentiment and power of popular gratitude, produced a repeal of the "odious acts of exclusion" of North Carolina, placing him "in lone conspicuity," and the people called him, by unanimous voice, again, and again, and yet again, to preside as Governor of Tennessee, and to a seat in the Senate of the United States, then did her great heart swell with thankfulness to God and her fellow-citizens. Then did she acknowledge that her husband had not endured peril, toil, and sacrifice in vain, though far short of the reward to which she thought him justly entitled. And we doubt not posterity will coincide in this judgment.

When the Governor of the State of Franklin was seized and spirited away into the interior of North Carolina by the enemies of the "new State," Mrs. Sevier, with the promptness, energy, and daring which qualify for any occasion of utmost moment, aroused his friends, and would have gone, as a fearless leader, "to conquer or to die." But seeing that her relatives, his relatives, and sons and friends were resolved upon his release and restoration, she little doubted his speedy return, and she was not disappointed.*

During the twelve years in which he officiated as Governor of Tennessee, his wife made his home delightful to him and his children. It was the rest of the weary, the asylum of the afflicted, well known as "the hospitable mansion of the first Governor, the people's favorite."

The education of Mrs. Sevier, in respect of literature and the embellishments of dress and music, was such as she attained chiefly from reading the Bible, hearing the wild birds sing, and the Indian's pow-wow. "I picked up a good deal from an observation of men and their acts—for that was a business with us in the early settlements—and we examined the works of Nature to some advantage; but as to school education, we had precious little of that except at our mothers' knees."

* The circumstances which led to the organization of the State of Franklin were like those which at this day produced the hasty establishment of California necessity, self-defence, self-protection.

She embraced the religious sentiments of the Presbyterians, and her life throughout was exemplary and useful. In this faith she lived and died.

A favorite expression of hers was: "I always trust in Providence." And she taught her children that "trust in God, with a pure heart, is to be rich enough; if you are lazy, your blood will stagnate in your veins, and your trust die."

She would never be idle. Knitting often engaged her fingers, while her mind and tongue were occupied in thought and conversation. She always wore at her side a bunch of very bright keys.

After the death of Gov. Sevier on the Tallapoosa, in 1815, where he had gone to cement peace and establish the boundary with the Creek Indians, Mrs. Sevier removed to Overton County, in Middle Tennessee, where most of her children resided. She selected a most romantic and secluded spot for her own retired residence. It was upon a high bench, or spur of one of the mountains of that county, a few miles from Obeds River, with higher mountains on either side. There were some ten or fifteen acres of tillable land, and a bold never-failing spring issuing from near the surface of the level tract of land, which cast its pure cold waters down the side of the mountain hundreds of feet into the narrow valley. In a dense wood near that spring, and miles distant from any other habitation, did her sons erect her log-cabins for bedroom, dining-room, and kitchen, and others for stable and crib. She resided for years at The Dale, with the General's aged body-servant, Toby (who had accompanied him in all his Indian campaigns), his wife, Rachel, and a favorite female servant and boy. Seldom did she come down from her eyrie in the mountain.

The aged eagle had lost her mate. She made her nest among the lofty oaks upon the mountain heights, where she breathed the air and drank the water untainted and undisturbed, fresh and pure, and nearest to the heavens.

We have visited her in that chosen spot. "The Governor's Widow" could never be looked upon as an ordinary country-woman. Whoever saw her could not be satisfied with a single glance—he must look again. And if she stood erect, and her penetrating eye caught the beholder's, he judged at once there was in that mind a consciousness of worth and an acquaintance with notable events. He would wish to converse with her.

She used language of much expressiveness and point. She never forgot that she was the widow of Gov. and Gen. Sevier; that he had given forty years of his life to the service of his country, and in the most arduous and perilous exposure, contributing from his own means far more than he ever received from the public treasury; and yet he never reproached that country for injustice, neither would she murmur nor repine.

At times she was disposed to sociable cheerfulness and humor, as one in youthful days, and then would she relate interesting anecdotes and incidents of the early settlement of the country, of manners and habits of the people, of the "barefoot and moccason dance" and "spice-wood tea-parties."

Her woman's pride, or some other feminine feeling, induced her to preserve with the utmost care an "imported or bought carpet," of about twelve by fifteen feet in size, which had been presented to her as the "first Governor's wife," and as the first article of the kind ever laid upon a "punchoon," or split-log floor west of the Alleghany Mountains. Whenever she expected company upon her own invitation, or persons of character to pay their respects to her, the Scotch carpet was sure to be spread out, about the size of a modern bedquilt. But, as soon as company departed, the ever-present and faithful servants, Suzy and Jeff, incontinently commenced dusting and folding, and it was soon again boxed up.

Three times were we permitted the honorable privilege of placing our well-cleaned boots upon this dear relic from the household of the first Governor of Tennessee, and of admiring the pair of ancient and decrepit branch-candlesticks as they stood on the board over the fireplace.

The bucket of cool water was ever on the shelf at the batten-door, which stood wide open, swung back upon its wooden hinges; and there hung the sweet water-gourd; and from very love of everything around, we repeatedly helped ourselves. The floors, the doors, the chairs, the dishes on the shelves—yea, everything seemed to have been scoured. There was a lovely cleanness and order, and, we believe, "godliness with contentment."

She was remarkably neat in her person, tidy, and particular, and uniform in her dress, which might be called half-mourning—a white cap with black trimmings. She had a hearth-rug, the accompaniment of the favorite carpet, which was usually laid before the fireplace in her own room, and there she commonly was seated, erect as a statue—no stooping of the figure, as is so often acquired by indolence and careless habit, or from infirm old age—but with her feet placed upon her rug, her work-stand near her side, the Bible ever thereon or in her lap, the Governor's hat upon the wall—such were the striking features of that mountain hermitage.

There was resignation and good cheer—there was hospitality and worth in that plain cottage; and had not the prospect of better fortune, and attachment to children married and settled at a distance, induced her own sons to remove from her vicinity, she ought never to have been urged to come down from that "lodge in the wilderness." But her last son having resolved to remove to Alabama, she consented to go with him and pass her few remaining days in his family.

She departed this life on the 2d October, 1836, at Russellville, in the State of Alabama, aged about eighty-two.

ELLA MORTON; OR, THE MAIDEN'S FIRST SORROW.

BY VILLA C——.

"LEAVE me, Fannie, leave me for a while; I would fain be alone at this hour," and, as the door closed after the footsteps of her gentle friend, Ella turned towards the window, and her pale face betrayed that her soul was struggling with an emotion almost too deep for utterance. The evening was beautiful, but she seemed unconscious of it; the purling of a little rivulet fell gently on the ear, but she listened not to the soothing sound; and, although her eyes were turned upward, she seemed not to note the myriads of stars that came forth from their distant homes to look down on the dwellers of earth. Her eyes were dimmed with tears, and ere long words of agony burst from her lips. "Oh! mother, come from your heavenly home, or take me thither with you; earth has no charms for your child since you have gone. Alone I must struggle on through life against words of envy, and looks of unkindness, perchance of scorn; few will think of the orphan girl kindly, many may seek to scatter thorns in my path; and when my spirit is weary and sad, there will be no mother's bosom on which to rest my drooping head, no mother's voice to speak words of consolation and balm to my wounded soul, and no mother's heart to pour forth its deepest, its best, its unfailing love. Oh! be my guardian spirit, hover around my every path, guide me in the way your steps trod heavenward; in sickness, in sorrow, still watch over your suffering, stricken child; and, if it may be thus granted, be my attendant to your own bright home. Father in Heaven, take me, oh! take me early, and let the flowers of spring bloom above my grave!" She threw herself on the couch, and abandoned herself to uncontrolled emotion.

"Ella, dear Ella, will you not rouse yourself, and cease thus madly, wickedly to repine against the will of your Creator?" murmured a soft voice in her ear.

For a moment she raised her face, on which was written anguish too deep for utterance; but again she buried it in the cushions with only a moan of intense agony.

"Ella, your bereavement is indeed most severe, and I need not assure you of my deepest sympathy; but remember, my friend, that except ——"

"Oh! Fannie, Fannie, you have never lost a mother," interrupted Ella, vehemently, "and you do not, you cannot know the utter loneliness that pervades my spirit. For years has my existence been bound up in hers, for years have I watched her every look, and listened intently to the lowest tones of her voice. I have seen her fading away, becoming too lovely for earth, and now, now she is gone. There are none to love me now, none to care for me more; and oh! I would that I were resting beside her!"

"Are there none to care for you?" was the reproachful reply.

"Yes, you will not forsake me, my own kind Fannie; and may you be richly rewarded for all your kindness, your unwearied affection! and Heaven grant that you may long, long be spared the desolation, the woe of this hour!"

"Holy Father, bless her!" were the murmured words as Fannie gently glided from the room.

It was but too true—Ella Morton was indeed an orphan, and an orphan with no near ties to bind her to earth. Her father had died when her infantile lips could but just lisped his name, and her memory retained no traces of the form she had so earnestly yearned to see. In the prime of his days he had departed, far from home and kindred; stranger hands closed his eyes, strangers had consigned him to his last resting-place, and the beings he loved so dearly were denied the sad consolation of weeping over his tomb.

Alfred Morton had had but one sister, and to her he had clung from his earliest infancy. A gentle, lovely being was she, one of those who seem created to diffuse light and joy wherever they tread, and to scatter sunshine over the darkest, gloomiest days. Five years his senior, she had rejoiced when her baby brother was placed on her knee, and she laughed gleefully when she could call up the smile on his beaming face, or hear the merry shout of his infant voice. Her hand had guided his first tottering steps, and on him she bestowed more than a sister's love. Years passed away, and as the laughing babe changed into a thoughtless boy, he knew that her eyes were ever bent on him, and that in her ear he might pour forth his childish sorrows and meet with a ready sympathy. In every sport she was his chosen companion, if she were near; he sought for no greater happiness. An epidemic that swept the land, carrying millions to their graves, cast its darkening shadow over the home of the Mortons, and, in a few brief hours, father and mother were laid in the same tomb, while Helen and Alfred stood by that tomb, sorrowing orphans. The little boy was too young to understand his bereavement; he only knew that the parents he had loved were gone, and he turned with a still deeper affection to his sister. It was then that the true worth of her character shone forth; and, though but a child in years, she became, from that day, a woman in spirit. For her brother she lived; she taught him to look to the skies, and, in tones of soliness, bade him remember that his mother was there, and that there too he should go if he loved his Saviour here.

Boyhood expanded into youth, youth into early manhood, and still that sister was ever by his side. Was he sad?—her smile would cheer him; was he discouraged?—her voice would whisper hope; was he wayward and erring?—her reproving countenance, her beseeching words would gently win him back to truth and rectitude. He entered the world with a firm purpose and a steady eye; manfully he struggled, and gloriously he won. His own patrimony would have richly maintained him, but he burned to distinguish himself, and to have his name shine brightly in the annals of his country. One object was ever before him—it was his sister's mild face; and, that she might have reason to glory in her brother, he made every exertion, and crowned each with success. At twenty-four, no more brilliant talents were to be found than those possessed by Alfred Morton. His eloquence held thousands spell-bound, and fame even then placed her brightest laurels on his brow.

A few months passed away, and he pressed his sister closely to his heart in a parting embrace. She whose existence was almost identified with his own was about to leave him; she, who had been his constant companion, his friend, his counselor, whose affection had been the sunshine of his life, was on the eve of departure for other lands. A few weeks before, she had been united to one whose self-sacrificing, devoted spirit was equal to her own, and together they were going to tell of a Saviour's love on Turkey's soil; to labor, perhaps suffer, for the truth; to supplant the Crescent, and place in its stead the "Cross of the Crucified."

"Sister," were his last words, "sister, farewell; but for you I might have been the veriest wretch on earth; what I owe you I can never repay; your reward is laid up in heaven. You go on a high and holy mission—may angels guard your steps whithersoever they turn, and your Father in whom you trust keep you from all ill! Your absence will leave a void in my heart that none else can fill; but I would not detain you even for a moment. Heaven bless you, my beloved sister! Farewell."

With an aching heart Alfred Morton watched the vessel that bore Helen and her husband far away, and then returned to his residence, for home it no longer seemed—feeling as if there was now no object for which to live. But he told his sister, truly, he would not have detained her, for he knew that hers was a nobler course, and hers a higher destiny than his own.

Months passed on, and those that saw him in the crowded throng, or listened to his soul-stirring words, would not have imagined that there was sorrow in his heart. He was courted and admired; everywhere the distinguished orator was received with applause; and many there were who could have cherished a deeper feeling than mere admiration for him whose fame had spread far and wide. But, one vision of feminine loveliness had been his, which he deemed could never be replaced, and he could not, he dare not bind himself by ties which might be repugnant to himself, and cause him flagrantly to violate the laws of his Maker.

Come with me, you that like to see strange things, to yonder chapel, and pause for a moment. Rumor with her busy tongue has been flying from house to house, and though the hour is early, many are assembled to witness what would seem to be an unlooked-for event. Look around you, and what fixes your attention? A bridal train is passing up the aisle, and look closely, for, methinks that form, that bearing, is one that you should know. They stand beside the altar, and now the vows of Alfred Morton and Margaret Stanley are plighted, and they turn to leave the church. Watch carefully now for a glimpse of the bride, for the chosen of him so widely renowned should be one with whom few could compete. Are you disappointed? Gaze once more, then; I know that beauty of form and feature is not hers, I know that the complexion is not one of fairest hue, nor are those eyes dazzling in their brilliance; but there is a beauty there that shall endure when these have passed away. There is intellect on that brow, there is soul in that eye, and there is an expression resting on that face that arrogant beauties might vainly strive to possess. Enclosed in that form is a gentle, a "meek and quiet" spirit, and within that bosom beats a heart that will not grow cold when the storms of life dash harshly and pitilessly on the objects of its present regard.

Margaret Stanley was not beautiful; to some, a mere acquaintance would not discover her noble soul; but there was that within her that fitted her to be the life companion of Alfred Morton. She realized the dream that he had formed, and though some envious ones scornfully passed her by, those that were honored with the friendship of Mrs. Morton wondered no more at her husband's choice. She was the light of his home; and as, in the days of his boyhood, he ever found his sister's ear open to his joys or sorrows, so now, in his maturer years, he turned his footsteps towards his own hearth, and if weary and desponding, ever found an influence that would brighten everything. His home was a blessed place, and within its hallowed precincts the busy world was forgotten.

Two years passed away, and they were no longer alone by their fireside, for an infant's cheerful voice called forth answering music in their hearts, and drew them more closely to earth. On Helen, or Ella as they always called her, every care was lavished; for her no sacrifice was too great; and her gleesome spirit would be infused into their own. Daily they watched her with ever-increasing delight, and as they saw her merry gambols, or listened to her infant prattle, they almost forgot that any cloud could overshadow the horizon of their lives. Three years more passed away, and still the full sunshine of joy lit their home and gladdened their hearts. But joy may not last forever; for a time it is given to us, to make us turn with a truer love and a holier trust towards our heavenly home; but, when earthly objects cause us to lose sight of that home, the barriers we have raised must be broken down, and our souls be purified, though it be through suffering.

It was with a burdened heart and a saddened eye that Mr. Morton read to his wife a letter that had just reached him, bearing the mournful intelligence of his cherished sister's rapid decline, and that he communicated to her his design of instantly going to her, although it might be but to see her die. "You never saw my sister," were his words; "but you know her lovely character, you know her unwearied care for me, and if I could, ought I to leave her to die in a distant land almost alone? Should not duty, as well as love, prompt me to go to her? and if her spirit must be severed from earth, should not I be there to catch the last glance of her eyes, that never were bent on me but with the tenderest devotion? To part from you, my wife, and my precious child, will be a struggle severe indeed; but Heaven will watch over you, and, if it be our Father's will, we shall be rejoined yet again on earth; if it be not so, we will still look to Him with unwavering trust, for we know that 'he will do all things well.'"

No word was spoken in opposition, and in two days Alfred Morton was on the bosom of the ocean, hastening to the bedside of his dying sister.

Six months had fled since Alfred Morton left his home in the full pride of manhood; and by the hearth of that once cheerful spot, sat his desolate widow, and his fatherless child. Little Ella could not understand why her "papa would come back no more," nor why her dear mamma looked so sad, and sighed so deeply when she pressed her darling to her bosom. And her mother, as she watched her innocent child, murmured a prayer that for her sake she might still live. But for her, she would gladly have laid her head low in the grave; but when her child would gently climb on her knee, pass its little hands over her pale face, and look sad to see her so mournful, she reproached herself for thus yielding to her regrets, and devoted herself more unwearingly to her beloved little one. Time tarried not; and as day after day Ella grew more lovely, more beautiful, as her intellect expanded, and her mind showed more of its strength and power, so the shadow gradually departed from the mother's brow, and a peace which is not of this world shed its light over her countenance. To Ella, her mother was all in all. Had sickness pale her cheek? Ella's station was by her bedside, Ella's hand administered medicine and nourishment, Ella's voice gently lulled her to repose, and Ella's was the first eye to brighten when health returned.

One being alone beside her mother obtained any share of Ella's affection. Fannie Enfield was the daughter of one of Mrs. Morton's early friends, and the two girls were too much thrown together not to become mutually attached. A sister had never been given to Fannie, and she welcomed Ella with all a sister's affection. Through their childhood they had been chosen companions, and as years flew by, their early friendship became still more firmly cemented.

But Ella's eye grew troubled, and her face wore an anxious expression, for her mother's loved form grew thin, and her face was very pale, save where the fever flush dwelt brightly in her cheek; her eye assumed a lustre too brilliant to last, and medical skill proved unavailing. With the agony that only those know who have lost all they loved save one, and who see the frail cords that held that one back to life about to be severed, Ella watched her mother's fading form, hoping that the dawn of each day would bring health and vigor to her whose existence was well nigh ended. Wildly, madly she prayed that yet a little while might be added to her life; but it was only the wild cry of despair. No faith, no love mingled with that petition, and when with each new hour hope grew fainter, no resignation marked her sorrow, no response of "Thy will be done!" arose from her heart.

Mrs. Morton saw this but too clearly, and earnestly she sought to lead Ella to look for guidance and consolation from Him whose ear is ever open to the cry of the sorrowing. Gently she chid her for thus yielding to her grief, and bade her meet her in the bright spirit-land, to whose worshippers she should soon be joined. Her last words were to her dearly beloved daughter, her last look was fixed on her, and as a smile of angelic sweetness rested on her face, and a prayer trembled on her lips, her spirit fled to add another to the choral band that encircles the throne of the Eternal.

For hours Ella Morton sat by the bedside of her departed mother, searching for one indication that life still remained; but vainly she lingered, for the living principle that had existed in that marble form had passed away, no more to feanimate it, until "earth and sea give up their dead."

There is a limit to physical and mental endurance, and when Fannie Enfield entered the room, Ella had fallen insensible by her mother's side. With more than a sister's tenderness, Fannie watched over her friend, and when animation returned to that apparently lifeless body, it was Fannie's glad eye that beamed hopefully on the sufferer. For a single moment Ella seemed unconscious of all she had suffered, but the full tide of agony quickly rushed over her, and despairingly she prayed to die. It was well for Ella that she had such a friend; it was well that there was a Fannie to speak words of hope, and breathe of purer skies than those that overcanopy our world; else she might have turned away from the call of the heavenly messenger, and the chastisement that was sent in mercy might have steeled her heart and weighed her down to death.

A year has passed since the night we first saw Ella, on the evening of her mother's funeral, and in the same room a youthful form is bending in prayer, and a holy radiance overspreads that fair young face

It is Ella; but how changed! Yes, she had sought for happiness where none ever sought and were refused. Sorrow has accomplished its sacred mission, and though a more subdued expression rests on her face than is common to those who have lost none of the objects on which their affections have been placed, though her thoughts turn less to the things of this world, and are fixed more constantly on those that shall not pass away, yet she is none the less loved by those who cluster around her, and listen unwearingly to every accent of her voice.

To shed joy around her is her unceasing aim; to make more easy the path of those who but for her might live uncared for, and die unheeded; to pour balm into the bleeding hearts of those from whom the busy world turn carelessly away, these are the purposes for which she exists. Prayers and blessings follow her from many mouths, and in her own heart there is diffused a happiness and peace which those who bow before the shrine of Mammon would vainly seek.

Has my tale been a sad one, gentle reader?—Remember that there are dark pages as well as those that are light in life's history; and, if you have never known in your own case the sorrow that the loss of one you devotedly loved has occasioned; if a mother's eye is resting fondly on you as you peruse these pages, and no vacant chair stands by your hearth, pour forth your richest thanks that thus it is. But if a dark cloud should overspread your dwelling, and your heart be desolate and sad because the Angel of Death has come thither, then raise your thoughts above the things that are within the power of the Destroyer, bow meekly to the will of your God, and you shall then know that to the darkest and most cheerless night may succeed a bright and glorious morning, and you shall feel

“—that by the lights and shades through which your pathway lies,
By the beauty and the grief alike, you are training for the skies.”

POETRY.

NEW YEAR.

BY ABBY ALLIN.

Up into the sunshine, soul of mine!
I brook no darkness here;
The sun is shining on the hills
In the first day of the year!
The glittering snow is on the pines,
Like frosted cones they rise,
And the earth below, and the sky above,
Are clad in happy guise!

Up, up, my soul! no longer sit,
With folded hands, alone;
The Future opens her arms to thee,
The Past is dead and gone!
The Future, with her luring voice,
Cries, “Hither, hither, sweet!”
The Past, a shadow of the lost,
Is tracking at my feet.

Up, up, my soul! nor glance behind;
Turn not one wistful look;
Leave all the Past to Him who gave,
To Him, again, who took!
Press on, press on, the year of life
Cannot be always May;
Yet the snow-birds sing on the leafless tree,
And why not thou as they?

Up, up, my soul! no longer sit
Inert with fear and dread,
Since Nature's calm is all around,
And the sky shines overhead!
Up, up, and climb the mountain path,
With strong, unfettered will!
And let thy motto ever be,
“Onward and upward” still!

TO A SNOW-BIRD

BY M. E. E.

WELCOME, thou little warbler,
With tuneful notes and sweet!
Thrice welcome, in these dreary days
Of frost, and snow, and sleet!

Chirp on! thou bring'st sweet memories
Of the laughing summer-time,
Of whispering leaves, the warm south wind,
And the streamlet's silver chime!

Where hast thou been, bright wanderer,
Since the winter last was here?
Why cam'st thou not with the summer birds,
When the sky was blue and clear?

Spring brought her buds and blossoms,
And, in every grove and dell,
Those gentle minstrels tuned their notes,
Of happiness to tell.

They ushered in the morning,
They bade the day adieu;
When evening shadows gathered round,
Home to their nests they flew.

Oh, the world was then so beautiful!
The air with music rung!
Why cam'st thou not when its summer gart
Was brightly o'er it flung?

Alas! too soon it faded!
The flowers bent down to die!
And cold, dark clouds, with chilling looks,
Came o'er the autumn sky!

The leaves grew brown and withered,
And fell upon the ground,

And the winds swept through the naked trees
With a lonely, solemn sound !

All fair, bright things departed !
The cold snows came at last,
And wrapt the earth in its winding-sheet,
By the dirge of the wintry blast !

The stream's gay song was silenced,
The glad birds sung no more,
And loneliness was on the hill,
And by the pleasant shore !

Thy sweet voice broke the stillness,
And, with its first glad strain,
All the gentle gifts of the summer hours
Seemed to return again !

'Tis so when shadows darken
The sunshine of the heart,
And the gentle tones of mirth and joy,
Like summer flowers, depart. •

Some sweet hope ever springeth,
Like a bird in the wintry hours,
To brighten the brow with a sunny gleam,
Though dark the storm-cloud lowers.

LATIN POEM.

VITÆ HUMANÆ TEMPORA.

BY WM. ALEXANDER.

MANE veni ; erat Ver,
Atque risi.
Meridiano tempore, Perambulavi,

SEASONS OF LIFE.

A Paraphrase of Wm. Alexander's Latin Poem.

BY E. PENN SMITH.

I CAME in Morning ; it was Spring,
And I smiled.

At Mid-day, I, on eager wing,
Rambled o'er the green to sing,
As bird or child.

It now was Summer, fruitful, bland,
My Soul and Joy walked hand in hand
O'er flowery fields, in merry glee ;
I smiled at Joy, he laughed at me.

Shades of Eve came slowly on,
'Twas Autumn now ;

My joys had vanished one by one,
Grief pressed my brow.

Although my breast was sore distrest,
Soon Night approached to give me rest :
'Twas Winter now, all nature wept ;
I shed no tear, but calmly slept.

INDIVIDUAL AND UNIVERSAL ACTION.

FROM THE GERMAN.

ACTION, action, action, action !
Never tiring, never ceasing,
At each step with new-born power,
Like the mountain stream increasing

Up, thou craven ! up, and doing !
Toil alone can win the road ;
Onward, upward, still pursuing,
On, and leave the rest to God !

It is true, thou art a trifle,
Sport of every passing wave,
That, with one quick plunge, could stifle,
And give thee a wat'ry grave.

Thou canst not one fiat alter
In the heavens or on the earth ;
Could a heavenly being falter
To a thing of mortal birth ?

Well thou mayest cry, in sorrow,
" All my labor is but vain !
What is built to-day, to-morrow
Must be all built o'er again ! "

Know this truth, and cease complaining,
Hope will here revive thy soul—
Thou art but a single atom
• Of a universal whole.

In the cycle of Creation,
Toil not for thyself alone :
In thy brother's thy salvation,
In his ruin, too, thine own.

HALCYON DAYS.*

BY ROBERT G. ALLISON.

THE halcyon days of youth have fled,
And many a joy with them has sped ;
For many a friend sleeps with the dead.
Ah, ne'er shall balmy Spring's return
Revive the ashes in Friendship's urn !
Those halcyon days, when Fancy drew
Her scenes all tinged with Hope's bright hue ;
Memory may oft those days review :
But youth's fresh hopes have with them fled—
Those hopes lie buried with the dead !

* These lines were suggested while reading the following in " Virgil's Georgics " :—

" Non tepidum ad solem pennas in litore pandunt Dilectæ Thetidi Halcyones," &c.

The reader will recollect the portion of mythological history to which Virgil alludes: " Ceyx, King of Trachinia, going to consult the oracle of Apollo, at Claros, was shipwrecked in the Ægean Sea. His wife, Halcyone, seeing his dead body floating near the shore, flung herself upon it in a transport of her passion. Thetis, out of compassion to the lovers, transformed them into the birds called king-fishers; hence Dilectæ Thetidi. It is said the sea is calm a certain number of days about the winter solstice, while these birds of poetry are gently gliding over its surface."

ON THE DEATH OF AN OBSCURE CITIZEN.

BY W. GILMORE SIMMS.

Mix wonder when the planets do go out,
And stars desert their places; when the might
Of the great oak is shattered, and the storm
Sweeps the imperial trophy from the brow
Of him who looked the god in mortal eyes,
And grew so to his own. And yet for thee,
So lowly in life's places, with no power
To lift thee into majesty, no grace
To woo glad eyes in homage to thy walks,
And consecrate thy doings with applause
That cheered to new achievements; with no aim
Of greatness, and but little thirst for life—
Death hath no dignity: and thou hast sunk,
Silent, from out the crowded walks of man,
Into the quiet grave, and art not missed.

But Nature hath her obsequies for all,
And virtue is remembered with her tears,
When Fame itself grows voiceless o'er the great,
And clothes their shrines with ruin. Thou hast made
Some sweet affections blossom at thy grave,
Which have befitting flowers, that take on bloom
Ere Spring hath made escape from Winter cells,
Still pale with cold and terror of pursuit!
Love did not shrink to shelter in thy cot,
Though at the door stood Poverty, and Toil,
Forevermore within, from dawn to dusk,
Found little respite to enjoy the smiles
That warmed his courage to resolve, and made
The burden easy of his daily care.
But, in the very rareness of the joy
Grows its delicious value; and thy bliss,
If lowly in condition, wanting state
In utterance, and significant to thee
Alone, of all around thee, was not less
The wholesome solace of a life that knew
A cottage empire only. In thy home
Sat Peace, content with lowliness, that gave
New freude warmth and gladness to thy hearth,
That wore no gauds of grandeur. Love could share
Thy labors, and could lighten them; and Truth,
That has a beauty separate from the world,
Found thee meet treasures that, within thy heart,
Assured of faith, made all a calm delight,
That never wept for fortune. Thou wast blest,
To the necessity reconciled, that left Thy home secure from Envy, and which brought An adequate beauty to thy homely weeds,
And sweetness to thy threshold; and thy life
Passed on, as passed the long summer day
O'er silent forests, making shade and sun
Equally fruitful of repose and love;
Commencing, in rare union, with a joy
That, if it knows no guashings wild and warm,
Knows not the storms of passion, which but show
The beats of rapture—all the peace denied
That makes the pleasure holy and secure
Thy living and thy dying, both the same,
Safe from the tempest, in the world without Making no stir. Few were they who knew
Thy virtues; few, at thy departure, feel
That something, which was precious to the day,
Hath been despoiled by night. Yet, in thy home,
There hangs a blind, sad vacancy, that looks,

VOL. LXIV.—8

Through eyes of terror, to the lonely heart
Of thy sad widow. If she weeps, her tears
Lack voice, unless to those, her orphan brood,
That hear through a like consciousness of loss,
And echo with a silence like her own.

Ah, Nature hath not one unnoted child!
Some soul still sorrows when the light goes out,
Though feeble, which, in Poverty's low cell,
Shone for the humblest: desolate hearts still shrine
The lineaments of care, when softened thus
By Love; and precious instincts still discern
The little, lowly hiding-place in earth,
Unmarked by any monument, where sleeps
The form of him whose gifts in Poverty
Made Poverty's self a treasure, best of all!

I'M KNEELING AT THY GRAVE, MOTHER.

BY C. T. POOLER.

AIR—"I'm sitting on the stile, Mary."

The following lines were suggested on seeing a sick girl—an only child—a few weeks before her death, kneeling at her mother's grave.

I'm kneeling at thy grave, mother,
Where I have planted flowers,
Which, with dew-drops, nightly weep with me,
Here in my lonely hours.
Forget-me-nots are blooming here,
And the rose perfumes the air;
Willows bend above thy head, mother,
Where thy daughter bows in prayer.

I'm kneeling at thy grave, mother,
As once I knelt by thee,
When early taught by thee to pray,
My head upon thy knee:
Oh, then our home was bright and gay,
When thy voice was heard in song!
Now I sing and weep alone, mother,
And the days are sad and long.

I'm kneeling at thy grave, mother,
Where I have come to pray;
Though the stars of autumn coldly shine
As twilight fades away;
Though winds are sweeping hoarsely by,
Still I love to linger here,
For 'tis lonely at our home, mother,
Since thou 'rt not there to cheer.

Oh, art thou looking down, mother,
Upon thy weeping child?
And now, from the spirit land, canst thou
Not bless thy dying child?
Though I am wasting fast away,
I've no one to weep with me;
For a little while, good night, mother—
Soon I'll come and sleep by thee.

* * * * *
September winds have blown chilling,
The token flowers are gone,
And, beneath the willow bending there,
I mark another stone.
Death, too, hath nipped an angel flower,
And beneath the sod 'tis pressed;
Ceased from sorrow, with her dear mother,
Emma now hath gone to rest.

FASHION IN NEWPORT.

BY PARK BENJAMIN.

[The following lines, now first in print, were introduced by our friend, PARK BENJAMIN, Esq., in a humorous, satirical poem, entitled, "The Age of Gold," which he recently pronounced at the Bellevue Hall, in Newport, before a crowded and fashionable audience.]

On, mighty fine it is to be the slave
Of Fashion! Mighty fine it is to brave
Old Common Sense, that antiquated snob,
Mix in gay crowds and mingle with the mob,
Whom love of show, and love of pleasure, too,
Lead where they can be rather viewed than view!
Where they can run from folly to excess,
Loll all the morning, and with leisure dress;
And then, at dinner, sit o'er sleepy wine,
And sleepier talk—all this is mighty fine!
And, finer still, when evening shadows sink,
And small desire is left to eat and drink—
The livelong day in vacant dawdle spent,
As if Life's lease were given free of rent—
Oblivious now of office or of shop,
To spend the evening in a general hop!
(All kops, I ween, a slumberous influence shed, Made by the feet or pillowed near the head.)
Yes, to live thus, in some sea-beaten spot,
Is truly charming while the weather's hot,
And while—kind friends, excuse this truthful song—
Sport is the judgment and the purse is long.
Yet, glorious Newport! though all sorts of belles
And fops come thronging to thy huge hotels;
Though many a seller by the yard of tape
Here strives high manners and high style to ape;
Though anxious mothers deem thy market good
For girls on hand, grown sick of solitude;
Though pointless slanders, and jokes void of pith,
Are told of some Count Mustache or Count Smith;
Though to knock down small pins with balls that roll,
And shoot at targets, occupy the soul;
Though the fond mazes of the doubtful dance
Lap youths and damsels in a dreamy trance;
And though fantastic tricks are madly played,
Before high Heaven, within thy breezy shade—
Thy charms are many, thine attractions rare!
Blue are thy summer skies, and sweet the air
Which, saltly perfumed by the billow, flings
Health and excitement from its shoreward wings!
And many spirits, generous and bright,
Cheer thy fair day, illuminate thy night,
Who, from some region or remote or near,
Seek the cool influence of old Ocean here;
And who, by studious culture, tastes refined,
Deck social pleasures with the gems of mind.

THE SPIRIT'S REVELATION.

BY J. WM. WEIDEMEYER.

"TELL me, ye departed spirits,
Who, in mystery, round us dwell,
Dare ye hold converse with mortals,
And your tale of wonders tell?"

"Ask us not to break the secret,
Aught beyond the grave reveal;
In the gray night's gloom and stillness,
Drawn toward the earth we feel:

"For there is a strange communion
'Twixt men and our spirit band;
Oft in omens we approach ye,
Brothers of our ancient land.

"From the glittering orb of even,
Gliding down upon its beams,
Noiseless as the step of zephyr,
Do we visit you in dreams.

"At the couch of all true-hearted
Stand we guardian in their sleep;
For the loved ones left behind us
Do we faithful vigils keep.

"See you spirit-mother hovering
O'er her fondly-cherished child
Smile on it in tender sorrow—
Drink its breath in rapturo wild.

"And the ghostly husband beckons,
Loving, to his lonely wife;
In yon lunar bowers he bids her
Join with him in spirit-life.

"Playing with her flowing tresses,
Pillowed on her heaving breast,
Comes the spirit-child to linger,
By its mother's lips caressed.

"Never can the tie be severed
'Twixt the hearts that truly love;
And for every friend departed,
One ye gain with us above."

THE DREAM OF MEMORY

Oh, why, sad mem'ry, wilt thou cling
To that dear name I love to sing!
That vision of my youth's glad dreams,
Which Love once decked in fairest beams?
Ah, well, fond mem'ry, may'st thou cling
To that dear name I love to sing!

How joys have faded since we met!
Friends change or die, and some forget!
While sorrow's tears, like gentle rain,
But make the Past look green again!
Then cling, sad mem'ry, fondly cling
To that dear name I love to sing!

I would not tell thee all I've borne,
Thy yet kind heart perchance would mourn;
And oh, to show thy heart one pain,
I'd bid them all in mine remain!
Then cling, sad mem'ry, fondly cling
To that dear name I love to sing!

Yet I would ask thee, when I'm gone,
Give but one thought to me alone:
The idle thing will cost thee naught,
And be to me so sweet a thought!
Then cling, sad mem'ry, fondly cling
To that dear name I love to sing!

But other friends will soon be thine;
The gay, false-hearted would be mine:
They smile in vain, I knew but one!
Dream on, sad mem'ry, I'm alone!
Ah, well, fond mem'ry, may'st thou cling
To that dear name I love to sing.

MUSLIN CANEZOU AND LE GILET.

Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.

MUSLIN CANEZOU.

SINCE lace and embroidered muslin capes are somewhat out of date, the canezou seems to have taken their place, a medium between the high and low corsages. Of these, we have every variety; and, when fitting well to the form, nothing can be more tasteful.

Fig. 1 is a canezou of Swiss muslin, and intended for a dinner or evening dress for a small company. It may be worn with a white muslin or light silk skirt. The body is composed of alternate rows of fine Swiss insertion and puffings, or, as the French call them, borrillonnées, of plain muslin, made very full. The sleeves are plain to the elbow, where they widen trumpet-shaped, and are finished in the same style as the corsage, edged by a wide row of embroidery. The same also surrounds the throat and edges the corsage, which is clasped by a belt suitable to the skirt in color, and a buckle of pearl, gold, or enamel.

LE GILET.

We have frequently of late alluded to the introduction of the Gilet, or vest, to the wardrobes of our fair countrywomen. They are most suitable for a promenade toilet, though, when made of a light or rich material, dinner dresses are improved by them. We have selected two from the great variety of models offered to us, and have had them engraved without the skirt or chemisette, which usually accompanies them, that our readers may understand the forms more distinctly.

Fig. 2 is of white Marseilles, and intended to be worn with a plaid silk or poplin skirt. It has a rolling collar, and is ornamented with small enameled buttons. The sleeves are en revers, or turned over so as to form a cuff.

Fig. 3 is of watered silk, a deep Marie Louise blue. Instead of the collar, it has an edge of needlework, the scolops being very deep. This Gilet is lined with white silk, and the entire corsage is open in front, intended to display a costly chemisette.

HAND-SCREENS AND CUSHION.

Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.

HAND-SCREENS. Figs. 1 and 2.

The new raised cross-stitch, for working on canvas.

This stitch answers extremely well for screens, or anything that is shown on either side (as in the screens shown in Figs. 1 and 2), both being finished.

The canvas must be placed in a frame, and worked the same as common cross stitch, with this exception, that the cross-stitch on the right side must be left loose, about half an inch from the canvas, then cross it on the wrong side, which finishes the stitch. It must be worked with double wool, and, when finished, cut according to taste. Any Berlin pattern can be worked, but birds are the most suitable.

CUSHION. Fig. 3.

The cushion shown in Fig. 3, which is about a quarter of a yard square, has the pattern worked on canvas. The flower is white, shaded with stone color, and the outer petals are blue. The largest leaf is worked with olive green in four shades. The other two leaves, which are partially hidden by the flower, are in shades of common green.

CROCHET.—NOVEL VASE STAND.

Materials.—One ounce of double Berlin wool, shaded scarlet; ivory hook.

Make 3 chain stitches; unite the ends.

First round.—Single crochet, making 1 chain stitch between each single.

Second round.—3 chain into every second stitch in the last round.

Third round.—The same.

Fourth round.—4 treble into every loop of 3 chain.

Fifth round.—Plain treble, taking every loop at the back of the chain.

Sixth round.—3 chain into every second stitch in the preceding round.

Seventh round.—4 treble into every loop of 3 chain.

Eighth round.—3 chain into every second stitch in the last round.

Ninth round.—2 treble into every loop of 3 chain.

Border.—5 chain into every third stitch in the last round of the bottom

Second round.—1 treble into every loop of 5 chain, making 7 chain between each treble.

Third round.—4 chain into the centre of every second loop in the last round.

Fourth round.—1 treble into every third stitch in the last round, making 7 chain between each treble.

Fifth round.—3 chain worked into every second loop, as in the third round.

Sixth round.—6 chain into every fourth stitch in the last round.

Seventh round.—6 chain into the centre of the loop in the last round.

Eighth round.—3 chain into the centre of the loops.

Ninth round.—6 chain, 1 treble in the space formed by the 3 chain in the last round.

The Vase-stand is now completed by working 7 chain stitches between every second loop where the border commences turning up, which makes a finish to the bottom.

PATTERNS FOR SILK EMBROIDERY.

THE fashion for embroidering the borders of cloaks, pelisses, sarques, &c., on merino, or fine cassimere, or flannel, with silk, is so prevalent this season, that we have thought it might be useful to give our readers a few choice patterns for the purpose from original designs. They are to be wrought with coarse or fine silk, or with a mixture of the two, according to the degree of intricacy or simplicity in the parts of the pattern.

To facilitate the work, we can furnish casts from the original wood-cuts of these designs. By chalking the raised figure on the cast, the design may be stamped on the cloth, and the whole trouble of tracing or drawing on tissue paper saved. One of our correspondents uses printer's ink, instead of chalk, in putting the design on merino. This requires skill and care to avoid soiling the cloth.

These patterns are equally serviceable for muslin, or any other material.

KNITTING FOR THE NURSERY.

A NEW KNITTED PELISSE

(WITH TRIMMING TO IMITATE CHINCHILLA; SUITED IN SIZE FOR A YOUNG LADY, FROM SEVEN TO NINE YEARS OF AGE).

Materials.—Six ounces of crimson, four thread super fleecy. Two ounces each of three shades of stone color ditto; and No. 4 box wood pins; and No. 8 bone pins for the trimmings.

The pattern consists of two rows worked thus:—

First row.—Make one, † place the pin in the next stitch, as if going to knit it, pass the wool twice round the pin, and finish knitting it as usual, † repeat until one is left, knit that plain.

Second row.—Knit the first stitch and half the next together; then the remaining half and the half of the next together, continue this to the end of the row. These two rows form a ridge, and to be continued throughout.

FOR THE BACK.

Cast on thirty-two stitches.

Repeat the two rows until you can count eight ridges on the right side of your work; then cast off three on each side. In the next ridge decrease one on each side. Knit back as in the second row.

Knit three ridges without decreasing; then cast on three stitches at each end of the row, thus making half the arm-hole; then work seven ridges, decreasing one stitch every alternate row; cast off.

FOR THE FRONT.

Cast on sixteen stitches.

Knit eight ridges as in the back; then cast off three.

At the commencement of the next row, knit the back row, but decrease one at the end.

Knit three ridges without increase or decrease. In the beginning of the next row cast on three stitches, and work one ridge; then seven other ridges, decreasing every alternate row at the beginning, thus making the other half of the shoulder.

In working the other side, it will simply require the knitter to increase or decrease at the end of the row instead of the beginning to make both fronts alike.

FOR THE SLEEVE.

Cast on twenty-six stitches, beginning at the wrist.

Knit six ridges; then increase each side every alternate row for twelve rows. Cast off in the next row three on each side; then decrease each side every alternate row three times more, and cast off.

FOR THE SKIRT.

Cast on one hundred and twenty stitches.

Increase every row on each side for ten ridges, knit two together in the next row, and cast off.

FOR THE TRIMMING ROUND THE SKIRT, ETC.

Cast on with the darkest shade of stone color one hundred and eighty stitches.

First row.—Knit two, † purl four, cast on six on your right hand pin, † repeat, knit two.

Second row.—Knit two, † purl seven, knit three, † repeat, knit two.

Third row.—Knit two, † purl three, knit seven, † repeat, knit two.

Fourth row.—Next shade.—Knit two, † purl seven, knit three, † knit two.

Fifth row.—Knit two, † purl three, knit two together, knit three, knit two together, † knit two.

Sixth row.—Knit two, † purl five, knit three, † knit two.

Seventh row.—Knit two, † purl three, knit two together, knit one, knit two together, † knit two.

Eighth row.—Next shade.—Knit two, † purl three, knit three, † knit two.

Ninth row.—Knit two, † purl three, knit two together, knit one, † knit two.

Tenth row.—Knit two, † purl two, knit three, † knit two.

Eleventh row.—Knit two, † purl three, knit two together, † knit two.

Twelfth row.—Plain. Join on the darkest shade, and work the pattern through again and cast off.

FOR THE COLLAR.

Cast on sixty-four stitches.

Knit the same as the border, but only going through the rows once.

FOR THE CUFF.

Cast on twenty-four stitches.

Which will be six patterns, and the two stitches for each edge, and work as the Collar.

FOR THE FRONT.

Cast on eight stitches.

Which will be two patterns, and work four patterns in depth. A second piece must be knitted like this to go down the other front.

To make it up, the back and two fronts must be joined; sixty stitches picked up round the waist, and a plain row knitted, and cast off.

The skirt to be sewn on to the body leaving a plain space on each side the front of a nail and half, sew the rest round to suit the figure. To be tied at the throat, and down the front of the body with ribbon to match. The cuffs also the same. The chin chilla trimming having been previously sewn on.

EDITORS' TABLE.

THE NEW YEAR is a standing-point from which we should look backward as well as onward, noting chiefly those actions and influences that, beginning in the past, are to be carried out in their full results, or modified in their tendencies, by causes and events yet undeveloped.

The most important, among these recent movements, is the attempt to take woman from her empire of home, and make her the rival of man for the mastery of the world. The ostensible plea for this innovation is that the female sex suffers oppression and wrong from men; and therefore women must learn to support and defend themselves, and be able to demand justice before they will obtain it.

That men should consider physical strength and mechanical skill superior to moral influence and spiritual purity is not strange, because the tendencies of their nature are earthward; but that women should be found in our country, where the sex is so highly respected and tenderly cared for, willing to give up their heavenly privileges of acting with angels in the care of the young, and co-operating with the Divine influence in keeping alive the true faith of the Gospel in the heart of humanity, is astonishing. It seems impossible that those of the sex who are leading onward this movement can have considered its consequences. The industrial power of the world is now greatly in advance of its moral development; and shall woman, who is the appointed guardian of whatsoever is good, pure, and lovely in morals and manners, resign her mission, in order to add to the material wealth of the world? It is as though a star should strive to come down from its place in the calm sky, and take the station of a gas-lamp in a crowded city street.

Let us take an illustration from that Magna Charta of woman's rights, the BIBLE. The pyramids of Egypt show to this day the grand triumph of man's physical power and mechanical skill. No female mind would ever have planned the pyramids, and no female strength could have erected those mountain-like structures ascribed to the Pharaohs. But the daughter of a Pharaoh performed an act of womanly tenderness, which was of more importance to the cause of human improvement than all the material works of all the kings of Egypt. Which deed was the nobler, the disinterested kindness which saved the life of the Jewish Lawgiver, or the selfish pride which probably destroyed, or rendered miserable, a hundred thousand lives in building the great pyramid?

Men and women have different tendencies of nature, and different tasks to occupy and develop those tendencies; to bring them into the same field of employments would be as absurd as to make the value of porcelain consist in its power to do the work of iron. Woman has a higher pursuit than the industrial arts afford; a better inheritance than earth can offer is in her keeping—to raise humanity towards the angelic is her office. The most important vocation on earth is that of the Christian mother in her nursery. The true wife has a ministry at home which may be more potent than that of the pulpit; for she, "by her chaste conversation, coupled with fear"—that is, piety, with gentleness and humility—may convert and save her husband when the preacher fails. The female teacher wields an influence more potent than the statesman; and, as the preserver, women, when made familiar with medical science, which belongs to their department of knowledge and practice, so far as their own sex and children are concerned, will excel in the preventive department, and, by diffusing among mothers the knowledge of the laws of health and better modes of training children, they will bring about a renovation of the general health, and, doubtless, a prolongation of human life.

To fit her for these duties, and give her opportunities of performing them in the best manner, woman needs what the BIBLE, above all other books or codes, gives the sex, namely, the right to claim support, protection, education, and every needful facility which man can provide. Sons must provide for their mothers—such was the example of the blessed Saviour. He did not leave his mother to support herself by her own hands. One of the first cares of the early Christians was to provide for widows; husbands were commanded to "love and cherish"—provide for—their wives the father was worse than an infidel who did not provide for his children. The churches were commanded "to help those women who labored in the Lord." The female disciples were "to keep the house," "to teach the children," and to "teach the young women." If the doctrines of the Gospel were carried out, there would be no suffering, no oppression of the female sex. "Christ was made of a woman." Everywhere He has borne testimony to feminine excellence; the precepts of His doctrine harmonize with woman's nature; and, as the same standard of purity is required by the Gospel for both sexes, it follows that, in the real improvement of society, men will, in their moral sentiments, become more like the gentle sex, and not that women are to affect the style and pretensions of the masculine character.

In a work* of our own, which has been long in preparation, and will soon appear, these views are fully explained; and, we trust, the book will be of some service in settling the agitations about woman's sphere, which now perplex many minds, and threaten to disturb the happiness of home and the peace of society.

In order to show what woman becomes when compelled to do "man's work," we give a description of rural life in France, from the pen of one of the best and most philanthropic of living French writers. Such pictures are common over continental Europe. Where millions of men are withdrawn from labor, and kept embodied as soldiers, much of the out-door work must be done by females; hence the low estimation placed on woman in those countries, and the degradation of the sex. As a contrast to this shocking portrait of "working women"—that is, those who are engaged in labors pertaining to "subduing the earth," which God imposed on men only—we give the views of an eminent

* "Woman's Record; or Biographical Sketches of all Distinguished Women," &c.

American statesman respecting the true destiny of the sex. Is there an American woman who would not prefer this lot above any which earth can offer?

THE WORKING WOMEN OF FRANCE.

BY L. AIME-MARTIN.

The great misfortune of our villages is the degradation of the women through labors which belong to men. In their earliest years they tend the flocks and gather in the harvest. As young girls, an instinct of coquetry and the foresight of their mothers remove them from the rude fatigues of husbandry; but no sooner do they marry, than all is changed; they abandon the house, and follow their husbands into the fields. You see them bowed to earth, as laborers, or laden with enormous weights, like beasts of burden. There are districts in France—I do not say in Africa—where they are harnessed to carts with the ox and the ass. From that time their skin becomes shriveled, their complexions like coal, their features coarse and homely, and they fall into a premature decrepitude, more hideous than that of old age. But, whilst thus performing the labor of men, their own labors, those labors which sweeten and refine all others, remain neglected or unknown. Nothing can be more filthy, nothing more unwholesome, than the interior of their cottages. Fowls, ducks, pigs, contending for a meal; the door opening into the mud; and the windows, where there are any, serving only as vent-holes to carry off the smoke. It is there, nevertheless, in a hole, miry as the hut of a savage, amidst the gruntings and fetid emanations of animals, that, every evening, two human beings, male and female, repose from the fatigues of the day. Nobody is there to receive them, nothing to flatter their regards, the table is empty, and the hearth cold as ice. There, lastly, other labors await the woman, and, before thinking of her husband's supper, or the care of her children, she must think of the stable and of supper for the beasts.

But how different would it be, if, leaving to her husband the hard labors of the field, and confining her attention to the interior of the house, the wife, in her delicate forethought, had prepared all for the hour of return! The fire would blaze on the hearth, and the evening's meal smoke on the polished board. The good housewife would present herself to her husband in the midst of plenty, and surrounded by the smiling faces of her children. Thus a sweet and easy life would be the natural life of the villager. But there is nothing to impress his mind with any image of this happiness; he knows not the word comfort; he is insensible to the charm of caresses, and even the power of love. His children tremble before him, his wife dreads the vigor of his arm. The adversary, not the protector, of these feeble beings, he knows of no law but force. The dernier argument of the peasant, in his cottage as in his field, is the weight of his fist.

If asked for examples of these things, we will cite whole provinces, the richest as well as the poorest, of France: Perigord, where the women live in a state of filth and abjectness which reacts on the whole family; Picardy and Limousin, where, degraded to the lowest rank, and as of an inferior race, they serve their husband at table, without ever daring to take a place at his side; Breacia, where they are mere laborers, mere beasts of burden; lastly, Lower Brittany, where husband, wife, and children, reduced to a state almost savage, live all, pell mell, in the same filthy chamber, and eat black bread, in the same trough with their sheep and hogs. Everywhere is the degradation of the woman a sure proof of the brutishness of the man, and everywhere is the brutishness of the man a necessary consequence and reaction from the degradation of the woman. Do not offer them comfort or well-being; they would reject it as something useless or strange. To desire comfort, it is necessary for them to know what comfort is, and ages have passed over their cabins without leaving there any other thoughts than those of labor and wretchedness.

Such is the condition of whole districts in almost every country of civilized Europe. And what is sadder still, is the fact that these spectacles strike our eyes without wounding them, our souls without softening them.

Two modes, very simple, offer themselves, however, for ameliorating the lot of these poor rustics. The first is to establish a primary institution, sufficiently large, for young girls, where they may learn how to direct the interior economy of a house, and thus, hereafter, be themselves qualified to instruct their own children in the same. To establish, in a village, the intellectual superiority of the women over the men, however transiently, is to restore to the former their influence—that vivifying influence which enriches cottages and civilizes nations.

Hitherto, all our laws of primary instruction have proved insufficient, because they did not establish—before all, and in preference to all—schools for the education of young girls. Never will instruction take deep root and spread in the rural districts, if it does not reach the children through their mothers, and the men through their wives. The public teacher is but a dry instrument, that teaches the alphabet; the mother of the family, on the contrary, is a moral power, which fertilizes the mind, while, at the same time, it opens the heart to love and the soul to charity.

The second method, a necessary sequel of the first, consists in restoring to the women of the village the occupations of their sex, and in bringing them back to the law of nature. This change, so simple, would operate as a complete revolution. In resuming her appropriate tasks, woman recovers her beauty; in recovering her beauty, she regains her just influence and power. Occupied with employments less gross, her tastes become purified, her manners softened; she studies neatness, she comprehends comfort, and a day at length comes when all her thoughts, all her desires, penetrate even the heart of her husband. Delicacy in woman is the most powerful enemy to the barbarism of man.

It may be urged, perhaps, that, to withdraw women from the rude labor of the field, is to ruin the laborer. To this we reply that, far from ruining, it would enrich him. Surely the avocations of the cottage are neither less numerous nor of less importance than those of the field. If it require a vigorous arm to handle the spade or the plough, it requires not less careful hands to receive the crop, to gather in the fruits, to rear the poultry, to prepare butter and cheese, to card and spin the wool, and to maintain everywhere order and neatness. The earth does not bring forth but under the plough, which rends it asunder, and the house cannot prosper but under the widow which superintends it.

When Solomon would describe the prosperity of a house, it is not the labors of the man, but the sweet influences of the wife, that occur to his thoughts. To the woman he attributes all the favors of fortune, even to the wisdom for which her husband is honored. He describes her as watching over the ways of her household, and rising, while it is yet night, to distribute wool to her servants. Wisdom speaks through her mouth, kindness reposes on her lips, and never is she seen to eat the bread of idleness. Thus is she respected by her servants, blessed by the poor and needy, and, when she appears so girded with strength and beauty, her children rise up and call her blessed, and her husband, joining his praises to theirs, says to her, "Many daughters have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all." The recompense of the virtuous woman in the Bible is the respect of her children, the love of her husband, and the homage of all around her.

Such are the sentiments which would spring from the civilization of the country. Let the legislator but once give birth to them, and we shall, ere long, admire in the cottage the same virtues which, in the time of Solomon, gave delight to the palace.

INFLUENCE OF WOMAN.

BY HON. DANIEL WEBSTER.

It is by the promulgation of sound morals in the community, and more especially by the training and instruction of the young, that woman performs her part towards the preservation of a free government. It is generally admitted that public liberty, the perpetuity of a free constitution, rests on the virtue and intelligence of the community which enjoys it. How is that virtue to be inspired, and how is that intelligence to be communicated? Bonaparte once asked Madame de Staël in what manner he could most promote the happiness of France? Her reply is full of political wisdom. She said, "Instruct the mothers of the French people." Mothers are, indeed, the affectionate and effective teachers of the human race. The mother begins her process of training with the infant in her arms. It is she who directs, so to speak, its first mental and spiritual pulsations. She conducts it along the impressible years of childhood and youth, and hopes to deliver it to the rough contests and tumultuous scenes of life, armed by those good principles which her child has received from maternal care and love.

If we draw within the circle of our contemplation the mothers of a civilized nation, what do we see? We behold so many artificers working, not on frail and perishable matter, but on the immortal mind, moulding and fashioning beings who are to exist forever. We applaud the artist whose skill and genius present the mimic man upon the canvas; we admire and celebrate the sculptor who works out that same image in enduring marble; but how insignificant are these achievements, though the highest and the fairest in all the departments of art, in comparison with the great vocation of human mothers? They work, not upon the canvas that shall fail, or the marble that shall crumble into dust, but upon mind, upon spirit, which is to last forever, and which is to bear, for good or evil, throughout its duration, the impress of a mother's plastic hand.

Our security for the duration of the free institutions which bless our country, depends upon the habits of virtue and the prevalence of knowledge and of education. Knowledge does not comprise all which is contained in the larger term of education. The feelings are to be disciplined; the passions are to be restrained; true and worthy motives are to be inspired; a profound religious feeling is to be instilled; and pure morality inculcated under all circumstances. All this is comprised in education. Mothers who are faithful to this great duty will tell their children that, neither in political nor in any other concerns of life, can man ever withdraw himself from the perpetual obligations of conscience and of duty; that, in every act, whether public or private, he incurs a just responsibility; and that in no condition is he warranted in trifling with important rights and obligations. They will impress upon their children the truth, that the exercise of the elective franchise is a social duty of as solemn a nature as man can be called to perform; that a man may not innocently trifle with his vote; that every free elector is a trustee, as well for others as himself; and that every man, and every measure he supports, has an important bearing on the interests of others as well as his own. It is in the inculcation of high and pure morals, such as these, that, in a free republic, woman performs her sacred duty, and fulfills her destiny.

CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR.—We have a twofold pleasure in sending out this number of our "Book;" it will go forth as the harbinger of two important days, Christmas and the New Year. We did not allude to the former in our last number, because this, being issued about "Christmas time," would be better suited to the congratulations we now heartily offer our many, many friends. "A merry Christmas" and "a happy New Year" to each and all who clasp our hands through the "Book!" May our long-continued friendship be strengthened, as well as brightened, by the mutual favors conferred, and the blessings enjoyed during the year 1852!

Literary Notices.

From BLANCHARD & LEA, Philadelphia:—

EXCERPTA EX P. OVIDII NASONIS CARMINIBUS. This is another neatly printed volume of the classical series now in the course of publication by Messrs. Blanchard & Lea, and edited by Drs. Schmitz and Zumpt. It is enough to say that this series has met with the unqualified approbation of the best teachers and scholars of America.

From A. HART (late Carey & Hart), Philadelphia:—

MEMOIRS OF THE QUEENS OF FRANCE. Including a Memoir of her Majesty, the late Queen of the French (Marie Amelie). By Mrs. Forbes Burk. From the second London edition. In two volumes. The history of courts, and the private memoirs of queens and kings, are too often but the details of gossip and scandals, which would bring dishonor upon the lowest of their subjects. There are exceptions, no doubt; and, if there were not, the book before us would be a sad and melancholy record of all the human weaknesses blended in the characters of the greatest princes. But there are exceptions, and thus we find the purest and most exalted virtue contrasted with the lowest vices. There are many examples of both in the book before us, which cannot fail to have a salutary effect upon those who love to philosophize on the waywardness, the nobleness, and—alas, that it should be so!—the corruptions of the human heart.

THE SCOURGE OF THE OCEAN. A Story of the Atlantic. By an Officer of the U. S. Navy. In one volume. Price 50 cents. One of the best features of this book, as far as its authorship is concerned, will be found in the evidences which it contains that it was written by some one who had actually handled the ropes. Besides this, the story is patriotic, and the plot prudently interwoven with the affections.

From CHARLES SCRIBNER, New York, through A. HART, Philadelphia:—

NAVAL LIFE; OR, OBSERVATIONS AFLOAT AND ON SHORE. The Midshipman. By W. F. Lynch, U. S. N. We have just laid aside one book by an officer of the United States Navy, and here is another, rather better printed, and more durably bound, and of a somewhat different order of literary merit. We are not sorry to see that, in these "piping times of peace," our naval defenders are disposed to exchange the tar-pot for the ink-pot, and the steel sword for the steel pen. They have had ample opportunities for the study of human nature, and of examining the institutions of other nations; and, at their leisure, they have now an opportunity to add to the literary fame, as they have already assisted in establishing the naval glory, of their country.

THE BOY'S AND GIRL'S COUNTRY BOOK. With illustrations. This is one of Uncle Frank's familiar works, amiable in its sentiments, and peculiarly adapted to the youthful mind.

WATCHING SPIRITS. By Mrs. Ellet, author of "The Women of the Revolution." This work is, in every sense of the word, a most beautiful volume. Beautiful in theme, in language, and in moral and religious sentiment; and beautiful in its illustrations, in its printing, its paper, and its binding; and, in all, a most beautiful present for the holidays.

THE CAPTAINS OF THE OLD WORLD. By Henry William Herbert. The reading public has long been familiar with Mr. Herbert as a spirited and elegant writer. We have not had time to read his book carefully, but have satisfied our mind that he spoke truly when he assured the reader that his object had been to produce authentic details concerning the great generals of antiquity, with particulars of their campaigns, conduct, feats, exploits, real merits, and comparative degrees of skill and excellence.

RURAL HOMES; OR, SKETCHES OF HOUSES SUITED TO AMERICAN COUNTRY LIFE. With Original Plans, Designs, &c. By Gervase Wheeler. The best idea of the contents of this book that we can present to our readers is to refer them to our own views and illustrations of cottages, furniture, etc., which, as they know, form a principal feature of the "Lady's Book."

From F. H. BUTLER & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE FEMALE PROSE WRITERS OF AMERICA: with Portraits, Biographical Notices, and Specimens of their Writings. By John S. Hart, LL.D. A more acceptable souvenir cannot be found among the numerous splendidly illustrated and illuminated gift-books, which have been issued by our various enterprising publishers for the holiday season.

Professor Hart has performed the duties of editor, biographer, and bibliographer with great ability. Among the selections are many articles of sufficient merit to establish good claims to high rank, in the same departments of literature, wherever the English language is a medium for the expression of bright fancies, interesting heart-romances, or picturesque descriptions; wherever it is the record in which the ideal heroes of the imagination are embodied by the soul's historian in noble thoughts and an imperishable language, at once monuments to the minds and means.

In the so called province of "light literature," we have often been struck with the vigor and originality of some of our "female writers," and have long seen the necessity for such a volume as we now have the pleasure of noticing in our magazine. Most of our readers will find "old friends" among this wreath of "fair names." Many of them have graced the pages of the "Lady's Book" as frequent and regular contributors. It gives us great pleasure to see that their writings have found such value in the estimation of the public as to call for some less perishable form than that in which many of them became known to fame.

It is the subject of much surprise to behold such an array of names, and such a collection of excellent extracts and articles, as fill the ample pages of this beautiful volume. The illustrations and portraits are gems of art. The whole of the heads have been engraved in London, from drawings made expressly for this work. In every case where we have had opportunities to know the originals, we find the likenesses exceedingly lifelike and correct. The paper, typography, and binding are superb, and present the claims of this galaxy of our gifted countrywomen in the most winning and appropriate dress. The book must find a rapid sale among our large reading public, being the first publication of the kind that has been issued by an American publisher in such gorgeous style.

From HOGAN, PERKINS & Co., No. 30 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia:—

THE TALISMAN. An Offering of Friendship. A splendid annual, with twelve oil-colored illuminated plates, from designs by Devereux. This is one of the finest annuals of the season, beautifully printed and bound, and the illustrations are fully worth the price of the book. It is edited by Rev. Henry D. Moore, who has made an admirable selection of articles. Among them we notice the celebrated "Love Song," by our contributor, "Carl Linley," first published in the "Lady's Book." We cannot recommend a more acceptable volume for a holiday gift-book.

PAUL AND VIRGINIA.

THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD. Two standard works, without which no library is complete. The publishers have got them up in beautiful style, handsomely illustrated by Devereux. The beauty of the typography, the elegant plates, and the neat binding, will render them desirable books for the coming season. Their internal merits require no notice at our hands.

HAPPINESS, IN ITS RELATION TO WORK AND KNOWLEDGE. By John Forbes, M.D. A moral lecture, delivered by the Queen's Physician, which may be read with pleasure and profit by all classes.

A SET OF CHILDREN'S BOOKS, embracing "TIMOUR, THE TARTAR," "THE SOLDIER'S CAP," and a series entitled, "OLD TESTAMENT SCENES AND NARRATIVES," including the separate histories of Joseph, Samuel, Jacob, David, Isaac, Abraham, Joshua, Moses, the Departure of the Israelites, the Dispersion of Mankind, the History of the Flood, and the Garden of Eden. These are all handsomely illustrated with colored engravings, and the tendency of their contents, as well as their cheapness, renders them most desirable books for parents and guardians to place in the hands of their children and wards.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through LINDSAY & BLAKISTON, Philadelphia:—

LIVES OF THE QUEENS OF SCOTLAND AND ENGLISH PRINCESSES CONNECTED WITH THE REGAL SUCCESSION OF GREAT BRITAIN. By Agnes Strickland, author of the "Lives of the Queens of England." The second volume of this able work will be favorably received by those who have read its predecessor, and by all who love to linger in the shadows of romance, while tracing the facts and realities of history.

THE YOUNG CHRISTIAN. By Jacob Abbott. Very greatly improved and enlarged. With numerous engravings. This work, as the reader might presume, is not intended for children, nor exclusively for the young, but for all who are commencing a religious life, whatever their years may be. The works comprised in the series are, 1, "The Young Christian; or a Familiar Illustration of Christian Duty;" 2, "The Corner Stone; or, a Familiar Illustration of Christian Truth;" 3, "The Way to God; or, the Christian Character Matured."

RULE AND MISRULE OF THE ENGLISH IN AMERICA. By the author of "Sam Slick, the Clock-Maker," "The Letter Bag," etc. Many things will be found in this book to which the American reader will not readily give his assent. We find much to object to, even in a cursory perusal, as well on the ground of fact, as in the author's speculations and opinions, which would have passed as harmless jokes from the lips of Sam Slick, the clock-maker, but cannot be so easily tolerated when falling seriously from the pen of a British jurist, and addressed to the consideration of a British lord.

FOREST LIFE AND FOREST TREES: containing Winter Camp-Life among the Loggers, and Wild-wood Adventure. With descriptions of lumbering operations on the various rivers of Maine and New Brunswick. By John S. Springer. There is a great deal in this book to amuse and instruct the reader, who, hitherto, has thought only of forest-life in the West. He will here find, by turning to the eastern boundaries of our country, scenes and adventures quite as romantic and formidable as any recounted of the opposite extreme of our forest limits.

THE FIFTEEN DECISIVE BATTLES OF THE WORLD; FROM MARATHON TO WATERLOO. By E. S. Creasy, M. A., Professor of Ancient and Modern History in University College, London, late Fellow of King's College, Cambridge. This is a work of deep research, and, as such, will greatly interest the student of history. The author is an Englishman; but, from all that we have read of his work in relation to "the victory of the Americans over Burgoyne at Saratoga," we believe to be as honest and impartial as could have been expected.

From W. J. HAMERSLY, Hartford, through E. H. BUTLER & Co., Philadelphia:—

THE STRING OF DIAMONDS, GATHERED FROM MANY MINES. By a Gem Fancier. This volume embraces a large collection of poems by writers of the first distinction in the literary world. Great taste has been displayed in the selection of these poems, as well as in the printing and binding of the book, all which will render it an appropriate holiday present.

From JOHN BALL, 48 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia:—

HUNGARY AND KOSSUTH; or, an American Exposition of the late Hungarian Revolution. By Rev. B. F. Tefft, D.D. This work, as the author informs us, is not intended to be a history of Hungary, or a biography of Kossuth. The substance of the work was originally confined to the limits of a popular lecture, but was afterwards "expanded to a small volume," in which form it now appears. The sentiments and the views of the author are on the popular side of all questions relating to Hungary, many of which are, however, undergoing a thorough investigation by those who are better able to decide upon them, religiously and politically, as they are presented to us in the volume before us, than we profess to be.

From TICKNOR, REED & FIELDS, Boston, through WILLIS P. HAZARD, 178 Chestnut Street, we have received two very neatly bound and printed volumes, intended for the amusement of young readers. The first of these is entitled, THE MEMOIRS OF A LONDON DOLL. Written by herself. Edited by Mrs. Fairston. With engravings by Baker. The second, which is a match volume, is entitled, TALES FROM CATLAND FOR LITTLE KITTENS. By an Old Tabby. With engravings from designs by Billings.

From H. C. PECK & THEO. BLISS, Philadelphia:—
THE LADY'S ORACLE: an Elegant Pastime for Social Parties and the Family Circle. By Henrietta Dumont. The pastime proposed by this book is a game of questions and answers between a lady and gentleman, and may be carried successfully round a whole circle, all giving attention to each question and each answer. The answers being quoted from standard poets, and made by a chance choice of numbers, all appearance of personality is avoided, and the amusement, which often occasions the liveliest mirth, is free from every kind of offence.

From D. APPLETON & Co., New York:—
ULRIC; OR, THE VOICES. By T. S. Fay. We have not had time to examine, minutely, the plot, the beauties, or the deficiencies of this poem. We know the author to be a gentleman of considerable reputation as a poet, and these, we presume, have been fully sustained in the effort before us.

From WALKER & JAMES, Charleston, S. C.:—
HISTORY OF ALABAMA, AND, INCIDENTAL-LY, OF GEORGIA AND MISSISSIPPI, FROM THE EARLIEST PERIOD. By Albert James Pickett, of Montgomery. In two volumes. Second edition.
We have received, with the compliments of the author, through Thomas, Cowperthwait & Co., of this city, a copy of this valuable work, which appears to have had bestowed upon it the greatest amount of labor and research that an individual writer could possibly bring to his aid. He has brought to light in these volumes, and condensed, a vast amount of historical information so intimately connected with the first settlement of the American continent, that, it may be said, the public records of our national existence would have been incomplete without them.

NOVELS, SERIALS, PAMPHLETS, &c.

From T. B. Peterson, 98 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia: "The Oxonians." Being a Sequel to "The Rose; or, the Hazards of Women." This purports to be a domestic romance, and was first published in London twenty-four years ago, and its authorship was generally attributed to Sir Edward Lytton Bulwer. Three volumes complete in one. Price 25 cents.—Sketches in Ireland." By W. M. Thackeray, author of "Vanity Fair," "History of Pendennis," etc. These sketches are very amusing, and very instructive in regard to the condition of Ireland and the peculiarities of her people.

From Harper & Brothers, New York, through Lindsay & Blakiston, N. W. corner of Fourth and Chestnut Streets, Philadelphia: "London Labor and the London Poor." By Henry Mayhew. Parts 13 and 14. Price 12½ cents.—No. 18 of the "Pictorial Field Book of the Revolution." Price 25 cents.

From E. S. Jones & Co.: No. 4, being the October number of "The Model Architect," containing original designs for cottages, villas, suburban residences, etc., accompanied by explanations, specifications, estimates, and elaborate details. Prepared expressly for the use of projectors and artisans throughout the United States. By Samuel Sloan, architect, Philadelphia.

From J. S. Bailey, Portland, Me.: "Bozzaria." A Tragedy, in five acts. By N. Deering. We have not had time to examine this play with sufficient care to enable us to speak of it critically.

MUSIC.—From Lee & Walker, 162 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia: "The Mississippi River." Respectfully dedicated to the ladies of Memphis, Tenn. Words by J. Fred Simmons. Music by J. H. Milton.

Publisher's Department.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK FOR JANUARY, 1852.—All that art can do has been employed to ornament this number. The first plate, on the cover, is printed in colors from a steel engraving: this style of work is not attempted in any other office in this country. The second plate, the title-page, is printed in colors on stone. This engraving has to go seven times through the press. The next, "The Parables of our Lord," contains five distinct pictures, engraved in line. The next plate, "The Happy Family," is engraved in the style termed "Gemograph." Ours is the only magazine that has given a plate engraved in this style. The next, "The Pet Bird," is colored, by our corps of female colorers, by hand. Here we have every variety of engraving and coloring: line engraving, gemograph engraving, steel plate printed in colors, lithograph printed in colors, and a plate colored by hand.

The following were designed expressly for the "Lady's Book": "Preparing for Winter," painted by Chapman; "The Title-Page," designed by Croome; "The Parables of our Lord," by the same artist; "The Pet Bird," by Tucker. Four original designs in one number. We have never heard of any other magazine giving a single original plate.

In the one hundred pages of original reading matter, will be found effusions by the master minds of our country. We are certain that no person will be disappointed who subscribes to "Godey's Lady's Book" for 1852.

We call attention to the notice on our cover touching traveling collectors. It will be seen that, in future, all remittances must be made direct to us.

VOL. XLV.—9

We shall, in our next number, commence a series of "Model Cottages" far exceeding in beauty anything that we have hitherto given. We were the first to commence this highly interesting feature.

We would respectfully announce that we are making a collection of autographs. We should be pleased to receive those of our subscribers who happen to be in arrears.

Two articles that we have recently published have been very extensively copied and very much praised by the press—"Hugh Evans; or, the Young Statesman," and "How can an American Woman Serve her Country?"

THE "Rome Courier" says, "We have been much gratified that Mr. Godey has given no encouragement to the Bloomer folly." We were right. Even those who paraded our streets at night have given it up. The thing is dead.

THE "Huntingdon Observer" says, "Godey must set up at nights to study out so many new and pleasing features. We cannot see how he does it in any other way." We assure our friend of the "Observer" that the "Book" "is our pondered thought by day, our dream by night."

THE following letter speaks volumes for "The Book":—

"Harper's Ferry.

"SIR: According to request, I inclose $5, the amount due for the present as well as the next year's 'Lady's Book.' It has been a friend of thirteen years' standing, with the exception of the year 1849, when I was tempted to give it up for another magazine, but very soon discovered that it did not yield me the same pleasure that the long-tried 'Godey' had done.

"Very respectfully,

Mrs. A. C. C."

A GEM FOR CHILDREN.—W. P. Hazard, No. 178 Chestnut Street, has published a series of stories for children, entitled, "Slovenly Peter," "Young Troublesome," "Simple Hans," "Slovenly Kate," and other stories. The one great merit of these tales, simple as they are, is that each contains a good moral. The illustrations no one can misunderstand. They are of the most ludicrous kind, perfectly chaste, and very expressive. Don't neglect this book among your Christmas presents for children.

MESSRS. S. HART & CO., Nos. 24 and 17 Merchant Street, in this city, are perhaps the largest American manufacturers of staple stationery and fancy goods: blank and playing cards, steel pens, pearl visiting card-cases (a most beautiful article), traveling companions, &c. Their factory is well worth a visit. Thanks to Messrs. Hart & Co., we are no longer dependent upon Europe for the articles we have here mentioned.

THE "Belfast Journal" says, "We are pleased to see so much matter of domestic interest in so popular and cheap a form. Godey is extending the useful departments of his magazine." We think this number gives good evidence of our intention to devote a large portion of our "Book" to the useful. A lady must, indeed, be hard to please that cannot find some matter in this number that will interest her.

THE NEW YORK SPIRIT OF THE TIMES.—The laughing-loving editor of this paper, Col. Wm. T. Porter, still continues to give his subscribers the most recherché paper published in this country. It is the only one of the kind; and, for pure American stories and anecdotes, records of fishing, hunting, etc., it has no equal in Europe.

VIRGINIUS HUTCHEN, Esq., has assumed the editorial chair of the "Banner," at Henderson, Ky. Our readers have often met with articles by Mr. H. in our "Book."

TO HEADS OF FAMILIES.—FITZGERALD'S CITY ITEM is the title of a weekly family journal, published in Philadelphia by Fitzgerald & Co. It is a very good paper, of a medium size, elegantly printed, and especially devoted to literature, the fine arts, music, and the drama. In the literary department of Fitzgerald's City Item the most careful taste is exercised to present a variety of high-toned, instructive, and entertaining articles, selected particularly with an eye to the tastes of ladies and families. Subscriptions two dollars a year. Address Fitzgerald & Co.

HOME BOOKS. BY COUSIN ALICE.—Under this title, Mrs. Neal has published the first number of a practical, household work, for the amusement and instruction of the young class of readers. "No Such Word as Fail," a book intended particularly for boys, is beautifully illuminated by Sinclair, of Philadelphia, and will form a handsome present, and a salutary lesson for the opening of the new year.

THE BOOK TRADE.—The second volume of this paper was commenced in August last. It is a monthly record of new publications, and literary advertiser, and, as such, has proved itself useful to all who are engaged in writing or in publishing books. H. Wilson, publisher, Ann Street, New York.

Mrs. LESDERNIER.—We had the pleasure, a few evenings since, to attend, with many delighted friends, the "Readings from the Poets," by this gifted and amiable lady. Her voice, diction, and whole manner of expression were of a superior order. In her comic readings she was especially true to life, and afforded to all who listened to her the highest amusement and pleasure.

CARPENTER'S.

"Oh, she's very fond of her husband!" we heard one lady say of another not long ago. "Why, I often see them together at Levy's, and she takes just as much interest in his gloves and scarfs as if they were her own."

Well, after all, it may be a trifle, but it certainly is a pleasant thing to have one's husband notice a dress that has been arranged with especial reference to his taste; and why should not "the rule work both ways?" Indeed, if ladies interested themselves a little more in the toilets of their liege lords, we should see fewer men who outrage taste and propriety in light colors and bold checks, by shining satin scarfs, and nether garments with "the other plaid on the other pair."

To be sure, a tailor's is not exactly the proper lounging place for a lady; that is, most shops devoted to the wardrobe masculine are not. But, if any of our lady readers choose to exert their taste, and save their husbands from being "horrors," they will be most cordially welcomed, and comfortably seated, at the new establishment of the brothers W. & F. Carpenter, celebrated in many ways, apart from the editorials of the "Home Journal," where Willis, in congenial ellement, discourses of their excellencies. It is, in fact, an elegant saloon, a part of the beautiful hotel just opened as the "Girard House," Chestnut Street. Carpets from Orne's, chandeliers from Cornelius', sofas, lounging chairs, etc., might cheat them into the belief that it was not a shop, after all. But it is "Carpenter's," nevertheless. A firm known even in Bond Street, and talked of in Paris; and, better than all, properly appreciated and supported in our own country. This is due to the taste that has selected their present extensive stock, including gloves, handkerchiefs, cravats, in fact, all those elegant little articles that go to make up the tout ensemble of the outer man. And we commend to your especial notice, fair ladies, as we commend you to the courtesies of the ever-courteous proprietors of the establishment, a character well worth the study, and known as "Old David" by every young man and boy in town, ever since they were old enough to feel a nervous satisfaction in getting home a new coat and vest "of a Saturday night." In his fine new livery as porter, he seems to dispute the sobriquet so universally accorded him, looking ten years younger at the least, as he brings you a chair, or bows politely to his old acquaintance, your husband. We don't think you'll repent your visit; and then you can any day bring a claim for attendance at an "opening," against the gentleman you have assisted by your taste and kindly advice.

ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE.—In addition to the notices which will be found on the cover of the "Book" of this valuable family newspaper, we have selected from our numerous exchanges a few more equally just and warmly complimentary to the editor. No editor that we know of has been more deserving of the approbation of his fellow-citizens, and of the esteem and confidence of the entire reading public of America, than Mr. Arthur. Honest, dignified, and calm in all his personal relations, the same peculiarities of character distinguish the columns over which he presides in an eminent degree. Without rant or vulgar passion, they are sufficiently expressive and enthusiastic in the cause of truth and virtue to assure us of their honesty of purpose; and, without assumption or dictation, they are sufficiently careful and explicit in explaining and supporting their own position, to command for the editor the respect and the esteem of all truly independent minds. As we have said, on a former occasion, we know of no man in the wide circle of our literary acquaintance whom we deem more valuable in the vocation, or more efficient, scrupulous, or penetrating in the performance of his editorial duties, than Mr. Arthur. The great heart of the American nation, we might truly say, owes Mr. Arthur a debt of gratitude, which we hope yet to see paid in full, without stint or objection. While too many of our writers have sought only fame, he has been leading the minds of thousands, almost imperceptibly, into the quiet and peaceful paths of virtue. How many fond wives and mothers can look back upon his glowing description of the nobleness and the happiness that spring from a moral and a temperate course of life, and from them date the period that first brought kind looks, gentle words, and soothing consultations into their own poor homes! How many parents, who have sighed in bitterness over the degradation of a son, have rejoiced in his restoration through the persuasive pages of Arthur! How many children, who have wept for very shame over the follies of their parents, rejoice now and shed tears of lively gratitude over those touching stories that led to the reformation of their hapless lives! But we have said enough for the present. Hear now the opinions of others of Arthur and his "Home Gazette."

ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE.—This very superior family journal has just entered upon its second volume. That it should have proved eminently successful during the first year of its existence is no more than its sterling merits deserved; and the fact speaks well for the discrimination of the American public. Mr. Arthur's abilities as a writer, and the admirable moral which we find interwoven in each one of his pleasing tales, of which he contributes a large number to the Home Gazette, together with the pure and useful character of the articles prepared for it by a long array of the best authors in the United States—all combine to render this paper one of the most desirable extant for family reading. Now is a good time to subscribe, and those who have not heretofore taken it will find it all they could wish as a home journal.—Mich. Whig.

● ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE this week commences, under happy auspices, its second volume. Among our exchanges there are a few we always seize with avidity, and the Home Gazette is one of the few. As a family journal, we consider it the best in the country. There is a fine moral tone running through the whole that cannot fail of doing good. Mr. Arthur is an excellent writer, and we have often endeavored to study his style; indeed, we consider that, in his sphere of literary labor, he has no superior. His tales are always so good, and yet so instructive, that the reader rises from their perusal with an inward conviction that he has not been wasting his time over a mass of foolish nonsense. His paper is but a mirror, in which are reflected all his traits of superiority.—Gazette, South Boston, Mass.

ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE.—The second volume is begun. No periodical can we wish a more hearty "God speed." It abounds with information and morality—its lessons are all purity; and it is emphatically what it professes to be, a Home Gazette—appropriate companion for every fireside.—Waterloo Patriot.

ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE has entered upon its second volume, and we have heard but one opinion of its merits expressed on all hands, and that is a favorable one. For papers of that class, we hazard nothing in saying it takes the first rank; and we are the more prepossessed in its favor for the high moral tone of its contents. It appears to be entirely free from that undercurrent of impurity which is so characteristic of a large portion of the mammoth sheets of the day.—Journal of Education, Bath, Me.

ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE is so sacred to our home that it always escapes our scissors. It is a real family paper, containing no demoralizing stories or low witticisms. Its character corresponds with that of its editor, who is well known to the public as a pleasing, graceful, and interesting writer.—Palmer Journal.

ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE meets, at our table each week, a warm greeting, and at the "home circle" unmistakable marks of favoritism. Its dignified and practical moral tone fits it eminently for a place in the bosom of every family. The assiduity of its editor keeps its columns full of interest; and its truths cannot fail to instruct.—Mich. Citizen.

ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE, T. S. Arthur, Editor, has just finished its first volume. It is filled with the choicest matter from the pen of its celebrated editor, and is a paper which should be read at every fireside. Its subscription price is but two dollars per year, and everybody who subscribes for it well invests his money.—Advertiser, Biddeford.

Receipts.

A RECIPE FOR A CARROT PUDDING, which tastes very good: Take half a pound of raisins, half a pound of currants, half a pound of suet, one ounce of lemon peel, half a nutmeg, two large carrots, two tablespoonfuls of flour. To be boiled two hours and a half, and the carrots are to be boiled and pulped previously.

PHILADELPHIA BUNS.—Take a pound of flour, the rinds of three lemons grated fine, half a pound of butter melted in a coffee-cup of cream, a teaspoonful of yeast, and three eggs. Mix; add half a pound of finely-powdered white sugar: work well, let it stand to rise well, and it will make thirty-nine buns.

TEA CAKES.—Take a pound of flour, half a pound of butter, and the same of sugar; the peel of a lemon finely grated, a little of the juice, an egg, a little brandy to flavor, and a teaspoonful of bruised coriander seed. Roll it out thin, make into cakes, and bake them in a quick oven.

DESCRIPTION OF FASHION PLATE.

Fig. 1st.—Evening dress of white crape, embroidered in a star pattern of gold-colored silk. The trimming of the skirt consists of rows of gold-colored guaze ribbon in groups. The corsege is made en chemisette, and edged only by a narrow row of lace. A necklace and bracelet of pearls, and a wreath of blush roses and foliage, are the only ornaments.

Fig. 2d.—A dinner dress of pink silk solitaire, the skirt trimmed with two deep flounces, embroidered in a double row of needlework scallops. These scallops are trimmed with five rows of narrow velvet ribbon, of a bright maroon shade, placed at regular distances. The upper part of the second flounce forms a ruche, and the skirt is also edged with one in silk. The corsege is low, cut en gilet, and trimmed in scallops to correspond with the skirt. Chemisette of Valenciennes lace, slightly full. A simple band of velvet, with a pearl clasp, encircles the throat. Hair dressed plainly with knots of pink and maroon velvet.

ROBE DE NUIT.

A most elaborate and elegant garment, made of the finest French cambric. The skirt is very full and long, and divided in each of the front breadths into three branches of plaits, six in each. A row of very narrow tucks edges the hem. Two rows of rich embroidered cambric are disposed after the fashion of a pointed yoke, and a collar of the same encircles the neck closely. The sleeves are stitched in plaits at the wrist, with a double cuff of the edging, the lower falling over the hand.

CHIT-CHAT ON PHILADELPHIA FASHIONS FOR JANUARY.

Cloaks and evening dresses seem to divide the principal attention of our ladies the present month. It was thought, earlier in the season, that few cloaks would be worn; but the variety and gracefulness of the styles have made them the favorite out-door dress as the season advances. The most beautiful display that we have yet seen, or that will probably be found in the country, is in Stewart's cloak-room, which, now that the edifice is finished, is situated in the left wing of the building, bordering upon the Park, and is entirely distinct from the shawl-room in the opposite extremity. It is very large, beautifully lighted, and fitted with models upon which to display the elegant garments which it contains. The centre of the room has a counter, bearing the same relation to its size and extent as a sofa-table in an ordinary parlor. At each end is a figure, upon which is displayed every day a new brocade silk, finished by a light and elegant mantle to correspond. Among the richest, we noticed a gold-colored ground, with the flowers in a light running pattern, principally in pink, with green foliage. It is intended, of course, for an evening dress. Price seventy dollars, and is a full pattern. Another, more quiet, and far more tasteful, has a black ground, with bouquets of half-blown moss roses and buds, with their simple, natural brown stems, and emerald foliage. Those in plain colors, with the figure merely raised in satin, are great favorites, and their ordinary price from three dollars to five dollars per yard. It must be remembered that they are nearly, if not quite, a yard in width, and, as the common, but most expressive phrase goes, "are as thick as a board." Indeed, we have seen some this season as thick as an ordinary Matseilles counterpane. The heaviness of the material, together with the rich colors in which it usually is embroidered, makes it quite unsuited to the toilet of young girls, unless it is in the lightest and most delicate plain shades, as white, fawn, pink, or blue.

Miss Wharton has made a very stylish bridal dress of rich moir d'antique, perfectly plain, with the exception of a rich fall of blonde upon the open sleeves. With an elegant lace collar and bridal veil, this will be all-sufficient for ornament. The wreath was of lilies of the valley, clematis, and white roses; the roses forming the base; and the light wreath over the forehead, arching slightly, to give greater height to the figure, was of the simple lily bells. Clematis and pendent sprays of lilies were mixed with the roses. The whole could not be detected from nature, except by touch, in the evening. Perfuming artificial flowers is the last refinement of Parisian skill. The contrast between these most natural blossoms and the stiff nondescript conceptions, called "artificial flowers" by country milliners, usually in upright bunches, shapes such as flowers never could assume, is ludicrous enough. Indeed, we have long intended a crusade against these same tasteless bits of pink cambrie and crimson muslin. They are placed inside an unlined brim, in direct contact with a complexion in most cases far from delicate, and only resemble the flowers of the field in that "they toil not, neither do they spin." Not that we would breathe aught that could affect so lucrative a trade, in which many of our countrywomen are now engaged. But, if public taste demands an improvement, it will most assuredly be made; and, if ladies object to wearing poppies, peonies, and "composition" flowers, taking nature to task, as it were, in shape and coloring, the more graceful and delicate blossoms will be imitated and improved, until our manufactures shall rival those abroad. Our young countrywomen have taste enough, if it were only allowed scope, and encouraged.

Flowers inside the brim should not be worn without a light mixture of lace, plain thulle, to soften the effect, particularly if the complexion of the wearer is at all brilliant.

Amid the trousseaux spoken of above, we noticed an elegant dinner dress of fawn-colored moir d'antique, made with the marquise corsage, with the close puffings described in our last. It has a most stylish effect, and is not easily imitated or copied. A rich traveling dress of habit cloth, a lighter and more creamy shade of fawn, was considered an elegant accompaniment to the bridal wardrobe. The cloth is as glossy as the softest satin, and, at the same time, is thick enough to afford all necessary protection in the most inclement weather. The corsage was plain, with the double pointed bodice, and the sleeves and skirt have plain bands of terry satin ribbon, the same shade, a favorite and very neat trimming. The cloak, of the same, is of the circular, or cardinal shape, with a light hood and tassel, lined and quilted with silk.

We have also noticed, at Miss Wharton's rooms, a new gilet with a short basque. The corsage was black watered silk, with the vest of lavender, a very light and delicate shade. Lavender is now universally worn in second mourning, and is quite a distinct shade from the French gray so much the style a year or two since. The deepest borders upon violet, and the lighter shades are more of pearl gray. Black bonnets, with lavender ribbon inside the brim and for strings, are much worn, also lavender silks, and neck ribbons, sometimes plaided with black. It is one of the most ladylike, because quietest, shades of color that can be introduced into the toilet.

But we have wandered a long distance from the cloaks displayed at Stewart's. You will find them lying in elegant confusion—velvets, satins, cloth, and fur mingled in graceful combinations. The cardinal form still continues the favorite. It is a simple deep cape, reaching almost to the knee, of a three-quarters circle. It is lined and quilted throughout with silk, as the corners are turned over the arm in front, displaying it, and making a kind of loose cardinal sleeve. Hooda, or deep collara, are the accompaniment of this style, and there is a little novelty in the shape of a side pocket in the lining, just large enough for a small purse or card-case, or a tiny embroidered handkerchief. A Persian cloak, imported to order by Stewart this season, was composed of velvet and Siberian sable. Incredible as it may seem, the price was £600!

Of the lighter items of the toilet, little can be said. Chemisettes of a hundred different varieties are seen, and undersleeves of every conceivable pattern and material. The last are worn a trifle narrower, and, as the weather grows cool, of fine French and linen cambrics, or India muslin. Ear-rings have pendants no longer. The last style is a little flat button, about the size of a half dime, ornamented with precious stones. Chate-laines are little worn, a simple vest guard, or belt chain of gold, attaching the watch to the waist. Vest buttons are a new and dainty style of jewelry; but we have been quite extravagant enough in this article, in our faithful descriptions of what is worn by city fashionables, not recommending our readers generally to follow the example.

THE INTERCEPTED LETTER

BY EDITH HERVEY.

KATHERINE DEVEREUX was the spoiled child of a widowed mother. From her infancy through her childhood she knew nothing but the language of tenderness and the caresses of the most overweening affection, except when her stepfather, Mr. Lewiston, a man stern and unrelenting as Cato, would point out to her fond mother some fault that he thought should be corrected, or some defect of character that he prophesied would inevitably, if allowed to pass unrebuked, render her future life miserable. But Mr. Lewiston, in this also like Cato, was too fond of his wife to be willing often to see her face clouded by grief or anxiety; so the prophecies and solemn warnings came more and more seldom, though the faults that had at first provoked them by no means lessened with Kate's increasing years. Not that those faults were anything uncommon or even apparent to an ordinary observer. To most persons Kate seemed as she did to her mother, a remarkably sweet-tempered, affectionate child, full of gayety and spirit; but her keen-eyed father saw the obstinacy and wilfulness of her temper, which, lying dormant in the sunshine of her usual life, would when roused assert and claim their rights with a quiet resolution as immovable as uncontrollable. With this peculiarity of Kate's Mr. Lewiston ought to have sympathized, for he shared it in no common degree; but in himself he called it firmness, and considered it as one of his chief excellencies; in Kate it was obstinacy, in his eyes the greatest fault a young girl could possess.

Thus Kate, too young to appreciate her stepfather's virtues, his real desire for her improvement, or his conscientious care of the large property she inherited from her father, looked upon him only as a severe censor, and as one who, blind to her virtues, perceived only her faults. As long as her mother lived, this did not trouble her much, for he warmth and sunshine of that abundant love would have rendered her insensible to the coldness or disapproval of all the rest of the world; but, when Kate was thirteen, Mrs. Lewiston died, leaving her child to the guardianship of her husband, and entreating her to love and obey him, as though in him her mother still lived to her.

This injunction at such a time, from one in whom all her affections were centered, had so great an effect on the ardent and enthusiastic nature of Katherine, that it seemed for a while almost to change her nature, and even Mr. Lewiston was greatly struck by the quiet deference and implicit obedience that marked her conduct towards him. Nothing could have pleased him more, and a real affection was beginning to spring up between them, when Mr. Lewiston, after two years of unaffected sorrow, growing tired of his loneliness, brought home another wife.

To see her mother's place filled, while her own grief for her loss was still fresh in her mind, roused all the antagonism of Kate's nature; and when, added to this, the second wife proved to be one of those managing, interfering, and officious persons who, although kind and good-hearted in the main, yet contrive to make themselves especially distasteful to all under their control, it is hardly a wonder that Kate's fastidious refinement of feeling induced her to shrink from one who showed but little delicacy in touching the most sensitive chords of her nature. She even, to Mr. Lewiston's serious displeasure, refused to give his wife the sacred name of mother, and Mrs. Lewiston, hurt and offended by what she considered the want of respect and sympathy of one towards whom she fully intended to act the part of a devoted mother, as far as she understood it, complained bitterly of Kate's coldness and reserve, but without in the least relaxing in the plan she had formed for perfecting the young girl's education, which she thought had been woefully neglected.

Education was Mrs. Lewiston's hobby, and she considered herself peculiarly fitted to train the feminine portion of creation both in mind and manners. Boys she frankly acknowledged to be above her powers, though once she had not thought so; but a girl, she was accustomed to say, she could mould as she pleased; and she tried her plastic hand perseveringly and courageously on the firm nature of her adopted daughter. It must be acknowledged she spared no pains with her. She lectured her from morning till night, thwarted her in all the little plans of study and amusement she formed for herself, amply providing for her all the time occupations and pleasures of her own choosing, without being able to understand Kate's want of gratitude in not accepting them, or accepting them so coldly.

Yet, with all this lack of affection and even real respect, Kate's thorough good breeding, and, perhaps, her pride, prevented her from making any marked demonstrations of her dislike or impatience of control. There was another motive—it may be, a stronger one than either of the others—that influenced Katherine in her outwardly dutiful conduct to Mrs. Lewiston, and that was her affection for an aunt of her stepfather's, Mrs. Exeter, who had resided with him since her mother's death, and on whose kindness and judgment Kate had so firm a reliance that she confided to her all her little troubles, sure of finding in her, although a just and sometimes she thought even a severe judge, a gentleness and sympathy that had won her whole heart.

Some two or three years after the commencement of the new dynasty, Kate's forbearance was put to a severe test, and, for the hundredth time, was on the point of failure entirely. She had a cousin, Henry Grant, a favorite nephew of her mother's, and who had been, during her life, always a welcome visitor and playmate of her own. The intimacy and friendship had always been maintained; but now, that Kate had attained to the dignity of being considered a young lady, and a particularly handsome and agreeable one, the watchful Mrs. Lewiston, who fancied that she had a peculiar gift for detecting the tender passion from its very commencement, suddenly discovered that Kate was in love with her cousin, and that he would be a very unsuitable match for her. To the last sentiment Kate fully agreed; but the first, when it was gently insinuated, filled her with the greatest indignation. That her warm cousinly affection for the favorite companion of her childhood should be mistaken for love irritated her; and that any one could think she would bestow her heart on one whom she secretly looked upon as a boy, though he was a little older than herself, and who was no more to be compared to the beau idéal in her own mind than a wild rose to the Victoria Regia, seemed to her such an imputation on her taste and discernment that she found it difficult to restrain her anger within its just bounds; but when, in addition to all this, she learned that Henry's usual Christmas visit had been declined, on some slight pretext, by Mrs. Lewiston, and his feelings very much wounded in consequence, excited by her sympathy for him and her anger at Mrs. Lewiston, she wrote him a long and very kind letter, full of regrets at being disappointed in his usual visit, and expressing even more affection for him than she felt, so desirous was she that the son of her mother's favorite sister should feel that her feelings towards him remained unchanged.

Just as she was about to give the letter to a servant to be carried to the post office, Mr. Lewiston entered, and, taking it from her, read the direction, and quietly consigned it to the flames, saying "that he did not approve of young ladies corresponding with gentlemen." Kate felt that she could not trust herself to speak, and left the room as quickly as possible. After relieving her excited feelings by a few tears, she did not even seek her usual consolation by confiding her troubles to Mrs. Exeter, but went about her ordinary avocations with a cold and haughty reserve that effectually precluded all attempt at explanation, if Mrs. Lewiston wished to make any.

While in this state, treated as she thought like a child by her guardian, and tyrannized over by his wife, as she sat in church one Sunday morning, wondering if there was anybody in the world, excepting her cousin Harry, who cared an iota for her, her thoughts were suddenly recalled to a recollection of what was passing around her, by observing a pair of eyes, large, deep, blue, earnest, admiring eyes, fixed intently upon her. A furtive glance in that direction showed her that the owner of the eyes was a strikingly handsome, though rather effeminate young gentleman, and, from his sitting in the same pew with some friend of hers, she concluded him to be their acquaintance. She thought it very impertinent in him to stare so at her; yet, in the wounded state of her feelings, the evident, and, at the same time respectful, admiration conveyed by those expressive though mute messengers, was not displeasing to her.

The next week happened to be the one before Christmas, and a part of it was generally devoted by the young ladies of the neighboring village and country to dressing the church with the emblematic tokens of rejoicing usual on such occasions. Kate was always the leading spirit on these occasions, the superiority of her taste being unquestionable, and her energy and activity leading her to undertake all the more difficult portions of the arrangements. Her cousin Harry had always been her willing assistant, and, as Katherine walked more slowly than usual to the church on the day appointed for commencing their annual task, she thought sadly on how much she should miss his gay spirit and happy facility at overcoming all difficulties. She was in a very misanthropic mood, and more than inclined several times to turn back and shut herself in her own room till the Christmas festivities were over. She did not do it, however; and, alas for poor Harry!

no sooner had she opened the door that led into the vestry room, where the little party had assembled, than all thoughts of him passed from her mind; for there stood the stranger who had attracted her attention on the previous Sabbath. His look of evident pleasure, as she entered, could not but strike her, and, when he had almost instantly sought and obtained an introduction, his gentle deferential manner, the low soft tone in which he whispered the sweetest nothings, which to her unaccustomed ear sounded so much like sensible remarks that they passed uncriticized, and the open admiration which the Miss Graysons, the ladies whom he had accompanied, displayed for him, all helped to complete the favorable impression which Mr. Augustus Barney, for that unfortunately was his name, made upon the young heiress.

Mr. Barney did not fail to profit by the unrestrained intercourse allowed by their daily meetings at the church. He professed the most sublime and lofty sentiments; and Kate, too new to the world's ways to have discovered the difference between "to seem and to be," sympathized with and admired him. Occasionally, it is true, there was a something in his manner, or some casual remark, that struck her as not exactly in keeping with his usual style of conversation; but she had but very little opportunity of judging him, for, though he was always by her side whenever he was permitted, yet he had become such a favorite, his taste and his opinion were so often appealed to, that they found but little time for uninterrupted conversation. This was all the more fortunate for him, as his talent in that particular was very limited. He accompanied her home once, and passed the evening with her, and Kate wondered at herself for feeling quite relieved when he went away, and at the indefinite impression he had left of being somewhat of a bore, although he had wasted on her his prettiest compliments and his sweetest glances. If Katherine had been anything of a flirt, his conversation would have satisfied her. But she was too earnest and enthusiastic, as well as high minded, to be in the least tainted by that prevailing weakness of beauties. She had a mind and a heart that asserted their claims to be satisfied, although she was by no means destitute of a little feminine vanity that was easily pleased, though the pleasure was a passing one, by the language of adulation.

When matters had reached this point, if Mrs. Lewiston had not interfered, all would have been well. Miss Devereux was already growing weary of the weak sentimentality of Mr. Barney's usual style of conversation, and would soon have wearied of his society. But, observing his attentions of course, and jumping at once to the conclusion that he was addressing Katherine, and that he would certainly be accepted, she wrote to some friends who lived in the same city with the young gentleman, and, finding by their answer that he belonged to that numerous class of persons in large cities who have forced their way into fashionable society, and manage to keep in it and to live no one knows exactly how, and that, in fact, his character was by no means above suspicion, she at once very properly determined not to allow Kate to receive his visits.

It would have been better if Mrs. Lewiston had been perfectly frank with her stepdaughter, who, however cold and reserved she had appeared to her, had never actually disobeyed her; but, against Mrs. Exeter's advice, she preferred to give the servant private orders to say that "the ladies were engaged" whenever Mr. Barney called, hoping that he would leave, now that Christmas had passed, without again meeting Kate. But, after having been refused admittance several times, Mr. Barney, who had flattered himself that he had made quite an impression, and who could not bear to give up so tempting a prize without an effort, mounted guard near the stately residence of Mr. Lewiston, until he saw Kate come out alone to take a morning walk. He joined her, and, in the explanation that ensued, Kate's anger at the want of confidence displayed towards her was so favorably construed by the gentleman that he burst into an ardent declaration of most devoted attachment. Kate was completely taken by surprise; yet, as she had never heard any suspicion breathed against him, but, on the contrary, had seen that he was admired and courted by those who certainly ought to know all about him, although she felt that she did not love him, the devotion expressed to her biased her in his favor, and her indignation against her stepmother made her long to throw off her control. Rendered undecided by her excited feelings—although she neither accepted him nor positively refused him—she allowed him to form a plan for carrying on a clandestine correspondence, to which in a calmer mood she would certainly not have consented.

As soon as she had time for cool reflection, Kate repented the permission she had granted so readily, and determined that one letter on each side should be the limit of the correspondence. Although pleased with the winning, deferential manner of her suitor, she had formed no high opinion of his intellect, and therefore his first letter, the first love letter she had ever received, astonished as much as it pleased. The sentimentality and high-flown compliments that marked his conversation had given place to a manliness of thought, a depth of feeling, and a beauty and energy of expression, of which no one would have thought a mere man of society, like Mr. Barney, capable. The letter did more to change her partiality into love than a year's intercourse with him would have effected. True to her first intention, however, Kate wrote a very short and guarded reply, requesting that the correspondence should be allowed to drop. But "faint heart never won fair lady" was Mr. Barney's maxim, and, not discouraged by this unpromising commencement, he continued to write, satisfied with knowing that his letters were not returned, and trusting that in time they would produce the desired result.

As balm and incense to her wounded self-love, they certainly were not without their effect. Mrs. Lewiston, unsuspecting of the cause, was delighted to see Kate restored to cheerfulness and gayety natural to her, although she still found fault with her for her fondness of the solitude of her own room. In this instance, Mrs. Exeter proved herself more clear sighted. She was confident that there was a mystery about Miss Devereux which was very unusual. In going into her room, she had often lately discovered her poring over some letters that were quietly slipped aside on her entrance, and a great intimacy had suddenly sprung up between Kate and the younger Miss Grayson, a giddy, foolish girl whom Mrs. Exeter had never liked.

One day, in rambling about the grounds at sunset, Mrs. Exeter's attention was attracted by a brilliantly white object lying in the hollow trunk of an old elm. The last rays of the sun fell full upon it, or she would probably not have observed it. On taking it out, she found it to be a letter to Miss Devereux, for this was the romantic post-office Miss Grayson had selected in which to deposit the letters directed to her care. Mrs. Exeter's first impulse was to take the epistle to Mr. Lewiston; but, recollecting Kate's already embittered feelings towards him, and the little confidence and affection she felt for his wife, she resolved, with great reluctance, to take the disagreeable task of inquisitor upon herself. "Kate knows me too well," thought she, "to accuse me of idle curiosity, and will bear reproof from me better than from any one else." The good lady was surprised and shocked to see how far the intimacy seemed to have advanced, especially when she observed the writer's name, whose reputation she well knew. She returned to the house, and sent for Kate, who was preparing to go to a small party, but came down immediately. At sight of the well known hand, the young girl was very much startled and embarrassed; but she was too conscious of the impropriety of her conduct to answer but with tears to the earnest remonstrances of the old lady. Kate could not believe that the author of those high-toned and impassioned letters was the worthless creature Mrs. Exeter described him, but she liked the open and straightforward course too well not to be willing that the correspondence should be ended at once.

"In this letter, I find," said Mrs. Exeter, "that Mr. Barney makes an appointment to meet you at eight this evening at the old elm tree in the grove. Should you have gone there?"

"I am afraid I should; but only for a few minutes," replied Kate.

"He also hints at an elopement," continued Mrs. Exeter.

"Oh, that, never!" exclaimed Kate; "I would never marry any one who could not claim me in the presence of the whole world."

"Ah, my dear," said the old lady, "we cannot answer for that. When we take one wrong step, we never know how many more it will lead to.

But, my dear, suppose you make me your deputy. Give me the letters you have received already, and let me return them and give your final message to Mr. Barney."

Kate readily complied. "Tell him," said she, "that our correspondence and intercourse must drop until I can receive him openly."

At the appointed time, Mrs. Exeter proceeded on her mission. Mr. Barney, already at his post, saw a tall muffled figure slowly advancing, and, imagining that it would be no one but Miss Devereux, he rushed forward, and, sinking gracefully on one knee, seized her hand to raise it to his lips, exclaiming, "Star of my existence!"

"You are mistaken, sir," said the calm voice of Mrs. Exeter.

With a sudden exclamation, Mr. Barney sprang to his feet, but instantly regained his suavity and ease of manners. In fact, he was so excessively polite that Mrs. Exeter could not be half so severe as she intended. In answer to her stern rebukes, he assumed so much the air of an injured man, and pleaded his own cause with such an appearance of truth and reason, that the good lady left him half repenting her harsh judgment of him, though she carefully concealed her tender relentings from Katherine.

The plausible, gentle, but persevering Mr. Barney did not readily see his hopes of the heiress disappointed. He made use of all the artifices in the lover's category; but, protected by her voluntary promise to Mrs. Exeter, and grateful to her for preserving her secret faithfully, he escaped all the plots and snares he laid for her unwary heart. She wondered that he did not vindicate his fair fame from the aspersions that had been cast upon it, as she had no doubt he could, and then wait patiently, if it must be so, till she was her own mistress, and could select her acquaintances; but she believed that he truly loved her, and—for what inconsistencies will not that belief be an ample excuse in a woman's eyes!—in her heart there was enlisted on his side a tone of pity, a degree of self-reproach for having in a manner encouraged his affection, and a certain partiality that a young girl almost always feels for her first lover. All these feelings kept the recollection of Mr. Barney fresh in Kate's mind, and Mrs. Exeter observing it, feared that the love affair, though now broken off, might be renewed and successful; "and then Kate will indeed be miserable," thought she. An accident effected more than all her arguments.

Some business made it necessary for Mr. Lewiston to call on Henry Grant for his assistance, and, in consequence, Kate was gratified by the presence of her cousin once more. They were both sitting in Mrs. Exeter's room one morning, when the conversation happened to fall on Kate's quondam lover. She was surprised at the contempt with which Harry spoke both of his morals and intellect. "He is mistaken there," thought she; "Harry never was a good judge of character." But she wisely held her peace, although her cheeks were glowing and her heart beating, while Mrs. Exeter, delighted at the turn the conversation had taken, with an apparent carelessness contrived to extract from Harry all he knew, which was not a little, of the young gentleman. Harry, as confidential and as unsuspecting as Lamartine, rattled on, little thinking of the impression his words were producing.

"By the way," he exclaimed, "there was some young lady in this part of the country he was making a desperate attack on last winter. I would like to know who she was, for I became quite interested in the affair from reading all his love-letters to her."

"You are very intimate with him, it seems," said Mrs. Exeter.

"With him? Oh no!" said Harry; "but we have a mutual friend, Mr. Chase, one of the most talented young lawyers in New York; and Mr. Barney used to get him to write all his letters for him, and, as I was a great deal in his office, he often read them to me, and I really had no idea a love-letter could be made half so interesting. We used to have a good deal of sport over them, though; and I suppose the poor girl took them all in sad earnest."

"Your friend was very kind, certainly," said Kate, bitterly.

"Yes, he had known Barney since they were boys, and did not like to refuse him. The best of it was that the count, as we always called Barney, was carrying on another desperate flirtation in the city with one of our heiresses there. I suppose he has not been successful with either one, as I have heard nothing about it lately."

Poor Kate learned more true humility in that day than her whole previous life had taught her. Mrs. Exeter saw her deep mortification, and never again alluded to the subject, and Mr. Augustus Barney became a thing of the past. In time, by the aid of this severe lesson, and Mrs. Exeter's counsels, Kate learned to distrust her own inexperienced judgment, and to appreciate Mr. Lewiston's sterling qualities, and even his wife's real affection, though displayed in a rather annoying manner. And when, in the course of a few years, she became a wife and mother, and a remarkably useful one, Mr. Lewiston, in remarking on the change in her character, or rather in the direction of its powers, said—

"It seemed to me once to depend on the merest accident whether Kate became a happy or a miserable woman."

"Where a girl has good sense and good principles," said Mrs. Exeter, "there can be but little fears for the result, I think."

"With a proper person to guide her," chimed in Mrs. Lewiston. "I have had a great deal of trouble with Kate; but I must say she has more than repaid me."

THE LEGEND OF INDIAN HOLE.

A TALE OF HARRIS COUNTY, TEXAS.

BY "ESPERANCE."

CHAPTER I.

AMIDST the broad plain that the Rio San Jacinto bounds on the north, and the Brazos on the south, rises the small but well-known stream of Claro (now called Clear) Creek. Like all streams or Bayous of its class, it presents nothing remarkable in its appearance. During the Summer and Fall—the dry season—the bed near its source remains nearly destitute of water; but, as you descend, the waters increase, the banks become wider, and the timber, which was but small and scattering at first, assumes a larger and thicker growth, graduating its density and size with that of the bayou, the course of which it follows until finally it swells out to a large forest as the creek enters Clear Lake; through the lake the bayou forces its way on, winding along through prairie and woodland, until it empties its waters into the broad Bay of Galveston.

As I remarked, there is nothing extraordinary in the appearance of this creek, either in its size or length, to distinguish it from many others similar, and in the same section of country; and it probably never would have been so but for a scene enacted on its banks—the memory of which is still green in the recollection of many. Some six or eight miles from its source, the bayou swells out around a kind of point or projection of the bank, and then, contracting again, forms a basin or pond which remains full, or nearly so, of sweet clear water, during the entire summer. This is a lovely spot, and the one our tale refers to—it is known as Indian Hole.

"Here, scattered wild, the lily of the vale
Its balmy essence breathes; here cowslips hang
Their dewy heads, and purple violets lurk,
With all the lowly children of the shade."

Look around you whilst we are here, and behold this vast extended plain that spreads out before us in solemn grandeur, its unbroken view extending far away in the distant horizon, where the blue-arched sky seems to descend and meet it in gentle embrace! What author's pen can do justice to this boundless prairie ocean? Its magnitude reminds one of the Atlantic, and its grassy ridges waving in long rolls, with the sunlight glistening in the valleys, also recall to mind the ocean's swell after the gale has passed. Who can paint the bright flowers of rainbow tint that stud its bosom, whose odor—the prairie's breath—scents the air, transporting the weary hunter into an elysium sweeter than that created by fairy music, or the Mussulman's vision of his future Paradise!

Let us dismount, and, whilst our horses are grazing the tender young grass, we will recline under the shade of this oak, and, in the mean time, enjoying the soft air from the Gulf, and the warbling of birds overhead, I will relate to you the history of this place—the Legend of Indian Hole.

CHAPTER II.

For ages these green woodlands and plains were unknown and untenanted—the deep, oppressive silence which reigned over all, unbroken save by the war-whoop of the savage, the howling of beasts, and the tramp of the wild horse and buffalo. But anon, a change came over the spirit of the scene. The fame of the country spread abroad—its rich lands, salubrious climate, and abundance of game were strong inducements to the emigrating portion of the Western people. The white man appeared—his rifle rang through field and forest; the gigantic old trees—patriarchs! venerable in years, and gray headed with their mantles of moss—bowed beneath the sharp strokes of his axe. Soon cabins arose, forming the nucleus of a settlement. Hundreds of hardy pioneers poured in from the Valley of the Mississippi, bringing with them their all. Settlement after settlement was formed, and their foothold made good against the nations of the wilderness.

The Red Men soon sought the destruction of the intruders, for it needed no prophet's warning voice as to the result of this encroachment on the hunting-grounds of their forefathers. Now came the strife for the supremacy, and, in the struggle that followed, the red tribes of the forest were scattered like leaves before the whirlwind. Many were the bloody scenes enacted; but, for every white man's scalp taken, a dozen aborigines bit the dust. The Indians fled—leaving their hills and plains, their homes and graves of their forefathers in the possession of the conquerors. Unhappy race! Years have passed away, and the places that once knew you know you no more! The forest that once sheltered the lodges of your tribe, and echoed to the dance and war-whoop, is now usurped by the rising city! The ploughshare has again and again passed over the bones of your ancestors—the golden grain of Ceres waves over their tombs!

"Your day is o'er,

Your fires are out from shore to shore;
No more for you the wild deer bounds—
The plough is on your hunting grounds.

The pale man's axe rings through your woods,
The pale man's sail skins o'er the floods;
Your pleasant springs are dry;
Your children—look, by power oppressed,
Beyond the mountains of the West—
Your children go—to die!"

Among the many hostile tribes with whom the white men were often engaged in deadly strife, there were none they encountered more frequently, or who made more desperate resistance, than that of the Caronqueways. This tribe inhabited the entire coast of Texas; and, from their number, bravery, and savage character, were more dreaded than all others. Numerous and deadly were the encounters they had with their white foes—defeat, instead of weakening their courage, served but to exasperate them the more—they fought long and well, and were among the last to retreat. Their battle fields extend from the forests and canebrakes of the Trinity to the surf-beaten shore of the Gulf of Mexico.

At the time of our tale, but a few years had passed since this part of the country had been settled by immigrants; and the feud was at its height. Scarcely a month would pass away without witnessing the blazing of some lonely "squatter's" hut—the murder of his wife and children, and the quick and fearful retribution that followed. Such was the state of affairs when a report came to the settlers, on and near the Brazos, that a large party of Caronqueway Indians had just returned from a successful foray against a tribe friendly to the whites; and that they, flushed with their late victory, were now preparing to attack and exterminate the settlers. This news spread like prairie fire, and very soon every man and boy within fifty miles, capable of bearing arms, had shouldered his gun and marched to a designated point, where all were enrolled into a company. As soon as possible, they reached the encampment of Indians, and the memorable fight with the Caronqueways, near the pass of that name, took place soon after. Many of the combatants say the fight was well and bloodily contested. The Indians finally gave way—not before, however, they had lost half their number, and made their escape with their prisoners towards Clear Creek.

With the white men engaged in this fight was a tall, finely-formed, young Indian warrior. He belonged to the tribe whose village had been lately sacked and destroyed by this same band. He it was who brought the intelligence to the whites, and had eagerly supplicated their aid in chastising them, and rescuing some of his tribe still prisoners in their hands. During the encounter he fought with great bravery—his war-cry ringing like a trumpet's note above the din of battle—cutting down all who opposed him, and following the white men in every charge that was made. But after the enemy had given way—when the noise and confusion of the conflict had subsided—and the whites were busily engaged in burying the dead and relieving the wounded, Coshatte—for such was his name—retired to a short distance, and, covering his head with his robe, seemed to be the prey of great emotion. The captain of the company, seeing him evidently in distress, and fearing he was severely wounded, called him up, and, with a friendly speech, sought to know of him the cause of his trouble. The Indian drew himself up, and, dropping the buffalo robe which had covered his breast, so as to give full freedom to his gestures, spoke to the following effect—

“White brothers, listen! This day has the red wolf been struck. The white man’s bullets are deep into his body! Already do the black vultures scent his blood, and are whetting their beaks for the feast. Many a warrior will be missed from the council fire of his tribe. There will be mourning in the lodges of the Caronqueways. Coshatte has fought by his white brothers; his tomahawk has been buried in the brains of their enemy; his knife has drank their blood—it is good, but the heart of Coshatte is not happy. White men, listen! But two moons have passed since I accompanied the warriors and young braves of my tribe to the big plains of the West to chase the wild-horse and to hunt the buffalo. Our old men, our women and children we left behind us—for we were at peace with the white man, and we dreamed no harm from our red brothers; but we were mistaken—the Caronqueway wolves had their spies upon us, and but a few days had we left when they attacked our village. They killed our old men, they carried off our women and children, and our tents are but a heap of ashes!

“White men, listen! Among the prisoners is our head chief’s daughter Keleotuc—‘the wild flower’—the pride of our tribe, and the betrothed wife of Coshatte. His heart cannot be happy, nor will he rest while she remains a prisoner among the destroyers of his tribe. Coshatte has spoken. Will his white brothers aid him in taking the young bird from the clutches of the hawk?”

The Indian’s gestures were so vehement, his looks so appealing, and the grief he felt evidently so sincere that, although the white men were worn down by fatigue and excitement, they with one accord determined to pursue the robbers and rescue the prisoners, if alive, at all hazards. As soon as the dead were buried and the wounded properly attended to—a few being left to guard them—the company proceeded at once on the track of the fugitives. The Indian took the lead, showing all the eagerness and instinct of a bloodhound; and often, when every vertige of the trail was lost, he would, by his unerring sagacity, find and pursue it with a rapidity that left the others far behind. On the evening of the second day, about sunset, the party reached Clear Creek about four miles below, where we will leave them, for the present, pursuing their course which led direct to this spot.

CHAPTER III.

It was midnight. A large fire burned brightly in the bottom of this ravine, throwing a strong glare upon the forms of about forty warriors, who stood, with bows and war-clubs in their hands, in a circle around it. Many a head and limb bore frightful marks of a recent conflict; and every face wore an aspect as hideous as paint and rage could make it. Some few lay around wrapped in skins, and appeared, from their restless motions and the occasional groans that proceeded from them, to be desperately wounded. Some exciting topic had evidently been lately discussed and settled by the warriors in council; and, from the large heap of brush and dry wood that lay piled up close by, and from the angry gestures that were occasionally directed to a particular spot, it was not hard to divine what it was, nor that which was soon to follow. Close by the group of warriors, and in full view, tied hand and foot to a tall stake, was an Indian girl. Her feet and arms were swollen and bloody from many wounds inflicted by thorns and briars. An embroidered and highly dressed skin of some wild animal hung in strips from her shrinking body, disclosing a form youthful and full of beauty. Her head was bowed in deep dejection, from which the long dark hair flowed wildly over her heaving bosom. Now and then her eyes would wander restlessly over the painted faces of her captors, seeking, but in vain, to catch some ray of hope in their unpitiful glances; but for this, she neither moved nor stirred, and, to all appearances, was as inanimate as the trees that towered around her. As well might she expect mercy as the young lamb when the jaws of the wolf have fastened upon him—or her sweet namesake, “the wild flower,” when winter’s icy breath has touched it. Her fate was sealed! Soon, very soon would her fragile body be given to the fiery heat of the blazing fagot, and her gentle spirit would pass away amid shouts, and taunts, and yells of exultation. There she stood, bound and helpless, a feeble, unresisting woman—a sacrifice to be offered on the altar of Indian superstition! She knew that even now those chosen for the purpose were preparing to commence their infernal offices upon her. But her thoughts were far away. Before her mental vision arises the home of her childhood—her aged parents, and the young brave to whom her troth was plighted. Now her fancy roves through the green woodlands and wide fields where she had so often strayed, listening to the singing bird and running water. No more shall the songs of the one, and the plaintive rippling of the other, gladden the heart of Keleotuc! No more will she greet them living!

Now are the warriors gathering around her. See! they are heaping up the fagots. Listen to the taunts they cast upon their gentle victim; but she answers not—she hears them not. Like the dying swan, she pours forth her latest breath in touching melody. Her soft, flute-like tone of voice comes floating through the midnight air. In solemn chant, she sings, "Green earth! bright flowers! running waters! bear hence, far away unto Coshatte the young brave, the last sigh of Keleotuc! Spirit of the waving trees! whisper forth through the air—let the fate of the 'wild flower' reach the home of her kindred—let it burn in the hearts of her tribe. Companions of my childhood, ye birds of sweet note, sing my requiem! Silvery stream of the mountain, murmur forth my name! And now, Great Father, listen to thy suffering child! Oh! send forth thy winged messengers—speed them quickly on—let them shield and bear me to thy bosom! Hark! like meteors flashing through the sky I see them! Their snowy pinions beat the air, and songs of joy are floating round. Welcome, sweet shadows of the spirit land! Welcome, bright sisters of the starry robe! To your outstretched arms I come! I come!"

Thus sang Keleotuc, as a warrior seized a lighted torch and hurled it at her feet. Quickly the dry brush ignited, and a canopy of smoke, black as a volume from hell, rose fiercely to the sable sky. One wild shriek of agony burst forth from the dying girl as the flames, wreathing round, blasted her with its fiery breath; a maddened howl of derision from the infuriated savages answered her. A moment more, and a crushing sound from the tramp of feet was heard, and, before the Indians could gain a cover, the party of whites burst forth from the adjoining thicket, and poured out the contents of their rifles upon them.

"Then arose so wild a yell
Within this dark and narrow dell,
As if the fiends from Heaven that fell
Had peeled their banner-cry of Hell."

The Indians, although losing several of their number, and taken entirely by surprise, maintained their ground for some time, fighting hand to hand with the courage of despair and the ferocity of tigers. The blow of the tomahawk, the thrust of the knife, the shrieks of the wounded and dying, were now intermingled with the shouts of encouragement from one party and the yell of defiance from the other. None expected or asked for mercy, but fought desperately, like the wolf, to the last gasp.

In the mean time, the flames rolled on, lighting up the scene of battle with all its horrors—bringing every combatant into full view. Foremost, from the commencement of the affray, was Coshatte, who, wielding his war-club, fought with the fury of a maniac, in the direction where he had discovered Keleotuc bound and enveloped with fire. None withstood him, for he struck down all who opposed, and made his way, through flame and smoke, to the side of the Indian girl. With one sweep of his knife he severed the bonds that held her, and springing back bore her out of reach—but, alas, too late! No sooner did the blackened and charred remains of the young girl meet his gaze, as he bore her body off, than, with a cry like that of a wild beast, he dropped his burden and rushed amid the fight. Already was his arms, face, and breast deluged with blood, and now his knife at every thrust was deeply painted with its gory color. On he rushed to the very centre of the enemy, and, in despite of the wounds and blows he received from all sides, he grappled with the chief, and bore him, writhing and struggling, to the blazing fire that still roared and hissed for its victim. With a bound like that of a panther, he sprang with his enemy full in the midst of the roaring column of flame that shot forth its forked tongues for yards around. For a moment a cloud of ashes and smoke obscured the view; then thousands of bright sparks ascended and fell again like hail on the green sward around. An instant more, and Coshatte—his whole person, even to his long scalp-lock on fire—burst forth, with his blazing shroud, like a tortured devil loosened from his chains, and, feebly sounding his war-cry, dashed again among them. His enemies—the few Caronqueways that were left—fled in terror before this blazing, frightful apparition, and to this day they believe that the white men were guided and assisted by a supernatural being at the fight of "Indian Hole."

Coshatte lived but a few hours after the battle. His body, as well as that of the Indian girl, was taken some three miles from the Creek, and laid side by side at the edge of the prairie—his war-club and knife being placed with him—and a strong enclosure of young trees and brush built around them which can be seen to this day.

The fate of Coshatte the brave, and Keleotuc the "wild flower," forms the legend of Indian Hole!

TO MISS ———.

SWEET is the music that a ripple makes,
As o'er a pebbly bed it trembling leaps;
And sweet are lutes on tranquil summer lakes,
When o'er their strings a minstrel's finger sweeps;
Sweet are the notes of birds when morning breaks;
Sweet any music when one halfway sleeps:
But sweeter still to me that gentle tone
Than all the music that the world has known.

Bright is the lustre of a twinkling star—
A sparkle flashing from a rock when clave;
Bright is the sun, when it does seem afar
A globe of fire, emerging from the wave;
And bright the rays of glittering diamonds are,
When fresh they come forth from the ocean cave:
But brighter still to me the light that flies,
In dazzling glances, from those radiant eyes.

Pure is the snow-flake on the mountain peak,
Where human footsteps never deigned to tread;
Pure is the hyacinth that, frail and weak,
Lifts its white petals from a vernal bed;
Pure is the pale tint of an infant's cheek,
When to its God its spirit late is fled:
But purer still that heart, where does not rest
One image that would stain an angel's breast.

LEONORA AINSLIE.

A TALE OF CITY LIFE.

BY ELLA HOWARD.

CHAPTER I.

"Is that you, husband?" asked Leonora Ainslie, in a languid tone of voice, to a gentleman who directed his steps to the parlor.

"It is I, my dear wife; are you particularly desirous of seeing me? You seem not well." He missed her usually light step and cheerful bound into his arms on this evening. "Are you ill?" demanded he affectionately, as he smoothed the rich brown wave of hair that parted over his wife's truly classic forehead.

"No, Charles, I am not ill," replied she, as they rested upon the sofa, "that is, I am not well;" but, recovering from a degree of languor to resume her explanation, as she saw he smiled at her reply, she resumed, "I am neither well nor ill, if I can make you understand the seeming contradiction."

"Neither well nor ill?" repeated he. "It will take an evening's chat to convince me of one or both of these assertions. Let us take a cup of tea upon it, then I'll light a cigar, for I can always see more clearly through a subject when it is enveloped in a cloud of smoke. While you give orders, I will just step into my slippers. Such a nice time as we will have!" emphasized he, and would probably have said much more had not the servant entered and announced that tea was ready.

Charles Ainslie affected a sudden start of joy at these tidings only for the sake of eliciting a responsive feeling on the part of his wife. At any time he would have given up the best cup of Souchong to chase the shadow of a care from her brow.

But if Mrs. Ainslie thought to effect his object by magic starts, he missed it on this evening. Mrs. Ainslie, whatever was the matter with her, was too far gone for that. She resumed her reclining position, only, instead of his shoulder, took the hair-cloth pillow of the sofa to lean upon; the hard hair-cloth on which to rest her beautiful cheek that was the mate of a peach for color and freshness.

"Indeed, Charles, I am too wretched to move. You may take your tea without me; I can stay alone until you get through. Really, it seems to me there is nothing but cooking going on in this house from morning until night. Breakfast at nine, dinner at three, tea at seven, and mutton-chops, as I live, again for supper. Shut the door, Sally; I will not go to tea nor subject myself any longer to feeling at one time like a sheep, another like a calf, until I fear to lose my identity. I am disgusted with meat suppers." So saying, Mrs. Ainslie shut her eyes, and would her ears if she could to farther argument.

Mr. Ainslie saw through the whole state of the case in a moment; and, with the kindest expressions of sympathy, humored his wife in this new whim; but, being hungry, he suggested to her that, as she was really too ill to go as far as the dining-room, they should have the tea brought into the parlor. Mrs. Ainslie nodded a speechless consent; a word would have been too much of an effort. Sally was called, a few orders conveyed to her in an under tone, when Mrs. Ainslie put out her little taper finger, and touched her husband's arm.

"Charles, for my sake, not the chops!" Sally had gone but a few steps when she was recalled by Mr. Ainslie, with the order, "and Sally, not the chops!" Sally obeyed, returning in a few moments with a tray, on which she had placed two cups of fragrant tea, sandwiches, and other tempting viands that would have pleased the most fastidious appetite. Mr. Ainslie was quite at home in his new office of arranging the tea-poy for his wife, and another for him-self just beside it, while Sally stood by holding the tray—amused at the one, and making her own silent comments upon the conduct of the other. Very soon all was arranged to Mr. Ainslie's satisfaction, and Sally dismissed. Before closing the door, she turned to give a glance at the inanimate form on the sofa, exclaiming, in sotto voce, "Lord! but the airs of that one!" Now, Sally was the cream of Irish girls, withal the only domestic in the house; when there was extra work, others were employed to assist; but the principal duties devolved upon her. She would have liked to have her mistress a little oftener in the kitchen to assist her, perhaps in the dressing of a salad, the concocting of a dessert, or in the thousand little offices that a lady in moderate circumstances is called upon to do, at any rate supervise. She went on cheerfully, however, in the hope that her mistress would see that she must lend her aid or get a cook to relieve her. At all events, Sally reasoned she could leave the place. That alternative she would prefer avoiding, for, in truth, she loved it. Mrs. Ainslie was the soul of good-will and generosity. Already had Sally's bandbox been stocked with French worked collars, gay ribbons, and a nice hat as good as new, given that day to her, that had been worn only two months, besides other perquisites, causing Sally to feel that "the lines had fallen to her in too pleasant places" to displace them rudely by even an interposing hand. The house had been newly furnished, as yet little or nothing to do compared to what the short days in winter had in store for them both. Mrs. Ainslie was only a bride of a few months, to be sure; Sally charitably reasoned, brides must always be dressed up—the hall-bell was forever going—the house filled with callers. Sally thought a trifle too many stayed for lunch, but that was not her business. There was a well-stocked pantry, everything dealt out with an unsparing hand; all she objected to was the extra work it caused her. Then Mrs. Ainslie expected her to be the perfection of neatness, to open the door for her visitors. How could she, on perhaps a wash or scrubbing day, wear her best clothes? Five dollars a month would not afford it; still she liked the place; the well-dressed people that came to it; her mistress's sixteen silk dresses, not omitting a black velvet pelisse, as she called it, that she took delight in counting over. When alone in the house, her greatest amusement consisted in just throwing them over her shoulders to see how they would become her, never dreaming that the question could be mooted of her becoming them. At any time she would refrain from her own wild song to listen to the bravura emanating from the parlor. Her mistress's voice, and performance on the piano, were the pride of the street they lived in; to be sure the girl next door, with a Milesian emphasis on the noun sounding as though spelled gur-rel, kept at the piano from morning till night. Sally observed to a friend, "but she might tingle till death, and she'd niver perdue the likes." In short, Sally was a devoted admirer of the nice house and her gay young mistress.

CHAPTER II.

MR. AINSLIE must have been very hungry, for the eatables disappeared most mysteriously; now and then his wife would open her eyes languidly and observe something else missing. He at last volunteered to finish the untouched sandwich upon his wife's plate; that no sooner gone than he amiably proffered to drink the tea she had but just dawdled the spoon in. Rather impatiently pushing the cup towards him, just spilling a little over into the saucer, she suggested to him the propriety of swallowing cup and all. Mrs. Ainslie turned her back to her husband without a seeming effort. Mr. Ainslie almost choked with laughter, as he drained the dregs from the saucer, even striking it two or three times on the edge of the cup to get the last drop.

"That's a good cup of tea—most excellent," observed Mr. Ainslie aloud; though to all appearance his wife slept, he suspected she was foxing a little. "Those chops would have relished particularly, as I have not; but, never mind, I see chops are fallen, stocks and chops! One and the same, both, go down at a time; the way of the world! wicked world! be burnt up some time or other." Mr. Ainslie lighted his cigar, and mused as he smoked, while his wife preserved unbroken silence, or feigned sleep. He had lighted his cigar at the gas light, and marveled what turn affairs would take next, for she was the loved subject of all his reveries.

The cigar must have been a stronger one than usual, for the fumes brought a violent fit of coughing on his wife. Strange! smoking had never done so before; but he laid it aside, presuming the difficulty arose from the indefinite state of health his wife had been thrown in since breakfast time; to use her own words, "Neither ill nor well." He had thought, as he gazed on her faultless proportions, her perfection of bloom and beauty, that he knew of a panacea to avert the continuance of the new evil; but the doses must be homœopathic, and given in infinitesimals. He had chosen her, for he loved her; she had hitherto been the idol of a large circle of friends; her sphere of usefulness was not so wide as he hoped it would become, from the manner in which her time had been formerly spent; as yet, the attractive superseded the domestic. Trusting to the standard of perfection she attained in the lighter branches of art, he did not despair of seeing her turn to the duties of her new state, therein to walk in perfection.

Charles Ainslie was a rising young man, of fine person, fine mind, sound judgment, and honest principles; he laid his views open to his wife before marriage, and believed implicitly the words she had then spoken, that she loved him too dearly to delay their union for events that, by including the delay, would bring competency. She rather, and indeed sincerely, wished to begin housekeeping with one servant, to having two, that she might know better the respective duties of each when she would require them. So she said; as yet the novelty of marriage and the congratulations of friends had occupied her; but now that there was a slight cessation of these occupations, he saw through his mind's eye that the curse of nothing to do had come upon her. Therefore he was prepared for anything, and not surprised when, upon reaching the sofa, his wife threw her arms around his neck, weeping violently.

"Why, Leonora, wife, tell me what is the matter? what has happened, since morning, to cause you so much distress? Come now, dry your eyes, cheer up, and just let us talk over this little affair rationally."

"Oh, Charles! do not call this a little affair. I am wretched, and have been wretched this week past and more. I should not have got married. Oh, dear! oh, dear!"

"Why, darling wife! it can be no little affair that causes you to say such words, such as those, 'You should not have married!' Have you seen any one you could love better than your husband?"

"Oh, no, no, no! not that," interrupted his wife, clinging closer to his neck, "not that; only I am not fit to be any one's wife. I do not know how to be a housekeeper. Here it is evening, and the rooms up stairs are all in disorder."

"Why, what has Sally been doing?"

"Cooking, cooking all day. Breakfast was no sooner over than she had to go to market; then visitors came; I had to attend the door myself. I did not care for that though, for they were only Carrie and Kate; we practiced duets together until dinner-time, then I set the table myself, and waited a whole asked you to come to dinner. Sally got out of patience, and talked ever so much Irish to herself; knew it was all about leaving here. If she leaves, I do not know what will become of me, Charles." Here another burst of tears. "Then I watched and waited for you; you never came until supper-time. I have not eaten a thing since lunch, and have not seen you a day this week from morning until night. O dear! I can never live so; life is a purgatory, as Sally truly says, upon such terms. I know I feel incapable of doing any more than I do; still everything is in disorder."

Here Mr. Ainslie interposed a remark as prelude to the cure. "Leonora, you know that it was your own choice, when you became a wife, to keep but one servant; indeed, your impulse would have led you to dispense with that one, if necessity had not prevented. Never mind that though; then you wanted yourself more than I wished you, in arranging your rooms, from your too eager desire of having everything done in a moment. A little patience, and all would have been as well, if not better."

"There! even what I did do," interrupted Mrs. Ainslie, "meets no praise from you, though I nearly killed myself to have a room fixed every day when you came home."

"I do praise you, Leonora; you can do all things perfectly if you give yourself time. You would not wait for an upholsterer, and caused yourself useless fatigue, besides risk of life, in hanging pictures and curtains; not to speak of the danger my own neck was in when the whole family of St. Joseph came tumbling down upon my devoted head, two days after you hung up the picture. Faith! it's well they came in canvass, or it would have been a matter of serious moment to me, just starting out in life with such a family on my shoulders. All jokes aside; you have chosen to take the domestic arrangements into your own hands; endeavor to accomplish your original intention; you will meet with no opposition from me, but every assistance or counsel in my power that I can give you. To produce harmony in any condition of things requires system. By your own account you have done nothing this day but breakfast, answer the bell once, practice duets, dress for dinner, and wait for me; no wonder you are wretched, and life is a purgatory. It would make a warmer place than poets dream, of this beautiful earth to me, if I had so little to do."

"System!" petulantly argued Mrs. Ainslie, with some spirit, "all metaphysics. Charles, you are only systematic from habit. You have certain hours of the day to appear on 'Change. All men are alike; you could not alter your mind any more than the sun his course, if a genius arose to instruct you in a different path. You must walk Wall Street, with the crowd going down, whether you have business or not; return with the mass coming up, look more knowingly than you know how to talk of who a bull to-day will be a bear to-morrow. You would find yours was an explosive system if you held command over the affairs of this house for a week."

"This house! Why, Leonora, what will become of you when you occupy the mansion you have planned yourself, if you do not try, by degrees, to resort to some method of management?"

"I'll give up the mansion cheerfully."

"No, that you cannot do, for this week I have been detained by examining estimates, and to-day have contracted for the work; so neither deprive yourself of food nor ease of mind, at the casual detentions of a man of business; and listen to me for only a few moments longer, while I just show you how much you might accomplish by a more judicious disposal of your time."

CHAPTER III.

It may be as well to detail a few of the arguments Mr. Ainslie made use of to bring his wife over to his opinions. She listened, as wives should always (though seldom do), to all her husband said; making silent comments upon the impracticability of some of his suggestions. Once sensible of the real necessity of putting her hand to, at the present time to aid Sally, whose services were really invaluable, she, at a glance, foresaw how much annoyance she could spare herself. She was willing, but, as yet, did not know how. She had always arranged and dusted her parlor, except on regular cleaning days; beyond that, her aspirations had never ascended. Her readiness to appropriate her time, as her husband proposed, warred with nothing so much as his desire of reducing her number of friends. To convince her that her new duties required so slight a sacrifice, Mr. Ainslie gave her paper and pencil to write down the names of those she called her "dear friends." Name followed name in rapid succession until the list swelled to the number of one hundred. Incredible almost to herself, she could have continued adding, had he not expressed his satisfaction that the list was sufficiently lengthy for his required purpose. Marking off such as he desired her to cease visiting; then, specifying others for intimate friends on account of similarity of tastes; adding an aged friend's name or so to the list, that she had forgotten, he placed his own only at the bottom of it, under the term "Confidential." His wife looked on with amazement, and exclaimed—

"Why, Charles! how can I hurt the feelings of these old friends? They have known me all my life, and will call me proud and unfeeling. Indeed, I could not bear to hear such terms applied to me."

"They have known you all your life? That is no reason to urge against what I propose," replied he, now looking seriously. "Pray what advantage have they been to you? Is there one among them that is distinguished for any superior virtue? Have you ever learned anything useful from them? Have you not sung yourself hoarse, played cotillions for their coteries, to my knowledge without even a 'thank you' from them? They flatter you, and kiss their dear friend, as they call you, a dozen times a day—in the street—over the gutters—it matters not when or where. As long as you change your dress for every party, look stylish, introduce them to the society of your valued friends, who would not afterwards notice them, to further their own private views, they will court you. But, wait and mark my words, if one of those, whose names I have erased, comes to this little domicile after the first visit of curiosity is paid. Now, that you cannot give large parties for them, you will be amused to hear the excuses they will give when they meet you by accident. Give yourself no concern about hurting their feelings; instead of you dropping them, they will drop you. Rejoice with me that you have, through disinterested love, placed yourself in a position to judge who are your real friends. In the mean time, keep your own secret about our future plans or intended removal. This winter will open your eyes to a new glimpse of life as it is. I would that Mrs. Ainslie's society should be more eagerly sought than easily obtained.

Mrs. Ainslie was sensible that all her husband advanced was true. Through the retrospective view he sketched of those evenings, she saw that, though an invited guest, she performed the office of musician for the company. She did not feel mortified, for, through her unselfishness, she had won the heart of her loved husband. For him, and a few other shining lights, "the coteries" had been organized, their ostensible object, amusement; their paramount, good settlement in life. Mr. Ainslie, in giving the dose, had worked a cure; he had given his wife a secret to keep. Their new house! she would not breathe a word of it, it was to be in a secluded part of the city; no one would find it out until they would call at this to-be-vacated abode, and find them removed to some number or other, Washington Square.

It was an ordeal to which she was not displeased to subject her friends. How Carrie would enjoy it! she thought; and Kate (though Charles had insinuated to the contrary) was sure, was true as steel. Nous verrons.

The next morning, for the first time since her marriage, Mrs. Ainslie finished her toilet before her husband had descended to the kitchen. It was rather colder than she liked, as the night air had penetrated into the entries, making door handles cold to the touch; but, wrapping her quilted morning-dress more closely around her, she made her entrée into the kitchen, to the great wonderment of Sally, and the immediate construction of three crosses on the forehead, nose, and mouth of that most worthy woman. In hasty tones, Sally demanded if "the master was ill, or herself either?"

"All well enough, Sally," Mrs. Ainslie replied; "but I am coming down every morning to see that Mr. Ainslie's breakfast goes properly to the table."

"That you may be as good as your word," ejaculated Sally.

"Well, Sally! it is not proper for you to make any remarks, for you do cook and do your work well; but it is the duty of every mistress, you know, to be occasionally seen in her own kitchen."

"The oftener the more welcome surely," responded Sally; and, as Mrs. Ainslie carried the nice hot beefsteak, brown and broiled, up to the dining-room in one hand, and raised her dress with the other to the exhibiting of a tiny foot, beautifully chaussée, Sally paused on the step to remark to her invisible friend in the dresser, in pure mother tongue, "Another notion."

That breakfast was avowed decidedly the best ever eaten by Mr. Ainslie, in his own proper person, a confession, probably, elicited from the fact of meat being a stranger to his palate since the morning previous. The love he made to his wife by looks was carefully illustrated by untiring devotion to the beefsteak. Mrs. Ainslie praised his appetite, as indeed it was a subject of her remarks. Mr. Ainslie praised her beauty of a breakfast cap until Sally confidentially vowed, to her before-mentioned friend, "that it was as good as a play to listen till them."

Mr. Ainslie's departure was the signal for Sally's performance on the bones. On this memorable occasion, there was indeed little else left; not that Sally was anything of a minstrel or "bona fide" musician, for, upon the occasion of Max Larer's benefit, she observed to her invisible friend that "never did she see such sights, and hear such sounds before nor since she landed in America, and that was four years next Candlemas."

The hall door closed; Mrs. Ainslie's light foot was heard on the stairs. Before proceeding to her own room, she gave the necessary orders to Sally, who was more puzzled at the evident change for the better, in her mistress, than at the dissection she had abandoned knife and fork for, resorting to the "council of Ten," her fingers so named, that, as she observed, "never deserted herself, nor mother church, in a pinch."

Whatever she thought, she made no remarks upon the happy occasion until she reached the kitchen, when she gave full vent to her feelings, rejoicing at the dawn of an entire new condition of things. Like a second Micawber, Mrs. Ainslie was secured now from the dread of ever being deserted by Sally.

From this period, Mrs. Ainslie began to think. Ever anxious to act from principle, she endeavored to correct, or rather govern, her impulses. Through her wish to oblige, they occasionally blinded her judgment and caused her regrets. After a few months of watchfulness, she accustomed herself to reason upon matters of importance, and found the path of easy ascent that she at first thought difficult to climb.

She had made the mistake that many, even all, do upon entering into married life, who think that cares are nothing; to be sure hope, that "never-failing friend of man," and woman too, gilds the picture. Experience soon teaches us that the real must give place to the seeming. Did her spirit ever sink under her new cares? Her husband's kind word and approving smile gave her renewed strength. Was she weary? His heart she rested on. Was her new path a toil? No! but every step, like in the ladder of the vision, added a virtue that sped her onward, onward.

CHAPTER IV.

"FIFTEEN years brings changes in the life of every one," mused Sally; "them that was on the top spoke of the wheel are down now, and the down are up." Soliloquizing Sally had given up her old habits, and now resorted to figures in rhetoric. From the progress of the age, expansion of intellect, and other collateral causes, she had given up, or forgotten, her friend in the dresser. Without consciousness of the injury she was doing, Sally had fallen into disgrace through her attachment to her; upon several occasions, Mrs. Ainslie, inferring, from the constant reference of her domestic affairs to the dresser, that Sally was indulging in insoberb remarks, prohibited the use of the Irish language in the kitchen, on pain of dismissal.

The above allusion to the mutability of human affairs was owing, no doubt, to Sally's retrospective of her past life. Sally now rode in a carriage; probably, for want of better occupation, was watching every turn of the highly-polished wheels, while taking a ride on the Bloomingdale road with Mrs. Ainslie and the children. Her mistress and she were both thoughtful during this evening. On that day, Sally had accompanied her on a visit to a sick, and apparently dying, woman. The house was in a questionable neighborhood for a lady to be seen alone in; so together they sought the abode designated. They had to travel up long flights of stairs, traverse long deep passages, until Sally felt herself called upon to exercise the protection of a whole host of saints, to "be between them and all harm." Finally, reaching the sixth landing, the door of the apartment marked 40, localities defined by numerals, Mrs. Ainslie entered upon a scene that never entirely left her remembrance.

Why pause to describe the picture? Yet it were as well. The first objects that met her view, upon entering into the room, were two aged persons, male and female, and three children, seated at a table, whose surface matched the hue of the discolored portion constituting their meal. Matted locks, glassy eyes, pallid and sunken cheeks, revealed of physical suffering more than language can express. Yet there were sounds of merriment belying their looks. A loud peal of laughter was checked at Mrs. Ainslie's entrance, created by a little sick child who refused to eat a dried potato that it held in its hand. An older brother of the little moving mass of filth, imitated its whining tones, repeating, "I can't eat it, I want mammy." "Give it to Doggey, then," said the toothless dame, as she shoved a large Newfoundland at her feet. The animal's immovability caused her to look down. The dog lay dead. Sick, almost to fainting, as a glance revealed such unlooked-for wretchedness, Mrs. Ainslie shrunk back. These were not the persons she came to see. A moment, and the door would have closed upon the scene, had not the spectre of a tall pale girl arrested her flight, who, pointing to a corner, said, "There is mother."

Mrs. Ainslie mechanically obeyed the direction indicated, nearly tottering to the side of a narrow bed, whereon lay the emaciated form of a woman in the last stage of consumption.

"Father of mercy!" exclaimed Mrs. Ainslie, "can this be my old friend Carrie?"

"All that remains of her, Leonora, if you will allow me so to call you. If I had always taken your good advice, I would be less fearful of offending you by that title. Do not weep; you must hear how much I owe you; your example was my guiding star of life, until pride made me a stranger to you. I could ill-bear bounty from your hands, you whom he nearly defrauded. I felt that we would meet again, though little dreamed it would be thus and at this hour. You cannot blame me that I loved him to the last. He would have regained his honorable position among men, had his life been spared; but he has gone to his last account, where I shall soon follow." The invalid wept.

In answer to Mrs. Ainslie's kind inquiries, she resumed. "Look at these," as she held up her almost transparent hands; "they have supported me for years. This, your gift, clasping the sacred volume lying open, my only solace. Sickness and poverty have changed my face, but not my heart. I rejoice that 'there is another and a better world;' but weep only to leave that dear child among strangers; yet He hath promised to be a father to the fatherless; into His hands I commend her!"

The girl remained motionless, in an attitude of deep grief, at the foot of the bed. The dim light revealed her features sufficiently to show Mrs. Ainslie a face of distinct beauty, though want and sorrow had stamped the impress of premature age.

"You must both leave this place," she said, as her thoughts reverted to the picture that first met her view.

"Not worth while. I could not survive a removal. They are very kind to me. Those children's mother was a faithful servant of mine. She died a month since of this same disease. The old man is blind. The grandmother does all she can, but not much since the youngest child fell ill. He will soon be better off. The rest are going to the poor house; only promise to be with me at my last hour, dear Leonora; then lay me in a grave beside my Harry."

Mrs. Ainslie could endure no more; but, promising to return the next day, hastened from a scene whereon my pen has, perhaps, dwelt too long.

The next day the dying Caroline Selby was removed to comfortable rooms. Skillful nursing prolonged her life for a short period. But a few weeks passed when Mrs. Ainslie closed the eyes of her early friend, and the daughter wept bitter tears over the graves of parents whose pride had caused their ruin.

CHAPTER V.

A FEW years after the foregoing events, Mr. Ainslie retired from business. A fortunate turn in the money-market had placed him far above competence. He was one of the few who bear prosperity well. Always liberal, though early in life no stranger to straightened resources, he maintained a good name, and commanded the respect of his fellow-men. Too sensible to quit all business, and adopt the slavery of leisure, as he termed it, he appeared on 'Change every day, giving his attention to the rise and decline of stocks—his hobby—thereby aiding, by his foresight, his brother-in-law, Ralph Carroll, who had succeeded him in business. His family was now large: three sons, two blooming daughters, besides Mrs. Ainslie's father and brother, and his adopted daughter, Caroline Selby. Mrs. Ainslie had matured into all that is lovely in woman, practicing the virtues that adorn the respective characters of child, sister, wife, friend, and mother.

In her long life they had met with trials that would, but for the sweet corrective of mutual confidence, have caused disastrous results. Through all, their confidence in each other's faith and love had remained firm, bearing them hoping, trusting, lovingly on. If the old sofa, that witnessed the young wife's first and final display of petulance, could have spoken, it would have told of as gentle words and as loving endearments as it witnessed twenty years before. Silent and contented, it bore the burthen of those secret joys until death. «It was beginning to get objectionable usage from its old friend, Sally, who, from admiring it above all things, had taken a violent aversion to it, actually averring that it was not fit to hold a place in her mistress' room. When Mrs. Ainslie pleaded old associations for her attachment to it, Sally argued that there was little need of getting a new one in her, the house-keeper's, room, when that was good enough. Mrs. Ainslie only smiled at these remarks. Sally ruled the house, sometimes the children, but never her.

Opposite to the "rich broker's" house—for so was the Ainslie mansion called—was one of more modern date. A park, shaded by time-grown trees and watered by a summer-flowing fountain, alone intervened to hide them from each other's view, except during the winter season. The inmates led a gay life apparently, as once a fortnight, at least, during the fashionable season, the quiet of the neighborhood was interrupted by the sound of carriages wheeling the busy seekers of the world's gay pleasures to and fro. Of a particularly quiet night, the sound of music, the signal of the dance, reached the ears of the Ainslies as their hour came for retiring. It was a subject of remark to the gossips, that the gay Mrs. Ellsworth and Mrs. Ainslie never recognized each other when they met in society, as it was a well-known and often-repeated fact that, when the former was Kate Marley, Mrs. Ainslie and she were very intimate friends. For whatever reason, concluded they, it was very evident that it was Mrs. Ainslie's own fault if she was not seen at the Ellsworth soirées, as it seemed to many Mrs. Ellsworth gave them purposely to pique Mrs. Ainslie into noticing her.

All of which was perfectly true. Mrs. Ellsworth writhed under the mortification of several defeated attempts she had made to resume her former intimacy. She yet hoped that time would effect her wishes through a yet surer medium than had yet been tried. Their children both attended Ferrero's dancing-school, passing friends, but for the malice and envy of the young Ellsworths towards those of the scholars who excelled them in dancing or dressing better than themselves. From some news that reached Mrs. Ellsworth through the young people, she thought one trial more and her object was obtained. She resolved to make a personal application. No one's favor was anything to her so long as, in the face of society, Mrs. Ainslie continued to pass her coldly by.

Arraying herself in the plainest of her morning dresses, effacing all appearance of rouge from her face, assuming a look of humility that, in heart, she was far from feeling, she quietly left her house, hastily traversed the park, and ascended the door-steps of Ainslie mansion. The bell was answered by Sally, who seemed to be less occupied in doing than in giving directions to others. There were preparations for a grand party evidently going on. The Rubicon once passed, Mrs. Ellsworth cast a hasty glance into the suite of drawing-rooms, their sliding doors thrown back, their walls festooned with natural flowers, the thousand burners only wanting light to gild the whole with enchantment. The only room wherein to receive a visitor was Mr. Ainslie's study-library, or smoking-room. This combined all three.

Unrecognized by Sally, Mrs. Ellsworth sent no card or other message than a lady desired to see her mistress. A few moments followed, only serving to still the beatings of her heart, and increase her desire to be even the recognized acquaintance of the only person who had resisted the attractions of her wealth, when Mrs. Ainslie stood before her.

It were needless to detail the arguments the practical woman of the world used to effect her object. Sufficient for the purpose will be Mrs. Ainslie's reply, showing why she refused the vain appeal.

"For five years after my marriage, Catherine Marley, I acknowledged your influence. I would not listen to a doubt of your sincerity. As soon have dreamed of a sister's deceit as yours. You instigated me to one great folly in my youth, that causes me regret to think of; but it brought evil consequences alone to yourself. From the moment the fortune-teller prophesied a brilliant destiny to you, you became a changed being. To satisfy your ambition, you married, without loving, a man devoid of principle, for the sake of his wealth. Fashion became your idol, shutting your heart against all softening influences. I still loved and pitied you, knowing that I had innocently won the object of your unsolicited affections, nor did I jealously strive to mar your intercourse, depending upon his love and the fixedness of your principles.

"When I found that, though a married woman, you still thirsted for conquest, I sorrowed for your fall, and tried to cast you from my heart. When, with smooth tongue, you besought me to warn Harry Selby of his danger in time to save him from disgrace, and witnessed his gratitude, you dared the attempt to win my husband's love with a tale of my dishonor; then I spurned you from me, as the remembrance makes me now. Do not doubt. He told me all. But for your intrusion this morning, I deemed this a day of unalloyed happiness. You must be satisfied with this, our last interview. My duties require me elsewhere."

The discomfited votary of fashion left disappointed, not repentant. A few years closed her worldly career. Contemned by the truly virtuous, never knowing "the blessed peace this world cannot give," she went down to her grave the unhappy victim of a misplaced ambition.

CHAPTER VI.

A LONG train of carriages passed along the Broadway, leading from Mrs. Ainslie's mansion. There were old and young people. Gay faces; no grave ones. Everybody smiled as the cortège swept along. It was apparent to all that it was the occasion of a happy bridal. The crowd could not see the face of the bride. The blinds of her carriage were closed, as were those of the four others that followed "en train." It was five o'clock of an October evening. What a day it had been!—not a cloud! The very sun seemed not willing to set, until his last ray had stolen a kiss from the cheek of the bride. Many followed to the church to see the whole affair. The eight bridesmaids! The beautiful bride led forth by the happy bridegroom. "Who is he?" asked a dozen lookers-on. "Ralph Carroll." "Carroll! Who? Which?" "Don't you know the Carrolls? One of our old families. Ainslie, the broker's brother." "Oh! Ah! Who is the bride?" "Their adopted daughter, Caroline Selby." "Splendid girl, 'pon honor!" ejaculates the dandy, twirling his cane.

But now they walk up the aisle. The wedding guests, in their white gloves and white ribbons, dispose themselves in pews, where they can best see her face. They stand before the chancel. The bride is trembling from varied emotions. Her intended husband speaks a few words of encouragement. The vaulted roof is above her. A perfect stillness reigns around, when a strain of almost celestial harmony steals upon the air. Her eyes pierce the Heaven, painted in glowing light above; she would wish, if mortals could behold, to see the spot from whence her mother's eye watches over her. Again her eyelids fall. The clergyman approaches. Hands unite; then are pronounced the impressive words, what "He has joined no man shall put asunder." A pause. Friends crowd around the happy pair. The orphan bride leans on the neck of Mrs. Ainslie. One word, "Mother!" escapes her lips.

Soon the husband begins to show his authority. He snatches her away before half the people have kissed her. But the sun has taken his, and our old friend Sally hers. There she stands in the vestibule, too orthodox to cross the threshold. The love she bears the bride is manifested in the blessings she invokes upon her head, and the kisses on both her cheeks. The carriages move; the crowd disperse. A new moon arises that never sets. 'Tis the honeymoon! Night soon closes over the scene. The sound of music proceeds from the Ainslie mansion. There are gay and gladsome voices mingling together in converse and the dance. Among them stands, as conspicuous for virtue as the bride for loveliness, Mrs. Ainslie, of whom it may be truly said, "the registry of her life formed a transcript of Heaven."

THE POOR LOVER'S SONG.

BY MAURICE O'QUILL, ESQ.

MINE is not wealth, nor mine estate—
An humble lot I call my own;
And yet I would it were in fate
To make it thine and mine alone!
A lowly roof o'er thee and me,
A scanty board between us spread,
With passion pure as air and free,
Would bid us spurn life, richer led.

Thy sphere, I know, were better laid
In lofty domes of haughty pride,
Where borrowed arts, with splendor, aid
To make life's stream a golden tide.
But, by thy side, this breast of mine,
With truthful pulse, thine own would meet;
Whilst some gay lord might turn from thine,
Or scarce respond its loving beat.

I do not yearn the costly pearls
A princely purse may tempt with gold
From eastern climes, to gem the curls
That sweep thy brows in grace untold,
For thine are charms that chide the hand
Which could insult, with tinselled toys,
Their beauteous crowd, whose matchless band
From art's best deed the glance decoys.

Another hand than mine, I ween,
May yet press thine in wedlock's grasp,
And bright to him and thee the scene
I hope will wake beneath the clasp!
Yet worlds were sweet, and they were glad,
Together, if but thou and I
Could trace the paths which else were sad,
And must make mine the wish to die!

FANNY WHARTON; OR, WOMAN'S LOVE.

BY JOHN M. EVANS.

O Love, forsake me not!
Mine were a lone, dark lot,
Bereft of thee. HERMAN.

THE allusions made by a certain class of authors to the inconstancy of woman's affections have, of late, become so frequent that the mind turns in disgust from their invidious comparisons and unjust attacks.

With them a tale appears incomplete unless it depicts, in glowing colors, the fickleness of some fair one, or indulges in strains of sarcastic wit, intended to display in a ludicrous light the purest and holiest feelings of her nature.

Why is it that men—ay, and even those of the opposite sex!—will prostitute their talents by pandering to the vitiated tastes of a few (for we are unwilling to believe that many such exist) who seem to delight in gazing upon scenes which represent the fall and degradation of the fellow-beings? Does not the blush of shame suffuse the cheek of him who gives to the world that which the lofty character of woman stamps as false? And does it not deepen on the fair brow of her who can thus basely betray the interests and peace of her own sex, or lend her aid in deteriorating its true claims to man's admiration? We think that talent might be more profitably employed in advocating those claims, and in endeavoring to elevate woman to even a higher position in the moral scale than she now occupies.

Such an effort would not only correspond with the enlightened views of the nineteenth century, but it might snatch from oblivion the names of those who, in tracing the character of woman, give proof that they are ill calculated to contribute to the tastes of an enlightened people. Their views might have been appreciated in the dark ages of barbarism, when her true position was scarcely acknowledged. The physical powers of woman are, it is true, unequal to man's; but in regard to the powers of the mind, in many respects she rises far his superior. That bold development of thought which characterizes the intellect of the latter is surpassed in woman by a peculiar gentleness, which, in its general effect, is more powerful and striking; and there is, within the recesses of her heart, a depth of feeling that is unfathomable; a fountain whose waters sparkle in the bright sunshine of love, and cease not to flow when the horizon is darkened by the portentous clouds of sorrow.

Like the ivy, whose tendrils for years have twined amid some crumbling ruins, with all the tenderness of her nature she clings to the object of her early love, with a hallowed fondness and tenacity that earth cannot sever. Ah! there is a beauty in woman's undying love. No emblem of purity more perfect exists on this side of heaven.

To corroborate the truth of these general remarks, permit me, kind reader, to relate the following simple, yet truthful, narrative.

About three years since, I spent a few days amid the classic scenes of Wyoming Valley. During one of my pedestrian excursions, a short distance above Wilkesbarre, on the opposite side of the river, my attention was attracted by the peculiar neatness of a cottage, situated about fifty yards from the main road. From the singularity and beauty of its construction, so different from anything in the vicinity, I felt a strong inclination to examine more closely what to me appeared the abode of peace and contentment.

Acting under the impulse of my wishes, I entered the little gate that opened upon a lawn of velvety green in front of the house, and was slowly wending my way amid the fragrance exhaled from the flowers of Autumn, which bloomed in all their departing beauty around, when I was suddenly aroused from the agreeable reverie into which I had been thrown by the piercing shriek of a female. At first, I was unable to determine whence it proceeded, until a voice from the cottage called loudly for assistance. I quickened my pace, and arrived just at the moment that a young man, apparently of my own age, rushed from a neighboring wood and bounded upon a piazza that had been concealed from view by a trellised arbor in front, over which twined the scented woodbine, while clusters of roses hung in rich profusion around. Beneath this pleasant retreat, extended upon a rustic settee, lay the apparently inanimate form of a lady, attended by one somewhat advanced in years—another, a few years younger than the sufferer upon the couch—besides the young gentleman already alluded to. For a time, no one seemed to notice my presence, and, fearful of intruding upon the privacy of the family circle, I was quietly taking my departure, when a hand was gently laid upon my shoulder. I turned, and recognized the young man I had just left, who, extending his hand, and calling me by name, invited me to a seat. I was soon, however, relieved from my astonishment at this familiarity on learning his name. It seemed almost impossible that I could so soon forget the features of one who, but a few years previous, had been my most intimate and confiding friend; yet he who then addressed me was no other than Frank Wharton, with whom I had spent my happiest school days.

It was pleasant thus unexpectedly to meet with one whom I could address by the endearing title of friend, and feel that I was not entirely alone. As might be supposed, the afternoon wore rapidly away in discussing the events of past years—without, however, any allusion being made to the singular manner of my introduction, or the cause of his removal from his former home in Connecticut—until tea was announced; when I was duly presented to the mother and sister of Frank, neither of whom I had ever seen previous to that afternoon. At this moment, the door of an adjoining apartment opened, and presented to my view a young lady of surpassing beauty; who, on casting her eyes upon me, uttered a shriek more piercing than that which had startled me from the former part of the afternoon, and, swooning, fell into the arms of Frank. My curiosity was now fairly aroused relative to the nature of the mysterious influence I undoubtedly exercised over her; this I could in no manner account for. She was immediately removed to another room, and after the free use of restoratives, I was informed she had sufficiently recovered to explain, in an unconnected and incoherent manner, the cause of her distress, which was made known to Frank, who promised an explanation after tea. On reaching the piazza, my friend desired me to be seated, that he might communicate everything which appeared shrouded in mystery. I shall therefore use his own words, as nearly as possible:—

“On my return from school, I found everything at home prosperous, and promised myself much happiness with those I sincerely loved, and from whom I had been so long separated. But my father's failing health soon gave us sad premonitions that his society could not long be enjoyed; he was rapidly sinking under that fatal disease, consumption. Alas! our fears were too soon realized; in less than eight months after my return, he was committed to the silent grave. This was indeed a severe affliction, and one which we all felt most sensibly; but time healed the wound, and gradually the cheerfulness that hitherto had reigned amid our family circle once more resumed its sway over our hearts.

“And now was added to our number one whom we all loved; who for a long time had evinced a more than ordinary interest in my eldest sister Fanny, so singularly introduced to your notice this afternoon.

“Mr. Herman had removed from New York, and settled in our neighborhood a few months previous to my return from school; and from all that could be gathered from the general deportment of Henry, his son, he was in every respect an exemplary young man; possessing in a high degree those gentlemanly qualities which secured for him a welcome reception into the best families of the country.

“Fanny was among the first of his female acquaintances, and a mutual attachment was soon the result. Much of his leisure time was spent with her previous to the death of my father; but, after this bereavement, perhaps from feelings of condolence, or as the means of repairing, in part, the breach that all felt had been made by the hand of death, every evening brought our welcome visitor, whose endeavors to please and ingratiate himself into favor succeeded but too well. What were his particular motives, I could never ascertain; but of one thing I am convinced—that he was not actuated by those pure feelings of love which should characterize the advances of an honorable man. I will not attribute his protestations to an impurity of design; but rather persuade myself that his youth, and the surpassing beauty of Fanny, had awakened feelings which led him into the belief of love, when in reality the faintest spark of that passion had no existence in his breast.

“The summer had nearly passed, and many preparations were already completed for their approaching nuptials, to be celebrated the ensuing month, when Henry was unexpectedly called from home, to attend to some business in the adjacent town of L—. The evening previous to his departure was spent with his affianced bride; and all the sorrow attending a two days' separation of lovers was evinced by the swollen eyes of Fanny after his departure.

“But as all seasons arrive, so came the evening for Henry's return. Fanny had early stationed herself at a window from which she always watched his approach, casting anxious glances down the dusty road. But she was doomed to disappointment. The dark shadows of night gradually enshrouded each distinct object, and one by one the stars glimmered through the gloom; but her eyes were strained in vain to descry the object of her solicitude. The evening gradually wore away, but a long and wearisome one it was to her: and the next morning I was early dispatched to ascertain if Henry had arrived. Imagine, therefore, my surprise to learn, from his own acknowledgment, that he had returned about two o'clock the previous day.

“After a very few moments' conversation, during which the name of Fanny was not once mentioned, I retraced my steps, wondering what could have produced a change so sudden and unaccountable as was displayed in the cool and indifferent reception I had met with.

“Long before I reached home, I beheld my sister approaching, and endeavored to fortify myself against her inquiries, feeling an unwillingness to tell her what I believed to be the true cause of his neglect. After assuring her of his safe return, and answering her innumerable questions as cautiously as truth would admit, I sought my mother, and communicated to her all my fears, which, as I shall show, were not groundless.

“The day to which I allude was Saturday; and, as the morning passed without bringing Henry, Fanny persuaded herself that he would come, as usual, in the afternoon, and with her enjoy their accustomed walk. Vain hope! Evening came, and brightly dawned the Sabbath morn; but there came no joys to dispel the sadness that had already taken possession of her heart. She resisted all our attempts at persuading her to accompany us to church, and often have I blessed the resolution that prevented her yielding consent.

"My mother, through indisposition, was also prevented from filling her accustomed seat; our family being represented by my younger sister and myself.

"Scarcely had we taken our seats when the inquiring glances of those around us gave proof of some important arrival; and in a few moments Henry Herman escorted to his own pew a young lady whose dress and manners indicated those of a stranger. For a time, I could scarcely realize that what I beheld was not a dream, and endeavored to drive from my mind feelings of indignation that struggled for life, and whispered revenge against the perjured betrayer of my sister's happiness. Everything seemed now strongly to confirm the fears I had entertained; yet I could not believe that his was a heart so base, and hoped that some misunderstanding had caused the cessation of his visits, which, when explained, would again restore the smile of gladness and the rose-hued flush of health to the cheek of our sweet Fanny. But this was not the case; and on the following day, the truth of my suspicion was confirmed.

"Connected with the hotel at which Henry was stopping while at L——, was the principal stage office of the town; and on the morning of his departure, while his carriage was waiting at the door, a young lady presented herself to the agent, and desired a seat in the coach for B——; a request with which he could not comply, as every one had been previously engaged. At this she appeared very much disappointed, and inquired if there was no other mode of reaching the place that day; to which he replied that there was not, unless she would accept a seat in Mr. Herman's carriage, who resided within one mile of the place she intended visiting, and who, he thought, would not object thus to accommodate her.

"'Certainly not,' replied Henry, who had overheard the conversation; 'nothing could afford me more pleasure.' At first she was undecided whether to accept of such an offer from a perfect stranger, or remain; but her desire to reach the town that day finally triumphed over other feelings, and she was handed into the carriage by Henry, who immediately started for home.

"It is almost useless for me to follow them further. The acquaintance, thus singularly formed, soon ripened into love; and, sir, I have every reason to believe that Henry, though under most sacred obligations to another, pledged her his love before he had been in her society six hours.

"It soon became the general topic of conversation among gossiping neighbors; and that Fanny might be made acquainted with the truth by some sympathizing friend, I was appointed to tell her all. A more painful duty I never performed.

"I endeavored to arouse her pride, and advised her to treat him with the utter contempt he deserved; but in this I touched a chord in her woman's heart that could not respond to the feelings of my own, and never shall I forget the piercing look she fixed upon me as she replied—

"'Frank, do you suppose me deprived of a woman's heart?'

"It was all she could say; but that simple question spoke volumes. As well may the hand of man endeavor to calm the mighty heavings of the ocean, as attempt to crush the love of a young and confident heart. There is in its operations a power that obeys no law. It springs unbidden into existence; and naught on earth can quench the kindling flame.

"I obtained an interview with Henry, hoping to effect a reconciliation, and secure a renewal of the attentions so long lavished upon my sister; not that I considered it an honor to have his name associated with ours, but in consideration of the sacred obligations he had of choice assumed in regard to her whose health or reason I feared would eventually sink under the effects of his cruel desertion. Accordingly, I requested him to call, in order that everything connected with his conduct might be explained. With this request he never complied.

"But months rolled on, and with them was borne every trace of the dreary winter. To us it had been cheerless indeed; and, as the soft breath of spring kissed each opening bud and flower, new life seemed infused into everything around, except the heart of Fanny. For her the season, with its expanding beauties, brought no smile; on the contrary, a settled melancholy seemed brooding o'er her spirits, that all our efforts could not dispel. The name of Henry was no longer mentioned in her presence; and now, more than ever, had we reason to dread the shock which the tidings of his recent marriage might create. Accordingly, every precaution was employed to keep it concealed from her, but without avail. An intimate friend of my mother's, while in the presence of Fanny, during the course of a general conversation, abruptly adverted to Henry's marriage.

"Alas! it was now too late to remedy what had been caused by the mere thoughtlessness of a friend; and, sir, from that moment my sister became imbecile. All recollections of the past seemed obliterated from memory. Her soul appeared steeped in the depths of forgetfulness, as the waves of oblivion's dark sea rolled in upon it.

"The lapse of years now renders her society a source of peculiar pleasure to me; but then I could scarcely bear to look upon her, so altered, yet still so beautiful. Ah! could Henry Herman but have beheld the unmeaning expression of that beautiful face, the dull and vacant stare of those soft blue eyes, so often the theme of his admiration, or gazed upon that wreck of youth's bright hopes, methinks it would have been as a thorn, hanging forever in the depths of his soul; but they have never seen each other since the fatal evening previous to his departure for L——.

"About two years since, we exchanged our former home in Connecticut for this beautiful spot, trusting that a change of scenery would prove beneficial to my sister; and we had fondly believed that, with the apparent departure of everything connected with the recollection of bygone years, by her Henry was no longer remembered. But this day has proved to the contrary. The moment her eyes rested upon you, a fancied resemblance to the object of her love recalled those visions which we had hoped were buried with the past, and produced the painful effects you have witnessed. Though insensible to everything around, his image seems indelibly impressed upon her heart."

I had listened to this affecting narrative with fixed attention, and would gladly have accepted of my kind friend's invitation to prolong my visit, had I not entertained fears of again producing effects similar to those of which I had already been the unconscious cause. Accordingly, I left that interesting family; but never can I forget the sad impressions formed by the recital of that truthful tale. Fearful, indeed, must be the retribution awaiting him who can dare to act the part of Henry Herman! There is, in fact, no combination of language sufficiently strong to express the detestable character of one whose baseness leads him to trifle with the holy affections of woman—of one who, to gratify a feeling of pride, will, in deed if not in word, pledge his love, and then with perjured soul turn from the unfortunate victim of his false vows.

LEOPARDI.

BY HENRY T. TUCKERMAN.

PROVINCIAL life in Italy can scarcely be realized by an American except through observation. However remote from cities, or sequestered in location, may be a town in this country, if not connected with the great world by railroad and telegraph, the newspaper, the political representative, and an identity of feeling and action in some remote enterprise or interest, keep alive mutual sympathy and intelligence. But a moral and social, as well as physical isolation belongs to the minor towns of the Italian peninsula. The quaint, old stone houses enclose beings whose existence is essentially monastic, whose knowledge is far behind the times, and whose feelings are rigidly confined within the limits of family and neighborhood. A more complete picture of still-life, in the nineteenth century, it is difficult to imagine, than many of these secluded towns present. The dilapidated air of the palaces, the sullen gloom of the narrow streets, as one turns into them from the square, where a group of idlers in tattered cloaks are ever engaged in a game or a gossip, the electrical effect of a traveling-carriage, or a troop of soldiers invading the quiet scene, at once inform even the casual visitor of the distance he is at from the spirit of the age. With the decayed air of the private houses, their worn brick floors and primitive furniture, contrast impressively the extensive and beautiful view usually obtainable from the highest windows, and the architectural magnificence of the church. We are constantly reminded that modern amelioration has not yet invaded the region; while the petty objects to which even the better class are devoted, the importance attached to the most frivolous details of life, the confined views and microscopic jealousies, or dilettante tastes that prevail, assure us that liberal curiosity and enlarged sympathy find but little scope in these haunts of a nation devoid of civil life, and thrust upon the past for mental nourishment.

It is, however, comparatively easy to imagine the influence of such an environment upon a superior intelligence. Recoiling from the attempt to find satisfaction in the external, thus repressed and deadened, the scholar would there naturally turn to written lore with a singular intensity of purpose; the aspirant would find little to tempt him from long and sustained flights into the ideal world; and the thinker would cling to abstract truth with an energy more fond and concentrated from the very absence of all motive and scope for action and utterance. It is thus that we account, in part, for the remarkable individuality and lonely career of Giacomo Leopardi, one of the greatest scholars and men of genius modern Italy has produced. He has left a glimpse of this monotonous and ungenial life in one of his poems—La Vita Solitaria :—

"La mattutina pioggia, allor che l'al
Battendo esulta nella chiusa stanza
Le gallinella ed al balcon s'affaccia
L'abitator de' campi, e il Sol che nasce
I suoi tremuli rai fra le cadenti
Stille saetta, alla capanna mia
Dolcemente picchiando, mi risveglia;
E sorgo, e i lievi nagoletti, e il primo
Degli angelli susurro, e l'aura fresca,
E le ridenti piagge benedico;
Poichè voi, cittadine infauste mura,
Vidi e conobbi assai, là dove segue
Odio al dolor compagno; e doloroso
Lo vivo, e tal morirò, deh tosto! Alcuna
Benche scarsa pietà pur mi dimostra
Natura in questi lochi, un giorno oh quanto
Verso me pin cortere.

Leopardi was the son of a count, whose estates are situated at Recanti, in the March of Ancona, and here his early youth was passed chiefly in his father's library, which consisted wholly of theological and classical books. After being taught Latin and the elements of philosophy by two priests, he seems to have been left to pursue his own course; and, at ten years old, he describes himself as having commenced a wild and desperate life of study, the result of which was a mastery of ancient classic and church literature, not only displayed in positive knowledge, but re-produced habitually in the form of translations and commentaries. Greek is not cultivated in Italy, and in this, as well as other branches of learning, he was quite isolated. In seven years his health was completely ruined by unremitted mental application. Niebuhr and Angelo Mai soon recognized him as a philologist of remarkable acumen and attainment; and laudatory articles in the French, German, and Holland journals, as well as complimentary letters from distinguished men, found their way to his secluded home. He duped scholars by tricks like those of Macpherson and Chatterton, in the pretended translations of an Hellenic fragment; he engaged in a literary correspondence with Monti and Gioberti; wrote able commentaries on the rhetoricians of the first and second centuries; annotations on the chronicle of Eusebius; invented new narratives of martyrdoms that passed for genuine; translated parts of the Odyssey, Epictetus, and Socrates; and, in fact, performed Herculean labors of research and criticism.

But the most remarkable feature of his life is the contrast between its profound scholarship and its domestic environment. During this period, Leopardi was treated like a child, kept at home by poverty, utterly destitute of companionship, except what he found in an occasional disputation with the Jews of Ancona; wretched in appearance, consumed by melancholy, struggling with his father against the project to dedicate him to the church; without sympathy from his kind, or faith in his Creator, or joy in his youth, or hope in his destiny. He only found temporary solace when consciousness was absorbed in his studious vigils, in the solitary library of a forlorn palace in that secluded town. Such is an epitome of Leopardi's youth. Of his works thus produced, there are but few and imperfect copies, many being still unedited; and his peculiar genius would be faintly revealed to us, had it not found more direct and personal expression in a few sincere and highly finished original writings, which shadow forth and embody, with singular eloquence, the life and the nature of the man.

Leopardi was born at Recanti, on the twentieth of June, 1798, and died at Naples, on the fourteenth of June, 1837. The restraint under which he lived, partly that of circumstances, and partly of authority, both exerted upon a morbidly sensitive and lonely being, kept him in his provincial birth-place until the age of twenty-four. After this period, he sought a precarious subsistence in Rome, Florence, Bologna, and Naples. Of the conscious aim he proposed to himself as a scholar, we may judge by his own early declaration: "Mediocrity frightens me; my wish is to love and become great by genius and study." In regard to the first desire, he seems, either from an unfortunate personal appearance, or from having been in contact with the insincere and the vain, to have experienced a bitter disappointment; for the craving for sympathy, and the praise of love, continually find expression in his writings, while he says of women, "L'ambizione, l'interesse, la perfidia, l'insensibilità delle donne che io definisco un animale senza cuore, sono cose che mi spaventano." He translated, with great zest, the satire of Simonides on women. Elsewhere, however, there is evinced a remarkable sensibility to female attractions, and indications appear of gratified, though interrupted affinities. Indeed, we cannot but perceive that Leopardi belongs to that rare class of men whose great sense of beauty and "necessity of loving" is united with an equal passion for truth. It was not, therefore, because his taste was too refined, or his standard too ideal, that his affections were baffled, but on account of the extreme rarity of that sacred union of loveliness and loyalty, of grace and candor, of the beautiful and the true, which, to the thinker and the man of heart, alone justifies the earnestness of love. Nature vindicated herself, as she ever will, even in his courageous attempt to merge all youthful impulse in the pursuit of knowledge, and twine around abstract truth the clinging sensibilities that covet a human object. He became, indeed, a master of lore, he lived a scholar, he kept apart from the multitude, and enacted the stoical thinker; but the ungratified portion of his soul bewailed her bereavement; from his harvest-fields of learning went up the cry of famine; a melancholy tone blended with his most triumphant expositions; and an irony, that ill conceals moral need, underlies his most vivacious utterance.

In his actual life, Leopardi confesses himself to have been greatly influenced by prudential motives. There was a reserve in his family intercourse, which doubtless tended to excite his thoughts and feelings to a greater private scope; and he accordingly sought in fancy and reflection a more bold expansion. His skepticism has been greatly lamented as the chief source of his hopelessness; and the Jesuits even ventured to assert his final conversion, so important did they regard the accession of such a gifted name to the roll of the church; but his friend, Ranieri, in whose arms he died, only tells us that he "resigned his exalted spirit with a smile." He presents another instance of the futility of attempting to graft religious belief externally, and by prescriptive means, upon a free, inquiring, and enthusiastic mind. Christianity, as practically made known to Leopardi, failed to enlist his sympathies, from the erroneous form in which it was revealed, and the abuses incident to such a manifestation; while, speculatively, its authority seemed to have no higher sanction than the antique philosophy and fables with which he was conversant. Had he learned to consider religion as a sentiment, inevitable and divine; had he realized it in the same way as he did love, as an experience, a feeling, a principle of the soul, and not a technical system, it would have yielded him both comfort and inspiration. Deformed, with the seeds of decay in his very frame, familiar with the history, the philosophy, the languages of the earth, reflective and susceptible, loving and lonely, erudite, but without a faith, young in years, but venerable in mental life, he found nothing, in the age of transition in which he lived, to fix and harmonize his nature. His parent was incapable of comprehending the mind he sought to control. Sympathy with Greece and Rome, compassion for Italy, and despair of himself, were the bitter fruits of knowledge unilluminated by supernal trust. He says the inspiegabile mistero dell'universo weighed upon his soul. He longed to solve the problem of life, and tried to believe, with Byron, that "everything is naught!"—tutto è nulla; and wrote, la calamità è la sola cosa che vi convenga essendo virtuoso. Nostra vita, he asks, che val? solo a spregiarla. He thought too much to be happy without a centre of light about which his meditations could hopefully revolve; he felt too much to be tranquil without some reliable and endeared object to which he might confidently turn for solace and recognition. The facts of his existence are meagre, the circle of his experience limited, and his achievements as a scholar give us no clue to his inward life; but the two concise volumes of prose and verse are a genuine legacy, a reflection of himself amply illustrative to the discriminating reader.

As regards the diction of Leopardi, it partakes of the superiority of his mind and the individuality of his character. Versed, as he was, both in the vocabulary and the philosophy of ancient and modern languages, he cherished the highest appreciation of his native tongue, of which he said it was sempre infinita. He wrote slowly, and with great care. In poetry, his first conception was noted, at once, and born in an access of fervor; but he was employed, at intervals, for weeks, in giving the finishing touches to the shortest piece. It is, indeed, evident that Leopardi gave to his deliberate compositions the essence, as it were, of his life. No one would imagine his poems, except from their lofty and artistic style, to be the effusions of a great scholar, so simple, true, and apparently unavoidable are the feelings they embody. It is this union of severe discipline and great erudition with the glow, the directness, and the natural sentiment of a young poet, that constitutes the distinction of Leopardi. The reflective power, and the predominance of the thoughtful element in his writings, assimilate him rather with German and English than modern Italian literature. There is nothing desultory and superficial; vigor of thought, breadth and accuracy of knowledge, and the most serious feeling characterize his works.

His taste was manly, and formed altogether on the higher models; in terse energy, he often resembles Dante; in tender and pensive sentiment, Petrarch; in philosophical tone, he manifested the Anglo-Saxon spirit of inquiry and psychological tendency of Bacon and Coleridge; thus singularly combining the poetic and the erudite, gay research and fanciful speculation, grave wisdom and exuberant love. Of late Italian writers, perhaps no one more truly revives the romantic associations of her literature; for Leopardi "learned in suffering what he taught in song," as exclusively as the "grim Tuscan" who described the world of spirits; his life was shadowed by a melancholy not less pervading than that of Tasso; and, since Laura's bard, no poet of the race has sung of love with a more earnest beauty. He has been well said to have passed a "life of thought with sorrow beside him." The efflorescence of that life is concentrated in his verse, comparatively limited in quantity, but proportionally intense in expression; and the views, impressions, fancies, and ideas generated by his studies and experience, we may gather from his prose, equally concise in form and individual in spirit. From these authentic sources, we will now endeavor to infer the characteristics of his genius.

His faith, or rather his want of faith, in life and human destiny, is clearly betrayed in his legend, or allegory, called, Storia del Genere Umano. According to this fable, Jove created the world infinitely less perfect than it now exists, with obvious limits, undiversified by water or mountains; and over it man roved without impediment, childlike, truthful, and living wholly in the immediate. Upon emerging from this adolescent condition, however, the race, wearied by the monotony and obvious bounds to their power and enjoyment, grew dissatisfied. Satiety took the place of contentment, and many grew desperate, loathing the existence in which they originally rejoiced. This insensibility to the gifts of the gods was remedied by introducing the elements of diversity and suggestiveness into the face of nature and the significance of life. The night was made brilliant by stars; mountains and valleys alternated in the landscape; the atmosphere, from a fixed aspect, became nebulous and crystalline by turns. Nature, instead of ministering only to vitality and instinctive enjoyment, was so arranged and developed as constantly to excite imagination and act upon sympathy. Echo was born, at this time, to startle with mysterious responses; and dreams first invaded the domain of sleep, to prolong the illusive agencies thus instituted to render human life more tolerable. By these means, Jove awakened to consciousness the soul, and increased the charities and the grace of existence through a sense of the grand and beautiful. This epoch was of longer duration than that which preceded it; and the weary and hackneyed spirits once more realized enjoyment in experiencing the same vivid impressions and zest of being which had marked the primitive era. But, at length, this warfare between the real and ideal, this successive interchange of charming delusion and stern fact that made up existence, wore upon the moral energies, and so fatigued the spirits of men, that it gave rise to the custom, once prevalent among our progenitors, of celebrating as a festival the death of friends. Impiety was the final result of this period in the history of the race. Life became perverted, and human nature shorn of its original beauty. This fallen condition the gods punished by the flood of Deucalion. Admonished to repair the solitude of the earth, he and Phyrre, though disdainful of life, obeyed the command, and threw stones behind them to restore the species. Jove, admonished by the past of the essential nature of man, that it is impossible for him, like other animals, to live happily in a state of freedom from evil, always desiring the impossible, considered by what new arts it was practicable to keep alive the unhappy race. These he decided were—first, to mingle in his life real evils, and then to engage him in a thousand avocations and labors, in order to divert him as much as possible from communing with his own nature, or, at least, with the desire of the unattained. He, therefore, sent abroad many diseases and misfortunes, wishing, by the vicissitudes of mortal life, to obviate satiety, and increase, by the presence of evil, the relish of good—to soften the ferocity of man, to reduce his power, and lead him to succumb to necessity, and to temper the ardor of his desires.

Besides such benefits, he knew that, when there is room for hope, the unhappy are less inclined to do violence to themselves, and that the gloom of disaster thus illumined is endurable. Accordingly, he created tempests, armed them with thunder and lightning, gave Neptune his trident, whirled comets into space, and ordained eclipses. By these, and other terrible phases of the elements, he desired to excite a wholesome awe, knowing that the presence of danger will reconcile to life, for a time at least, not only the unhappy, but those who most abominate it. To exclude the previous satiety, he induced in mankind appetites for new gratifications, not to be obtained without toil; and whereas, before the flood, water, herbs, and fruits sufficed for nourishment, now food and drink of great variety and elaborate preparation became a necessity; until then, the equality of temperature rendered clothing useless, the inclemency of the weather now made it indispensable. He ordered Mercury to found the first city, and divide the race into nations, tongues, and people, sowing discord among them. Thus laws were originated and civil life instituted. He then sent among men certain sentiments, or superhuman phantasms of most excellent semblance, such as Justice, Virtue, Glory, and Patriotism, to mould, quicken, and elevate society. The fruit of this revolution was admirable. Notwithstanding the fatigues, alarms, and griefs previously unknown to our race, it excelled, in sweetness and convenience, its state before the deluge; and this effect was owing mainly to the phantasms or ideas before alluded to, which inspired poets and artists to the highest efforts, and to which many cheerfully sacrificed their lives. This greatly pleased Jove, who justly thought that men would value life in proportion as they were disposed to yield it in a noble cause. Indeed, this order of things, even when superseded after many centuries, retained its supremacy so well that, up to a time not very distant from the present, the maxims founded upon it were in vogue.

Again, the insatiable desires of man alienated him from the will of the gods. Unsatisfied with the scope given to imaginative enjoyment, he now pleaded for Truth. This unreasonable exaction angered Jupiter, who, however, determined to punish importunity by granting the demand. To the remonstrances of the other deities, he replied by describing the consequences of the gift. It will, he assured them, destroy many of the attractive illusions of life, disenchant perception, and forever chasten the fervor of desire; for Truth is not to mortals what she is to divinities; she makes clear the beatitude of the one, but the misery of the other, by revealing the conditions of their fate, the precarious nature of their enjoyments, and the deceptive character of human pursuits. The long-sought blessing thus proved to the multitude a bane; for, in this new order of things, the semblance of the infinite no longer yielded satisfaction, but aggravated the soul, created unrest, longing, and aspiration. Under the dominion of Truth, universality supervened among men, landmarks lost their distinctness, nations intermingled, and the motives to earnest love or hate became few and tame; life thus gradually lost its original interest and significance to human consciousness, and its essential value was so greatly diminished as to awaken the pity of the gods at the forlorn destiny of the race. Jove heard their intercession benignly, and consented to the prayer of Love that she might descend to the earth. The gentle daughter of the celestial Venus thus preserved the only vestige of the ancient nobility of man. Often before had men imagined that she dwelt among them; but it was only her counterfeit. Not until humanity came under the dominion of Truth, did Love actually vouchsafe her genuine presence, and then only for a time, for she could not be long spared from Heaven. So unworthy had mankind become, that few hearts were found fit to receive the angelic guest, and these she filled with such noble and sweet emotions, such high and consistent moral energy, as to revive in them the life of the beatific era. This state, when realized, so nearly approached the divine, that Jove permitted it to but few, and at long intervals. By this means, however, the grand primeval sentiments were kept in relation with man, the original sacred fire remained unextinguished, and the glorious imaginings and tender charms of humanity yet lingered to nourish a sublime faith and infinite hope. The majority, however, continued insensible to this redeeming element, and profaned and ignorantly repudiated it; yet it ceased not to hallow, exalt, and refine the weary, sated, and baffled soul of man.

Such is a meagre outline of the allegory which shadows forth Leopardi's views of life. It would appear that he recognized no sign of promise in the firmament of existence, radiant as it was to his vision with the starry light of knowledge, but the rainbow of love, upon which angels seemed to ascend and descend—the one glowing link between earth and sky, the bridge spanning the gulf of time, the iris made up of the tears of earth and the light of heaven. In a note to this fable, he protests against having had any design to run a philosophical tilt against either the Mosaic tradition or the evangelists; but it is evident that he did aim to utter the convictions which his own meditations and personal experience had engendered. Nor is the view thus given of the significance and far-reaching associations of human love, when consecrated by sentiment and intensified by intelligence, so peculiar as might appear from his manner of presenting it. In Plato, Dante, and Petrarch, in all the higher order of poets and philosophers, we find a divine and enduring principle recognized under the same guise. The language in which Leopardi expresses his faith on the subject is not less emphatic than graceful: “Qualora viene in sulla terra, sceglie i cuori piu teneri e piu gentili delle persone piu generose e magnanime; e quivi siede per alcun breve spazio; diffondendovi sì pellegrina e mirabile soavità, ed empiendoli di affetti sì nobili, e di tanta virtù e forza, che egli allora provano, cosa al tutto nuova nel genere umano, pinttosto verità che rassomiglianza di beatitudine.”

The satire of Leopardi is pensive rather than bitter; it is aimed at general, not special error, and seems inspired far more by the sad conviction of a serious mind than the acerbity of a disappointed one. In the dialogue between Fashion and Death, the former argues a near relationship and almost identity of purpose with the latter; and the folly and unwholesome effects of subservience to custom are finely satirized, in naively showing how the habit she induces tends to shorten life and multiply the victims of disease. So in the proposal of premiums by an imaginary academy, the mechanical spirit of the age is wittily rebuked by the offer of prizes to the inventor of a machine to enact the office of a friend, without the alloy of selfishness and disloyalty which usually mars the perfection of that character in its human form. Another prize is offered for a machine that will enact magnanimity, and another for one that will produce women of unperverted conjugal instincts. The imaginary conversation between a sprite and a gnome is a capital rebuke to self-love; and that between Malambruno and Farfarello emphatically indicates the impossibility of obtaining happiness through will, or the agency even of superior intelligence. Leopardi's hopelessness is clearly shown in the dialogue of Nature and a Soul, wherein the latter refuses the great endowments offered because of the inevitable attendant suffering. In the Earth and Moon's interview, we have an ingenious satire upon that shallow philosophy which denies all the data of truth from individual consciousness and personal experience.

One of the most quaint and instructive of these colloquies is that between Federico Ruysch and his mummies, in which the popular notion of the pain of dying is refuted by the alleged proof of experience. The mummies, in their midnight song, declare the condition of death to be lieta no ma sicura. Physiologically considered, all pleasure is declared to be attended with a certain languor; Burke suggests the same idea in reference to the metaphysical effects of beauty on the nervous system; and this agreeable state is referred to by the mummies to give their inquisitive owner an idea of the sensation of dying. The philosophy of this subject, the vague and superstitious fears respecting it, have recently engaged the attention of popular medical writers; but the essential points are clearly unfolded in this little dialogue of Leopardi.

In his essay entitled Detti Memorabili di Filippo Ottonieri, we have apparently an epitome of his own creed; at least, the affinity between the maxims and habits here described and those which, in other instances, he acknowledges as personal, is quite obvious. Ottonieri is portrayed as a man isolated in mind and sympathies, though dwelling among his kind. He thought that the degree in which individuality of life and opinion in man was regarded as eccentric, might be deemed a just standard of civilization; as, the more enlightened and refined the state of society, the more such originality was respected and regarded as natural. He is described as ironical; but the reason for this was that he was deformed and unattractive in person, like Socrates, yet created to love; and, not being able to win this highest gratification, so conversed as to inspire both fear and esteem. He cultivated wisdom, and tried to console himself with friendship; moreover, his irony was not sdognosa ed acerba, ma riposata e dolce. He was of opinion that the greatest delights of existence are illusions, and that children find everything in nothing, and adults nothing in everything. He compared pleasure to odors which usually promised a satisfaction unrealized by taste; and said, of some nectar-drinking bees, that they were blest in not understanding their own happiness. He remarked that want of consideration occasioned far more suffering than positive and intentional cruelty, and that one who lived a gregarious life would utter himself aloud when alone, if a fly bit him; but one accustomed to solitude and inward life would often be silent in company, though threatened with a stroke of apoplexy. He divided mankind into two classes, those whose characters and instincts are overlaid and moulded by conformity and conventionalism, and those whose natures are so rich or so strong as to assert themselves intact and habitually. He declared that, in this age, it was impossible for any one to love without a rival; for the egotist usually combined with and struggled for supremacy against the lover in each individual. He considered delusion a requisite of all human enjoyment, and thought that man, like the child who, from a sweet-rimmed chalice, imbibed the medicine, according to Tasso's simile, e dal' inganano sus vita riceve. In these, and many other ideas attributed to Ottonieri, we recognize the tone of feeling and the experience of Leopardi; and the epitaph with which it concludes breathes of the same melancholy, but intelligent and aspiring nature: "Nato alle opere virtuose e alla gloria, vissuto ozioso e disutile, e morto senza fama non ignaro della natura nè della fortuna sua."

The Wager of Prometheus is a satire upon civilization, in which a cannibal feast, a Hindoo widow's sacrifice, and a suicide in London, are brought into vivid and graphic contrast. To exhibit the fallacy which estimates life merely as such a blessing, and to show that it consists in sensitive and moral experience rather than in duration, as color is derived from light and not from the objects of which it is but a quality, he gives us an animated and discriminating argument between a metaphysician and a materialist; and in illustration of the absolute mental nature of happiness when closely analyzed, he takes us to the cell of Tasso, where a most characteristic and suggestive discussion takes place between him and his familiar genius. The tyranny of Nature, her universal and inevitable laws, unredeemed, to Leopardi's view, by any compensatory spiritual principle, is displayed in an interview between her and one of her discontented subjects, wherein she declares man's felicity an object of entire indifference; her arrangements having for their end only the preservation of the universe by a constant succession of destruction and renovation.

His literary creed is emphatically recorded in the little treatise on Parini o vero della Gloria; and it exhibits him as a true nobleman in letters, although the characteristic sadness of his mind is evident in his severe estimate of the obstacles which interfere with the recognition of an original and earnest writer; for to this result, rather than fame, his argument is directed. As a vocation, he considers authorship unsatisfactory, on account of its usual effect, when sedulously pursued, upon the animal economy; he justly deems the capacity to understand and sympathize with a great writer extremely rare; the preoccupation of society in the immediate and the personal, the inundation of books in modern times, the influence of prejudice, ignorance, and narrowness of mind, the lack of generous souls, mental satiety, frivolous tastes, decadence of enthusiasm and vigor in age, and impatient expectancy in youth—are among the many and constant obstacles against which the individual who appeals to his race through books has to contend. He also dwells upon the extraordinary influence of prescriptive opinion, wedded to a few antique exemplars, upon the literary taste of the age. He considers the secret power of genius, in literature, to exist in an indefinable charm of style almost as rarely appreciated as it is exercised; and he thinks great writing only an inevitable substitute for great action—the development of the heroic, the beautiful, and the true in language, opinion, and sentiment, which, under propitious circumstances, would have been embodied, with yet greater zeal, in deeds. He thus views the art in which he excelled, in its most disinterested and noblest relations.

There is great naturalness, and a philosophic tone, in the interview between Columbus and one of his companions, as they approach the New World. In the Eulogy on Birds, it is touching to perceive the keen appreciation Leopardi had of the joyous side of life, his complete recognition of it as a phase of nature, and his apparent unconsciousness of it as a state of feeling. The blithe habits of the feathered creation, their vivacity, motive power, and jocund strains, elicit as loving a commentary as Audubon or Wilson ever penned; but they are described only to be contrasted with the hollow and evanescent smiles of his own species; and the brief illusions they enjoy are pronounced more desirable than those of such singers as Dante and Tasso, to whom imagination was a funestissima dote, e principio di sollecitudini, e angosce gravissime e perpetue. With the tokens of his rare intelligence and sensibility before us, it is affecting to read his wish to be converted into a bird, in order to experience awhile their contentment and joy.

The form of these writings is peculiar. We know of no English prose work at all similar, except the Imaginary Conversations of Landor, and a few inferior attempts of a like character; but there is one striking distinction between Leopardi and his classic English prototype: the former's aim is always to reproduce the opinions and modes of expression of his characters, while the latter chiefly gives utterance to his own. This disguise was adopted, we imagine, in a degree, from prudential motives. Conscious of sentiments at variance with the accepted creed, both in religion and philosophy, the young Italian recluse summoned historical personages, whose memories were hallowed to the imagination, and whose names were associated with the past, and, through their imaginary dialogues, revealed his own fancies, meditations, and emotions. In fact, a want of sympathy with the age is one of the prominent traits of his mind. He was skeptical in regard to the alleged progress of the race, had little faith in the wisdom of newspapers, and doubted the love of truth for her own sake, as the master principle of modern science and literature. Everywhere he lauds the negative. Ignorance is always bliss, and sleep, that "unfits the raveled sleeve of care," the most desirable blessing enjoyed by mortals. He scorns compromise with evil, and feels it is "nobler in the mind to suffer" than to reconcile itself to error and pain through cowardice, illusion, or stupidity. He writes to solace himself by expression; and he writes in a satirical and humorous vein, because it is less annoying to others and more manly in itself than wailing and despair. Thus, Leopardi's misanthropy differs from that of Rousseau and Byron in being more intellectual; it springs not so much from exasperated feeling as from the habitual contemplation of painful truth. Philosophy is rather an available medicament to him than an ultimate good.

Patriotism, learning, despair, and love are expressed in Leopardi's verse with emphatic beauty. There is an antique grandeur, a solemn wail, in his allusions to his country, which stirs, and, at the same time, melts the heart. This sad, yet noble melody is quite untranslatable; and we must content ourselves with an earnest reference to some of these eloquent and finished lyrical strains. How grand, simple, and pathetic is the opening of the first, All'Italia:—

"O patria mia, vedo le mura e gli archi
E le colonne e i simulacri e l'ermas
Torri degli avi nostri,
Ma la gloria non vedo,
Non vedo il lauro e il ferro ond'eran curchi
I nostri padri antichi. Or fatta inerme
Nuda la fronte e nudo il petto mostri.
Oimè quante ferite,
Che lividor, che sangue! oh qual ti veggio,
Formosissima donna! Io chiedo al cielo
E al mondo: dite, dite,
Chì la ridusse a tale? E questo è peggio,
Che di catene ha carco ambe le braccia,
Sì che sparte le chiome e senza velo
Siede in terra negletta e sconsolata,
Nascendendo la faccia
Tra le ginocchia, e piange."

In the same spirit are the lines on the Monument to Dante, to whom he says—

"Beato te che il fato
A viver non dannò fra tanto orrore;
Che non vedesti in braccio
L'itala moglie a barbaro soldato.
* * * * *
Non si conviene a sì corrotta usanza
Questa d'animi eccelsi altrice a scola:
Se di codardi è stanza,
Meglio l'è rimaner vedova e sola."

The poem to Angelo Mai, on his discovery of the Republic of Cicero, is of kindred tone—the scholar's triumph blending with the patriot's grief. An identical vein of feeling also we recognize, under another form, in the poem written for his sister's nuptials. Bitterly he depicts the fate of woman in a country where

"Virtù viva sprezziam, lodiamo estinta;"

and declares—

"O miseri o codardi
Figliuoli avrai. Miseri eleggi. Immenso
Tra fortuna e valor dissidio pose
Il corrotto costume. Abi troppo tardi,
E nella sera dell'umane cose,
Acquista oggi chi nasce il moto e il senso."

Bruto Minor is vigorous in conception and exquisitely modulated. In the hymn to the Patriarchs, La Primavera, Il Sabato del Vilaggio, Alla Lune, Il Passaro Solitaria, Il Canto notturno d'un Pastore errante in Asia, and other poems, Leopardi not only gives true descriptive hints, with tact and fidelity, but reproduces the sentiment of the hour, or the scene he celebrates, breathing into his verse the latent music they awaken in the depths of thought and sensibility; the rhythm, the words, the imagery, all combine to produce this result, in a way analogous to that by which great composers harmonize sound, or the masters of landscape blend colors, giving birth to the magical effect which, under the name of tone, constitutes the vital principle of such emanations of genius. But not only in exalted patriotic sentiment and graphic portraiture, nor even in artistic skill, resides all the individuality of Leopardi as a poet. His tenderness is as sincere as it is manly. There is an indescribable sadness native to his soul, quite removed from acrid gloom or weak sensibility. We have already traced it in his opinions and in his life; but its most affecting and impressive expression is revealed in his poetry. Il Primo Amore, La Sera del Di di Festa, Il Risorgimento, and other effusions, in a similar vein, are instinct with this deep, yet attractive melancholy, the offspring of profound thought and emotion. "Uscir di pena," he sadly declares, "è diletto fra noi; non brillin gli occhi se non di pianto; due cose belle ha il mondo: amore e morto." In that most characteristic poem, Amore e Morte, he speaks of the maiden who la gentilezza del morir comprende:—

"Quando novellamente
Nasce nel cor profondo
Un amoroso affetto,
Languido e stanco insieme con esso in petto
Un desiderio di morir si sente:
Come, non so: ma tale
D'amor vero e possente è il primo effetto;
Forse gli occhi spaura
Allor questo deserto: a se la terra
Forse il mortale inabitabil fatta
Vede omai senza quella
Nova, sola, infinita
Felicità che il suo pensier figura:
Ma per cagioni lui grave procella
Presentando il suo cor, brama quiete,
Brama raccorsi in porto
Dinanzi a fier desio,
Che già ruggiando, intorno, intorno oscura."

SONNET.—OCEAN.

BY WM. ALEXANDER.

WHERE hath thy voice, old Ocean, not been heard?
O'er every spot thy wild waves once have swopt,
And o'er high hill tops hath thou boldly crept;
Obedient only to the Omnipotent Word:
Sits stillness mid dark Africa's wastes; yet there
Of old wert thou. The effigies of thy Amazing primal denizens now lie
Sculptured on every crag. Thy fish appear Imbedded in the rock, so gray, whence hewed
Are Egypt's pyramids. Immensity
In thy broad bosom, too, is seen to be,
Where storms assume terrific attitude:
One only makes thee calm and quiet stand,
Who holds thy waters all in "hollow of his hand."

MY COUSIN.—A STORY.

BY K. R. P.

CHAPTER I.

A FEW simple sketches would I lay before you, gentle reader—sketches from the life of one I knew and loved—and which, I will hope, may serve to show the “good” which may be gained by “a word spoken in season.”

And now let me introduce at once the heroine of my little tale, my well beloved Cousin Alice, or, more formally, Miss Alice Ermyn, only daughter of the Hon. Judge Ermyn, and niece of the very worthy and venerable maidens, Miss Amelia Barton and her sister, Miss Anne, who, having had her in charge since her fifteenth year, and being, withal, very good-natured misses, had endeavored, aided in every respect by her father, as much as in them lay, to pet, pamper, and spoil entirely the interesting young heiress; and had succeeded as well as might be expected, when we consider the materials with which they had to work. But Alice was not easily spoiled; and, notwithstanding she possessed her share of faults, she was nevertheless a very lovely and a very “lovable” personage.

True, Aunt Anne was brought to acknowledge that “Alice was fond of having her own way,” while others thought Alice was downright obstinate; and Aunt Amelia “wished Alice were not quite so spirited,” while others were often annoyed at the little termagant’s display of temper; still, a tear or a nod from one she loved would cause her to yield, even when most determined to carry her point, or subdue her when in one of her most violent outbreaks of temper. And then, when not angry, no one could be more generous, more entirely thoughtless of self, more devoted in her love to her friend, than this same Alice.

The Misses Barton lived in a handsome white house, “beautifully situated on the banks of the Hudson,” as the geographers say. It was a fine old place, with its smoothly shaven lawns stretching down to the sparkling waters, and shaded by elm trees, the society of hill and dale, all belonging to the Barton farm; and the house, too, was a handsome structure, which had been built by Miss Barton’s grandfather. And the certainty that all this would descend to the young Alice did not, in the least, diminish the interest with which the mammon-loving community regarded her.

I had just returned from college when I first saw Alice Ermyn. I was about to make the tour of Europe, and was paying some long-owed visits previous to my departure. I was rather averse to making these visits, especially to my aunts Anne and Amelia, for several reasons. In the first place, like college youths in general, I imagined myself remarkably precocious, and feared that my profundity and wit would be but ill appreciated by maiden aunts; and then, as a natural consequence of my self-admiration, I considered ladies in general, and elderly ladies in particular, quite unworthy of my regards. Alice soon cured me of that, however; for she was then, verily, a charming little representative of the, by me, despised sex.

Expect not, however, any cousin’s flirtation. Notwithstanding Alice had, among other faults, quite a taste for coquetry, she would by no means waste her talents on such an unpromising specimen as myself; and, as for me, I soon loved Alice too well to flirt with her.

I have not, as yet, said one word about my cousin’s personal appearance; and, indeed, I scarcely know what to say. Some called her beautiful, some said she was pretty; others would only grant she might be so, were her nose straight and her eyes not so peculiar. For me, I know she was not beautiful, yet there was not one feature of her face I would have had altered.

She had one of those peculiar complexions so rarely seen, yet so extremely beautiful, where the skin seems transparent, and beneath it may be seen wandering, on her cheeks, the hue of the rose, and on her temples the delicate blue veins; her mouth, her teeth, and her chin, in its curve to the throat, were perfect; her eyes were a sort of hazel, of a rather unusual color, but bright and expressive.

Alice and I were soon warm friends. I had lost both my parents; Alice had only her father remaining, and he was my guardian. We had neither of us brothers or sisters, or any other cousins, so we naturally grew very fond of each other; and, though I was with her but a fortnight, and though that was our first meeting, still, when I left her, Alice cried bitterly, expatiated upon the absurdity of traveling in general, and of her cousin’s traveling in particular, and seemed about to launch into a regular “fit of the blues;” while I could only promise to write often, and claim the same promise from her. And so I left her.

Alice was then about fourteen; and when I next saw her, upon my return from Europe, she was eighteen. I had heard from her often during my absence. At length news came that she had gone to New York, and that, under the chaperonage of her aunt, the gay and beautiful Mrs. B——, she had made her entrée into fashionable life, and was admired and courted, as I had expected.

During the first year of my absence from home, I had formed the acquaintance of Philip Howe. He was several years older than myself, being at that time nearly thirty, while I was scarcely twenty, years old. Philip Howe was universally called, by the ladies, a very handsome and entertaining man, by gentlemen a very clever and agreeable one, and a very talented and fascinating one by all; and they were all right. The chief secret, however, of my first attachment to him lay in the fact that I already knew his sister in America; and, although my cousin Alice was a very dear cousin, I meant, on my return, that Helen Howe should be something still dearer. So Philip and myself became inseparable. We traveled together through England, France, Italy, and Switzerland; and with the increased knowledge which every day brought me of his noble character, did my love increase for him also. He possessed the most brilliant conversational powers I ever knew. His information was extensive, and his eloquence persuasive. I scarcely ever heard a subject discussed of which he did not seem to possess a thorough knowledge. One subject alone did he avoid—that of religion.

I had often spoken of Alice to Philip; but I remembered and described her only as a beautiful, but wayward child, and had never dreamed that such a one could ever influence a mind like his. I had read to him portions of her letters. At first, they were mere sprightly, girlish effusions, always entertaining, rarely thoughtful, and never studied; afterwards they assumed a deeper, more earnest tone, and seemed to speak a character more formed and more perfect. At all times they were refined, and displayed occasionally bursts of enthusiasm that would even startle one by their intensity. Philip seemed much interested in her letters.

"Your cousin," said he, "has a great deal of character. One may see that from her letters. They tell of a thoughtful mind, but a happy heart, and one that has never known sorrow."

"And God grant she never may!" said I. "She is ill fitted to bear with sorrow. I think a deep sorrow would kill Alice."

"Not so," answered Philip. "I see much of resolution in her letters; and I should judge that she had much of fortitude in her character."

At length, after an absence of four years, Howe and myself turned our route homeward.

"You must introduce me to your cousin Alice when we arrive at America," said Philip to me, the evening after our departure from England. We stood upon the deck watching the sunset. We had been speaking of Helen and my hopes.

"Willingly," was my reply to his remark. "And, by the way, I received a letter from her yesterday. I will read you a portion of it; for, in truth, I am somewhat surprised, not at what has occurred, but that she has said nothing about it before, when she has written so often."

And I procured the letter and read—Alice had united with the church.

"Do you wonder at this?" she wrote. "I trust not. I have been, I am still, high-hearted and happy; far happier than I had ever dreamed of before. It has come to me, this beautiful faith, like sunlight from the heaven above; and, while it has given to this life a joy unspeakable and more lasting, it has taught me that, when I have passed away from earth, He, the Holy One, has prepared a rest, a rest of happiness, where all who have loved Him here must be blessed forever, because His dwelling-place is there. Why should this love for the Creator render me gloomy and ascetic? Does it not rather render more perfect, because more holy, every earthly joy, and take the sting from every earthly woe? Does it not teach us to treasure more carefully, and esteem more highly, all those qualities in others which excite our love, because these they have received from 'our Father,' and it is the possession of these which renders them more like Him?"

"This Christian religion," said Philip, as if to himself, when I had paused, "is beautiful, if we could only believe it; infinitely more so than any other which has ever been formed."

"And do you not believe it, Philip?" said I.

He seemed annoyed, and hastily endeavored to change the conversation.

"Answer me, Philip," I insisted. "I wish to talk of this now."

He was silent a moment; then, approaching nearer to me, he replied—

"My mother died before my recollection. My father owned a large plantation in Georgia, where we resided. He was a man of talent and energy; but he possessed a grasping ambition and an indomitable pride; and—I speak thus to you alone, Tom—he had little regard for the means of which he made use, or what were the consequences to others, if only he accomplished his purposes. I was the oldest son. I had one brother, Edmond, who died when I was about eighteen. My father, for some reasons which I cannot explain to you, had always disliked me. He was a man of violent passions; and, after the death of my mother, his hatred of me increased to such an extent that he could not endure my presence. He selected a college at the north, where I should pursue my education, and I did not return to my home until after his death.

"And this man, my father, was a member of the church; and, as I often saw him leave his home with curses on his lip, and enter the church, and, with great apparent emotion, read the service and repeat the 'creed,' I could scarcely fail to acquire a disgust at the church which would admit such a member, and a disbelief of the religion which he professed.

"This has increased with my observation. I have, indeed, seen some more consistent believers than he, and some enthusiasts, who really seemed to believe the truth of the doctrine; but rarely have I seen one whose religion was of the heart, the understanding, and the conduct."

"But," said I, "should we conclude, because some of the professors of this faith are false, that the faith itself is so?"

"Perhaps not, Tom," replied he—"perhaps not. Let us speak no more of this. I meant never to have done so. It was not wise for me to risk the diminishing of our friendship on account of a mere difference of opinion; and still less would I wish that any word of mine should have a tendency to weaken your faith, if you really believe this doctrine. And now, Tom, let us never speak of this again." And, so saying, he turned and walked away.

Our voyage was prosperous; and, at length, the fair shores of America dawned upon our view, and soon after we had landed in the busy city of New York. As soon as possible after my arrival, I hastened to seek my uncle and cousin, and Howe to see his sister.

It was about nine o'clock in the evening when I rang for admittance at Mrs. B.'s beautiful mansion, and was ushered into her parlors. Judge Ermyrn, I was informed, was out of town, but Miss Ermyrn would be with me soon; and, almost before the message was delivered, she entered.

I had left Alice a child; I found her now a woman, and a very beautiful one; yet still the same warm-hearted Alice, as I discovered from her affectionate greeting. Her manners were still as winning as of old; but she had acquired a self-possession which rendered them still more graceful in the woman, though differing much from the waywardness, the quick succession of smile, and frown, and tear, which had rendered her so charming as a child. She still retained all her former frankness and artlessness, while, at the same time, firm principles seemed to have acquired the control of her impulsive temper.

The clear color still reveled in her cheek, and the smile still hovered round her red lip, disclosing as often as of old the pearls they hid; but, in the glance of her dark eye, might be seen traces of thoughts and feelings once unknown. Her usual exquisite taste was displayed in her dress; but I perceived, from its richness, that she was probably engaged somewhere for the evening. I asked her where, and received permission to accompany her.

"We were intending to go to Mrs. Arlington's for a short time, and then we were engaged to Mrs. Ward. By the way, it is there that Miss Howe resides. I believe you are acquainted with her, ain't you, coz? Mr. Ward is her guardian."

"Indeed!" said I, with an increased desire to accompany her. "I would like much to see Miss Howe"—

"I don't doubt it," interrupted Alice.

"But I don't care to go to Mrs. Arlington's."

"Oh," said Alice, "I will persuade my aunt to go there alone, and we will call for her in an hour."

She did so; and, after Mrs. B.— had "sailed" into the room, "congratulated me upon my safe arrival, hoped I was very well, and that she should see me often at her house," she left us with the injunction not to delay for more than an hour.

We talked earnestly and frankly until the clock told the hour of ten; then Alice, starting, declared we must go.

We called for Mrs. B.—, and drove to Mr. Ward's. I pass over the joy I felt at meeting Helen, and at the assurance I contrived to elicit that she was still true to me as when I left her.

At length, as I stood talking with her for a moment between the dancing, Philip joined us.

"I have seen a vision of loveliness, Tom," said he, "which I believe is some one to whom you have promised me an introduction. You have been so engrossed by some fair lady—don't blush so, Nelly—as to have quite forgotten it."

"Ah! What is she like?" said I. "Let me see if you are right in your conjecture."

"She has a laughing eye, a blushing cheek, and the most beautiful mouth, chin, and throat in the world. Then, I believe, she wears white gauze, or lace, or gossamer, over rose color. On the whole, I think she would remind one very much of a cherry rose, with a beam of sunlight flashing on its petals."

"Bravo, brother Philip!" said Helen. "You certainly are improved in the charming art of paying compliments to an absent lady, though scarcely in flattering one present."

"I leave that for Tom when we are with you. He does such things with a much better grace than I. Besides, Nelly, I have a strange way of never flattering those whom I love, especially when we have been parted so long as you and I have."

"Ah, brother," said she, "call all the world beautiful, if you will; while you remember your sister thus, she is happy." Then, suddenly changing her tone, as she saw my earnest gaze at her face, with a blush and a smile that a woman has at her command in such cases, she exclaimed, "There, take him, and introduce him to this 'sun-bright maiden,' who, I imagine, is my friend, Alice Ermyrn. I see Captain Osborn coming to claim me for this dance."

I found my cousin surrounded by a troop of dandies, who, however, soon dispersed as I, rather unceremoniously, claimed for myself and my friend the principal share of her attention.

As we approached, she, to the great mortification of the perfumed gentry around, was good-naturedly conversing with a very shy, awkward boy, whom I had previously endeavored to engage in conversation, and had entirely failed in my effort. Alice, however, with a woman's tact, had "drawn out" his conversational powers, and his proud, happy look was very different from the shy, distressed, "not-at-home" expression he had formerly worn. She gave him into my charge, when she, soon after, accepted Philip's invitation to promenade, with a whispered injunction to "amuse him till she came back, for he seemed very lonesome."

Such acts as this were what, more than levity or wit, rendered Alice a general favorite. Acts of genuine kindness, by which she won not only admiration, but gratitude and friendship. That same boy said to me, years after, when his awkward bashfulness had given way to a graceful self-possession—

"I shall not, I think, forget Miss Ermyn's kindness to me at the first party I ever attended. It seemed a little thing to her to speak to me and make me speak; but I was fresh from the country, and the most retired part of it, where I had seen little company, and the lights and these people, I assure you, frightened me terribly till, finally, Miss Ermyn, with her earnest, unaffected, good-natured manner, placed me quite at my ease. Such little acts have gained her the gratitude and friendship of many others besides myself."

After that night, we saw Alice frequently. Helen and Alice were already acquainted; and, for my sake first, afterwards for her own, Alice sought her society much, and soon learned to love her as a dear friend.

Philip remained several weeks in New York, and then returned to his home at the south. During his stay in the city, Judge Ermyn had returned. He, too, yielded to the skill of Philip's gifted mind and heart. He conceived a warm attachment to him, and earnestly invited him to accompany me to his home in the summer.

"Come home with Tom," said he. "I know that he and Alice, by their united efforts, are trying to persuade your sister to do so. Alice, in her usual wilful way, declares it shall be so; while Tom, I suppose, flatters himself he shall be equally successful by another mode of proceeding. We can promise you there fishing, and even shooting, sailing and driving, riding and walking, by way of amusement, with the society of such fair ladies!"

"By way of instruction," interposed Helen.

Philip laughed, thanked him, professed that it would be extremely difficult to refuse such an invitation, glanced at Alice, who smiled, and finally ended by accepting the invitation.

CHAPTER II.

JULY found Philip Howe on his way to the little village where was Alice's early home, and where we were spending the summer. I had driven to the neighboring railroad station to meet him; and, soon after his arrival there, we alighted at my aunt Anne's hospitable door.

Helen was at the door to meet him, and welcome him with the warmest affection. He passed his arm round her slender waist, and, kissing lightly her pure white forehead, drew her to the parlor, where Judge Ermyn stood with extended hand to welcome him.

"Yes!" exclaimed I; "this is ever the way: no sort of notice is taken of me when Philip is here."

"Don't begin to scold, Tom," said my uncle.

"I was talking to Helen," responded I.

"Humph!" said he. "If, by any possibility, you could be persuaded to stay away from her as long as Philip has, then you might perhaps be welcomed with more empressement than you now are."

"Should I, Helen?" whispered I, pathetically.

And Helen laughed, as ladies always do when they don't know what to say.

In the mean time, came Aunt Anne and Aunt Amelia, eager to welcome a brother of our Alice's friend.

He acknowledged all their kindness with his usual inimitable grace. And, at the first opportunity, Aunt Anne declared Mr. Howe to be the most agreeable young man she had met for years; so soon does a gentle manner and a pleasant word subdue the heart.

"Where is Miss Ermyn?" asked Philip, at length, as time passed on, and still she did not appear.

"Indeed, I do not know," replied Aunt Amelia. "She went out about two hours since. I can't imagine why she is so long absent. She knew that you were coming, and that Tom had gone for you; and she said she should return before he did. Did she not tell you where she was going, Miss Howe?" said the good lady, quite alarmed lest any one should imagine Alice meant to treat with rudeness Helen's brother.

"No," replied Helen. "She merely said she was going out for a walk. I was dressing, and she did not ask me to accompany her."

"Doubtless performing some act of charity," quoth Aunt Anne.

Philip looked up at her with a quick glance, as of a person aware that words are often spoken "for effect," and able to detect where such was the case. He found little traces of deceit upon Aunt Anne's open countenance. I saw that Philip was a little piqued at my cousin's continued absence.

Tea was announced, and still she came not. After tea, Helen was engaged for a game of chess with my uncle. Philip and myself went out for a walk.

We strolled through the village to a portion of it where resided some Irish workmen at the neighboring mills. In a dirty hovel, on a pallet of straw, lay a woman dying. Beside her, supporting her head upon her arm, sat Alice. Near her stood a broken earthen bowl, containing some water. With this, Alice occasionally cooled the feverish lips of the woman, or, with her own delicate fingers, smoothed back the disheveled and tangled hair from her haggard face, whispering those low and soothing words which are music from a woman's lip. Directly a tidy-looking woman passed us, whom I recognized as a sister of one of my aunt's servants. Led by a ragged Irish boy, she entered the house.

"Johnny says you sent for me, Miss Ermyn," said she.

"I did, Mrs. Brown," replied Alice. "I wish you would stay with this woman a few hours, until it is no longer necessary, and then take Johnny home with you till morning. I will send David down to stay with you. And I will try to return your kindness at some future day."

"Certainly I will stay, Miss Ermyn," answered Mrs. Brown; "to accommodate you, if not for humanity's sake. I shall not forget how kind you were to my poor Andrew when he died."

We passed on, and heard no more; but soon we saw Alice leave the house and walk quickly homeward. Slowly, we did the same.

"Yes," said Philip, at length, in a low tone, "it was beautiful to see that young, light-hearted girl bending, in tenderest love, over that wretched, dying woman! But her conduct would have been the same did she possess no belief in a heaven or a God. It is her own gentle heart which prompts such actions."

I did not reply, and we walked homeward silently.

Philip Howe's was not a heart easily won; neither was my cousin's; yet, as Philip lingered there week after week, I saw that the gentle, but joyous spirit of Alice had awakened in Philip a deeper interest than ever had titled foreign dame; and upon my cousin's cheek came, at his glance, the fitful blush, and her eye had the impassioned look that tells when the deep wells of feeling within a woman's heart are stirred by the wing of love.

We sat one evening by the open window enjoying the twilight. My uncle and aunts were within the room.

"Alice," said Aunt Anne, "have you heard the sad intelligence in regard to your former friend, Mary Sandford?"

"No," exclaimed Alice. "What, aunt? Is she not happy? Her husband is?"

"She has none now, Alice."

"Charles Sandford dead! Did he die suddenly? I hope not."

"He did—very. He was thrown from his horse, and killed by the fall. He died in great agony. And in that—in his extreme mental suffering—consisted Mary's chief misery. She could scarcely love one who treated her as he did."

"Was he unkind to her?" said Alice.

"He was positively cruel. He openly said he only married her out of regard to his father's command; that he disliked her; and he had never seen his child. He said he did not consider himself at all bound by his marriage; that he only lived with her to retain the Sandford property; condemned her as a 'canting hypocrite;' forbade her the use of money for charity; forbade her entrance into a church; and, in short, Mary has rather existed than lived during the four years of her married life."

"Poor Mary!" sighed Alice. "Why did she marry him—an infidel?"

"Does Miss Ermyn suppose it was that which wrecked her friend's happiness?"

"Certainly," said Alice. "How could it be otherwise?"

"Would you not wed an infidel?"

"Never!" said Alice, rather surprised at the question.

Philip's cheek grew pale; but he said no more.

"Why, Alice," said I, "a person may possess a warm, kind heart and a gifted understanding—I have known such who were called infidels."

"Possibly you may, coz. But, as for me, I could never love one who had too little understanding to comprehend the simple and beautiful truths of the Gospel, too little taste to appreciate them, and too little heart to know and love their Author. Such a one would possess too little understanding, taste, and soul for me."

Philip arose, suddenly, and remarked upon the beauty of the moon, professed himself a great admirer of moonlight, regretted that the dew was so heavy as to preclude the possibility of a moonlight walk accompanied by the ladies, and finally walked down to see its reflection upon the water. Excusing myself, I joined him.

We proceeded in silence to the river. It was a glorious night. The moon was at its full, and the tiny wavelets seemed woven of its golden rays, save where tree or rock threw over the water its well-defined shadow. The mellow ray fell on the dewy grass and trembling spray, lighting up all with a dreamy beauty. The pale features of my friend, as he leaned against the trunk of an elm tree, were clearly revealed. His lip was compressed, and his heavy brow hung low over his restless eye. I saw that he was suffering; yet I spoke not. He was not one to accept pity, nor I to seek confidence, so I silently drank in the glories of the night, and thought of Helen.

"Tom," said Philip at length, abruptly, "hear that whippoorwill. What does its song say?"

"Oh," said I, "there is a voluptuous melancholy in its note just fitting for the night."

"Not so," answered he; "'tis a note of bitter sadness, as where there is no joy in the heart; and the moonlight, the glittering wave, the deep dark sky, and all the beauty here bring no relief. You have never known such sorrow, for yours is a happy, careless spirit, and you have friends to love you. You are—you will be happy, Tom; while with me the brightest cup is ever dashed with bitterness."

"Friendless in childhood, deceived and hated in youth, banished from home in earliest manhood, what wonder that gentleness and trust have left my heart. And now when, by one purer and holier, the crust which had gathered round its better feelings is broken, to be scorned for the very evil my misfortunes have occasioned, no wonder the spirit grows sad as the song of yonder bird. Tom, I love your cousin; and I had learned to hope that life would seem to me again not the paltry, worthless thing it has been; and now a wild enthusiasm has made her say she 'will not wed an infidel!'"

There was a moment's pause, and then I spoke—"Philip, I know that you love Alice. I believe that she loves you. Ask her. It may be"—

"I will, Tom! Thank you for those words! If she loves me, her religion will be but a slight obstacle. If it will yield to lighter passions, it surely will to love. I will ask her now," said he, after a pause; and, turning, we walked quickly towards the house.

Alice and Helen sat where we had left them. I drew Helen's arm within my own, and we went out upon the long piazza. Philip and Alice followed, and passed to a smaller one off from the conservatory.

"Alice," said Philip, in a low tone, "I must tell you a story to-night."

It was the first time he had called her Alice; and, as the moonlight fell upon his face, she saw that his cheek was flushed, and his eye fixed with a strange, impassioned look upon her face. Alice trembled at she knew not what.

"Listen to me, Alice. When I was in Europe, I met your cousin. He loved my sister, and so we became nearer friends. He told me there of his fair young cousin Alice. He read me her letters, and spoke of her character. I became interested, and promised myself a pleasant acquaintance when I should see her. I returned, and met her. She was graceful, winning, and beautiful; far more so than I had ever seen or dreamed. Then, as I knew her more, I found her gentle, pure, and noble. I learned to love her devotedly, as only those who love rarely can love. Alice, can you not return this love? I know 'tis but a seared and wayward heart I have to offer; but it is full, full to the brim, with love for you. Will you not accept it, Alice?"

He had paused in his walk, and the moonlight fell upon the face of Alice, revealing the mantling of the rich color on her delicate cheek, and the quiver of her warm, red lip, while the white eyelid concealed her beaming eye, as silently she placed her hand within his own. He pressed his lips passionately upon her taper fingers for a moment; then, suddenly, he dropped her hand. A struggle passed over his features.

"No, Alice!" said he, "not so, not so! I must tell you all before you yield to me your love. Oh Heaven! my words may even now check the stream as it flows forth to meet me!" He paused for a moment, and then spoke, in a low, earnest, but still hopeful tone: "Alice, I have had a beautiful dream, and it seemed almost realized. There was a cup filled to the brim with happiness, and life and you had held the cup, beloved, to my lip; but, even as I tasted, I thought your hand trembled, and you had almost withdrawn the life-giving draught forever from me. I must tell you all, Alice, lest a shadow steal between your heart and mine, and grow darker and darker, until both break in agony.

"Alice, you spoke this evening of feelings I have never known, of a love I have never felt. You said you would never wed with one who worshipped not the God you worship. Alice, will you love me still when you know that this ideal being, this impersonation of goodness, who claims your heart's best feelings, is to me only an ideal, an illusion of the imagination, a mere dream, in which I cannot believe; that you alone, dearest, are my God, my idol—that you alone I worship?"

The moonlight again fell on the lady's face; but every trace of color was gone—it expressed only horror and agony.

"Philip," said she, at length, and her voice sounded hollow and strange, "I can never be yours!"

"Alice!" he exclaimed, "think for a moment what you say! Your love is all the world to me! Think, Alice, of my misery, my despair; for every hope of my life now is centred upon you! I will respect your religion; I will never seek to estrange it. Oh, Alice, remember, if we part now, we may never meet again! Must it be so?"

"Oh, God!" said Alice, in a choking voice, "why am I so tempted?"

"Is it temptation, Alice? Do you love me?" asked Philip, in an eager voice.

"Yes, Philip Howe," she answered, "you are far dearer to me than life; but not than my God, and the safety of my soul. I cannot hazard that, even though now I would gladly die but to hear you recall those words which you have spoken. God bless you, Philip—and—farewell!" And, turning slowly, she left him.

Helen followed Alice to the parlor, and I joined Philip. I never saw a face so changed as his. His cheek was pale as the marble, his eyes were closed, and his whole frame shook with emotion. I gazed at him a moment in silence; then I spoke to him. With a strong effort, he controlled his emotion, and, taking my arm, we left the piazza. His face was still pale, but calm and quiet as usual. Oh, the power of love, which can thus bend a proud man's spirit, and crush young woman's heart to atoms! Oh, the power of woman, who, with gentle words, smiles, and tears, gains over man the power to "kill or cure!"

Early on the ensuing morning, Howe left us on pretence of business at a neighboring town.

We had already assembled at the breakfast-table when Alice entered. When she did, Helen and myself scanned her closely. She was very pale. All the beautiful color had gone from her cheeks, save where, in one little place, it burned like a fever spot; her eyes were bright, but restless, and her smile was forced and strange. She was evidently under great excitement, expecting, yet dreading to see Philip. She ate nothing; but, exousing herself, soon went about her accustomed duties.

I felt very sorry for my cousin. She seemed so ill fitted to crush, with a calm, determined hand, all the love and hopes of her own glad spirit—to see them wither, and still to live. The time wore on until the hour of noon, when a note came to Judge Ermyrn, and one to myself, from Philip.

"DEAR TOM," mine ran, "I leave this morning for the South. I shall hope to see you and Helen there in the spring. I will write more in a few days. I cannot now. Yours, &c.,

"P. HOWE."

I carried to Judge Ermyrn the letter which was addressed to him. In his own manly, characteristic manner, Philip told him all; thanked him for his hospitality, and begged him to deliver the inclosed note to Miss Ermyrn. My uncle requested me to deliver the note to Alice. I found that she had wandered to the river, to the very spot where Philip and I had stood the night before. She still seemed restless and excited. I handed her Philip's note in silence. She tore it open quickly, and read—

"ALICE, farewell! You have said it, and I leave you. I make no attempt to change your resolution, for I feel it would be ineffectual. I will not tell you of my misery; 'twould only render you more unhappy. I only bid you farewell. We shall meet no more for years, beloved. We shall only meet as strangers after years have flown. May you be happy, Alice, in the path which you have chosen! I have nothing left to comfort me in mine—nothing but the remembrance of her who is so dear to me. Once more, farewell! P. H."

Alice read the note; then, looking up, saw her father, who had joined us. She handed him the note, saying, in a voice of inexpressible sadness—

"It is all over now! This is the end!" And, turning, she walked quietly homeward.

We hastily followed her. Her face had lost all its color, her cheek and lip were equally white. She spoke not; but, seating herself upon the piazza, remained silent for hours. At length, the sun went down and the moon arose; then, as its cold, pale light fell on her, she arose with a shudder and entered the house.

How was all changed since she last looked upon its radiance! Then her heart was light and happy; now it was almost breaking. Then she was rejoicing in the purest joy a woman knows, unselfish, devoted love; now she had learned a woman's bitter lesson, her fairest hopes were crushed forever.

At length, a passionate burst of tears gave relief to her overcharged feelings. She wept for a while, without restraint, in her father's arms, where she had been always used to grieve for her former childish sorrows.

"God has commanded the sacrifice," said she, with a trusting look in her tearful eyes, "and he will give me strength to bear it."

The long hours of night were passed by her in prayers for strength; but morning found her calm.

CHAPTER III.

TIME passed; and, with it, the cares of many, and the joys and hopes of many more. To Helen and myself it lagged pleasantly along, as it brought nearer our wedding day. To my poor cousin its tread was more solemn; it brought to her the realization of no bright hope on earth, it only brought her nearer her life's close.

The winter season came, and Alice returned to town. One bright October morning, I had married Helen Howe, and Alice, as the only bridesmaid, went much into society. She was still beautiful, but much changed from the belle of the preceding winter. The principal charm of her face had ever been its expression; and now, as if her soul had been purified by sorrow, it wore a lofty, earnest look, far more fascinating than the ever merry word and smile which had won the admiration of "society." Yet Alice grew not sombre.

"My lighter, happier hours," she said, "are for the world, my suffering for myself, or the few who would love me in my sorrow, and wish to share it with me."

So Alice laughed and jested still, was still courted and admired by the gentlemen, while, stranger still, her calm dignity forbade the malice of even "fine ladies." Yet her closer friends could see that the heart-happiness was gone from her smile and her glance. Her elastic spirit might have recovered from a sudden shock, her soul had received more; it was as if an iron hand had crushed it, and pressed out the brightest drops of life. Had Philip died believing in her faith, she could have borne it more easily; but to know he might live on for years in unbelief, and die at last uncheered by love of friends below, or hope of heaven above—this was the sharpest pang of her misery. Yet said she to her father, the only time she ever spoke of it—

"I dared not wed him. I trust my faith is strong. I know he might never have sought to change it; but could I have prayed at night, 'lead me not into temptation, and deliver me from evil,' when I had placed myself in the greatest temptation, and planted my foot in the very road to evil?"

Still time passed onward towards eternity. Winter had given place to gladsome spring, and, with the earliest May, Helen and I had accompanied Alice to her country home, and had turned our route southward.

July had come, with its glowing mornings and balmy evenings. Alice sat once more in the deep window by the piazza. One year ago, Philip was there beside her. The sweet morning air came stealing over her warm cheek, and the wild, exulting song of the birds fell on her ear as pleasantly as then, and a feeling of renewed trust and peace came to her heart as she inhaled the breath and listened to the voice of nature, and thought of Him who had thus made for man "all nature beauty to his eye and music to his ear;" and, not only yielding anew her own heart to His trust and keeping, she rejoiced that He, too, would preserve the misguided wanderer whom she still mourned and loved.

Directly her father entered the room and seated himself by her side, handing her a letter, without a word. Alice took it, starting as she looked at the superscription. Did she not know that well? She had received one letter written by that hand, and she needed not to open this to know it was from Philip Howe. She broke the seal, and read—

"MY BELOVED ALICE—once more, though for the last time, I must call you thus—I am here, near the spot where you live, and I could not leave again without once more writing to you.

"Alice, I have found it—that faith for which you sacrificed your love—and it is you to whom I am indebted for it. That religion which could prompt an impassioned, warm-hearted woman to sacrifice what she confessed were her dearest hopes—I knew that religion could not be all a dream. Since that, I have thought, I have studied, I have read, and conversed with the wisest and best divines. I have always believed in a Creator; I knew the world did not come by chance; but I believed not in the God of your love. I said, 'He is only an all-powerful God who can create and destroy.' The Bible and its glorious truths were nothing to me.

"Now, thanks be to Him, I believe, fully and fervently, all. But all this has come too late for my joy in this world, though I trust not too late for my peace in another.

"You are another's now. I had not thought you could so soon forget your love; yet I do not reproach you. It was right that you should struggle against your love for an infidel. Were you still free and loving me, I might now claim you, since that bar to our happiness is removed. Yet now I must once more bid you farewell! And, deeply and faithfully as I still love you, still I rejoice that you once refused my love, as, without that, I might never have learned a nobler than even worship of you. My still loved, but lost Alice, 'God bless you!'

"P. H."

Alice's face grew absolutely radiant with joy. Unmindful of her father's presence, she fell on her knees, and fervently thanked the Being who had thus answered her prayers. At length, when she had somewhat recovered from her emotion, she handed her father the note.

"What means this, Alice," said he—"you are another's now?"

"Indeed," exclaimed Alice, "I do not know. It must be he has heard so." She had, for the moment, forgotten the last part of the note in her joy at the intelligence contained in the first. She thought some time. "I will write to him," said she, finally, "and tell him, father, that I am still free."

"Do so, my child."

And Alice wrote—

"PHILIP, thank God for what you have told me! I am happy now. Why do you say I am not free? I am bound to but one only. Let him come to me, and he shall find me still his. ALICE."

What now remains to be told? Philip had, indeed, given credence to a false report in regard to her engagement to another. They were united, and were happy.

Years have passed since then. Helen sits beside me as I write. She has become a fair, plump matron; yet she seems to me still as lovely as when we wandered by the river's bank in former days. Philip and Alice are with us now. Time has slightly blanched my friend's dark hair, and dimmed the bloom upon my cousin's cheek, yet still her smile answers his as warmly as on that bright July morning years ago.

TWILIGHT REMINISCENCES.

BY J. H. BIXBY.

It is twilight, silent twilight, and my heart returns to thee,
The gone, long gone, forever gone, but whom I yet may see;
Thou hast passed from earth before me, but, with thy parting prayer,

My name was whispered to Heaven, that God would guide me there.

My Mary, on this balmy breeze, didst thou not float along?
There came unto my longing heart a strain of angel song;
Methinks I hear the melody of thy sweet, familiar tone,
As of old it rose at twilight, ere I was left alone.

Alone! alone! oh, doubly lone! did not sweet dreams of thee

Float down to me at twilight, and give thee back to me;
Give thee back in all thy beauty, so spiritual and bright,
That, like life when here I knew thee, doth seem the happy night.

Oh, dim and dusky twilight, thou art fading soft and slow,
As passed my angel Mary from the realm of night and woe;
But she waits for me in Heaven, and her love from out the sky

Shines like a star upon my soul, my guide to bliss on high.

COSTUMES OF ALL NATIONS.—THIRD SERIES

THE TOILETTE IN GREECE.

CHAPTER II.

THE distinguishing feature of Grecian dress in ancient times was the pallium, whence the people were frequently called Palliati. This garment, which was shaped somewhat like a modern cloak, was very wide and long, so that its ample dimensions enabled it to be wound several times round the body; the edges were sometimes cut out to resemble fringe. The pallium had no collar, and was worn over the chlamyde.

The chlamyde is a garment about which authors greatly differ. Some affirm that it resembled the Roman toga, but the greater number reject this opinion; whatever its exact shape and dimensions may have been is therefore uncertain, but it was usually fastened on the shoulder by a brooch.

The phelone, a dress often mentioned by Greek writers, differed from the chlamyde only in the quality of the material of which it was formed, the former being usually made of a coarse manufacture fit for wearing in the country.

The under-garments of the Greeks, which generally were of white woolen stuff, bore the name of tunics—

"A vest and tunic o'er me next she threw."—Odyssey.

The tunics were of different kinds, and varied in name according to their shape and texture; they were worn equally by men and women, the only difference being that the latter always had the petticoat and sleeves long, while the common tunic of the men generally descended no lower than the calf of the leg, and the sleeves were short and very narrow. Thus, in the "Odyssey," we read of Ulysses—

"The goddess, with a radiant tunic, dressed
My limbs, and o'er me cast a silken vest."

The exomide was a tunic without sleeves, generally worn by servants, and often also by philosophers, who, to mark their contempt of luxury, sometimes clothed themselves in the most unostentatious manner.

The calasiris was another tunic made of linen, and with a fringe at the bottom. The richest tunics were made of silk, and they were fastened at the waist by a girdle or belt.

The upper garment worn by Grecian women was called ampehone; it was a kind of light cloak.

The Grecian matrons were, like the ladies of most other nations, fond of dress and ornament, and also of perfumes.

The principal occupations and amusements of women, in the earlier ages, seem to have consisted in spinning, weaving, and embroidering. The Grecian ladies, in particular, were very celebrated for their skill in all kinds of needlework. At some of the religious festivals, it was the custom to offer, to the god or goddess in whose honor it was instituted, a garment woven and embroidered for that purpose. Thus, at the Athenian fête in honor of Minerva, a robe was carried in the procession; it was of a white color, without sleeves, and embroidered with gold: upon it were described the achievements of the goddess. Jupiter, also, and the heroes, had their effigies in it. Hence, men of courage and bravery are said to be worthy to be portrayed in Minerva's sacred garment, as in Aristophanes—

"We will our fathers treat with high esteem,
Whose brave exploits are worthy Attica,
Fit to be portrayed in Minerva's vest."

The ancient Greeks generally went bareheaded; they had, nevertheless, a kind of hat, which they called sciadion, which signifies parasol. Their hair was an object of great importance, and they devoted much time and attention to it. The custom of dedicating the hair to one of their deities, and shaving off some of their locks for that purpose, seems to have been general both with the men and women of ancient Greece. In Euripides, when Pentheus threatens Bacchus to shave his hair, the young god tells him it would be an impious action, because he designed it as an offering to some deity—

"This lock is sacred, this I do preserve
As some choice votive offering for the god."

Fashion seems to have exercised as much influence over the head-dresses of the ladies, in the ancient days of Greece, as she does at the present time; gold, pearls, precious stones, flowers, and ribbons, were employed to ornament the tresses. One of their coiffures is described as an immense tower of bows and curls, and appears to have served as a model for the commode already mentioned. False hair seems also to have been very generally used, and in great quantities, both curled and frizzled.

In Greece, married women were distinguished from the unmarried by the manner in which the hair was parted in front.

It seems to have been the custom for women always to cover their faces with a veil when they went out, or appeared in public, as we read of Penelope—

"Then from her lodgings went the beauteous dame,
And to her much-expecting courtiers came;
There veiled before the door she stood."

A veil seems also to have been worn as an emblem of mourning by the ancient Greeks—

"Her face wrapp'd in a veil declared her woes."

Nor does this fashion appear to have belonged to women only, for Theseus thus addressed Adrastus, when he came to him after his loss at Thebes—

"Speak out, unfold your head, restrain your tears."

Among the ornaments worn by the Greeks, the brooch bore a distinguished place; it was a necessary as well as an ornamental part of their attire, being used to fasten the tunics and the chlamydes. It was of various shapes and materials. Bracelets, which were worn both by men and women, appear to have served as a mark of honor as well as of slavery, for we find them presented to warriors as a recompense for valor, at a period when they are mentioned by the historian Suetonius as being worn by slaves, in token of their servitude. The ordinary kinds were made of copper or iron, the more elegant of ivory, silver, gold, and precious stones. Homer thus describes the bracelet presented by Eurymachus to Penelope—

"A bracelet rich with gold, with amber gay,
That shot effulgence like the solar ray."

Necklaces and bracelets also seem to have been awarded as the prize of courage both in real and mimic warfare. Homer speaks of "orient necklaces"—necklaces strung with pearls, and others worked with art, whence we may infer that the ancients were skillful in their manufacture. Ear-rings appear to have been worn only by women and boys: immense sums were expended upon these ornaments. Seneca observes that a single pair was often worth the revenue of a rich man.

The dress of the modern Grecians differs much in various parts of the country. The matrons of Athens wear garments made of red or blue cloth, with very short waists, and petticoats falling in folds to the ground. Over the head and shoulders they throw a thin flowing veil of white muslin, ornamented with a gold border. The attire of a maiden of the same city consists of a long red vest, with a square yellow satin cape hanging down behind; they walk with their hands concealed in the pocket-holes at the sides of their gowns, and their faces muffled.

Chandler, in his "Travels in Greece," gives the following elegant description of a Grecian virgin in her secluded apartment: "There the girl, like Thetis, treading on a soft carpet, has her white and delicate feet naked, the nails tinged with red. Her trousers, which in winter are of red cloth, and in summer of fine calico or thin gauze, descend from the hips to the ankle, hanging loosely about her limbs, the lower portion embroidered with flowers, and appearing beneath the shift, which has the sleeves wide and open, and the seams and edges curiously adorned with needlework. Her vest is of silk, exactly fitted to the form of the bosom and the shape of the body, which it rather covers than conceals, and is shorter than the shift. The sleeves button occasionally at the hand, and are lined with red or yellow satin. A rich zone encompasses her waist, and is fastened before by clasps of silver gilded, or of gold set with precious stones. Over the vest is a robe, in summer lined with ermine, and in cold weather with fur of a warmer kind. The head-dress is a skull-cap, red or green, with pearls, a stay under the chin, and a yellow forehead cloth. She has bracelets of gold on her wrists, and, like Aurora, is rosy-fingered, the tips being stained. Her necklace is a string of zeckins, a species of gold coin, or the pieces called Byzantines. At her cheek is a lock of hair, made to curl towards the face; and down her back falls a profusion of tresses, spreading over her shoulders. Much time is consumed in combing and braiding the hair after bathing; and, at the greater festivals, in enriching and powdering it with small bits of silver, gilded, and resembling a violin in shape, and woven in at regular distances. She is painted blue round the eyes, and the insides of the sockets with the edges on which the lashes grow, are tinged with black."

The usual dress of a Greek lady we find described by a recent traveler as follows: "The dress of the Grecian ladies of rank and wealth, except at Smyrna, Constantinople, and a few other large commercial towns, does not differ very materially from that worn by the Turkish ladies. When out of doors, however, the two classes are easily distinguishable; the Turks muffle up and cover their faces in muslin, and wear yellow morocco slippers; the Greeks show their faces, and are obliged to wear slippers of a dingier hue; besides which, there are other points of difference between their promenade dresses. The usual costume is a scarlet cloth skull cap on the head, more or less richly worked in gold, with pearls, &c.; an open and flowing gown, with very full sleeves, mostly made of silk, richly embroidered; an inner vest, also richly worked, and setting to the body almost as closely as a man's waistcoat; very wide muslin drawers, tied above the ankle, and concealed by the gown; morocco bottines, without soles, thrust into well-soled morocco slippers, or colored silk stockings and loose shoes; a long and rich veil, put on with singular gracefulness, and the cestus, or zone or girdle (a beautiful shawl), which rests upon the hips, and is kept down in front by two silver clasps or bosses. This zone is altogether distinct from the waist, which is formed by the foldings of the dress below the bosom; it is, in short, a second waist, and, though very classical, and the image of the ancient cestus, is one of the few things at once classical and Greek that strikes us as ungraceful. In cold weather, a short satin pelisse or spenser, trimmed and lined with furs, is worn over the dress."

POETRY.

BY MRS. WM. S. SULLIVANT.

Fount of my spirit! ever brightly welling,
Like some oasis by lone deserts bound;
In one glad spot, the barren gloom dispelling,
Keeping a fertile, summer greenness 'round:
Star! from whose ray my horoscope was drawn,
Whose glory on my opening dream-life alanted:
Flower! deathless amaranth! divinely born,
Thy freshness, light, and bloom were ne'er for evil granted.

Though caravans of worldly pilgrims deem
Thy glitter but some mirage of the brain,
And turn aside to seek some nearer stream,
Whose tide impure thy vot'ries scorn to drain;
Though wanderers on life's sea, benighted, shun
Thy beacon-gleam as wav'ring and untrue;
Though, in the wreath of spirit-blossoms, none
But mark, with vague alarm, thy brightly mystic hue.

I know thee as thou art; the charm that gives
To mortal love the happiness of Heaven;
The subtler essence that in beauty lives,
The yeast and lightness of earth's dullest leaven;
The sunbeam, by whose genial radiance warmed,
Life's chilly glacier-peaks a rose-flush wear;
The sorcerer, by whose alchymy transformed,
The humblest things of clay a trace of glory bear!

Spirit divine! infuse thy influence ever
Into my life; nor let corroding care,
Nor rust of worldly thought, the bright links sever
That bind us into one. Though Time's keen 'share
Uproot each frail ephemeral joy, be thou
Steadfast and firm in thine immortal soil;
Ever as freshly vigorous as now,
Let naught of envious blight thy hale luxuriance spoil.

Hearts may grow cold and charge; the eye, once beaming
With friendship's light, turn darkly from my own;
Lips lose their smiles, or force an idle seeming;
Voices forget the old familiar tone:
But be thou always true—in youth or age
Faithful, twin-born companion of the soul
With power its griefs to soften and assuage,
With strength its lighter aims to banish and control

PERSONS AND PICTURES FROM THE HISTORY OF ENGLAND.

OLIVER CROMWELL AND CHARLES I.

BY ERNEST WILLIAM HERBERT, ACTRESS OF "THE ROMAN TRAITOR," "MARMADUKE WYVIL," "CROMWELL," "THE BROTHERS," ETC.

In the first years of the seventeenth century, there stood a small and dilapidated grange, or old-fashioned farm-house, on the outskirts of the little borough town of St. Joes, in Huntingdonshire, the seat of the last scion of a noble family, now lapsed from its high estate and fallen into unmerited decay—the family of Cromwell—which had been distinguished so long before as in the reign of Henry VIII., and which even claimed to share the royal blood of the unhappy race of Stuarts, whom they were destined, in the end, to supplant by energy of will and arbitration of the sword.

The present tenant of that desolate and dismal grange was a young man, the heir and sole remaining stay of the old house, a strong, thick-set, ungraceful person, with large, coarse features, redeemed, however, in the eye at least of the physiognomist, by the fine massive forehead, and the singular expression of thought, combined with immutable resolve and indomitable will, which pervaded all his features.

It was a dark and stormy night of November, and the wind was wailing with a sad and hollow sound among the stunted willows which surrounded the old farm-house, nurtured by the stagnant waters of the broad cuts and dikes made for the drainage of the sour and sterile soil from which they sprang. But the night was not more gloomy than the countenance, perhaps than the thoughts, of the ruined agriculturist, who sat alone by the cheerless hearth, poring over the maps and plans of extensive fen improvements, in which he had sunk the remnant of his impoverished fortunes, by the dim light of a single waning lamp.

There were no ornaments of any kind to be seen in the dismal apartment, unless a few weapons and pieces of old armor hanging on the walls, upon which the fitful light of the wood fire played with varying flashes, might be called ornaments. The floor was of brick, sanded; the walls exhibited their bare and paintless plaster; the furniture was of the humblest—two or three straight-backed oaken chairs, the ponderous table at which he sat, strewn with papers of calculation, maps, and diagrams, and one large book clasped with brass and bound in greasy calf-skin, which, by its shape, was evidently the volume of Holy Writ. Another trestle table, in the chimney corner, supported a coarse, brown loaf, a crust of old cheese, and a black jack of small ale, the supper of the agricultural speculator, of the visionary and enthusiastical religionist.

At length he arose from the table, before which he had been so long seated, and traversed the room with heavy and resounding steps, his hands clasped behind his back and his head bowed forward on his chest, muttering half-heard words between his close-set teeth, and occasionally heaving deep sighs. After a while he paused, as he reached the trestle table, took a deep draught of ale from the black jack, and then, opening the ponderous Bible, read a chapter of Isaiah, one of the most fiercely denunciatory against Pharaoh and the princes of Egypt, after which he cast himself on his knees and unburthened himself of a long, rambling, vehement, extemporaneous prayer, which, according to our notions, partook far more of the nature of cursing than of praying, of blasphemy than of piety.

This duty performed, he took up the lamp from the table, and, leaving the room, ascended a great, creaking, half-dismantled staircase, which led to a sort of corridor with many doors of sleeping apartments opening upon it. Into one of these he entered, locking the door behind him, and securing it with several heavy bolts, and, setting down his light upon a rude oaken bureau, placed his broadsword beneath his pillow, and disattired himself with great haste and little ceremony.

Within five minutes, the light was extinguished and the man ensconced in the old-fashioned bed-clothes of a huge four-post tester-bed, which had once, evidently, like its occupant, known better days, surrounded with heavy curtains of faded and moth-fretted damask drawn closely around it on all sides. For a time, all was silent, except the heavy breathing, degenerating at times into what seemed almost sighs, of the sleeper, and the occasional howl of a mastiff without, baying the moon, when, at fitful intervals, she waded out from among the giant clouds, and cast her wavering and pallid gleams, fleeting, like ghosts, along the bare walls of that great, unfurnished chamber.

What followed would be too strange, too improbable for grave recital, were it not that we find it recorded, beyond the possibility of cavil, in cotemporaneous history, long before the occurrence of the events which it would seem to foreshadow; and it was undoubtedly accredited as a fact by the early associates and comrades of the great and extraordinary man, of whom it is related, and whose actual life was as real, as practical, and as stern as his inner existence was visionary, morbidly fanciful, and fanatically enthusiastical.

His curtains, he avowed ever, were drawn asunder with a loud jingling of the rings by which they were suspended, and he might see, in the opening of their folds, a misty shape, giganatical, but undefined, while a voice thundered in his ears, mightier than any human utterance, "Arise, Oliver, arise! thou that shalt be, not king, but the first man in England!"

And this was thrice repeated; and thenceforth a new spirit was awakened in the soul of the strong, iron-minded, adamant-willed visionary, whose very superstitions were to him, not as to other men, weaknesses, but strength; an impenetrable armor for his own defence; an indomitable weapon against his enemies; and the name of that new spirit, though it may well be he who felt it knew it not, was ambition.

The name of that man was Oliver Cromwell, and of a surety in after times he was, "although not king, the first man in England," the first not in his own days, but perhaps in all days—not only then, but now, and perhaps forever.

Despite all his errors, all his crimes, for the ambitious rarely fail of crime, this is his great redemption, that he was purely, patriotically English; that, with him, his country, and his country's greatness, were ever the leading objects, paramount to self; and that when, by his own energy and will, he had made himself "the first man in England," he rested not from his fierce struggle with the world till he had rendered "England the first realm in Europe," and the name of Englishman as much respected throughout Christendom as was that in the ancient time of "civis Romanus."

Nearly at the same date with the occurrence above related, the throne of England was ascended, among the general rejoicings and almost universal satisfaction of his people, by a young, graceful, and amiable prince, son of an old, debauched, degraded, drunken despot, half pedant and half fool, addicted to vices which are so hideous as to lack a name; as a king, and as a man, alike without one virtue, one redeeming phase of character; an animal, in one word, unworthy to be styled a man, who lived detested, and died amid the secret joy and scarcely simulated mourning of the subjects by whom he had been scarcely tolerated while alive and powerful.

Popular himself, and wedded happily while young to a young and beautiful princess—the daughter of one of the greatest and the most popular of European princes, Henry IV., of France—singularly handsome; learned enough for a gentleman and a king; skillful in manly exercises; grave and decorous, perhaps somewhat austere, but ever with a gracious and serene austerity, in his deportment; really and genuinely pious, and devoted heart and soul to the doctrines of the Church of England; singularly pure in his morals, and virtuous without a stain in his domestic relations—Charles I., of England, might have been, had he but seen the right path and taken it, the most popular, and one of the greatest of the kings of England: he was the weakest, though by no means the worst, and the most unfortunate.

His first and greatest misfortune was the period of his birth, an absolute, or nearly absolute monarch, when the limits of royal prerogative and parliamentary privilege, of royal power and popular rights, were altogether undefined, among a people on whom were gradually dawning, through the medium of the Reformation, and the perverted views of the ultra-reforming and fanatical Puritans, the principles of constitutional liberty, and the fixed determination to uphold it, as the inalienable birthright of every Englishman.

His second was his false and detestable education under the doctrines of that subtle Scottish sophist, his abominable father, the first James, who instilled into him, from his earliest youth, his own favorite doctrine, that the best, the wisest, and most royal way of governing a people is by cheating them; a way of governance which he exultingly termed kingcraft, not in contempt as men now speak of priestcraft, but as term of high and honorable import. Added to this, he taught him, ever and anon, that a people has no rights, nor an individual member of the people; and that a king has no duties except to govern, well if it like him, if not, ill—only to govern de jure divino. The last, and most fatal of all his lessons, which he inculcated so steadily upon him, that it seems to have taken ineradicable root in his mind, was that no faith was required from a king to his subjects.

His last was his own infirmity of character. Principles, to use the term correctly, Charles appears to have had none—unless we may call his attachment to the Established Church, and his unquestionable religious character, by this title. Settled opinions and rooted habits he had many, and these, with many men, are apt to pass for principles; and of these, strengthened by his natural obstinacy, and confirmed yet further by opposition, we are inclined to regard his adherence to the church, through good report and ill, through life and unto death, as one, and undoubtedly the best and truest.

Sincere in his religion, in all things else he was habitually, by education, and we think by hereditary temperament, the most insincere of men. To friends and to enemies he was alike untrue and faithless. The former could never rely on his protection, the latter could never put trust in his most solemn asseverations.

Obtinate and unyielding to the last against the advice of the best and wisest of his friends, where concession would have been wisdom; wherever resistance to the end became the right and only course of conduct, he was invariably found vacillating, weak, infirm of purpose.

Had he been obstinate in the right, when the head of the noble Strafford was demanded at his hands, the only pilot who could have steered the ship of royalty safe through the tempest of Puritan democracy, he never had lost his crown, or bowed his own head to that block on which he sacrificed the bravest and most able of his counselors.

Had he been timely wise, and listened to conditions, when the last fight had been fought at Long Marston, "never," to use the words of Sir John Berkeley, perhaps the wisest of his late advisers—"never would crown so nearly lost have been regained on terms so easy." But it was not so written; and the eye even of the most blinded follower of loyalty must perceive that it was good, both for the peoples and the princes, yea, and for the world, the human race at large, that King Charles I. should perish on the block; that his power, if not his crown, should fall on the head of that most royal-minded of plebeians, who swayed England's sceptre as none of her kings, save perhaps Elizabeth, ever swayed it; and who did more than ever man did for the development of that great race, then starting on its vast, sublime career of war and commerce, liberty and toleration, science in peace and victory in arms, which we misname the Anglo-Saxon; and which, so surely as the great sun stands still, and the earth travels round it, shall girdle the globe from east again to east, and cover it from pole to pole, until no prayer shall mount to God but in the accents of the English tongue.

If there be one man of men whom England and America should unite to venerate, it is that hard, morose, rude Oliver, who secured for the Ocean Isle that position among European nations which she still maintains, that pre-eminence upon the seas which secured to virgin America the glorious privilege of being Anglo-Saxon and progressive, rather than Dutch or Spanish, and degenerating still into the last abyss of inanition.

The limits of a magazine article preclude, of course, the possibility of our sketching, with the briefest pen, the consecutive events in council and in field which signalized the greatest and most durable of revolutions; the watch-cry and trophy of which were privilege of Parliaments and the Bill of Rights; and the effects of which still endure in the civil freedom and religious liberty, in the maintenance of governmental powers, and the independence of individual rights peculiar to the genuine free politics of England and the United States, as contrasted to the spurious and bastard combination of despotic and anarchical principles which signalize the sham republics of all other races.

In the first instance, perhaps, the Parliament, and the Commons more especially, manifested a want of confidence, and, still more, a want of liberality, in granting necessary supplies to the king, which circumstances, up to that time, would scarcely appear to have warranted. But, ere long, the king manifested his true intentions, and came out under his genuine colors. To levy taxes by his own arbitrary imposition, to govern England of his own will wholly, dispensing with the use of Parliaments altogether, was the scheme of Charles I., ably carried into effect for a time by Thomas Wentworth, the able, haughty, and unhappy Earl of Strafford, and, as united to the suppression of all other churches save that of England only, comprehensively embodied by him in the singular term, "thorough."

How Hampden, Pym, St. John, the elder Vane, Eliot, and other noble spirits strove, suffered, and, in the end, triumphed, for the liberties of England, history has told trumpet-tongued with all her spirit-kindling echoes; but few know the fact that, in the House of Commons, even so early as the petition for the Bill of Rights, and the subsequent remonstrance, Oliver Cromwell was already a man of mark; in council, it is probable, not oratory; for he never became a fluent or powerful speaker, even when his accents were heard from the Protectoral chair; and he seems, like Talleyrand in after days, to have regarded language as a special gift for the concealment of thought.

On the eventful evening of the carrying of the Remonstrance, on which the debate was waged with such fury that many of the elder and sager members presaged an armed conflict and bloodshed—for gentlemen in those days habitually, as of their right, wore swords—when the members were leaving the house, a gentleman asked John Hampden, pointing to Oliver, who, by the way, was Hampden's cousin, "Who is that slovenly, ill-dressed fellow?" To which the great, pure patriot replied, "That sloven, should this controversy between the King and Commons be carried to the appeal of arms, which may God forbid, I say to you, that sloven will be the greatest man in England."

And John Hampden was no indifferent judge in such matters; nor, though he did not live to see it, was he mistaken in the issue. But he lived not to see it; and, had he lived, it is probable that he would have resisted, unto the death, the usurping ambition of the Great Independent, even as he resisted the usurped prerogative of the lawful king.

But John Hampden fell, shot to the death through the left shoulder with three bullets, at the head of his own regiment of Buckinghamshire volunteers, on the sad field of Chalgrove, the purest and most moderate of patriots.

And, shortly afterwards, at Newbury, fell Lucius Cary, Viscount Falkland, of whom Clarendon has recorded that, although conscience and patriotism compelled him to take up arms and to do battle for the king, he was ever from that moment wont, even in the company of his most intimate friends, to fall into deep fits of melancholy musing, and to ingeminate, with shrill and touching accents, the word, peace, peace. He fell, the purest and most moderate of royalists; and, thenceforth, purity seemed dead, and moderation likewise, on both sides, and the mortal sword, as ever, was the arbiter.

It was to the great insight of Oliver Cromwell into the minds of men—for he early discerned that some new spirit must be aroused in the minds of men to counterbalance the antique chivalry and loyalty, among the “decayed tapsters and pimple-nosed serving-men,” of whom, by his own allegation, the bulk of the parliamentary armies were composed—the ultimate victory of the Parliament must be ascribed.

To meet this spirit of chivalry, he awakened the spirit of militant religion; and, as ever must be the case when the religion of the masses becomes militant, as in the crusades, as in the Huguenot wars of France, and as in his own case especially, with it, his own creation, he overrode the oldest monarchy, the most sublime and stately hierarchy, the noblest and most puissant aristocracy of Europe; he overrode, secondly, the Parliament of England; he overrode, in the last place, though in our opinion wisely, justly, and for the preservation of his country from the worse curse of fanatical intolerance and social anarchy, the liberties of England herself, and made himself, all but in name, the mightiest and wisest of her kings.

Charles died on the scaffold, by the connivance rather than by the act of Cromwell. Prevented it, assuredly he might have done; but, preventing, must himself have perished; for Charles could not be trusted. Oliver would have spared him once, nay, but reinstated him; but the fatal discovery of a genuine letter, wherein the fated king assured his queen that, “for those knaves,” meaning Essex and Cromwell, “to whom he had promised a silken garter, he had in lieu of it a hempen halter,” sealed his fate thenceforth forever.

The scabbard was cast away between them, and in the strife of swords, as ever must be the case, the weaker went to the wall. Charles the First died to be pitied as a private man, to be deplored by the church of which he was a faithful son, but certainly not to be regretted as a king, for he was clearly in intent a traitor and tyrant; yet can it not be said of him, as it was of Julius Cæsar, “Jure cæsus habetur!”—Let him be held justly slain!—for, in the English constitution, from time immemorial, there is no rule or precedent by which a king can be brought to trial by his subjects.

Still, he had not much reason for complaint; during his whole life he had sacrificed to expediency only, not to justice, or to the rights of man, or to his oaths before God; and himself to expediency he fell a royal victim. He fell by the axe on the scaffold at Whitehall, and Heaven had no thunders by which to bruit aloud its indignation or its horror at his fall.

By his death, he aroused again the spirit of aggrrieved loyalty to arms, and fatal Dunbar, bloody Worcester, the great usurper’s “crowning mercy,” proved how gallant and true was the heart of the English gentry, proved how ineffectual and vain is gallantry or truth, is heart or hand, against the iron bands of discipline, against the leadership of a leader competent to govern the energies and point the enthusiasm of his men.

When Cromwell flung his arm aloft, amid the sunburst through the mist which revealed his enemies rushing down at the bidding of their frenzied preachers to “do battle at Armageddon,” and shouted, in his massive tones, “Let God arise, and let his enemies be scattered!” he showed himself a captain among captains. The far-famed “sun of Austerlitz” is trite and tame beside that glorious battle-word. When he drove, ignominiously, the “Rump” of the Long Parliament from the station which it had so long misused, from domination over a nation which it had so long misgoverned; when he bade his obedient Ironsides “carry away that bauble,” he proved himself a braver and more consistent patriot than when he thundered upon the flank of the half-victorious cavaliers at Marston, and conquered the reeling fight; than when he fought bareheaded in the van of the last deadliest mêlée of Naseby; than when he dared to sign the death-warrant of his hapless king.

When he once sat upon the throne—for which he had played, as some men will have it, so foully, though we cannot regard it as so altogether—he used that usurped power solely for England’s good and England’s glory; he wore, if not a crown, “a more than dictatorial wreath,” conquered, indeed, by might, but affixed by mercy.

The worst blot on his name is the deeds which have rendered that name, to this day, a curse in Ireland; but it must be remembered that he was dealing with men whom he regarded as murderers and heathen, and deeming himself probably the God-ordained avenger of Protestant and pious blood.

His greatest glory is Spain humbled, Holland overcome, Scotland and Ireland pacified, the colonies planted, the navigation act passed, the maritime glory of England, the Anglo-Saxonism of North America secured. These are his glories—glories enough for the greatest. They should secure him immortality among men—may they secure him pardon before God!

When he died, the greatest tempest on record—until that kindled tempest which scourged the earth when Napoleon, the second Cromwell, was departing from his scene of mingled crime and glory—devastated Europe from the Baltic to Cape Bon, from the Bosphorus to the Bay of Biscay, uptearing trees, upheaving hills, unroofing houses, killing both man and beast in the open field, with one continuous glare of lightning, one roll of continuous thunder.

And, as the death hours of these, the two greatest of usurpers, were thus similar, so were their last words strikingly alike. Cromwell, having laid senseless for above an hour, started to consciousness at a tremendous thunderclap, and exclaimed, “Ordinance!” Napoleon, transported by the din of elemental strife into the strife of men, muttered the words, “tête d’armée,” and passed into that world where the drum hath no sound and the sword is edgeless.

Both were great in their day; both were guilty; but both were instruments of the God who made them, not for evil, but unto good. It is for Him alone to judge them, as it is His alone to show mercy. Requiescant.

AMERICAN FEMALE AUTHORSHIP.

BY ALICE B. NEAL.

THAT "the fashion of this world passeth away," is quite as noticeable in the change of domestic amusements as in any style of dress or equipage. The tapestry of the early ages that employed the busy fingers, and suggested the delicious reveries of maidens waiting with patience the return of the lover long exiled to the Holy Land—the embroidery and tent-stitch of our grandmothers, the sampler-making of the last generation, and the net-work and crochet of this—all are by turns the rage, copied, discussed, exhibited, and forgotten. But just now the needle seems to be for the first time threatened by a powerful rival; the work-box is replaced by the desk, and the portfolio has usurped the corner sacred to the tambour-frame. In other words, authorship is the mania of our ladies, and an ambition for literary distinction becomes even in childhood the grande passion.

We can remember the time when we gazed on proof sheets with awe, and wondered at the cabalistic characters traced on the margin. "Copy" was a word unknown to ears polite, and ladies had their portraits painted only for their friends. But now "proof-reading" forms a regular branch of education; the fairest fingers are more or less soiled with printer's ink—metaphorically, of course—and

"Touching verses
Take now the place of birthday purses."

Every country newspaper has its quota of "our charming correspondents," and the magazines shine in the steady brilliancy of a constellation of fixed stars—names conspicuous on the cover, and sure to be quoted in a notice of the number.

Well, and what is there to urge against it? Nothing, dear ladies, of itself; for we, too, have suffered cacæthes scribendi; and therefore can speak feelingly of its approach. Our school-girl days were haunted with visions of magazine covers, and a niche—in the appendix, we humbly said—of a collection of prose or poets. How eagerly we listened to every anecdote connected with those already made so glorious! how we longed to see their pictured semblances, and studied every feature when they came! And we can still remember the delightful flutter when a poem with our nom de plume—we won't say of our own—was actually in print, and we laid it by the bedside, as children do their dolls, to be conned over again at earliest day. And when one was copied—really copied, with a dozen printer's mistakes, and one line omitted—that was still more charming, and we wondered our classmates did not acknowledge the access of dignity attained, even though we gained the foot of the algebra class, and received black marks for Latin syntax.

It was a strange chance that made us, soon, very soon, co-editor of the very journal that had so befriended our youthful indiscretions; and it was in the exercise of the power, thus our duty, that we watched the rapid growth of the taste for authorship to which we have alluded. It was this experience which has led us to embody some of the rules we were so constantly called on to give, in an article that will reach most of those whose hopes, fears, and anxieties we have known. So, if you choose, we invite you to enter our sanctum, and go over with us the pile of communications that crowd the basket devoted to their reception, that, instead of a dry disquisition, we may have our criticism in a more chatty and sociable form.

In the first place, as we sort the documents into prose and verse, we remark that nine out of the ten poets expect to be paid for their verses, and all to have the publication gratis. Two tales have the modest request, "Please publish next week," and their notes inform you that the authors themselves have very miserable opinions of the article inclosed, but are over-persuaded to offer it by admiring friends. One modest little sketch has not even a word commending it to our ears; and another we welcome at the first glance, for we see by the broad margin, the separated pages, written only on one side, and carefully numbered, that there is experience, if not force of talent, in the hand from whence it comes.

Shall we commence with the prose, then, leaving the poetry by way of dessert, and see some symptoms of the mania now epidemic? The letter is dated "Rosewood Seminary;" it is in a fine crow-quill hand, with pale ink, on satin paper. Our eyes are strained to decipher it; and yet we do so, and find that "Mignon Mignonne"—the authoress of the tale submitted to our judgment—"has already a considerable reputation in local prints," conducts the "Rose-Bud," a manuscript school periodical, and writes letters for the "Home Journal," but forgets to mention whether accepted or not. She does not write for money. "Fame," she tells us, "is all the reward she wants," and "ambition is her angel." So we are introduced to "her darling pet of all she has written"—Lilla Lenister: a Tale of Myrtle Dell."

"Come to me, my angel child," said Mrs. Lenister, on a warm, bright summer afternoon, when the sun was slowly sinking to its western couch, and the flowers bent languidly on their stalks, thirsting for the pearly, cooling drops of heaven; 'I am about to depart for "that bourne from whence no traveler returns," and I would fain give thee my parting counsel. Thou art too lovely for this cold, false world, dearest one; thine eyes droop to behold its agony, thy fair cheek pales at its ingratitude.'

"Oh, my idol mother! do not speak such cruel words of foreboding!" And the young girl clasped her hands in agony over her throbbing temples, until the blood seemed oozing through her waxen fingers."

So much for the first half page of "Mignon," and it is quite enough to make us certain that, whatever might be the interest or variety of the plot, the ambitious style would quite destroy its pretensions to our pages. In the first place, the description of nature has a redundancy of adjectives, a fault most common with young writers. Then, again, no person feeling the solemn realities of such a departure, would stop to quote the very trite line with which she prefaces her remarks, or talk blank verse at such a moment. Moreover, the "blood oozing through the waxen fingers" is certainly suggestive of a very delicate and beautiful hand, but one that certainly would unfit its possessor for the hard realities of this bitter world.

This brings us to the first element of tale writing, or, indeed, of any description—naturalness; forgetting this, the charm is destroyed, be the language ever so well chosen, or the thoughts daintily expressed. People in stories should talk, as much as possible, like people in real life. They are expected to be properly dressed, not in Cherubino's Grecian drapery, but as neatly and tastefully as their situation or position would require. The costume, language, and actions must be in keeping with the character intended to be portrayed, and the incidents should ensue in natural order. This is apt to be lost sight of by young writers, who consider imagination the only talent to be cultivated, and, laying the reins on the neck of their favorite hobby, neither know nor care to what cloud-land he takes his flight. We often find an admirable plot spoiled by this very "playing at stilts," in the conversation of the actors. This often results from a lack of observation on the subject, but too frequently from the mistaken idea that people in books should have a different vernacular from the well-bred in society around us. For instance, in a declaration which should express as much natural feeling as possible, how often we find the exalted language of Sir Charles

Grandison put in the mouth of a modern watering-place lover, who perhaps has never seen the lady but three times before in his life, and proposes for the same reason that he drinks wine at dinner—because every one around him does. Modern story writers—it must be understood that we allude entirely to novices—never allow the hero or heroine to think seriously upon what is involved in such a step. They meet a pretty girl in their morning walks, and propose without the slightest hint of the question Willis so thoughtfully propounds—

"Who is thy progenitor, fair girl?
What doeth he for lucre?"

Cruel fathers are overcome in a breath, and send a check for $1000 for bridal expenses, and inexorable mamma faint, use a vinaigrette, and add their blessing to the naughty young couple. They are launched into matrimony with no hope of being taken into the firm, or the least hint to the reader as to how the housekeeping is to go on. To be sure, we would not have a dry detail of these important facts, but a blending of the real with the ideal should at all times be insisted on. Let us have enough of human nature to excuse the blind devotion in all cases represented.

But we forget to mention that this last disquisition on prospects has arisen from certain passages in the successor of "Lilla Lenister," a tale of twenty-five foolscap pages, in which the very novel incident of marrying a poor girl against the wishes of the hero's father, the elopement, and subsequent reconciliation on most honorable terms, is served up. However, we would first state that an equally novel incident disposes of the fair Lilla: A rich uncle arrives from India, seeks out the orphan child of his only sister, who proves her claims to his consideration by the possession of a certain locket, and protects her from "the agony and ingratitude of this cold, false world."

Therefore commonplace or stereotyped incident should be avoided. Hackneyed plots are as much out of favor with the public as unnatural language or positions. Think what you have known, if in real life—imagine what would be most probably said by people you are acquainted with, situated as your hero and heroine are, and do not give three pages of description to one of action. Remember that a most delicate touch and long practice are needed by every landscape painter, before he can produce agreeable pictures. Artists of eminence aim to copy nature alone, and those who approach most nearly stand highest in their profession. Suppose, for instance, they were distinguished for imagination, and choose to give us a red sky at noonday, bright yellow foliage in spring, blue trees, and pink cattle. It might be a very showy and striking picture, one that would arrest the attention, no doubt, but no delicacy of touch could harmonise or cover such deformities. Again, if all things wore their proper huc, but the parts of the scene were patched together, an Italian sky with New Hampshire granite hills, tropical foliage and Swiss peasant girls, every one would cry out at the strange admixture, and turn with commendation to the modest delineation of a simple, unpretending landscape. A clump of trees well executed will receive more praise than the grandest sunset, and a cool, gray rock give more pleasure than Alps of ultra-marine hills with pink summits.

It is by these very touches that we judge of the "capabilities and improbabilities" of a young writer. Though the handling is rough, if they have preserved correctness of outline, even if they have chosen an artistic point without the least skill in its delineation, we know that there is real taste, and a true perception of the beautiful to be encouraged and fostered. And this we are ever ready cheerfully to do. For its own sake, the happiness which the power of expression confers, and for the good it may be the medium of conveying to others, real talent should never be neglected by its possessor. Not in vanity or self-seeking, but with a still thankfulness for the great gift Heaven has thought you worthy to receive, and a deep realization of the responsibility which attends it. Were talent thus regarded, and thus cultivated, we should have less flippant tales presented to our notice, and fewer poems to reject for their utter lack of novelty or thought.

Therefore, to sum up our simple rules, in tale-writing the plot and incident should be probable, at least possible, and arranged with a thought to the ordinary sequence of events; the descriptions of natural scenery few and delicately handled—we say few, because readers generally are not interested in a geographical description of mountains and valleys that never existed, and that do not increase the excitement of the plot, or hasten the development of character. It is a form of amplification that too often serves only as a cloak for poverty of material. The conversations should be spirited or thoughtful, as the case may be, but always remember that they are conversations, and in real life; one rarely moralizes a whole page without even a comment or ejaculation from the listener. Nor does a colloquial style often admit of sentences Johnsonian in length and finish. It is, more properly, characterized by abrupt transitions, terse opinions, or brilliant sallies. Look, for example, at the animated repartee of Beatrice, or the gentle thoughtfulness, the childlike simplicity of Miranda, or the eagerness of Ferdinand. There is a tenderness in the elevated and womanly thoughts of Portia naturally expressed, and the very trifling of Rosalind has more meaning than the most labored assurance of returned affection could convey.

To return once more to our parallel, as the painter goes forth to the woods and fields to study nature in its varied phases, and while reproducing with magic skill the broad sweep of the landscape, does not fail in most careful heed to its minutest detail, twining carefully a tuft of foliage, or copying, with patient skill, the circles of the rough bark he intends to portray, or imitates with minute exactness the gray moss that drapes the fallen tree—so those who would represent social grace or human loveliness, or even trace the follies and weakness too often its startling contrast, must not neglect the most trivial point that can contribute to the air of reality which gives it the greatest charm.

Curb the ambition to go too fast or too far; be content with the power that develops gradually; do not force the imagination, or task unpracticed powers of description, and, our word for it, the gradual mental development and acquisition will be a sufficient reward for every such restraint. But there is one thing to be guarded against even here; fastidiousness will creep in, unless the balance between the head and heart is carefully preserved—an unacknowledged assumption of mental superiority over those less fortunate by circumstance or natural powers; an impatience of their narrower views, and a gradual distaste and neglect of ordinary social and domestic avocations. This is the stain that has heretofore sullied the literary reputation of our sex; it is the cause of "the lifting up of eyes and holding up of hands," which mark the entrance of a bas bleu in society; and yet it is, of all errors, most easy to be avoided by a well-balanced intellect, however brilliant or refined.

The time is gone past when literary tastes or pursuits are admitted as a stigma upon the social relation of any woman. That she can write an able review is no longer considered an excuse for a neglected household, and there is nothing inconsistent in a mind that can fashion a dainty lyric and trim a becoming cap. Let the needle and the pen lie side by side, they will not wrangle; for the one induces long, pleasant reveries, and the other can give them expression. Why should not its inspiration be as pure as that of a cigar, to banish the still less refined draughts in which some modern poets would seem to have discovered their Helicon? For the honor of our sex and our profession—for, with Tupper, "I magnify mine office"—let it be distinctly understood that good daughters, and wives, and mothers wield the pen of authorship in our very midst, nor are their domestic and social positions less graced because of so doing. There is one evil still to be corrected—the invasion of domestic retirement which now seems to be recognized as justifiable. But we hope the time will soon arrive when home-life will cease to be invaded by the busy tongue or pen of those who consider an authoress has no claim to her own identity, becoming essentially the property of the public, for fulsome flattery or base depreciation, as soon as her name appears in print.

But, after all, we have suspended our critical judgment upon the contribution basket. To be candid, our hobby has been cantering away with the morning's occupations. But you will forgive us, dear ladies, and "our correspondents" are perhaps the gainers by the episode. Not that we ever allow a harsh or hypocritical judgment to go forth to those who confide in our editorial courtesy. Whatever be our errors, this is not one of them; for we know the extreme sensitiveness which is ever the accompaniment of real talent. The Golden Rule is the only one that can properly direct such a task, and even when correction is required, it can be gently as well as rudely administered. Therefore, if we say anything that can be interpreted harshly, we pray you give it the most favorable significance, the more so as we approach the practical points of our disquisition.

Authorship, in the absence of varied employment for our sex, is of late looked to as a means of subsistence by many whose naturally refined and well cultivated minds make them shrink from actual contact with business life. The belief has gone abroad that all who have acquired any reputation are winning fortunes as well, and that the harvest is still broad and waiting for reapers. Many, thrown by unexpected reverses upon their own resources, scarcely question the possibility of failure, to meet only with a bitter disappointment which they cannot comprehend, and which a wounded spirit construes into personal insult or neglect. But to look soberly at the fact. There are perhaps ten or twelve ladies in our own country who have adopted literature as a profession. Six of these—we speak of what we know—by giving all their time and energy to their labors, by an industry which few professional men dream of and few ladies can imitate, realise a comfortable, barely comfortable, income, as a reward of years passed in battling with disappointments and patient waiting upon the fancies of a capricious public. One of our most finished and elegant writers, quoted by European critics and upheld by our own, teaches for many hours of every day to supply deficiency of income, which ought not to exist where so much talent is displayed in books eagerly read, but meagrely paid for.

Besides those who have earned their position and established their claims to a magazine hearing, there are many writing equally well perhaps, but without the éclat of a name, who get a communication accepted now and then. This leaves but little opening for a new and utterly unknown author, who may have graceful fancies, but crudely expressed, and whose manuscript, carefully written and tied with a white ribbon, betrays inexperience at once to a practised eye. A hearing even is difficult to be obtained; and then is it natural that a publisher should reject a finished article by an author already well known, to make room for one that is mediocre, to say the least? Not until publishers have more unselfishness than distinguishes common mortals.

Book writing is even worse; the market, so to speak, being equally crowded, and the stamp of magazine approval having come to be considered almost essential. It is an avenue closed to all but those who are content to serve a laborious apprenticeship, or who can afford to print as well as write, asking no remuneration. Of course, there are exceptions to all that we have here stated. "Friends at court" now and then gain audience for those who prove worthy of an introduction. Some there have been who at once, by force of originality, can adopt the standard of Miss Mary Maria Quigge, and "write at once for the greatest glory and the highest pay." But these exceptions only prove the general rule, that authorship, as a profession, is the last to be chosen, if speedy or ample remuneration is expected; for the salary of many a governess equals, if not exceeds, the largest income we have ever known an American authoress to receive.

We have said nothing of simple literary ambition, because we do not recognise it as a worthy motive. It savors too much of vanity, and its returns are too often only "vexation of spirit." We commenced a playful criticism upon a topic forced daily upon our consideration, but, if it has become subdued or practical, it is because the subject seemed to demand the transition. We gladly welcome to the sisterhood those who are earnest and trustful in their vocation, for we owe it to them as a debt of gratitude to those whose hands and hearts were so kindly opened to us; but we would also shield others from painful disappointments and harsh experiences which are almost inevitable.

MATIN ANTHEM.

BY E. T. CONRAD.

THE gloom hath its shapes and the silence its warning,
And dim terrors troop 'neath the banner of night;
But God guards our couch, and joy comes in the morning;
Our souls, like the Orient, exult in His light.

Oh, praise for the gentle Sleep, sitting in shadow,
And singing sweet songs to the worn heart the while;
Its balmy spell falls, as the dew on the meadow,
When low winds caress and the loving stars smile.

Forgive, if ill thoughts, o'er those slumbers so sainted,
Career'd, as night birds o'er the sleeping earth soar!
Oh, be all, my soul, like the crystal untainted,
Which, stirred in the font, is still pure as before!

The sun to his journey goes forth like a giant,
Enrobed by his Lord in the radiance of day:
Oh, thus be my pilgrimage, lofty, reliant,
As true in His service, as strong in His stay!

Vouchsafe to deliver from sin and from danger;
My loved ones, oh, cherish them, guide and defend;
Thy grace grant my foe-man, thy bounty the stranger;
And blessings, like fruit clusters, hang round my friend!

So pass be each day, that, when all days are over,
When the blind sun hath sunk, a spent spark, from the sky,
My soul shall—though darkness the universe cover—
Arise to that Sun where the day cannot die!

SAINT VALENTINE'S DAY.

BY HICKORY BROOM.

JASON THOMPSON chanced, by the aid of his uncle's market-wagon and horses, to be once in Philadelphia on Saint Valentine's week, and his bewildered gaze was charmed by the objects of barter which were displayed about. His shoes had always enjoyed the luxury of soft mud in their journeyings with their master in the country, where he and they had always sojourned, and the difficulties of locomotion which the hard bricks interposed in his city travels, enabled him to take a better survey than he perhaps would have done under other circumstances.

The Valentine shops attracted his attention most though he was at a loss at first to understand what many of the monstrosities meant; but he soon comprehended the purposes to which they were to be applied. In a measure, ignorant of city affairs, and in city ways, Jason had the reputation at home of being a mischievous youth, who was always ready to engage in any fun which was going on, and, in many instances, the originator of the best share of it. The pictures met his hearty approval, and furnished him with many a laugh afterwards.

The next day after his visit to the city, he was struck with the idea of sending a Valentine to Patsey Manly, who had inflicted a serious wound upon him under the left side of his waistcoat. He made a confidant of Robert Manly, a broad-brimmed, felt-hatted youth of fourteen summers, who rejoiced in corduroy pantaloons, casinet roundabout, and fun generally. Robert was two years the junior of Jason, and looked up to him as his superior from his fertility in fishing out fun. When the two met together, after the return of the latter from the city, a description of the thousand and one curiosities was centered into. The great display of Valentines at Zieber's had taken a firm hold upon the imagination of Jason, who, in the midst of his descriptions, and while Robert was eagerly, with eyes and ears, taking in all he was saying, exclaimed—

"I'm going to send Pats a Voluntine."

"What's that? Something good to eat?"

"Why, no!" said Jason, laughing at the ignorant simplicity of his companion. "It's a sheet of paper all pattered over with love fixins, with love verses underneath."

"Did you get one of the things?"

"No, I didn't. I didn't have but a shilling, and that I spent at the circus the night before I seed the Voluntines. I can make one of them though. I'm going to get a sheet of paper and draw one of the picters I seen, and send it to your Patsey through the post office."

"That'll be fun though, won't it? I'm in for that. She'll wonder who it comes from, until she sees your name at the bottom, and then won't she let out at you! Maybe she won't!"

"You don't put your own name on 'em at all. You just send 'em, and sign 'em Voluntine, and she'll have to guess who it is from."

"She won't think it's us. She'll think it's that stuck-up Ben Jones, who's been cantering round her of a Sunday ever since he got that long-tailed coat. Or else she'll think it's flax-head Bob Mitchell, who gave her that brass ring last Christmas."

"I don't care who she thinks it is, after we have had our fun out of it."

The truth of the matter is that Jason would have been sorely troubled if he could have known that any one besides himself would be suspected of sending the Valentine.

"Let's make one right away, Jason, and I'll take it up to the postmaster's store when I go after that spool of cotton and yard of tape she wants to finish her apron with, to wear to Tilly Henderson's carpeting party."

A sheet of paper was procured from the table-drawer in the parlor, without the knowledge of the owner, in order to prevent suspicion, and the two conspirators set themselves to work to manufacture a Valentine.

"What kind of a picter are you going to put on, Jason?"

"Why, I'm going to make a heart with a carving-knife sticking in it."

Many endeavors were made to draw a heart correctly on another piece of paper, before a venture was made on the sheet which was to be sent away. After various attempts, which produced as variously-shaped hearts, Robert left the room, with an exclamation of "I know what we'll do!" and returned, in a few minutes, with a heart-shaped cake-cutter, that he had taken from the pantry unperceived, and, laying it triumphantly on the table, said, "That's the how to do it!"

The heart was drawn upon the paper, when a new difficulty arose in the drawing of the carving-knife, which was soon obviated by the jack-knife of Jason, which was laid upon the sheet and its outline correctly taken. How to embellish it with poetry was a matter of serious consideration; but the genius that could overcome the obstacle of a heart was not at a loss to procure poetry, and the almanac that hung lazily above the mantel was jerked down and examined.

"I don't see nothing in here that will do for the poetry, Bob; it's all about the weather, and figurations for the days in the week."

"Let me see it, Jason; I'll find something that'll do. Why, what do you want better than this here?"

"The ring is round, and has no end,
And so is my love to Mary, my friend."

"It don't say anything about a heart. I've got a heart here, and must say something about it, of course."

"Well, here's another one that's just the thing—

"My heart is broke, and you have done it,
By them little eyes you carry under your bonnet;
And, if you don't mend it by loving me straight,
I shall die of the trouble, and you'll be too late!
So take me then quickly, and you'll be in time
To have a good-looking feller for your VALENTINE."

"That's first-rate, Bob. I'll put that underneath, and write Patsey on the heart, and my name on the knife."

"If you do that, she'll know it's you sent it."

"Oh yes! Well, then, I'll write, 'Guess who;' that will bother her a little."

The precious document, over which so much time had been spent, was folded up and stuck together with beeswax. Appearing before Patsey with a look which hurry alone prevented her from noticing, he signified his readiness to go down for the cotton and tape, on which errand he was dispatched. The missive was safely deposited with the postmaster, who, from the singularity of a letter being put in the office by Robert for his sister, was induced to make an inquiry about it; and, on learning the facts, made an imitation of the Philadelphia postmark to help the affair along.

Upon the next day, which was St. Valentine's, Patsey, and Tilly Henderson, who had "just run over," and was assisting her in clearing away the dinner things, were surprised by a call at the door. On reaching the spot, they found the clerk of the postmaster, who handed Patsy a letter, saying "that he was going past up to Young's to carry a package, and thought he would bring the letter along, as they might want to know what was in it." Patsy took the letter and turned it over and over, and then, opening it, exclaimed—

"It's got a picture in it, I do declare!"

"Is it though, Patsy? Well, I declare, that's a Valentine!"

They were about to inquire further into the matter when Robert came into the kitchen, and the letter disappeared into the pocket of Patsy's dress. The manoeuvre was not quick enough to escape the eyes of Robert, who scampered off into the barn, and told Jason "it was all right; Pats has got the picture." They were debating what course to pursue in the matter, when they saw Patsy, Tilly, and the baby emerging from the house. A chink in the barn enabled them to watch their motions. They came towards the barn to see where the boys were, and found them very busy at a rat-trap, which apparently absorbed their undivided attention. The girls left the barn and the boys left the trap, and, through the chink, saw them go behind a large tree. The boys immediately came out of the barn and cautiously approached the spot. When they got to the side of the tree, they found the girls busily reading the Valentine.

"I wonder who it was that sent this to me? It come from Philadelphia, for there's the name printed on it. I wonder if it wasn't Ben Jones? He was into the city three or four days ago."

"I should not be surprised if it was him; and I suppose you be glad of it, if it was!"

"Be done that, now; you know I wouldn't"—A smiling blush betrayed the fib. "It must be somebody that thinks something of me, or he wouldn't say his heart was breaking. Now, I wonder if it was Ben?"

"You know it was him, Pats. What's the use of your saying you don't? I'll watch him next Sunday, and see if he didn't."

"I'd just like to know if it was him. I'd give something to know who it was."

Jason, whose jealousy was worked up to the highest pitch, could contain himself no longer, and, jumping down from the seat around the tree, exclaimed, triumphantly—

"I sent it! What are you going to give me for telling?"

"A smack in the face for your impudence!"

Jason Thompson did not marry Patsy Mauly, and a Valentine is his abomination.

NOTES OF TRAVELS AND PROGRESS.

BY JOHN DUFFEY.

It is truly a great gratification to the American heart to have an opportunity of occasionally contemplating some of the wonderful improvements that have been made in almost every section of our prosperous country within the last twenty or twenty-five years. Look from what point we may, we behold on every side the most astonishing effects, produced simply by the hard hand of industry and the indomitable enterprise of our people, fostered and directed by the generous and liberal spirit of our republican institutions. So rapidly, indeed, have most of our improvements been made, that the pleasure of contrasting the present with the past appearance and conditions of things is by no means confined to the aged or infirm. It is a gratification which may be fully enjoyed by those who have not yet reached the middle age, and by those who are at present the most ardent and hopeful aspirants for fortune and distinction among their fellow-citizens. Many such, as well as the "oldest inhabitant," can very distinctly remember his village home, on the wild and secluded bank perhaps of some western river, or in the bosom of a dense forest, upon which the gradual efforts of laborious man had just begun to produce a visible impression, and that only to make room for the sun to shine down upon a few scattered log cabins and garden spots. And yet, even now, while his locks are still dark and glossy as in his youth, or but slightly touched with the frosts of some thirty or forty winters, the rude hut in which he drew his first breath—nay, the entire village that was so familiar to him in his boyhood—has disappeared for ever. The humble home of his infancy has given place to a stately mansion, which occupies a commanding site in a beautiful and wealthy city. The almost unknown and unpretending village is no longer to be seen on the margin of the quiet and sluggish stream, surrounded by a dense and moaning forest—for the little river is now made to bear upon its bosom the products of industry and the arts, and its banks are crowded with the storehouses of commerce, and the habitations of prosperous men.

This, however, as every observing traveler well knows, is but a faint sketch of the rapid progress of improvements since the introduction of canals, steamboats, and railroads, but more especially since the introduction of the latter, as far as the interior of our country is concerned, and more especially still of the interior of the States of New York and Pennsylvania. The writer of this article, who is not very old, has himself witnessed all the singular changes he has attempted to describe, in all their panoramic rapidity and perfection, and in many sections of the Union. Nearly forty years ago he was a young adventurer, a printer, and, professionally, an editor, and commenced his career in Winchester, Va. How long he was traveling to Winchester from Philadelphia, and what Winchester looked like at that day, in comparison with what Winchester is at this day, it might be worth our time to stop and inquire, had not the railroad been introduced so recently, that almost every one who knows what Winchester is now can remember what she was only a few years since. Will any one who can remember what Fort Cumberland, Md., was in 1813, compare its appearance then with what the City of Cumberland is now, and not acknowledge the triumphs of railroads over time and space, as well as over national roads and canals? We say nothing here, however, of those places on the shores of our great rivers, whose rapid progress from insignificant villages to prosperous and magnificent cities has been the results of steam navigation.

But, to come down to a period some twenty years later—how remarkable are the changes which have taken place in the wealth and appearance of certain villages at this time embraced in the line of THE NEW YORK AND ERIE RAILROAD! Many of the towns which can now be found conspicuously displayed on the maps, at a much later period than twenty years had scarcely a local habitation or a name; whilst those whose names were only familiar to persons in their immediate vicinity, and to merchants in the east, as county seats and places of some commercial pretensions, are now become cities of wealth and importance, where learning and the arts are cultivated, and whose inhabitants are in the full enjoyment of all the comforts, luxuries, and refinements of civilization, and protected by all the moral and religious safeguards of the gospel. Such are now the happy and prosperous conditions of Elmira, of Binghamton, and of Oswego, the former of which, twenty years ago, had not more than one thousand of a resident population. It has now more than 3000 inhabitants; churches for the principal denominations of Christians; two splendid hotels, equal in their comfortable arrangements to the best in the city of New York; while the mercantile establishments, and the streets crowded with building materials, exhibit all the evidences of a thriving and prosperous business community. The same, however, is true of all the principal towns along the route to a certain extent, that have been brought into existence by the opening of the southern interior of the State, through the facilities afforded by the railroad.

But it is now time, agreeably to our first intention, that we should say something of the railroad itself, which, after twenty years of the most intense anxiety, labor, and perseverance, on the part of its projectors and friends, has recently triumphed over all opposition, and been completed from New York to Dunkirk, a distance a little short of five hundred miles.

We have now before us a copy of the "Elmira Republican," of December 30, 1831, which contains the proceedings of a convention held at Oswego ten days previously, at which it was unanimously resolved to apply immediately to the legislature of the State for the incorporation of a company to construct a railroad from Lake Erie to the city of New York, with a capital of $5,000,000. What is somewhat singular, the same paper contains a long report and resolutions of a convention held in Lyeoming County, Pennsylvania, in favor of the Williamsport and Elmira railroad, which, very greatly to the detriment of Philadelphia interests, has never yet been completed.

And here an old editor might be permitted to drop a tear over the names and the memories of the excellent and public-spirited men who composed, in part, those conventions, but who have long since passed over the railroad of life to that "bourne from whence no traveler returns." The record of those who have gone before, and of those who survive, is now indeed before us, and we may have some other and more favorable opportunity to refer to them. We could, however, offer nothing more conclusive in regard to the confidence that was placed in their intelligence, individually and collectively, than the fact that the legislature of New York granted their request; and, on the twenty-fourth of April, 1832, the act incorporating the New York and Erie Railroad was confirmed.

Passing over the numerous reverses and incidents of the times which impeded, and even suspended, its progress, this great railroad now employs upwards of one hundred engines of the very first class, requiring the services of four hundred men, and forty furnaces. The great depot is at Piermont, where the different works of the company, including the machine department, the car shop, and every other species of employment connected with locomotives, passenger and luggage trains, is carried on with the greatest celerity and perfection. The rail used throughout the extent of the road is the T rail, weighing some 60 pounds to the yard. The rails are laid six feet apart. Consequently, the cars are unusually wide and comfortable, and, being set on springs, produce an easy and pleasant sensation when in motion.

We have now to regret that we cannot accompany the locomotive in its rapid flight, and, at the same time, present to the reader a lively and a minute survey of the road which lies before us, as we start either from Jersey City or Piermont, to the end of its fiery career at Dunkirk. We regret also that our pen, albeit unused to sketching glowing descriptions of the beautiful or sublime, the majestic or the awful, can impart to the reader but little of that we feel, as the varied scenery suddenly opens to our view at every rise, descent, and curve of this most magnificent route. Twenty-two years ago, we traveled the southern stage roads from Eastern to Western New York; but what did we then see or comprehend of the great country that slept before us, covered up, as it were, by immense forests, and seemingly impenetrable, even to the sturdy and grasping hand of improvement? But now how changed! On every side we behold the most gratifying evidences of active life and teeming prosperity. Apart from the thriving villages and the little towns—the neat cottages and the noble farms, the wide-spread hill-sides and the deep and fertile valleys that sparkle in the sunshine and glow in the deep green of summer—the road itself is a work of art and labor combined which cannot fail to arrest the admiring attention of every reflecting traveler. From the numerous monuments of skill, durability, and safety which we meet in our rapid flight over hills, rivers, and ravines, we shall select but two at this time for the inspection of our readers. The first of these is the CASCADE BRIDGE, a stupendous wooden structure, 250 feet in width, and thrown over a ravine 134 feet deep. The span of the arch has a rise of 150 feet, and has been admired as well for its width, which is said to surpass that of any other wooden structure in the world, as for the strength, beauty, and gracefulness of its appearance from the chasm below. This bridge, it is said, cost $70,000, and it was while viewing a heavy train pass over it that Gen. Scott was heard to say: "The man who could throw a cow-path over that gulf deserves a crown." But John Fowler, a very clever carpenter, whose name alone has been given to the public in connection with the building of this bridge, was not the man who "deserved the crown." In justice to a worthy man, it should here be stated that JULIUS W. ADAMS, at present, we believe, the editor of "Appleton's Mechanics' Magazine," is entitled to the credit and the honor of designing and modeling the Cascade Bridge, and the Stnoducca Viaduct also, another stupendous structure which crosses the Stnoducca Creek about two miles west of the Cascade. The Viaduct, which we wish we could here represent, is 1200 feet long, 110 feet high, and has 18 arches, with spans of 50 feet; at the top it is 30 feet wide. The credit of all the work of this Viaduct has been given to Mr. Kirkwood, an accomplished engineer, but incorrectly, as we have already stated.

And now, alas! just as we were about to close our notes by recommending to our lady readers, who may have followed us in our ramble, not to forget to take the Erie Railroad in their jaunts of pleasure and recreation during the next summer, we find that we have not once alluded to the line of railroad which runs from Elmira to the princely village of Canandaigua, intersecting the main line of the New York and Erie Railroad at that point. This line will prove of great importance to the many enterprising towns, including Havana, Jefferson, at the head of Seneca Lake, Penn-Yan, &c. The view, from parts of this route, of Seneca Lake, and of the beautiful scenery that surrounds its blue waters, is alone worthy of a trip to Western New York, if not of a voyage across the Atlantic, as Mr. Jefferson once said of Harper's Ferry.

POETRY.

THE TIME TO DIE.

BY DAVID F. CABLE

I ASKED the child, whose prattling tongue
With sweet and silvery accents rung;
Who gambol'd through the livelong day,
And careless whiled the hours away—
"Tell me, sweet child, the time to die."
Thus did that careless boy reply:
"Oh! 'tis not time for one so young,
Whose race in life is just begun;
Whose hopes within the bud yet lie—
Oh! 'tis not time for me to die!"

I asked the youth, whose panting soul
Doff'd all bonds and spurn'd control;
Whose heart was fill'd with boyhood's fire,
And gushing o'er with chaste desire—
"Tell me the time when you would die."
Thus did the ardent youth reply:
"When I have bravely battled life,
And conquer'd all, and gain'd the strife;
When on Fame's lists I've mounted high—
Then, only then, 'tis time to die!"

I asked the man whom fleeting time
Bespoke as one in manhood's prime;
Whose thoughtful look and knitted brow
Proclaim'd him in life's warfare now—
"Tell me the time when you would die."
Thus did that hardy one reply:
"I would yet live, and have my health,
To grapple for the yellow wealth;
To guard my wife and family—
No, I'm not yet prepared to die!"

I asked the man whose careworn look
A weight of grief and age bespoke;
Whose slow and trembling accents gave Tones borrowed from the silent grave—
"Tell me the time when you would die."
Thus did the hoary one reply:
"Though I am old, yet life is sweet,
And I am not prepared to meet
The monster Death; I know not why—
But still I'm not prepared to die!"

Ah me! 'tis ever thus with man,
Who hugs the life that's but a span:

Who, fleeing from Death's rude alarms,
Is quickly hurried to his arms.
When asked the time that he would die,
'Tis ever thus he will reply :
" I am too young, too fair, too blessed ;
Too weak, too old, too much oppressed ;
Too rich, too poor ; too low, too high—
And I am not prepared to die !"

— LINES TO —.

BY MRS. EMILY PIERPONT LEEDERNIER.*

I WOULD not in anger chide thee,
Though thy deeds have been my bane ;
Though the deluge fierce hath swept me
Filled my soul with hopeless pain :

Love's bright dream all rudely ended,
Wakened by a sable wing,
Shutting out the holy sunlight,
Folding the deep midnight in.

There I brooded in the darkness,
Till my scorching brain did swim,
And my heart swelled in the blackness
Till hope burst the surging brim !

Years have rolled since that sad parting,
And the dull gray thread of life—
Woven 'mid the fires of Etna,
Quenched oft by sorrow's strife—

Though its woof can ne'er be blended,
Still 'tis mingling with the chime
Of the vibrant chords that echo
From the murmuring harp of time ;

Music writ in burning letters,
Pleasure cadenced into pain—
Thou it was that forged the fetters—
Would that I could break the chain !

For the galling links of iron
Rust within the human heart,
And the soaring spirit's fettered
By the poison and the smart.

Yet there is one pulse still throbbing
With the old accustomed power ;
There 's one cord I would not sever,
Though the world were pledged my dower :

* The author of this spirited and most touching poem has lately become favorably known to the intelligent public by her "Select Readings and Recitations of Poetry and Dramatic Writings." She has adopted this mode of sustaining herself and her three children, left dependent on her exertions. Her own "Lines" tell the sad tale of wrong and desertion with such evident truth and deep pathos that we need not add a word. Every good and feeling heart must take an interest in the author.

Mrs. Leedernier—she has assumed her maiden name—was born in Maine; her mother was a descendant of the Puritans, her father a Frenchman. She seems to unite the vivacity and versatility of the one race with the steadfast purpose and persevering energy of the other. She evidently has a genius for the profession she is pursuing. We trust her talents will meet with warm encouragement. The cause should be her passport to public favor.—EDITOR.

'Tis the sweet parental cistus,
Binding in a mutual thrill
Buds of love our God did give us—
With our life their pulses fill.

They, the little tender nurslings,
Clustering at their mother's knee,
And, with faces full of wonder,
Ask, "Where can our father be?"

Yet, for their sake, I, in silence,
Hold my quiv'ring heart that bleeds,
That I cannot, for example,
Point them to their father's deeds !

Thou hast thrown aside thy duty ;
But a mother's heart is strong,
And to win life's fearful battle,
I will wrestle 'mid the throng ;

Brave the tempest clashing thunder
With unflinching soul and eye,
To hope's broken plank still clinging—
Stem the tide, or 'neath it die !

— LIFE'S SEASONS.

BY RICHARD COB.

THERE is a Springtime of the heart—
'Tis found in infancy—
When on its mother's breast the babe
First smiles in dimpled glee :
When, like the bud upon the stem,
Its life is but begun,
And pearly tear-drops flee the eyes
As shadows flee the sun !

There is a Summer of the heart—
'Tis found in early youth—
When life is full of joyousness,
Of innocence and truth :
When clouds but seldom intervene
To mar the sky so bright,
And all is but a fairy scene
Of exquisite delight !

There is an Autumn of the heart—
'Tis found in riper age—
When sorrow 's a familiar thing,
And grief an heritage :
When shadows thick and dark come o'er
The beauty of the sky,
And, by their dim obscurity,
Ere tell some danger nigh !

There is a Winter of the heart—
'Tis found in later years—
When life is full of bitterness,
Of vain regretful tears :
When stormy winds and chilling blasts
Blow with so fierce a breath,
That we would fain seek shelter in
The anchorage of Death !

When'er the Autumn of the heart
Shall cloud our lives with gloom,
And Winter's cold and chilling blasts
Remind us of the tomb,
If we but act our parts aright
On Time's uncertain shore,
Our souls may know, in purer climes,
A Summer evermore !

OUTWARD BOUND.

SUNSHINE and beautiful the night hours on the sea!
The sun hath sunk to rest in silent majesty.
In the pure blue above, mark now each radiant star—
Diamonds in Night's dark robe—glistening afar;
My mother gazes there, and thinks of me away,
Whose floating home they cheer: Then, mother, dearest, Pray—
Pray Heaven to guide thy wanderer safely o'er the deep—
Pray Heaven to guard us all while we in quiet sleep!

Solemn and beautiful the night hours on the sea!
Slowly the moon ascends in silent majesty.
Mark how each silver wave smiles 'neath her gentle beam,
Leaving our bark's smooth side with fitful gleam;
Wide spread the waters round—in seeming mirth they play,
Sporting on unseen graves: Then, mother, dearest! pray—
Pray Heaven to guide thy wanderer safely o'er the deep—
Pray Heaven to guard us all while we in quiet sleep! D.

THE TWO STARS.

BY H. T. R.

As at night I wandered forth,
Came I where a mountain stream,
Rushing from the shaded woods'
Deep and lonely solitudes,
Glittered gayly in the beam
That from Dian's crescent crown
On the sleeping earth came down.

By the streamlet's grassy side
Sat a child of summers seven;
On her pale and upturned face,
By the moonlight, I could trace
Silent, wondering thoughts of Heaven.
"Stars that glimmer in the skies,
Are ye truly angels' eyes?"

"Why, dear one," said I, speaking low,
"Do you here unguarded lie?"
"My mother died last week," said she,
"And this promise made to me—
'Ever, dearest, shall this eye,
From amidst the stars above,
Watch thee with undying love.'

"My mother used to bring me here,
Before she went away—
And often I have heard her sigh,
As the bright bubbles hurried by—
But why, I cannot say.
Now I'm alone, I often dream
Among the voices of the stream.

"I hear her kind and gentle tones,
And there's one star, with tender beams,
So like my mother's loving eye
When the death-shadows gathered nigh,
And every night it nearer seems;
Not many nights, I think," said she,
"Before that star will come for me!"

Again at night I wandered forth,
And sought the streamlet's side;
In vain my anxious, searching look—
No form lay by the rushing brook;
But deep within the silver tide
Two stars, reflected, brightly shone:
When last I gazed, there was but one.

FIRST AND SECOND LOVE.

BY HELEN HAMILTON.

BELoved and most beautiful,
I gaze upon thy face—
Upon thy slender form, replete
With every winning grace;
And, oh! I tremble when I think
How dear to me thou art:
Wert thou to die, how desolate
Would be my vacant heart!

I pass each evening in my walk
The little churchyard lone,
And I see the moonlight shining
On one white gleaming stone;
The lilies growing round that grave
Look fair in the moon's ray;
But she who sleeps beneath that stone
Was fairer far than they.

She was a lovely, gentle girl,
With eyes of heaven's blue,
And cheeks whose soft tint put to shame
The earliest rosebud's hue.
I loved her, wooed her; but she was
A treasure lent—not given;
And, ere we wed, her gentle soul
Fled to its native Heaven!

And sometimes, in the lonely hours,
When far away thou art,
I look into that sepulchre
Of buried joy—my heart.
And Memory brings back the face
Of her, my seraph bride—
And that sad morning in the spring,
That May morn when she died!

But, oh! I loved her not as I
Love thee, beloved one!
She was my life's sweet morning star,
Thou art its glorious sun!
Though long I wept when she fled back
To her fair home on high,
Wert thou to perish so, beloved,
I would not weep—but die!

GERTRUDE LEE.

BY W. FLETCHER HOLMES, M.D.

Drest thou not at twilight's glooming,
Gertrude Lee,
Where the dewy buds were blooming
On the lea.
And the hours of Joy's beguiling
Swiftly flew,
Vow to me, through glad tears smiling,
"O be true!"

As the springtime flowers at even Thirst for rain;
As the stricken soul for Heaven
Sighs in vain;
As the tar on storm-lashed billow
Prays for rest—
So yearn I thy head to pillow
On my breast.

As the pilgrim wayworn, weary,
To the shrine,
In Arabia's desert dreary
Oft doth pine,
Whilst he toils across the mountain's
Rugged caves,
For the wayside sparkling fountain's
Emerald waves:

As the gallant hero, dying
On the plain,
Whilst his mangled form is lying
'Mid the slain,
Longs to hear his brave men shouting Victory—
So my heart, thine own not doubting,
Longs for thee.

As the wand'rer lorn—when twilight
Deep'ning glooms,
And, still later, when the starlight
Heaven illumes—
Sighs for home, where household treasures Garnered are—
Where thick cluster fire-side pleasures
Without care:

As the prisoned bird is pining
To be free—
So my heart, all else resigning,
Pines for thee.
To my home an angel blessed
Wilt thou be?
Be thy soul by mine caressed,
Gertrude Lee.

THE FORSAKEN.

BY GEO. A. MERRITT.

'Tis noon of night; yet balmy sleep
Soothes not her troubled breast,
Nor soaks those founts that wearied weep,
Though nature pleads for rest.
She mourns alone—but finds, too late,
What perfidy can prove;
As if to kiss the blow of fate,
Still cherishing her love.

Her raven hair neglected flows;
Her melting song is hushed;
And wan her cheeks, where once the rose
In mantling beauty blushed.
Upon her thin white hand she leans
Her pale, dejected brow,
Recalling blighted hopes and scenes,
E'en dear to mem'ry now.

More dim her midnight taper burns;
Now, faintly glimmering, dies;
Brief comforter! She, sorrowing, turns
To seek if in the skies
There is an orb whose friendly ray,
To sad reflection given,
Would pass not from her view away,
But steadfast burn in Heaven.

On yon lone stellar light afar,
Her eyes unconscious grow,
But little dreaming that bright star
Is hastening below.

The lawn awhile, and sylvan glade,
Bathe in its silv'ry tide:
Alas! how soon she sees it fade
Along yon bleak hill's side!

The cold moon looks upon her brow
With melancholy ray;
The dark winds moan around her now;
She languishes away.
Oh! chide her not! Blame not those tears!
Those drops unbidden spring
To melt the grief her bosom bears—
Forlorn and friendless thing!

Could she repress each rising sigh,
Each gushing tear restrain,
Her pent-up grief might smothered lie
Awhile; but soon again
The heaving bosom's swelling tide
Would spurn its weak control,
And pour, until its fount were dried,
In torrents o'er the soul.

Oh! who could bear, and bear unmoved,
The wrong that she has known?
To love, alas! and not be loved,
Would swell the heart alone;
But here a soulless wanton won
Affections to betray,
And left his victim, thus undone,
To pine and waste away!

TO NINA.

BY R. JAMES KERLING.

STARLIGHT upon the dark blue wave is trembling,
And mournful tones float on the evening air;
Starlight, the spirit's shadowy gloom resembling,
The wind's low tone—its murmuring voice of prayer.

Yet art thou with me! In the scene—the hour,
I see, I feel thy holy presence near;
And thoughts of thee, like dewdrops on the flower,
Lie on my heart, and tremble like thy tear.

Thy birdlike voice, with wild impassioned meaning,
Haunts like the memory of an olden dream;
That eye of thine, with its soft witch'ry beaming,
Will fling its radiance o'er the Lethan stream.

Once more, once more—and, hand in hand, communing,
We seek the trysting place—the hallowed spot—
Where Hope, the heart to softest joys attuning,
Woke its love-burthened tale—not yet forgot.

Once more, once more—the sunset's crimson glory
We watch fade o'er the distant mountain side,
While the young moon, just trembling with her story,
Wooes the bright bosom of the swelling tide.

Once more, once more—too sweet to last forever,
I hold thee trembling to my boyish brow;
Thus burst bright moments on life's path, and ever—
Like meteor-gleams by night—as soon depart.

Once more, once more—thine eyes to mine upturning,
I press the dark hair from thy Parian brow,
And wonder if the love within thee burning
Will laugh at Time and Fate—where art thou now!

No more, no more—for Mem'ry may not linger
Forever with the halcyon days that were;
Yet Time, that sweeps the heart with his dark finger,
Shall spare the name that Faith has written there.

PATTERNS FOR SILK EMBROIDERY.

THESE fashions for embroidering the borders of cloaks, pelisses, sacques, &c., on merino, or fine cassimere, or flannel, with silk, are to be wrought with coarse or fine silk, or with a mixture of the two, according to the degree of intricacy or simplicity in the parts of the pattern.

To facilitate the work, we can furnish casts from the original wood-cuts of these designs. By chalking the raised figure on the cast, the design may be stamped on the cloth, and the whole trouble of tracing or drawing on tissue paper saved. One of our correspondents uses printer's ink, instead of chalk, in putting the design on merino. This requires skill and care to avoid soiling the cloth.

These patterns are equally serviceable for muslin, or any other material.

THE NURSERY

We have selected for our muslin and cambric department of the present month several of the most tasteful infants' robes that have been designed of late.

Fig. 1 is a christening robe, of the finest French cambric, and ornamented with rich needlework en sablier. The front breadth is composed of alternate tucks and scalloped needlework, and this is enclosed in a horizontal trimming to match. The waist is formed in the same way, and the sleeves correspond. The needlework should be set on in an easy fullness. The same style may be made of tucks alternated with rich lace, and even ordinary embroidered muslin edging. The tucks should be run with great care, or they will draw and spoil the effect. It is well to have a thick pasteboard or portfolio laid upon the knee to straighten them over.

Fig. 2 is a much plainer slip for a small infant. It is left in fullness from the band around the throat, and the skirt is simply ornamented by two rows of scalloped cambric edging. The same surrounds the neck and finishes the sleeves, which are intended to be looped up with ribbon of some bright and pretty color. It will be noticed that there is a narrow band, or gusset, upon the shoulder.

Fig. 3 is an expensive, but tasteful dress, also for a very young child, with a rich needlework front and corsage. We have now in preparation a cut of the most elegant christening-dress produced in England the present year. We publish it as much for its novelty as its elegance.

Figs. 4 and 5 are specimens of Le Gilet.

DRESS NET FOR THE HAIR.

Materials.—One ounce and a half of gold thread, about the size of No. 8. Three strings of rather large pearl beads.

Cut 10 lengths, of two yards each, and 20 lengths in pairs, each two inches shorter than the preceding. For instance: the first pair will be 70 inches, the next 68, and so on. Take a large hard cushion, or pillow, and pin on the 10 lengths, at the side furthest from you, exactly in the centre of the threads. There will thus be 20 strings of each a yard. You will then begin the knotting, which is done in the following manner: Take four threads at the left hand, and of these hold the two centre between the thumb and first finger, whilst you pass the left hand one so as to form a loop on the right hand side (diagram a); take the right hand thread, pass the end under this loop, across the two centre, under the left hand thread and end, which are still on the left, and again down through the same loop in which you first inscribed it (diagram b). The knot is then complete, and only requires to be drawn up about half an inch from the pin. Before it is quite drawn up, slip a pearl bead on the two centre threads, and let it remain in the middle of the knot, as seen in the diagram accompanying this. As there are four threads for each knot, there will be five knots on this row. Now add one of the two longest pairs remaining, at each side of these, on a line with the knots. Repeat the process, and on this row there will be six knots; add another pair at each side, and there will be seven knots on the row. Go on increasing until you have added all the pairs of threads, when half the net will be done.

Then, after each row, omit a pair of threads at both ends, until you have only the first number left. Do not fasten them off, but merely attach them, with a stout pin, to the cushion, as you proceed. When all are done, knot them strongly together, in pairs, and cut off the ends; the pieces of thread that are left forming part of the tassels.

FOR THE BORDER.—The net being thus completed, slip a thread of gold all round, under the knots of the last half, and the loops formed by the doubled threads of the preceding. Tie the thread so as to contract the net into a round shape, and, with Boulton's steel crochet hook, No. 14, work \times 1 d c under thread and knot; 5 ch, \circ 1 d c under next thread and knot; 3 ch, 1 d c under next thread and knot; 3 ch, 1 d c on thread; 3 ch, 1 d c on thread; 3 ch \times repeat all round.

2d round of border.—Slip on any 3 d c of last round; \times 3 ch, miss 1, d c on 2d; \times 3 times, 3 ch, miss 1, slip on 2d; turn the work, \circ 3 ch, d c under every loop of 3 just made, and then 3 ch, slip on chain before the d c on which you began this round turn the work, and repeat d c under every chain with 3 chain between; 3 ch, s c on chain of first round, and slip on this till you come to the place where the next shell is to be begun—namely, the 2d d c stitch, after 5 ch.

3d round.—D c under chain, \times 3 ch, d c under next \times , wherever the loop of 3 ch occurs, and missing two between the d c where it does not.

4th round.— \times d c under loop, 4 ch, d c under next, 4 ch \times repeat.

Plait a band of gold thread, with a tassel at each end, and let it be sufficiently long to run in the same line of holes as the single thread, and to allow the tassels to hang as represented in the engraving.

CHINESE SLIPPER.

(See Out.)

Materials.— $\frac{1}{2}$ a yard of rich black satin, of the wide width; gold bullion; 2 skeins of the purest gold thread, coarse and fine; and of China silk 5 shades of each of the following colors; blue, purple, green, yellow green, brown (shaded into orange), crimson, and a skein of the coarsest white crochet twist.

The pattern for the front of the slipper, which it will readily be perceived is genuine Chinese, must be enlarged according to the size of the slipper required. It should occupy the whole front of the foot. When accurately drawn on stout writing paper, the outlines and divisions must be traced by pricking them with a pin; then lay the pattern very evenly on the satin, with the smooth side of the paper upwards, and keep it in its place by means of weights. Rub some finely powdered flake-white over the pattern with a large flat stump, and on removing the paper the design will be found traced accurately on the satin. Take a fine sable brush, dip it in a solution of flake-white and milk, and mark the outlines carefully. The gold pattern on the sides of the slippers must be enlarged, and marked in the same manner.

All the outlines are then to be worked by laying a line of the coarse white crochet silk on the satin, and sewing it over with fine silk of the same hue. Those parts only which are marked a, have the outline and filling up in fine gold thread, laid on and sewed over in yellow silk. The whole of the filling up is done in the delicate and effective stitch we term the French knot, which is worked in the following manner: Draw the silk to the upper side of the work, then catching it in the left hand, an inch or two from the satin, twist it round the needle twice, and then insert the point of the needle in the work exactly in the same place where you drew it out. Gradually draw it up, and a knot is formed. The great art in this style of embroidery consists in making the knots all lie very evenly, and in properly introducing the shades. In every color used, the lightest shade must be nearly white, to avoid any strong contrast with the white silk outline. The colors are indicated by letters, and the shading in the engraving denotes the shades of each.

- a. Fine gold thread.
- b. Blue.
- c. Purple.
- d. Blue green.
- e. Yellow green.
- f. Brown shaded through orange to yellow.
- g. Gold embroidery, worked with fine gold bullion
- h. Crimson.
- i. Thick gold thread.

The arabesque patterns of the sides are to be formed of the coarsest gold thread, laid on and sewed over. There is a slight error in the engraving, a single line being here and there substituted for a double one. This must be corrected in the work. The ends of the gold thread are to be drawn through the satin.

When made up, let the top of the slippers be trimmed with gold fringe, on the head of which a narrow ruche of ribbon may be laid. So many colors being used, almost any may be employed for the lining and ruche; but they ought to be the same.

EDITORS' TABLE.

We are often amused by the criticisms respecting magazine writers. People who wish to pass for wonders of wisdom, but who have little knowledge of general literature, usually condemn periodicals by the significant term, "poor trash." Addison they may have heard of, but think his papers must have been solid as statistics, and serious as sermons. Yet no magazine of the present day has more humorous stories, or tales and characters purely imaginative, than the "Spectator." Addison, no doubt, intended to make his work a manual of the real, the true, the noble, and the good; but the way in which these ideas were set forth and enforced was by showing, through the medium of fiction, how mean was the false, how miserable the selfish, how ridiculous the vain, and how hateful the wicked.

The "Lady's Book" has always been managed on a similar plan; nor is there any article admitted which is not intended to instruct either by example, sentiment, hints, or warnings. The lightest stories are never intended merely to amuse. Often the lessons of such are quite as impressive as that of the grave essays. Turn to the January number, page 7, and look over the excellent paper by Mr. Tuckerman. It teaches well and truly the littleness of human vanity, and the miserableness of the ambition "to be a shining character." Then turn to page 13, and read "The Old Cedar Chest." Does it not show the importance of education, and the improvement in schools, by the contrast between the language of the Aunt, who had no opportunities in her youth of learning grammar, and that of the children? And then the letter—will it not be a lesson to many a youth when penning a bulletin? And a lesson will, we hope, be taught young ladies by the story—that their youthful fancies are not always love—and that they will be happier in a single life than to marry a man they cannot respect as well as love.

VALENTINE'S DAY.—Some two years since, we suggested the present of a year's subscription to the Lady's Book as the most appropriate present a young gentleman could make to the lady of his heart as a VALENTINE GIFT. It will keep him in her mind the whole year through, if she knows his name, and keep her in a fever to find it out, if concealed. Try it, young gentlemen.

OUR TREASURY.

THOUGHTS CONCERNING ENGLISH WOMEN.

BY MRS. JAMISON.

In what regards government and politics, do we not find the interest of the many sacrificed to the few? while, in all that regards society, the morals and the happiness of individuals are sacrificed to the many? and both are wrong. I never can bring myself to admire a social system, in which the honor, rights, or happiness of any individual, though the meanest, is made to yield to a supposed future or general good. It is a wicked calculation, and it will be found as inexpedient as it is wicked.

We women have especial reason to exclaim against this principle. We are told openly, by moralists and politicians, that it is for the general good of society, nay, an absolute necessity, that one-fifth part of our sex should be condemned as the legitimate prey of the other, predoomed to die in reprobation, in the streets, in hospitals, that the virtue of the rest may be preserved, and the pride and the passions of men both gratified. But I have a bitter pleasure in thinking that this most base, most cruel conventional law is avenged upon those who made and uphold it; that here the sacrifice of a certain number of one sex to the permitted license of the other is no general good, but a general curse—a very ulcer in the bosom of society.

The subject is a hateful one—more hateful is it to hear it sometimes alluded to with sneering levity, and sometimes waved aside with a fastidious or arrogant prudery. Unless we women take some courage to look upon the evil, and find some help, some remedy within ourselves, I know not where it is to come from.

It is a fact, upon which I shall take an opportunity of enlarging, that almost all the greatest men who have lived in the world, whether poets, philosophers, artists, or statesmen, have derived their mental and physical organization more from the mother's than the father's side; and the same is true, unhappily, of those who have been in an extraordinary degree perverted. And does this not lead us to some awful considerations on the importance of the moral and physical well-being of women, and their present condition in society, as a branch of legislation and politics, which must ere long be modified? Let our lords and masters reflect that, if an extensive influence for good or for evil be not denied to us, an influence commencing not only with, but before the birth of their children, it is time that the manifold mischiefs and miseries lurking in the bosom of society, and of which woman is at once the wretched instrument, and more wretched victim, be looked to.

THE MOTHER'S LOVE.

BY MRS. ELLIS.

If the love of a mother be considered as an instinct which pervades all animated nature, it is not the less beautiful when exhibited in the human character, for being diffused throughout creation; because it proves that the Author of our being knew that the distinctive attributes of humanity would be insufficient to support the mother through her anxieties, vexations, and cares. He knew that reason would be making distinctions between the worthy and the unworthy, and prematurely consigning the supposed reprobate to ruin; that fancy would make selections, and dote upon one while it neglected another; that caprice would destroy the bond of domestic union; and that intellectual pursuits would often take precedence of domestic duties. And therefore he poured into woman's heart the same instinct which impels the timid bird to risk the last extremity of danger for her helpless young. Nor let any one think contemptuously of this peculiar capability of loving, because under the extinct it is shared with the brute. It is not a sufficient recommendation to our respect that it comes immediately from the hand of our Creator—that we have no power to control or subdue it—that it is "strong as death"—and lastly, that it imbues the mind of the mother with equal tenderness for her infirm, or wayward, or unlovely child, as for him who gives early promise of personal as well as mental beauty? But for this wonderful provision in human nature, what would become of the cripple, the diseased, the petulant, or the perverse? Who would be found to fulfil the hard duties of serving the ungrateful, ministering to the dissatisfied, and watching over the hopeless? No. There is no instance in which the providential care of our Heavenly Father is more beautifully exhibited than in that of a mother's love. Winding its silken cords alike around every natural object, whether worthy or unworthy, it creates a bond which unkindness cannot break. It pursues the wanderer without weariness, and supports the feeble without fainting. Neither appalled by danger, nor hindered by difficulty, it can labor without reward, and persevere without hope. "Many waters cannot quench" it; and when the glory has vanished from the brow of the beloved one, when summer friends have turned away, and guilt, and misery, and disgrace have usurped their place, it steals into the soul of the outcast like the sunbeams within the cell of the prisoner, lighting the darker dungeon of the polluted heart, bringing along with it fond recollections of past happiness, and wooing back to fresh participation in the light and the gladness that still remain for the broken and contrite spirit.

If the situation of a wife brings woman to a right understanding of her own character, that of a mother leads to a strict knowledge of her own principles. Scarcely is any one so depraved as to teach her child what she conscientiously believes to be wrong. And yet teach it she must, for its "clear, pure eyes" are fixed upon hers to learn their meaning, and its infant accents are inquiring out the first principles of good and evil. How, with such a picture before her, would any woman dare to teach what she did not (implicitly, as well as rationally, and from mature examination, believe to be true? In a few days—hours—nay, moments, that child may be a cherub in the courts of Heaven. What if a stain should have been upon its wings, and that stain the impress of a mother's hand! or if its earthly life should be prolonged, it is the foundation of the important future that the mother lays. Other governors in after years may take upon themselves the tuition of her child, and lead him through the paths of academic lore, but the early bias, the bent of the moral character, the first principles of spiritual life, will be here, and here the lasting glory or the lasting shame.

There is no scene throughout the whole range of our observation more strikingly illustrative of intellectual, moral, and even physical beauty than that presented by a domestic circle, where a mother holds her proper place, as the source of tenderness, the centre of affection, the bond of social union, the founder of each salutary plan, the umpire in all contention, and the general fountain of cheerfulness, hope, and consolation. It is to clear up the unjust suspicion that such a mother steps forward; to ward off the unmerited blow; to defend the wounded spirit from the injury to which it would sullenly submit; to encourage the hopeless, when thrown back in the competition of talent; to point out to those who have been defeated other aims in which they may yet succeed; to stand between the timid and the danger they dread; and, on behalf of each, and all, to make their peace with offended authority, promising, hoping, and believing, that they will never willingly commit the same fault again.

THE LADIES' MEDICAL MISSIONARY SOCIETY OF PHILADELPHIA.—The March number will contain an account of this important association.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "Other Days," "Our Rector," "To the Mocking-Bird," "The Phantom of the Walash," "The Traitor's Doom," "Pause Not," "To Caroline," "Sonnet—Early Autumn," "My Sister," "A Comparison," and "Spring's Morn."

The request of G. W. C., of Alexandria, La., will be attended to.

A. F. B. will find in the "Lady's Book," for 1851, several articles such as she describes. But wait; we have something in preparation.

Literary Notices.

FROM JOHN P. JEWETT & Co., Boston:—

THE PIANO FORTE: A COMPLETE AND THOROUGH INSTRUCTION BOOK. Selected, Compiled, and Arranged principally from the Works of Hummel, Burgmüller, Bertini, Beyer, Czerny, Hertz, &c., to which is added an extensive and Chaste Selection of Popular Airs, Waltzes, Polkas, Quick-steps, Marches, &c. By Manuel Fenollosa. We give the title as the best exposition of the contents of this large quarto volume, handsomely printed, and worthy of attention by all teachers and learners of music. It appears to be an excellent work.

MR. JOB K. TYSON'S LETTERS TO THE BRITISH CONSUL ON THE COMMERCE OF PHILADELPHIA is one of the publications called forth by the wonderful progress of our country. So rapid is this advance that, when its statistics are carefully collected and fairly stated, they surprise even those most actively engaged in the movement. Who can suppress an exclamation of wonder when told that one hundred and seventy years ago the first settlement was made in Pennsylvania, and that, in 1840, the wealth of the State was computed at a total of "twenty-one hundred millions of dollars!" Since the last census it has greatly increased. But read the letters. Mr. Tyson is a warm-hearted Philadelphian, and has brought the rich stores of his historical and general knowledge to elucidate his subjects. The city could not have found a more able advocate.

From HENRY CAREY BAIRD (successor to E. L. Carey), Philadelphia:—

THE PRACTICAL METAL-WORKER'S ASSISTANT. Containing the art of working all metals and alloys, forging of iron and steel, hardening and tempering, melting and mixing, casting and founding, works in sheet metal, the process dependent on the ductility of the metal, soldering, and the most improved processes, and tools employed by metal-workers, with the art of electro-metallurgy to manufacturing processes; collected from original sources, and from the works of Holtzapffel, Bergeron, Leupold, Napier, and others. The original matter is purely American. The whole arranged, with numerous engravings on wood, to suit the American metal-worker. By Oliver Byrne, Civil, Military, and Mechanical Engineer, and author of a number of practical and scientific works. The title so explicitly details the contents of the work, that we need only say that it is neatly printed and bound, and contains nearly five hundred pages.

From E. H. BUTLER & Co., Philadelphia:—

AYLMERE; OR, THE BONDSMAN OF KENT, and other Poems. By Robert T. Conrad. The literary reputation of Mr. Conrad has been so long and so firmly established in the minds, and, we might add, in the hearts of his countrymen, that it would seem to be an idle attempt for us, at this late day, to eulogize his genius, or to portray the chastened beauties or the manly energies of his imagination. The tragedy of AYLMERE, which forms the principal feature in the present volume, has fallen under the searching strictures of much sounder critics than we can pretend to be; and, although there may exist much diversity of opinion in regard to the original and historical character of the principal personage of the play, yet it has been over and over conceded that the author has brought to his aid some of the purest and bravest sentiments, and some of the loftiest flights of patriotism that have ever been uttered by the unshifting voice of freedom. As a play, its representation, under another title, has been witnessed with the most intense feeling, night after night, the hero, Aylmere, or Jack Cade, being performed by our native tragedian, Edwin Forrest, for whose peculiarly strong line of acting it was originally adapted. But, in its present form, divested of many of those peculiarities which were necessarily appended, in order to render it acceptable on the stage, it will be found a most worthy and a most agreeable companion of the poet and the philosopher; and, in the hands of the student of history, will awaken many new ideas, and may lead to new researches into the events and characters of the past which he has not yet dreamed of. The "dedicatory" sonnet to John Conrad, Esq., the father of the author, is beautifully and tenderly expressive of the love and affection of a son. Of the "other poems" which follow it is only necessary to say that they bear the same impress of genius, the same glow of sympathy for the wrongs and sufferings of humanity, and the same manly aspirations for the liberty and happiness of the world, which characterize all the writings of the gifted author.

From H. C. PECK & THOS. BLISS, N. E. corner of Third and Arch Streets, Philadelphia:—

THE YOUNG LADY'S MENTOR: a Guide to the Formation of Character. In a Series of Letters to her Unknown Friends. By a Lady. We may recommend this work to the personal and study of all young ladies, with a confidence in their improvement; for its teachings are founded upon a deep knowledge of the female character, and its standard of excellence is high, pure, and noble. The management of the temper, the choice of studies and amusements, the conduct in company, and in most of the situations within the sphere of woman, are touched upon in a manner calculated to awaken thought and infuse instruction.

THE LADY'S COMPANION; or, Sketches of Life, Manners, and Morals at the Present Day. Edited by a Lady. The universal thirst for variety has been consulted in the preparation of this work; yet there is a unity of design and a high purpose. Essays, sketches, tales, and poetry are gathered, like choice flowers, from the best gardens, to shed a fragrant, enlivening perfume for all who wish to partake. Precepts for the conduct of life, addressed particularly to females, assume every form of light and beauty to win the heart and strengthen the mind, while modes, manners, and customs are sketched with a truthful hand.

THE FLORAL OFFERING. A Token of Affection and Esteem. Comprising the Language and Poetry of Flowers. With colored illustrations from original drawings. By Henrietta Dumont. We know of no more beautiful idea than the construction of a language of flowers. How fitted to become the types of the hues of passion, and the bud, bloom, and decay of hopes, feelings, and even life itself! To the ladies, of whom a delicate taste is a distinguishing characteristic, the language of flowers is an important acquisition, opening to them a new field for the exercise of that taste as well as of the imagination. The "Floral Offering" contains a complete dictionary of all the flowers that are generally known, some account of the origin of, and reasons for, their given meaning, and poetry, selected from the brightest stars in English literature, appropriate to their sense. The illustrations are beautiful, and the general appearance of the book very superior.

From A. HART (late Carey & Hart), corner of Fourth and Chestnut Street, Philadelphia:—

A METHOD OF HORSEMANSHIP, FOUNDED UPON NEW PRINCIPLES: including the Breaking and Training of Horses; with Instructions for Obtaining a Good Seat. Illustrated with engravings. By F. BAUCHER. Translated from the ninth Paris edition. The appearance of this book we hope will have a good effect in correcting the existing errors in horsemanship, and in establishing a more considerate and humane treatment of the noble animal than has heretofore prevailed in our country. In all the countries of Europe, where the system has been adopted, it has been acknowledged as more preferable and more successful than any that has been hitherto attempted. Kings and princes, soldiers, private gentlemen, and "the masters of the ring," have all attested its merits, and have joined in its unqualified recommendation.

Those who have witnessed the wonderful performances of Gen. Welch's horse, "May-Flv," a thorough-bred belonging to the racing stud of Baron Rothschild, will judge of the system of training when told that he was, before being subjected to the master hand, so vicious that he had to be brought upon the race-course in a van, so that he could see nothing till the moment to start arrived. The horses ridden by Derious, and by Caroline Loyo, with so much "grace, elegance, and majesty," as the translator of the work assures us, were also trained agreeably to the principles of Baucher. We are happy to state that the work has met with the rapid sale it so justly merited.

From CHARLES SCRIBNER, New York, through A. HART, Philadelphia:—

FALL OF POLAND: containing an Analytical and Philosophical Account of the Causes which conspired in the Ruin of the Nation, together with the History of the Country from its Origin. By L. C. SAXTON. In two volumes. The historical reader will observe, by a single glance at the title of this work, that its contents are alike important in the complete education of the statesman and the philosopher, while they afford to every class of readers such lessons of patriotism, and such subjects for reflection, as cannot be without their salutary effects upon the minds of republicans.

NIGHT THOUGHTS ON LIFE, DEATH, AND IMMORTALITY. By Edward Young, LL.D. With a memoir of the author, a critical view of his writings, and explanatory notes. By James R. BOYD, Editor of the "Paradise Lost," etc. This elegant edition of a great work by a Christian poet, who, though not equal to Milton in sublimity, was not inferior to him in sentiment or practical devotion, is highly creditable to the enterprising publishers. The printing, embellishments, and binding are equal to those of any book that has been presented to us this season.

THE HEAVENLY RECOGNITION; or, an Earnest and Scriptural Discussion of the Question, Will we know our friends in Heaven? By Rev. H. HARBAGH, A. M., author of "Heaven; or, the Sanctified Dead." The author has brought a great many soothing reflections and sound arguments to prove the Heavenly Recognition, a subject which he seems to have studied with peculiar devotion. He has also brought to his aid the opinions and the hopes of many eminent divines, whose names will have weight in settling the question, as far at least as human opinion can be made available on such a subject.

THE WOODBINE. A Holiday Gift. Edited by Caroline May. With illustrations. We regret that this very acceptable gift came too late, as well as many others of the same character, for a notice in the January number of the "Book." It is not too late, however, to say that the selections of the "Woodbine" would be a most acceptable gift in any season of the year.

THE STAR OF BETHLEHEM, OR STORIES FOR CHRISTMAS. With beautiful illustrations. By Rev. H. Hastings Weld, Rector of St. James' Church, Downingtown, Pa. As its title indicates, this is another of the elegant class of books intended for the holiday season. The good name and the good efforts of the reverend author are too well known, and too highly appreciated by our readers, to require any eulogistic notice of this instructive work from our pen. His zeal and his success in combining the useful with the elegant have long endeared him as a writer to the literary public.

A CATECHISM OF FAMILIAR THINGS: their History, and the Events which led to their Discovery, with a short Explanation of some of the Principal Phenomena. For the use of schools and families. By Emily Elizabeth Millement. Carefully revised by an American teacher. This will prove a very useful work among the younger members of every family, in the dissemination of useful and entertaining knowledge.

From GOULD & LINCOLN, Boston, through LINDSAY & BLACKISTON, Philadelphia:—

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF THE HUMAN SPECIES, its Typical Forms, Primeval Distinction, and Migrations. Illustrated with numerous engravings. By Lieutenant-Colonel Charles Hamilton Smith, President of the Devon and Cornwall Nat. Hist. Society, etc. etc. With a preliminary abstract of the views of Blumenbach, Prichard, Bachman, Agassiz, and other authors of repute on the subject, by S. Kneeland, Jr., M.D. As will appear from its title, this work treats of subjects which have not yet been settled to the full satisfaction of any class of inquirers; and, as we know that there exist among them a great many doubts and opposing theories and speculations, it is not for us to decide as to the correctness or incorrectness of any of the views attempted to be established by the work before us. There can be no question, however, of their interest and importance to the development and progress of the natural history of man.

From CHARLES SCRIBNER, New York, through DANIELS & SMITH, 36 North Sixth Street, Philadelphia:—

THE IMPERIAL GUARD OF NAPOLEON: FROM MARENGO TO WATERLOO. By J. T. Headley, author of "Napoleon and his Marshals." Although the author says he lays no claim to originality for this work, it being a condensed translation of a popular history of the Imperial Guards by a French writer, the book has many illustrations, and is interesting.

From HARPER & BROTHER, New York, through LINDSAY & BLACKISTON, Philadelphia:—

MEMOIRS OF THE LIFE AND WRITINGS OF THOMAS CHALMERS, D.D., LL.D. By his son-in-law, the Rev. William Hanna, LL.D. Vol. 3. The numerous admirers of the truly great man, Thomas Chalmers, will be gratified with the appearance of this volume, which has been delayed some time in consequence of the severe illness of the author. It was at first announced that the memoirs would be comprised in three volumes; it has been found necessary, however, to extend them to a fourth, in order to make them complete.

THE LILY AND THE BEE: an Apologue of the Crystal Palace. By Samuel Warren, F.R.S. This is a sort of poem, or rhapsody, with which the author was inspired during his visits to the late Crystal Palace.

MOBY-DICK; OR, THE WHALE. By Herman Melville, author of "Types," "Omoo," "White Jacket," etc. etc. This is what is called a compact volume of upwards of six hundred pages, all about "the whale," whalers, and whaling, being itself a perfect literary whale, and worthy of the pen of Herman Melville, whose reputation as an original writer has been established the world over.

SIXTEEN MONTHS IN THE GOLD DIGGINGS. By Daniel B. Woods. The experience of this author enables him to present a great deal of practical and amusing matter, which will doubtless prove of interest to the inquiring reader.

AIMS AND OBSTACLES. A Romance. By G. P. R. James, Esq. This romance commences "upon a dull, untidy night in the early spring," in a description of which the author compares the "Sunday Press" to the greedy house gutter "in a rain storm, collecting all the washings of other people's tiles to pour them forth again with additional filth of its own." It may be of some interest to know what the Sunday papers will say of Mr. James after this.

From GOULD & LINCOLN, Boston, through DANIELS & SMITH, Philadelphia:—

A WREATH AROUND THE CROSS; OR, SCRIPTURE AND TRUTH ILLUSTRATED. By the Rev. A. Moreton Brown, author of "The Leader of the Lollards," etc. With a commendatory preface by John Angell James. This is an excellent little work, and ably commends itself to the perusal of every sincere Christian.

From TICKNOR, REED & FIELDS, Boston, through WILLIS P. HAZARD, No. 178 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia:—

FLORENCE, THE PARISH ORPHAN; and a Sketch of the Village in the last Century. By Eliza Buckminster Lee, author of "Naomi." The contents of this volume will gratify those readers who are fond of simple and affecting tales, when the moral is pure and the incidents within the bounds of probability. The first part has never before been published. The second has been out of print some time.

POEMS. By Richard Henry Stoddard. The author of this volume, we believe, is a friend, and, at the same time, a rival of Bayard Taylor. Without professing to have been very exact in the comparison, we think we discover a great deal of similarity in the style and sentiments of the two poets, and, of course, there is a great deal to admire in this collection.

A WONDER BOOK FOR GIRLS AND BOYS. By Nathaniel Hawthorne. With engravings by Baker, from designs by Billings. A very neat volume, with many beautiful illustrations, the contents of which will be most acceptable to the younger class of readers, for whose amusement and moral instruction it has been prepared, but which even a "modern philosopher" might peruse with advantage.

SIR ROGER DE COVERLY. By the Spectator. Those who have admired the character, and been pleased with the eccentricities of Sir Roger de Coverly, as traced through the numbers of the Spectator, will be gratified to find that all the papers concerning him which have been deemed worthy of his reputation, will be found in this volume.

THE GOLDEN LEGEND. By Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. The poetry of Longfellow will always be popular with that class of readers who are fond of dreamy quietude and mysterious speculations on the past and the future, to all whom this volume presents one of the richest treats, in that way, that has fallen from his pen.

From CROSBY & NICHOLS, Boston, through WILLIS P. HARRIS, 178 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia:—

We have here a package of eight neatly printed and illustrated little volumes, intended for the instruction and amusement of the younger classes of readers. The contents of this juvenile library are all moral as well as instructive in their tendencies, and, by their variety, will greatly please and engage the minds of the little "progressives."

From BERKFOOT & CO., Astor House, New York, through the politeness of the AUTHOR:—

SCENES IN A SOLDIER'S LIFE. By J. H. WILTON, author of "Etheld," "The Outcast," etc. Having been a participator in the disastrous events which occurred in the British wars in Asia, particularly those of Siende, Beelvochriston, and Afghanistan, from the year 1838 to 1842, the author has been enabled to present to the reader a most thrilling description of his military adventures in a country, and among a people comparatively but little known.

DAN MARBLE: A Biographical Sketch of that Famous and Diverting Humorist, with Reminiscences, Comicalities, Anecdotes, &c. &c. By Falconbridge, author of "Provincial Dramas," "Scenes in Prairie-Land," &c. &c. We have received a copy of this amusing work from the author, a gentleman of excellent fancy, to whom the public is probably more indebted than to any other American writer for racy and humorous stories. This work will remind the reader of the "Memoirs of an Actor," but it is infinitely its superior in originality and sentiment; and, besides that, it refers to characters and to persons who, in their day, were universal favorites with the people. We hope the labors of our friend Falconbridge will be amply rewarded.

From JNO. R. THOMPSON, Richmond, Va.:—

NORMAN MAURICE; OR, THE MAN OF THE PEOPLE. An American Drama. In Five Acts. By W. GILMORE SIMMS. This is a play of great merit and power, in which our friend has admirably succeeded in blending the dangers and quicksands of political life with the more refined and endearing sentiments of love and home.

From DEWITT & DAVENPORT, New York:—

GLANCES AT EUROPE: in a Series of Letters from Great Britain, France, Italy, Switzerland, &c., during the Summer of 1851. Including notices of the Great Exhibition, or World's Fair. By HORACE GREELLEY. The particular friends and admirers of Mr. Greeley have doubtless availed themselves of the contents of this work, as they were given to the public through the medium of the New York Tribune. To such as may desire to preserve his "Glances at Europe" in a portable form, the neatly printed volume before us presents an excellent opportunity.

From WILLIAM HALDREDGE, New York, through J. & J. L. GIBON, Philadelphia:—

WOMAN IN HER VARIOUS RELATIONS: containing Practical Rules for American Females. The best method for dinners and social parties; a chapter for young ladies, mothers, and invalids; hints on the body, mind, and characters; with a glance at woman's rights and wrongs, professions, costume, &c. &c. By MRS. L. G. ABELL, author of the "Grass on the Wayside," &c. A very sensible and a very useful book.

NOVELS, SERIALS, PAMPHLETS, &c.

From Harper & Brothers, New York, through Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia: "The Lady and the Priest." An Historical Romance. By MRS. MABERLY.—"Spiritual Regeneration with Reference to Present Times." A Charge delivered to the Clergy of the Diocese of Ohio, on the thirty-fourth annual convention of the same in St. Paul's Church, Cleveland, October 11th, 1851. By CHARLES PETTIT M'ILVAINE, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese. The author is known as a pious and zealous Episcopalian, and his charge will, no doubt, be most acceptable to the people with whom he is connected in religious faith.—"London Labor and London Poor." By HENRY MAYHEW. Part 15. Price 12½ cents.—"Pictorial Field Book of the Revolution." No. 18. Price 25 cents. This work continues to be highly interesting to the American reader. We observe, however, that, in speaking of the grave of Benjamin Franklin, the author says it is "overshadowed by the venerable church," meaning Christ Church, we presume; but the venerable church is in Second Street, and the grave of Franklin is in the burying-ground, and near the corner of Arch and Fifth Streets.

From J. B. RANDALL & J. N. LOOMES, editors and proprietors, Marietta, Georgia: "The Masonic Journal." Devoted to Masonry, Science, and Literature. Three dollars per annum. Well printed, and full of matter interesting to the "fraternity."

From WALKER & JAMES, Charleston, S. C.: "The Claims of Science." An Address delivered before the Euphemian and Philomathean Societies of Erskine College, S. C. (Due West Village, Abbeville District), at the annual commencement, August 13th, 1851. By CHARLES C. RICHARDS, A. M., Honorary Member of the Euphemian Society. Although there has been some delay in acknowledging the receipt of this able address, it may not be too late to speak either of its merits or of those of its author, in whom we are pleased to recognise our friend and cotemporary of the "Southern Literary Gazette." As an editor, Mr. Richards has long been favorably known to us, as well for his literary taste as for his efforts in the management of the arts and sciences, a hearty and patriotic regard for which he warmly inculcates and sustains in the address before us.—"Southern Repertory and College Review." Conducted by the Faculty of Emory and Henry College. Vol. 1.—No. 11. October, 1851. Emory, Virginia. This is a work of high literary, scientific, and moral character, and we hope that, as an energetic and enlightened auxiliary in the dissemination of knowledge, it will be ably and fully sustained by the public.

From HENRY CAREY BAIRD (successor to E. L. CAREY), Philadelphia: "Index to the Practical Calculator, for the Engineer, Machinist, Mechanic, Manufacturer of Engine-Work, Naval Architect, Miner, and Millwright." By OLIVER BYRNE, Civil, Military, and Mechanical Engineer, Editor and Compiler of the "Dictionary of Mechanics, Engine-Work, and Engineering." Illustrated by numerous engravings. This is the fourth number of a valuable scientific work now in course of publication, at twenty-five cents the number. The author has established for himself a high character among the mechanics and artisans of the country, and his works are relied upon with the greatest confidence for their accuracy and precision.

From the Office of the S. S. DEMOCRAT, Petersburg, Va.: "A Plain Treatise on Dental Science and Practice." By S. M. SHEPHERD, Dental Surgeon. A very valuable and comprehensive treatise on the various subjects connected with the science, and very useful in the hands of the operator, as well as of those preparing for an operation.

NEW MUSIC.

We have received from Messrs. Conenhoven, Scull & Co. the following new and excellent pieces, every one of which should be added to the musical library of our fair friends, viz. :—

I have Something Sweet to Tell You. A beautiful song by the lamented Mrs. Osgood; dedicated to and sung by Catherine Hayes.

Jenny Lind's Echo Waltz, and its companion, the Bird Waltz, introducing several of that artiste's most popular melodies.

National Guards' Polka Quickstep.

The music of the above is composed by Mr. Conenhoven, the talented and gentlemanly senior partner of the firm mentioned as the publishers, who are occupying the old stand at No. 184 Chestnut Street. Our friends will always find there an excellent assortment of music and musical instruments, and may be assured of the most gallant and gentlemanly attention.

They also publish Dr. Cunningham's beautiful song, Bright Eyes: the words by Freeman Scott, Esq. This is one of the most successful of the doctor's productions, and is worthy of its source.

Publisher's Department.

THE COTTAGE printed in tints in this number is from "Ranlett's" celebrated work on that subject—the best, probably, that has ever been produced in the United States. The publishers of the work are Messrs. Dewitt & Davenport, New York, who will furnish it in twenty numbers, at fifty cents each, or bound, royal quarto, for $12.

ANOTHER NEW FEATURE.—A plate in imitation of a colored crayon drawing—a style now so very popular in these parts. We endeavor to keep pace with the times in the fine arts, not merely by mentioning them, but by giving illustrations of them. The "Figure Merchant" is a pretty picture. The other engravings are in the finest style of the arts. See the "Intercepted Letter," and our new style of Cottages, upon which we intend still to make an improvement.

VALENTINES TO EDITORS.—One of the prettiest we have ever heard of is a remittance for one or two years' subscription. Will some of our subscribers favor us with a Valentine of this kind? We shall ever remember it; and what is more, give them credit for it.

London.

MY DEAR MR. GODEY: Agreeably to the arrangement previously to my leaving home, I have now the pleasure to address you from this great metropolis of the world, and through your elegant "Lady's Book," to furnish to your fair readers some items of interest, which, probably, would otherwise escape their notice.

The Bloomer costume has not been so successful in this country as some of its warm American friends seemed to anticipate. Notwithstanding the lectures of Mrs. F. C. Foster, who made her appearance in a modified suit of the Bloomer costume, the virtuous public taste refuses to tolerate the innovation. There is a class, to be sure, in this country, as in every other country, and who, I understand, have partially adopted the dress; but it is not such a class as in this, or any other country, can have the least effect upon the moral defences and natural distinctions of society. It was rather fatal to the new dress that a Bloomer should have been burnt in effigy on Guy Fawkes' Day.

Mr. Samuel Beasley, the theatrical architect, died a few days ago, very suddenly. Independent of his great celebrity as an architect, Mr. Beasley was a successful dramatist and novel writer. So great was his success in the latter department of literature, that his "Oxonians" and "The Roué" have both been attributed to the pen of Bulwer, showing the high estimate placed upon Mr. B.'s talents and genius. He was liberal and generous, and yet had amassed a considerable fortune.

Miss Glyn, whose rapid advances as an actress was the theme of some wonderment not long since, has been creating equal surprise by her rapid improvement as a dramatic reader. She read "Antony and Cleopatra," at the Islington "Athenaeum," to an overflowing audience, to whom she imparted great pleasure by the extraordinary powers of her declamation, and her taste in unfolding the poetic conception of the author.

What will you think, by and by, of receiving a challenge for a game at chess, between Philadelphia and London, to be carried on through the "Ocean Telegraph"? But whether that shall happen or not—and yet it is not unlikely that it will happen—what do you think, for the present, of a game of chess between Paris and London, through the medium of the sub-marine electrical telegraph? The prize to be contested is 1250 francs. It was early alleged that gambling in stocks, and gambling in produce, in politics and war, would be among the evils of the telegraph. But this, I believe, is the first attempt to gamble by telegraph for money, either through the game of chess, or cards, or dice, to all of which it may be applied alike, we presume.

One of John Bull's engineers, at Dover, has been making some experiments in firing a cannon across the Channel by the Gutta-Percha Company's newly-discovered process. What has become of Queen Anne's pocket-piece, I do not know. She would be surprised, no doubt, to find it superseded by an India-rubber cannon.

The Spanish Government, it appears, has been providing a new home for the unfortunate Irish, by granting to emigrants two hundred and fifty square miles of country on the banks of the Guadalquivir, comprising 16,000 acres of the richest land, the same having been depopulated by the expulsion of the Moors. So goes the world. Indian depopulation in America, Irish depopulation in Great Britain, Moorish depopulation in Spain, and a most radical change and interchange of races everywhere. Guadalquivir! I like the sound of that word, for the sake of some dear associations with which it is connected with my own dear home. Has Anne Bishop been entirely eclipsed by the more recent acquisitions from Europe?

While Madame Kossuth was in this country, an address was presented to her by a deputation from the "Society for the Emancipation of Women." The request was that the wife of the Hungarian hero should express to these ladies her sentiments in regard to their efforts for the emancipation of the sex. In my opinion, the lady of Kossuth was more happy in her remarks than was her eloquent lord in many of his, in reply to the toasts of the populace. After thanking them for their personal attentions, she said that, with respect to the emancipation of women, she had in earlier years confined herself to the circle of domestic duties, and that latterly she had no leisure for speculations of that kind. She submitted herself, she said, to the guidance of her husband, and never thought of emancipation; having no idea, indeed, that she was enslaved. The reply was a good one, and will be the model of all good wives who have good husbands. I have curtailed it of some of its proportions; but there is enough left of the "little speech" out of which to form a good and wholesome argument. Adieu.

F. E. W.

ILLUSTRATED FAMILY FRIEND. By S. A. Godman and J. J. Lyons, Columbia, S. C.—This is a large and very handsomely printed paper, full of original and selected matter of the highest order of literature and usefulness, and warm in exertions for the development of the practical energies of the South. The columns of the "Friend" are adorned with a number of very elegant engravings. The Editor, S. A. Godman, Esq., is an able writer, and we heartily wish the enterprise success.

LECTURES ON GERMANY, FRANCE, ETC.—We attended a recent course of lectures delivered in this city by the Rev Morris J. Raphael, M. A., late of Birmingham, England, and confess that we were greatly pleased and edified by the minuteness of the lecturer's descriptions, and by the easy and unaffected style in which they were delivered. The course embraced lectures on Germany, France, Russia, Sweden, Norway, and Spain, their mountains, rivers, and people, and were the results of personal observation and impressions received on the spot. These lectures were preceded by a most excellent discourse on the geography and travels of the ancients.

MISS CATHARINE HAYES.—This charming and highly educated singer has made a professional visit to our city, and has delighted, by her simplicity and genuine pathos and feeling, all who have had the pleasure of hearing her. Of course, there have been different opinions in regard to the tones and the brilliancy of her voice, in comparison with the same powers as exhibited by Jenny Lind. Many have thought that Catharine Hayes greatly excels the Swedish Nightingale in the correctness and the sweetness of her higher efforts, and especially in the greater ease with which, in their consideration, she manages the versatile powers of her voice. But it is not for us to decide. We think them both excellent in their peculiar spheres, and are happy that both have been received with that respect which is the deserved reward of merit and talent the world over.

BOSTON EVENING GAZETTE.—One of the oldest weekly papers in the country. We are happy to know that its support at home is only equalled by the appreciation in which it is held by all New Englanders abroad. It has attained its fiftieth year, and presents no signs of decay. "Long may it wave."

ROOT'S DISPATCH.—We are gratified to learn that the proprietor of this great public convenience has greatly increased its facilities, and that it is now making five post-offices and four city deliveries daily. We are assured, also, that responsible and intelligent men only are employed as carriers, and upon each letter is stamped the date and hour of delivery. The energetic efforts of those connected with the office of the Dispatch to render it serviceable to our citizens, fully entitles it to their confidence and support.

ROOT'S DAGUERREOTYPES.—It was pleasant hearing from the World's Fair, that American ingenuity and skill had received at least some recognition; and this pleasure was enhanced by the triumph of Stevens' yacht. It is much to be regretted that Root was not there with his Daguerreotypes. For one, we are positive he would have gained the first prize, as he has never failed of a prize whenever he has exhibited in this country, which has been twelve times. These decisions, too, have been justified by the general acclamation of the public. Daguerreotypy ranks among the chief wonders of our wondrous age, and yet the improvement made in it by Root's indefatigable labors is hardly less marvelous than its first discovery. His pictures are not merely exact, but exact copies of their originals. The counterpart is scarce less life-like than the original. His "crayon" or "vignette" Daguerreotypes, which he alone produces in our city, are lauded by artists to the skies. He offers to vend the right of making these exquisite pictures, and will also give instructions in the entire art of such painting. He has apparatus for taking the largest pictures producible in this country, and keeps for sale Daguerreotypic instruments of every size. The public are invited to visit his rooms, 140 Chestnut Street, and inspect his pictures.

SIGNOR BLITZ.—This ever-busy and kind-hearted little gentleman has been exerting himself most benevolently for some time past, in keeping our citizens in a good humor with themselves and with everybody else, by the exhibition of his wonderful powers of voice, and of his still more wonderful expertness in cheating people out of their eyes and their common sense. Blitz, owing to his kind and winning manners, is a great favorite with the younger personage of the family circle, but scarcely less a favorite with the mammas and papas, who love a good joke, or a well-performed sleight-of-hand, as well as ever they did. Old people cannot always be grave and solemn any more than the young and naturally light of heart, so they just go with the children to see Blitz, and to hear them laugh, and after awhile to join in the amusement.

MR. WILTON.—This gentleman, who accompanied Jenny Lind to this country from Europe, and who acted as the agent of the "Wizard of the North," during his recent visit to this city, is a most gentlemanly man, deserving of the confidence and respect, in a particular manner, of the editorial profession throughout the country. We make no apology when we offer a kind and grateful word in behalf of those engaged in public business, who have been kind and considerate in their attention to ourselves.

Receipts.

HALF-PAY PUDDING.—Four ounces of each of the following ingredients, viz., suet, flour, currants, raisins, and bread crumbs; two tablespoonfuls of treacle; half a pint of milk—all of which must be well mixed together, and boiled in a mould for three hours. It is an excellent substitute for Christmas plum-pudding; a small expense. To be served up with wine or brandy sauce.

SHORT-BREAD.—Rub one pound of butter, and twelve ounces of finely-powdered loaf sugar, into two pounds of flour, with the hand; make it into a stiff paste with four eggs, roll out to double the thickness of a penny-piece, cut it into round or square cakes, pinch the edges, stick slices of candied peel and some caraway comfits on the top, and bake them on iron plates in a warm oven.

SHAVING the head is always injurious to the hair, the bulbs being frequently destroyed by the process; and washing frequently with an alkaline preparation, such as soap and water, is decidedly objectionable, for that, as well as sea water, is very apt to change the color of the hair.

FOR A COLD IN THE HEAD, what is called a head-bath is useful. Fill a wash-hand basin with boiling-water, and add an ounce of flour of mustard; then hold the head, covered with a cloth to prevent the escape of the steam, over the basin as long as any steam arises.

Fashions.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION PLATE.

Fig. 1st.—Evening-dress of dark green brocade, over a slip of white satin. The corsage is open to the waist, the sleeves very short, and trimmed with broad blonde falls edged with a thread of gold. The dress itself has full raths of ivy and myrtle twined together, which form bands across the corsage and the front breadth of the skirt, contrasting beautifully with the satin. The head-dress is elaborate, consisting of ivy leaves and golden berries beneath a broad lappet of the same blonde which encircles the sleeves. None but a tall and elegant figure should venture on this costume.

Fig. 2d.—Dinner-dress of rich bouquet brocade. The sleeves are very large, of tropical patterns, as cactus, etc., and the only trimming bows of broad saffron ribbon from the corsage to the bottom of the hem. It will be noticed at the corsage is en Marysue, or opening square, instead of being pointed towards the waist. Chemisette and undersleeves of rich Valenciennes lace. Hair in plain bandeaux, with knots of black velvet ribbon.

Fig. 3d.—Child's dress of Mazarine blue French merino, with a coat of fawn-colored silk, trimmed with narrow velvet ribbon. A hat trimmed with white, and blue gaiters, complete the costume. The child on the right of the picture is dressed more simply, in plain white. Apart from an interest as a faithful report of fashions, in the arrangement of the scene and its actors, our artist has displayed unusual good taste.

CHIT-CHAT UPON FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

Of course, there is as yet little variation from the settled winter style; cloaks, bonnets, and dresses secured in January not having occasion to be changed. Evening-dresses are little variety, and furs are still the order of the day. It has occurred to us, in the dearth of incident, to give a few hints upon hotel-dress and etiquette, as our magazine catches many ladies who, though highly educated and refined, may yet lack an experience of the usages of society. We do not consider that dress alone makes the woman; but there are times when a lack of its fitness makes her very uncomfortable, and a little friendly advice would be warmly welcomed.

Let us suppose, then, that you suddenly determined to come with your husband, who is a Western merchant, to Philadelphia and New York for his usual supply of fall goods. Or perhaps you are just from school, and are travelling with a brother or an uncle who knows less of the proprieties of dress than you do of his cigars. Yet you are ready to all intent, and you do not care to appear awkward or out of, though watching to see what others do would destroy your self-possession. Well, then, you have your travelling-dress of dark merino, for it is winter now, and you should be careful to choose a color that will not easily spot or stain. The plainer this is made, the more convenient you will find it, though, if it is adapted to chemisette and undersleeves, the latter should be of cambric, and the former of plain linen, like the ordinary skirt fronts. Cambric undersleeves soil much sooner than muslin, but do not lose their stiffness so soon, and are much more comfortable. Buttons will be found more convenient than cuffs in a hurried toilet, and elastic bands will fasten them above the elbow. If they are tied in—a good plan usually—they cannot be so easily changed. Traveling dresses are sometimes made, the present season, with two sets of sleeves, which can be changed by being tied in under the cap. Tight sleeves and cuffs can then be worn, which are really more serviceable than any other mode. But, however this may be, be sure you have a supply of clean articles out of your trunks, that you may be ready to effect the change at a moment's notice, if opportunity serves. Next to a face-bath, there is nothing more refreshing than a clean collar. Double dressing-gowns, of lined cashmere or mousseline, will be found very convenient in steamboat traveling, particularly upon the Lakes, where one is often too ill to pay much heed to dressing and undressing. We recently noticed ladies traveling in them in the night-cars on a southern railroad, the change being effected in the little room always attached for nurses and children. They were thus secured a comfortable night, so far as ease was concerned.

Arrived at a hotel—we will suppose it the Irving House—you are shown to a comfortable room, and are expected to dress for dinner. You would not find it comfortable to dine in the same costume you have worn for several days, perhaps nights, nor would you choose to go down in a chintz morning-dress. The other extreme is equally bad, although fashionable women not unfrequently are guilty of it. Only the past winter an attempt was made to introduce dress hats at the dinner-table of an up-town New York hotel; a fashion having neither comfort nor propriety to sustain it. Nor can we forget a bridal party that once made their appearance at a Chestnut Street house, coming down in a full evening costume, the bride in her veil and wreath even, which ought never to be worn after the ceremony, and all the party in white kid gloves. This was evidently intended to "astonish" the boarders and transient visitors, and certainly effected its object. Never was a party more quietly ridiculed, or sinning so blindly against propriety. We did not wonder when the gentlemen pronounced it "dull," and voted "a move;" and the poor bride, after being the source of amusement to the whole parlor, very unwillingly consented to the proposition.

We have already remarked upon the bad taste that would expose the neck and arms at a table d'hôte, in the full glare of daylight, and seated next to an entire stranger. Nor is a display of jewelry exactly consistent with good taste, diamonds, at least, looking almost as much out of place as a bridal veil. A plain silk or cashmere, with neat collar and cuffs, is all-sufficient. Pretty undersleeves add much to the effect of any dress. We must not forget to notice, in this connection, the fault that is often committed of mixing two kinds of lace; as in a costly dress we lately saw, a lady appeared with an expensive Valenciennes chemisette and application undersleeves! If possible, both collar and undersleeves should be of the same style, be it embroidery or lace. Unless you are going out, the dinner-dress should not be changed in the evening, even to receive calls in the parlor. We have before given general rules for the choice of evening dresses, and would only add that concerts at Tripler Hall, and usually Castle Garden, are not considered dress concerts, while those at the Musical Fund generally are. In no case, however, is a bonnet proper for a concert or opera, although many always wear them.

A morning-dress at a hotel may be of chintz, cashmere, or mousseline; never of silk, or made so as to attract the attention of strangers. Aprons are quite common, and expensive laces or embroidery are never good taste at a breakfast-table. To sum up all we have said, no lady need feel ill at ease in the most fashionable house, if she consults neatness and propriety in her dress, as regards time and material. Overdressed people are to be met with everywhere; but they should never be taken as guides or critics.

those dear old ac - cus - tom'd tones, I lov'd so well to hear.

2

Again upon my heart, baby,
 Thy little hand is prest;
 Again thy little nestling head
 Is pillowed on my breast:
 Again my lips are murmuring
 Low words of love and prayer,
 I strive to draw thee closer yet,
But ah! when thou waken'st me—

3

And then I wake to weep, baby,
 Remem'ring thou art dead;
 And never more can my poor heart
 Pillow thy little head!
 Yet I am happy even now—
 This thought my grief disarms—
 A few short months I fondly clasp'd
An angel in my arms!

4

But loftier minds than mine, baby,
 Will now instruct thy youth,
 And holier hearts will point the path
 Of innocence and truth.
 Thou wert my blessing here on earth,
 And though tears dim my eyes,
 I feel that I am richer far
 To have thee in the skies!

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH, 1852.

THE COTTAGERS' SUNDAY MORNING.

BY REV. H. HASTINGS WELD.

(See Engraving.)

Age clings to earth. Can any question why,
Or ask the reason that, in slow adieu,
The aged eye, with retrospective view,
Looks down and earthward, rather than on high?
Children and children's children, gathering round,
Its tremulous vision to the present bound—
Affection's fair horizon. Not so bright
Is the gay beaming of day's coming light,
Fringing the clouds with purple and with gold,
As is the glory of fair childhood's dawn,
Affection's promises, their own second morn,
To the glad feelings of the happy old.
It hides all else. Oh! be the fault forgiven,
If, in our children's love, perchance we slight e'en Heaven!

And they who twofold joys and duties hold—
As children honoring the loved and old,
As parents guiding up the loved and young—
How may we wonder, with such feelings fraught,
The doubly blest are joyfully distraught,
Living and loving such fond claims among!
In the calm features of that dear old face
The deep-lined record of the past we trace;
Through the child's eye are future glances cast:
Between those two extremes, with thoughtful brow,
The middle-aged stand, whose day is now—
The bands between the future and the past.
Oh! earth is pleasant to such groups as this—
Then wonder not if such look for no higher bliss!

Earth's joys are fleeting. He who kindly gave,
May, in His wisdom, take the gift away;
What shall we rest on when our earthly stay
Lies in the silent slumber of the grave?
Oh! happy they, the humble and the meek,
Who love God's Sabbaths—"Heaven once a week!"
For in His house we learn, and from His Word,
That He the fatherless doth aye sustain;
To Him the widow looketh not in vain—
And, to the weary, rest doth He afford.
Let then our thoughts above the earth be borne,
And God will lift us earth's distress above,
As, with hearts gladdened in his heavenly love,
We hail, with reverend joy, His holy Sabbath morn!

To those who humbly toll for humble fare,
How sweet the respite of the Sabbath day,
In which, by higher aims, they drive away
The week-day thoughts of want and weary care,
While godless Dives liveth on, unblest
With the true pleasure of the Sabbath rest.
Then grant us, Lord, all else though Thou withhold,
That richer treasure than all stores of gold—
Content with godliness. In love with Thee
So pass our days, that we may ever see
Thy hand about us, and, whate'er befall
In the pure spirit of the heavenly poor,
Attain the riches which alone endure
And bless the smiling grace which made One Day for all!

SONNET.—URANIA.

BY WM. ALEXANDER.

The shining stars, "Heaven's Poetry," we see,
And read their characters of living light,
Writ on the ebon canopy of night:
Hearst thou, Urania! too, their melody;
Fw, on the lofty rock-based pyramid
Of Science thou, from age to age, hast stood—
On watchtowers, far and near, the great, the good,

Assistant sentinels. In Eden did
Our first forefather "gaze awhile" the sky;
On Shinar's plain, with thee, his vigil kept
The wise astronomer, nor wearied slept,
All else hushed in repose. The mystery
Of myriad million moving worlds, see him
Pry into still, as erst did morning seraphim.

THE SOLDIER'S DREAM.

AN INCIDENT OF EGYPT.

BY HENRY WILLIAM HERBERT, AUTHOR OF "THE ROMAN TRAITOR," "MARMADUKE WYVIL," "CROMWELL," "THE BROTHERS," ETC.

(See Plate.)

THE period had at length arrived when the disrepute and disfavor into which the English army had fallen with the nation at large, after the disastrous expedition to Walcheren—a disrepute so complete, that many bold and patriotic men did not hesitate to assert that no body of British troops could be brought to stand a conflict with the more numerous armies of the Continent—was about to pass away.

The English fleet had, for the second time, come to anchor in the famous Bay of Aboukir, whose echoes had resounded such a knell to the heart of France from Nelson's thunderous cannon; and, on the 8th of March, Lord Keith, who commanded the naval part of the expedition, embarked five thousand picked men, although without artillery or horse, in three hundred and twenty boats, and launched them against the enemy, who had prepared batteries along the sand hills, among which they lay covered from the artillery of the fleet, and ready to receive the invaders.

The morning was beautiful, the sun shining brilliantly, and the steel-blue waters of the Mediterranean breezeless and limpid as a vast azure mirror, in which were glassed the white and sparkling sand hills, and the few scattered palm trees, which were sprinkled at rare intervals along the low and monotonous coast.

The boats, drawn up in a huge semicircle of two lines stretching across the tranquil waters, moved on in unison, at first with a slow motion, the cannon of the English fleet roaring over their heads and scourging the shores with their tremendous fire, in order to cover their landing. At first, the French guns replied only with a few single shots, discharged to try the range; but, when the boats had come within grape distance, the water was torn up and swept by their prodigious cannonade, shattering the oars, sinking several of the boats, and wounding many of the sailors and the men. But it was all in vain against the impetuous audacity of the invaders. Chéering each other till the stunning roar of the ordnance was almost drowned in the joyous echoes of the English hurrah, they rushed on with increasing speed and emulation. It was, literally, a vast, well-contested boat-race, with a battle-field for the goal, and death or glory for the prize of the victors.

The whole mass now, as if propelled by one common impulse, drew near to the shore; now they touched bottom, and, leaping instantly into the sea, although it was above waist deep, the soldiers rushed forward to the sandy beach, cheering as they ran, formed before the enemy, harassed and ravaged by the fire of the English gun-boats during their advance, could molest them; and, hurrying rapidly to the intrenchments, were met by the French 75th and 61st regiments with a terrible fire, which they supported admirably, and, charging with the cold steel while the French were in some confusion, owing to the inequalities of the ground, threw them into confusion and carried the heights.

Here they were twice charged home by the French 18th and 20th dragoons, and, although they were not shaken by the first assault, which they repulsed with the loss of many men and horses, were subsequently much disordered by a second fiercer home charge, which failed, however, to extricate the 75th, as it was now falling back in great confusion. In the mean time, the 61st had gained some advantages on the right of the English lines, and had even forced back some of the men into their boats, when, the second line arriving, the 42d and 79th Highlanders rushed in with their Scottish slogan, their waving plumage, and gay tartans, gorgeous in the sunshine, and, emulated by the royal Irish, with their wild charging yell of "Faugh a ballagh!" re-established the action in an instant. The insupportable weight of their terrible and sustained fire and the impetuous dash of their bayonet charges soon made way through the French; and, though they fought well, and resisted obstinately, holding their ground to the last, they were compelled reluctantly to fall back; and with the loss of eleven hundred men killed or wounded in that brief but terrible encounter, the five thousand British soldiers, who alone had landed on the wild Egyptian sea banks, deployed their shattered but victorious bands along the summit of those well-disputed sand hills.

Thereafter, on the 9th, 10th, and 11th of March, the English landed, and organized their whole forces, getting on shore their ordnance, ammunition, and provisions, the whole army amounting to sixteen thousand soldiers, with two thousand sailors, who were employed in dragging the artillery through the deep sand which composed the soil of the country over which they had to pass. Their road lay along an extended embankment between the Lakes Mahadieh and Mareotis and the interior of Egypt, along which ran the great canal and the high road to Alexandria.

On the 12th, they set forward on their march, confident and in the highest spirits; for the events of the debarkation and the action of the sand hills had satisfied the English that they were capable at least of contending on equal terms with the best of the continental armies, and both officers and men were elated, and looked forward with eager anxiety to fresh contests and new victories.

The sailors cheerily, though not without vast toil and difficulty, dragged the artillery along through the deep sands, while the gunboats on the lakes and canal supported their flanks on the right hand and the left, and rendered them secure against all attack in that quarter.

On the evening of the 12th, they reached the junction of the embankment with the high grounds of Alexandria, and, in the following morning, debouched from the sand hills, among which they had been marching in three divisions, consisting of a great square flanked by two large bodies arranged in close column—a faulty arrangement as against cavalry, to resist which they were especially designed—with two other divisions to the right and left, marching along the lake-shore on the left, and the sea-shore on the right, where they were perfectly defended by their gunboats.

On the centre division, at daybreak, Lanusse and Friant launched the 22d chasseurs, supported by the 4th and 18th light infantry regiments; but, although the horse cut through a line of infantry which was in advance of the great square, killing many, and throwing the whole force into confusion, the infantry were unable to support the terrible fire of the English and Highland regiments, and were in the end compelled to retreat with the loss of six or eight hundred men. The loss of the English forces was even heavier; for, owing to the superiority of the French artillery and to their own want of cavalry, they had been ravaged by the shot from the heights, and had suffered fearfully from the sabres of the chasseurs. They were weakened by the loss of nearly fifteen hundred men, though still victorious and elated.

The bivouac on the torrid sea-sands followed, and soundly, sweetly slept the worn and wearied soldiers, a little way removed, and but a little from the red spot where many a trusty fere and many a gallant foe slept that long sleep that knows no earthly waking. But few thoughts such as these disturb the minds of men whose every faculty has been and is exerted to the utmost by the hard, actual realities of unrelenting warfare.

Few sounds disturbed the silence of the weary bivouac, save the wild, plaintive howl of the desert jackal, wandering, like an unquiet spirit, among the bodies of the slain, to which a wondrous instinct snuffing the tainted gale had led it, by the roaring sea-banks of Aboukir, far from the depths and solitudes of its native wastes, and converted it, for the moment, from the tracker of faint and famishing caravans into the follower of conquering or defeated armies. At times, the deep and resonant cry, "All 's well," would rise mournfully upon the night air from the lips of some near sentinel, and would be taken up by another and another voice, farther receding into the glimmering distance, till it would die away among the remotest precincts of the guarded bivouac—and there would again, for a while, be night and silence, the very carrion-hunting wild dogs of the desert ceasing from their infernal chorus in the presence of the dread majesty of the human voice divine.

At length the hours of the night lagged slowly onward, the glimmering stars paled in the purple skies, a few faint streaks on the horizon's eastern verge announced to the watchers of the host the advent of the day—of the day fraught with fresh toils, perchance with fresh havoc, agony, and slaughter.

Brighter and brighter grew the distant flush of the pearly and cloudless skies, and with it grew a dull, increasing hum around the watchfires, a buzzing, indistinct, and tremulous murmur, as that

"Of bees aroused, and arming in their fires."

A ruddy glow shot upward to the zenith, and, like a ball of living fire, the great sun heaved his disk above the level sands, which glowed like gold in his awakening lustre. A heavy gun boomed out its salutation to the morn, drums rolled, and the bugles of the light infantry were answered by the braying pipes of the Highland regiments, and the long files of scarlet jackets faced the new-risen sun in regular and orderly array, and a full-hearted English cheer pealed far and wide over the lone and irresponsive sand hills, as a manly form rode along the front, followed by an aid-de-camp and an orderly officer, the greeting of a conquering host to him who had so nobly led them—the good and gallant Abercromby.

All that day was consumed in landing men and munitions, in organizing hospitals and depots; but, when the sun went down, its last rays shone upon the proud array of fifteen thousand British foot, exulting in the first dawn of victory, which never thenceforth turned her back upon their red-cross banners, until the sun of Austerlitz had set forever in the drear night of Waterloo.

On the day following, the march was resumed, slowly and wearily, through the deep scorching sands, where water was scarce and brackish, shelter none, and the toils and sufferings of the soldiery almost intolerable. Still on they went, resistless, though not unresisted. At the pass of Ramanieh, by the Lakes Mahadieh and elder Mareotis, by the time-honored camp of Cæsar—where once had rung the brazen trumpets of the world-conquering legions, and marched that iron-disciplined, majestic infantry, the equal of which the world had never thought to witness, until the Anglo-Saxon roused him from the repose of centuries to build a vaster empire, and gird a mightier globe than ever filled the most ambitious vision of the antique Roman—At each and all of these the British army fought and conquered.

Nor, in the whole of that unrivaled host, was there one regiment that could outvie the kilted Camerons, the noble 79th, renowned from Hindostan to the New World beyond the western sea, and yet to win fresh laurels by the Pyramids of Egypt, the rocky ramparts of the Pyrenees, the bloody battle-grounds of Flanders.

Deeper havoc was not wrought amid the gallant ranks, sterner resistance was not offered to the fiery onslaught of the French Eagles, than by the solid and wall-like formations of the sturdy Highlanders, than by the murderous roll of the incessant volleys; and, when their arms were leveled to the charge, and Scotland's slogan replied wild and shrill to the deep and steady cheers of England, what earthly force could abide the brunt of their serried bayonets, what heart not bound and thrill to that fierce yell, the forerunner of certain triumph? Enough! It was upon their fluttering plumes and waving tartans that the last glance of noble Abercromby fell, as he sank in the arms of glory; it was their headlong charge that filled his glazing eye; it was their deafening cheers that burst upon his ear, and told him that he died not vainly, but victoriously, for England's—the world's freedom.

And Alexandria had fallen, and England's arms rolled onward, and still the solid columns of the plumed and plaided Highlanders were in the first wave of that onward, roaring tide, the sparkling of their bayonets the foam on its foremost billow.

The sun had sunk in the west, luridly crimson through the hot haze, and his last level rays had gilded the far-distant spires of the great pyramids, on which the sons of the stern north gazed with intelligent, yet wondering eyes. Night fell, and, in a long, long line, the watchfires gleamed in bright perspective over the level sands, stretching away into the endless distance. With guns unlimbered, and troop horses picketed, and muskets stacked beside them, and tall sentinels with shouldered arms gravely and silently stalking to and fro, their comrades off duty chatted round the fires, or, rolled in their checkered plaids, slept, all forgetful of past labors and coming perils.

It was a stern and solitary, but a glorious picture; for, far away on the very verge of the low horizon, the full moon was now setting with one thin streak of blood-red vapor—was that a sign of coming slaughter?—crossing her disk, and in her misty and uncertain light, uploomed, awful in their stern majesty of forgotten ages, the immemorial pyramids.

In the front of that great world-wide picture—so vast appeared the bare expanse of the naked and almost treeless sands—blazed a small, solitary watch-fire, and, close before it, with his head and shoulders propped on a small sand bank, from which arose a single stunted palm tree, there slept, as tranquilly as though he had been dozing away the languid afternoon of a summer's day, a youthful Highlander, the chevrons on whose sleeve told that he had achieved his first step of promotion, and was already, scarcely more than a youth in years, a sergeant of the 79th. His firelock and his bonnet lay beside him; but war, or the implements of war, were not in the mind of the sleeper; for, as the fitful gleams of the fire played over his bold, sunburnt features, a bright smile gilded them.

Ah, far away, far away from the burned sands and level desert was the soul of the mountaineer, at home among the rocks, with his foot planted, in imagination, on his beloved heather! It was but a short space before, that he had arisen and heaped fresh fuel on the fire, and then, as he lay half waking, half asleep, his eyes dwelt, scarcely conscious, on the dense smoke wreaths which surged upwards. Then they seemed to assume strange and fantastic shapes, to assume new, unwonted hues, to tower into far blue crags and mountains, with heathery slopes between; and well-known forms of favorite goats browsing upon their purple bloom, and an all-unforgotten shieling, with the light smoke-wreath of domestic peace upcurling over it, nestled at the roots of the overtopping hills. The soldier slept—the soldier was at home.

The cheers of his neighbors filled his ears; their forms, hurrying down to meet the returning wanderer, met his eye; but there were sights and sounds sweeter far than these, about him. Soft arms were wound about his neck, a low voice murmured in his ear, a loved form filled his arms—his own, own Jeanie—and clinging to her skirts an infant Joan, unborn when its father left his far Caithness at loyalty's and glory's call, and, speeding fleet as the wild roe to greet his daddie, his first-born boy, the pride of his honest heart, his own wee Donald.

There came upon the silence of the night a musket shot, another, and another—the startled roll of the alarm drums—a rattling volley. The Highlander sprang to his feet, grasped his firelock, but never raised it to his shoulder more. A ball crashed through his brain, and he fell, scarcely conscious if this were not the dream, and the dream reality.

He never moved again. The soldier's dream of home was ended, unless, perchance, it was dreamed out in Heaven.

FABLES. 1900!

BY THE LATE WM. A. JONES.

THE fable is the earliest form of fictitious composition, a species of didactic allegory or moral satire, couched under the guise of an apologue. It is an illustrative method of teaching duty, by example rather than by precept. It reaches the difficult end of impressing principles by a vivid representation of sensible images, or the intelligent discourse and action of the brute part of the creation. In the society of beasts, we are taught the moral and social obligations of men, while in their characters we find the features corresponding to those of our own species. Qualities are thus strikingly and naturally set forth, that affect us more by a characteristic delineation of them than we would be affected by long lectures on the vices and virtues, or by the most elaborate analysis of the passions and affections. Bacon has declared in favor of the natural love for imaginary representations of realities, fair pictures of the shows of things, in poetry and the drama, and, indeed, in all the efforts of the imagination, from the innate desire of the soul to attain at least glimpses of something better, and beyond our ordinary sphere. The imagination paints thus in richer colors than the practical understanding, while invention is truer than experience, and the ideal is more real than our common ideas of reality.

The fable inculcates rules of moral prudence, by exhibiting the evil of neglecting, and the benefits that flow from observing, them. It teaches a direct and strict morality, yet a metaphorical morality rather than ethical dissertation.

The matter of fable is morality and fiction wisely and skillfully intermingled; the form is prose or verse. Hence this intermixture of the real and ideal, the probable (in fiction) and the true (in morality). Fable lies on the border land between prose and poetry. A fable may be written in plain prose, or embodied in agreeable verse. Yet the verse is not of the highest order; it falls, naturally, under the head of meæ pedestris, a humble, if not the humblest, class of poetical writing. The majority of fabulists have written in prose, probably from the greater facility of composition.

Fables are partly narrative, partly descriptive, admitting of humor of character and incident, and witty satire, more gay than grave. They allow rarely the display of passion or of pathetic situation; yet they admit, at times, of both. In general direct and circumstantial, they are occasionally dramatic in spirit, and include lively dialogue. As to the wit and humor of fables, we quote a sentence of one of the most sensible of living writers, Mr. Home, to this effect: "All the great writers of fables—writers who are among the best instructors and noblest benefactors of their species—have been humorists rather than wits."* Because, as we infer, they are, for the most part, loving, genial instructors, and not harsh, arbitrary, censorious; philanthropists and not misanthropes. At least, this character applies to the masters, Pilpay, Æsop, Lafontaine, and Gay.

Thus much by way of preface and dissertation. We intend to occupy the remainder of the present paper with a series of sketches of the leading fabulists; all we may not hope to mention. Nor can we promise any deep philosophy of the matter, leaving that to the Herders and the learned German critics in a mass.

The East, the fountain of all wisdom and imagination, the mother country of sages and poets, the land of wonders and marvels in nature and art, the land of magic and monsters, of countless treasure and luxurious beauty, with debasing poverty and squalid wretchedness—the East, the glorious and degraded East, was, and in a sense still continues to be, the true land of fable, whence it originated, and where its greatest masters appeared: in Palestine, China, Arabia, Persia, and India.

The oldest fable in existence is Jotham's parable of the trees, which occurs in the ninth chapter of Judges: "The trees went forth on a time to anoint a king over them; and they said unto the olive tree, Reign thou over us. But the olive tree said unto them, Should I leave my fatness, wherewith by me they honor God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees? And the trees said to the fig tree, Come thou and reign over us. But the fig tree said unto them, Should I forsake my sweetness, and my good fruit, and go to be promoted over the trees? Then said the trees unto the vine, Come thou and reign over us. And the vine said unto them, Should I leave my wine, which cheereth God and man, and go to be promoted over the trees? Then said all the trees unto the bramble, Come thou and reign over us. And the bramble said unto the trees, If, in truth, ye anoint me king over you, then come and put your trust in my shadow; and, if not, let fire come out of the bramble and devour the cedars of Lebanon."

A most cutting satire. The absurd conceit and pitiful wrath, amounting almost to profanity, of the bramble is placed in a vivid light. This political fable was too well founded, and too pat, to fail of practical application, and the ingenious author of it was forced to secure his safety by flight, from the vengeance of folly in power.

* New Spirit of the Age.

The Chinese Bilpai (Pilpay), or the Arabian Lokman, perhaps one and the same person, is the acknowledged father of Eastern fable—the source of the largest number of the apologues of that land of fable. With the Persian Saadi, he, or they, constitute the chief names in this department of Oriental genius—a form of composition essentially Oriental. Teaching by fable doubtless appears the most natural method to an Oriental, whose imagination finds metaphors everywhere, whose love of moral instruction seems instinctive—(all their writings have an ethical cast)—whose humanity to beasts is notorious—in no other part of the world do we hear of asylums for animals sick, aged, or maimed)—whose style of instruction is peculiar, in which you find united a patriarchal authority to a pastoral simplicity; and whose whole manner of life, comparatively quiet and thoughtful, begets a tendency to moralize on the beauties of nature and on the brute creation, no less than on the characters of men, and the prospects and probable destiny of the human race. If it were necessary, which we cannot think it is, to seek Divine sanction for any class of writing, we might find it for the fable, which closely resembles the parable, and is identical with it, except that the former has a wider scope, and reaches its end by more various means. Teaching by parable was the favorite mode of instruction employed by Him “who spake as never man spake,” and whose lessons were confirmed by living examples.

The very existence, no less than the individuality of Pilpay, is disputed. Some regard his name and that of Lokman as convertible; while others regard the body of fables passing under their names as belonging to a great common stock. The French writers are the fullest on this, as on most Oriental subjects; elaborate and exact. They give a probable history of Pilpay—a sort of quasi biography. The Persian was also a poet, and none the worse fabulist for that. Pilpay, alone, we can read. He is full of sense and penetration, and a capital moral satirist. Though often referred to, the translation of his fables is very scarce.

The next great name, the one universally known, and in popular estimation, the greatest of all the fabulists, is Æsop, of whom the brilliant critic speaks thus admiringly: “There is a wit of sense and observation, which consists in the acute illustration of good sense and practical wisdom, by means of some far-fetched conceit or quaint imagery. The matter is sense, but the form is wit.” “The ancient philosophers also abounded in the same kind of wit, in telling home-truths in the most unexpected manner. In this sense, Æsop was the greatest wit and moralist that ever lived. Ape and slave, he looked askance at human nature, and beheld its weaknesses and errors transferred to another species. Vice and virtue were to him as plain as any objects of sense. He saw, in man, a talking, absurd, obstinate, proud, angry animal, and clothed these abstractions with wings, or a beak, or tail, or claws, or long ears, as they appeared embodied in these hieroglyphics in the brute creation. His moral philosophy is natural history. He makes an ass bray wisdom, and a frog croak humanity. The store of moral truth and the fund of invention, in exhibiting it in eternal forms, palpable and intelligible, and delightful to children and grown persons, and to all ages and nations, are almost miraculous. The invention of a fable is to me the most enviable exertion of human genius; it is the discovering a truth to which there is no clue, and which, when once found out, can never be forgotten. I would rather have been the author of Æsop's Fables than Euclid's Elements.”*

To this admirable criticism, we must add our hearty assent. The justness and nicety of the thought are only to be paralleled by the force and brilliancy of the style. Yet, though we admire the spirit of the judgment, we must correct a popular error into which the critic has fallen. Haslitt calls Æsop ape and slave; yet, from the best accounts, we conclude him to have been a freedman, the stories about whose deformity are probably as correct as those of Richard III., whose defects of nature appear to have been very slight, after all. Æsop may have been lame, but not deformed. He was a Phrygian, born about the middle of the sixth century before Christ, the oldest Greek fabulist, and the father of all the later European writers of fable, the source whence modern authors have universally drawn material, characters, and incidents, whose pictures they have only re-colored, whose landscapes and figures they have sketched, seldom without obscuring the original brightness of the first, or weakening the spirit of the last. The most popular translation into English by L'Estrange is a model of its kind, one of the most idiomatic versions ever put forth of any author. This volume, with Croxall's plates—no great things compared with later engravings—was the study and delight of our boyhood, as it ought to be of every schoolboy. Nor do we think that any elegance of type, or richness of illustration, or fineness of paper, can ever produce the impressions made upon us by the plain wood-cuts, coarse paper, and board covers of this unpretending little volume.

Æsop is the Pilpay of Europe, but more versatile, witty, and satirical.

Phædrus is Æsop in Latin and in verse. The musa pedestris is the muse of the Latin fabulist, who is a prose poet. We do not know this writer as we ought, but retain a certain feeling for him, as his volume happened to be our first school premium.

* Lecture on Wit and Humor. English Comic Writers.

The old German, from the earliest period, and down to Lessing, and later still, is rich in fabulous literature. The great Middle Age apologue of Reynard, the Fox, is the gem; a grand comic epopee, a humorous satire, worthy of the great German literature. Its author is unknown, or at least very doubtful. We do not know that the Italians or Spaniards have any fabulists of general reputation. Portugal boasts her Yiarte, of whom we are not competent to speak.

In modern times, France and England have produced the classic fabulists, Lafontaine and Gay. The former country has doubtless clever minor writers in this department; but Lafontaine's fame as a cosmopolitan writer has quite eclipsed theirs. The French have given true admiration to Lafontaine. D'Alembert used to say of him that he was the writer, of the great men of Louis XIV., whom Nature would find it the hardest to reproduce. Not that he was the greatest of them, but that his genius was the most individual. Much as we might say of Charles Lamb, of the present century, Wordsworth is the greatest writer, a grand poet; but Lamb's genius is peculiar and fine, to a degree unapproached by cotemporary writers. The same criticism may be applied to Prior and Sterne.

La Bruyère has left the best portrait of Lafontaine, whose simplicity of character, absence of mind, and conversational deficiency are well known: "A person who appears dull, sottish, and stupid, knows neither how to speak nor relate what he has seen. If he sets to write, no man does it better: he makes animals, stones, and trees talk, and everything which cannot talk. His works are full of nothing but elegance, easy, natural sense, and delicacy."

Mr. Wright's versions of the French fabulist, however faithful and spirited, do not give one so good an idea of Lafontaine as Gay in his delightful fables, and Prior in his graceful tales. The French writer appears to unite the sweetness, the simplicity, and saute elegance of the former, to the arch wit, bon-homie spirit, and delicacy of style of the latter. Mere invention neither can lay much claim to. Both Prior and Lafontaine borrowed largely their plots and the incidents of their tales from earlier writers, French and Italian—Rabelais and Boccaccio—who, in turn, derived their materials from still older writers.

"In wit a man, simplicity a child," Gay is intellectually, and was, we suspect, personally and socially, twin brother to Lafontaine, the idol of his friends, as well as one of the glories of the age of Anne—so much underrated just now, because inferior to that of Elizabeth, and because injudicious admirers had called it the Augustan age of our literature—and still is at the head of English fabulists. Good fables have appeared from other hands. Good old Doctor Cotton; and wise Johnson, with his oriental fancy and pomp of expression, so telling in an Eastern apologue; keen, penetrating

Franklin; and caustic Swift, have, at different times, written morality, worldly wisdom, prudential maxims, or severe irony, in the form of fables. Among the poets, from Chaucer to Cowper, and down to the latest versifier, old fables have been reproduced and translated into rhyme; but, though some of these writers are much superior to Gay in other respects, none so well and truly as he have hit the mark. His fables are often original in plan and matter, as in execution. The "Beggar's Opera" and the "Pastorals" place Gay much above the Frenchman; but these works do not come fairly into the question. Pope's correspondence shows Gay the darling of that most choice and picked society. He is spoken of, even by the saturnine Dean, with warmth and affection; and, from all we can learn of him, he fully deserves the admirable epitaph of Pope—a noble piece of eulogium, truly to deserve which marks the English Lafontaine as the possessor of one of the noblest hearts, as well as one of the finest heads of that brilliant era:—

"Of manners gentle, of affections mild;
In wit a man, simplicity a child;
With native humor tempering virtuous rage,
Formed to delight at once and lash the age:
Above temptation, in a low estate,
And uncorrupted ev'n among the great;
A safe companion and an easy friend,
Unblamed through life, lamented in thy end:
These are thy honors! not that here thy bust
Is mix'd with heroes, or with kings thy dust;
But that the worthy and the good shall say,
Striking their pensive bosoms—Here lies GAY!"

With these fine verses, we conclude a brief and imperfect sketch. Since that day, we have had many able, fine, brilliant writers, some men of genius, and many more of talents; but, with all our intellectual opulence, we have still but one Pope, and but one Gay.

SONG.

BY JACK LEEWAY.

A song! a song of the calm clear deep!
The canvas flaps, the wind is asleep;
The last blue line of the coast grows dim,
Above and around the sea-gulls skim.

A song! a song of the wild young seas,
The white caps foam in the rising breeze;
The porpoise darts in his gay career,
The ship is out in an offing clear.

A song! a song of the mountain swell!
The straining ropes of a tempest tell
The barque flies on in a living gale,
Till a squall strikes down both mast and sail!

A song! a song of the roaring surge,
As its curling summits beachward urge!
Despair hath charged on that parting deck,
With earthquake voice—that ship is a wreck!

PLANS FOR FLOWER GARDENS.

FLOWER GARDENS are of two kinds: those which are planted with flowers indiscriminately in the borders are called mixed flower gardens; and those which are of a regular shape, as shown in the figures, and which are planted in masses of flowers of one kind, are called geometrical flower gardens. Mixed flower gardens require comparatively little care to arrange and keep in order, as the principal objects to be attended to are to have the tallest plants placed farthest from the eye, and to keep the plants sufficiently distinct to prevent them from being drawn up for want of room. The geometrical flower garden, on the other hand, requires great care in its arrangement; for, as the plants form masses of color, if the colors do not harmonize with each other, they produce a very bad effect. It is, therefore, necessary to draw out a plan for a flower garden, and to color it before it is planted, as then, if the colors do not harmonize, they can be changed with little trouble. In a geometrical flower garden, the colors must be contrived so as to produce as striking effect contrasted with each other, and the plants must be so chosen as to be nearly of the same size, so that the garden, when seen at a distance, may have the effect of a Turkey carpet. The walks in a geometrical flower garden are either grass or gravel, but as in the latter case they must be bordered with box, the garden generally looks better when the beds are on grass.

AN APPEAL TO AMERICAN CHRISTIANS ON BEHALF OF THE LADIES' MEDICAL MISSIONARY SOCIETY.

BY MRS. SARAH J. PALE.

A few ladies of Philadelphia have lately formed an association for the purpose of advancing educational and Christian improvement. The following preamble from their "Rules," &c., will best define their plans:—

"Believing that God, in committing the care of the young especially to woman, imposes on her the duty of preparing herself, in the best possible manner, for her important vocations, among which are the care of her own health, the physical well-being of her children, and tendance on the sick, suffering, and helpless; and finding, also, that the BIBLE recognizes and approves only woman in the sacred office of midwife, therefore we, who give our names to this benevolent association, agree to unite in the following purposes:—

"1st. To co-operate with the efforts now being made in this city of Philadelphia, to qualify women to become physicians for their own sex and for children.

"2d. To give kindly encouragement to those females who are engaged in medical studies.

"3d. To give aid and sympathy to any among them who may desire to become missionaries, and go, in the spirit of love, to carry to the poor suffering women of heathendom, not only the blessings of the healing art, which Christian men can rarely, if ever, bear to females in those lands, but also the higher and holier knowledge of the true God, and of salvation through his Son, Jesus Christ."

The propriety of admitting young women to the study of medicine, and qualifying them to become physicians for their own sex and for children, is now not only generally acknowledged in our country, but has, to some extent, been provided for. Miss Blackwell, the pioneer in this praiseworthy undertaking, after graduating with the highest honors from an American medical college, went, as our readers are aware, to Paris and London to complete her studies. Having won from the faculty in those cities the acknowledgment of her full qualifications to practice the art of medicine and enjoy its degrees of honor, she has returned to this country and opened her office in the city of New York. Several other female graduates are now in full practice in that city and in Philadelphia.

In Boston, "The Female Medical Education Society" was organized and opened its School in November, 1843. In April, 1850, the Society was incorporated by the Massachusetts Legislature. After a protracted debate and severe scrutiny of the subject, only four votes were cast against it, which proves most conclusively the favorable opinion this respectable body of men entertained for female medical education. The School thus incorporated has received from sixty to seventy female students, many of whom have already gone into practice as nurses and midwives; but, as a full course of medical lectures was not given, none have graduated as physicians. The plan is now to be perfected,* and we may expect it to prosper greatly. The "Society" pledged to support this College numbers, we believe, nearly two thousand persons, among whom are found the names of distinguished statesmen, clergymen, physicians, merchants, and "honorable women not a few." New England has fully sanctioned the medical education of women. Indeed, the "physicians of Boston" deserve much respect for their liberal views† in regard to this effort to reinstate woman in the natural and Scriptural custom of tendance on her own sex, which must also include all necessary knowledge of the diseases of childhood.

But Boston is not alone in this great, because

* N. E. FEMALE MEDICAL COLLEGE.—Arrangements having been made for a complete course of medical instruction by six Professors, in the different departments, the Boston Female Medical School is hereafter to be known by the name of New England Female Medical College; and, under this arrangement, is to commence in February, 1852.

† HARVARD MEDICAL SCHOOL.—The Corporation of Harvard College, and the Professors in the Medical Department of the Institution, located in Boston—the Board of Instruction consisting of Drs. Walter Channing, Jacob Bigelow, John Ware, John S. B. Jackson, Oliver W. Holmes, Henry J. Bigelow, and E. N. Horsford—have recently given their testimony in favor of the Medical Education of Females, by deciding to admit a female pupil to that institution for the term of 1850-1.

The application was, however, withdrawn; the Students having, among other Resolutions (as published in the Boston Transcript), "Resolved, That no woman of true delicacy would be willing, in the presence of men, to listen to the discussion of the subjects that necessarily come under the consideration of the students of medicine. Resolved, That we are not opposed to allowing woman her rights, but do protest against her appearing in places where her presence is calculated to destroy our respect for the modesty and delicacy of her sex."

It must be obvious to every one that the students were correct in their views, and that propriety, and the "respect" of which they speak, require a separate School or Hospital for the professional education of women; and that much more do those considerations require that female practice among their own sex.

good, work. "The Female Medical College of Pennsylvania" was incorporated in 1849, and opened at Philadelphia in 1850. During these two years, it has numbered about sixty students in all, though a number were only attendants on particular branches. Its plan of studies and lectures corresponds with those of the male medical colleges in this city; its students are very assiduous, and give promise of much usefulness; and several are expected to graduate at the close of the present session.

The views and reasons which have led to the establishment of the two colleges thus briefly noticed, may be best understood by extracts from their own publications. The following is from the Introductory Lecture of one of the Faculty, who opened the "Female College" at Philadelphia:—

"The education of Females as Practitioners of Medicine is not the only aim or intention of the Trustees and Faculty; they desire, by a complete course of lectures in medical science, to show her the delicate and beautiful machinery which her Creator has formed, that thus she may be enabled to aid the suffering, make the path of the departing less rugged, and teach her associates to repel in advance the insidious approaches of disease, to which she now, from ignorance of their effects, too freely exposes herself and her offspring."

In April, 1851, the "Female Medical Education Society of Boston" asked the Legislature for aid. The committee to whom the petition was referred made a favorable report, from which we will quote—

FEMALE PRACTITIONERS IN MIDWIFERY.—Your committee have no hesitancy in expressing the opinion that there ought to be a class of thoroughly educated females for this department of professional duty. So far from being a departure of woman from the duties appropriate to her sex, it appears peculiarly her province. And it seems an unfortunate oversight, that this branch of female education has thus far been neglected in our country. In the countries of the Old World, women have filled this office from the days of the "Hebrew Midwives" to the present time. The governments of most of the European States provide institutions for the education and training of this class of persons, and allow none to practice but those who are properly qualified.

FEMALE PHYSICIANS.—The education of females as physicians is specified as one of the objects of the society that petitions for aid. It is not, however, expected that they are to supplant the present medical profession, but rather be auxiliary to it, thus rendering it more complete and useful. There is at present a want in this respect that has been felt and expressed by many physicians; and, in reference to which, the testimony of an eminent medical authority will here be presented.

Professor Meigs, of the Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, in his recent work on the Diseases of Females, thus speaks upon this point: "The relations between the sexes are of so delicate a character, that the duties of the medical practitioner are necessarily more difficult when he comes to take charge of any one of the great host of female complaints, than when he is called to treat any of the more general disorders. So great, indeed, is the embarrassment, that I am persuaded that much of the ill success of treatment may justly be traced thereto.

main, from any want of competency in medicines or medical men; but from the delicacy of the relations existing between the sexes; and, in a good degree, from a want of information among the population in general as to the import, and meaning, and tendency of disorders manifested by a certain train of symptoms.

"It is perhaps best, upon the whole, that this great degree of modesty should exist, even to the extent of putting a bar to researches, without which no very clear and understandable notions can be obtained of the sexual disorders. I confess I am proud to say that, in this country, generally, certainly in many parts of it, there are women who prefer to suffer the extremity of danger and pain, rather than waive those scruples of delicacy which prevent their maladies from being fully explored. I say it is an evidence of the dominion of a fine morality in our society."

In cases where these difficulties are nearly or quite insurmountable, Dr. Meigs recommends the call of a midwife, if one is to be found, to assist in the investigation; thus giving his testimony in favor of having a class of educated women of this description, if it be only to act as assistants to physicians.

It is obvious, however, that the evils in question may readily be removed by the education of females as physicians for their own sex.

To these reasons might be urged others equally important, and one of such serious magnitude as no Christian should overlook. It is proved by data* which cannot be questioned, that the practice of midwifery by men is not only injurious, but destructive of human life. In Boston, for several past years, out of 4000 annual births, the dead-born have averaged 300 yearly, or one in every fourteen. In the Hospital of Maternity, in Paris, entirely under a Female Superintendent, Madame Boivin, out of 21,502 births, only 783 were still-born, a fraction over one in twenty-eight; about half the ratio in Boston!!!

Let these facts be considered, and we do not see how any conscientious man or woman can withhold approval of this plan of female medical education and practice. It is not new. The intrusion of men into the department of midwifery was first permitted by the profligate Louis XIV., in the case of his mistress, Madame La Vallière, in order to conceal her shame. The unnatural and degrading practice has never been prevalent on the Continent of Europe; not even now in France, where there are, in the city of Paris alone, over six hundred licensed midwives, and several hundred are every year educated by Government for the provinces.

It is in England and the northern and middle portion of the United States that man-midwifery chiefly prevails. Yet it is but about eighty years since it was first ventured upon in America. It cannot long continue, now that public attention is called to the subject, and it is found that, in nine-tenths of the world, female physicians for their own sex are, and ever have been, employed successfully, and that there is actually less feebleness among women in those countries than in our own, where constitutional ill health in the mothers is fast making us a nation of invalids. This is not directly the fault of the regular physicians, perhaps, but results, indirectly, from the increased ignorance of women respecting their own diseases and those of their children, since the practice has been monopolized by men. This ignorance leads people of both sexes often to employ quacks and resort to poisonous nostrums.

* See "Letter to Ladies in favor of Female Physicians for their own Sex." By Samuel Gregory, A. M. Published in Boston, 1780.

Ignorance and mystery always induce superstition, and the false is then worshiped for the true. Why else do we see, in this city of Philadelphia, the boasted seat of Medical Science, where six colleges for the regular training of doctors are located, that quackery lifts its head like a second tower of Babel, and steam-engines are driving onward the manufacture of pills and potions, as though these were to support the nation? The inventors and preparers of these medicines win the confidence of the people from the regular physician, and gain wealth while he studies in vain—because he has kept his art in concealment, particularly from woman, who is the real conservator of health, as of home. Let the good and learned physicians of Philadelphia open Schools for training female medical students, and permit any lady who pays the matriculation fee of five dollars to attend one course of lectures, and their halls would be crowded. The study of medicine belongs to woman's department of knowledge; its practice is in harmony with the duties of mother and nurse, which she must fulfil. It is not going out of her sphere to prescribe for the sick; she must do this by the fireside, the bedside, in the "inner chamber," where her true place is. It is man who is there out of his sphere. And now let the effort be to give all females that knowledge of the laws of health and of their own frames which will lead them to improve the modes of training children and preserve them from the need of medical treatment.

Then, when real diseases occurred, and danger was apprehended, the most worthy and eminent physicians would be employed, trusted, honored. Quackery would be swept away as superstitious notions are when the people are enlightened, and the learned Professor of Medicine would no longer be eclipsed by every pretender who can prepare a pill and pay for a puff.

But this Appeal, which "The Ladies' Medical Missionary Society" now makes to the Christian public, is mainly in aid of preparing the wives of missionaries to act as physicians for the women and children among whom their station, either Domestic or Foreign, may be found. And, more important still, we wish to aid in educating pious unmarried ladies who may be willing to go out as Medical Missionaries. What a blessing to a mission family to be accompanied by a competent female physician, who would be an adviser as well as comforter in the hour of sickness! She might act as Teacher till called to her profession; and, though she would practice gratuitously among the poor in heathen lands, yet, when an entrance was gained to the more wealthy, she would doubtless receive rich presents, and be able to assist, materially, the cause of missions.

All heathen people have a high reverence for medical knowledge. Should they find Christian ladies accomplished in this science, would it not greatly raise the sex in the estimation of those nations, where one of the most serious impediments to moral improvement is the degradation and ignorance to which their females have been for centuries consigned?

Vaccination is difficult of introduction among the people of the East, though suffering dreadfully from the ravages of the small-pox. The American Missionary at Siam writes that thousands of children were, last year, swept away by this disease in the country around him. Female physicians could win their way among these poor children much easier than doctors of the other sex. Surely the ability of American women to learn and practice vaccination will not be questioned, when the more difficult art of inoculation was discovered by the women of Turkey, and introduced into Europe by an English woman! Inoculation is one of the greatest triumphs of remedial skill over a sure, loathsome, and deadly disease which the annals of Medical Art record. Its discovery belongs to women.* I name it here to show that they are gifted with genius for the profession, and only need to be educated to excel in the preventive department.

Let pious, intelligent women be fitly prepared, and what a mission-field for doing good would be opened! In India, China, Turkey, and all over the heathen world, they would, in their character of physicians, find access to the homes and the harems where women dwell, and where the good seed sown would bear an hundredfold, because it would take root in the bosom of the sufferer, and in the heart of childhood.

Such were the views and hopes of the ladies who formed this Association. We have been, thus far, greatly encouraged. Our Society was organized November 12th—not one month ago. Already we number over fifty members and donors; and, what is of more value than money, we have received the cordial approval of eminent clergymen belonging to each of the great denominations of Protestant Christians.

* What appears to be another great discovery in Medical Science has lately been made by Mrs. Emma Willard, viz., "The Theory of Respiration; or, how to Cure the Cholera." The Committee appointed by the "New York State Teachers' Association" to examine this discovery, have reported that they "believe the Theory to be TRUE." The New York State Legislature will have the subject again examined. Should this cure of the cholera prove efficient, it will rank next in importance to the discovery of inoculation.

The Rev. Dr. Malcom, who has visited the East, and knows the wants of Missions, gave the plan his warmest approbation.

Rev. Dr. Durbin, in his letter to the author of this Appeal, after expressing his sympathy with the movement to educate female physicians to take charge of their own sex and of children, adds, "If I were stationed in this city, I would give the effort my personal aid: now I send my own name, and that of Mrs. Durbin, as members of your Society."

Rt. Rev. Bishop Potter, in his letter, thus nobly cheers us on our way: "The importance of securing for women a larger sphere of usefulness, and the especial propriety and desirableness of qualifying them to practice the healing art among children and those of their own sex, will be admitted, I should hope, by all persons. If there are those, however, who think otherwise, I certainly am not of the number; and I shall rejoice heartily in the success of every effort which is calculated to promote such object."

Rev. Charles Wadsworth, after observing that he had "long entertained the opinion that Medical Science should, in all cases, form part of a woman's education," &c., thus concludes: "The design of the 'Ladies' Medical Missionary Society' seems to me truly benevolent, and its constitution eminently wise. I need not say that it has my most cordial wishes for its entire success, and that I shall rejoice to be able in any way to further your wishes in a cause so good."

Rev. Dr. Stevens, who was for some years a physician, thus sanctions our plan: "Whatever will tend to give true, Christian elevation to woman, whatever will enlarge the sphere of her legitimate influence, whatever will give her more efficiency in raising her sex in heathen lands, and in spreading among them the life-giving truths of the glorious Gospel, is worthy of the attention and co-operation of all those who have at heart the true welfare of our race. 'The Ladies' Medical Missionary Society' aims to secure all these points, and is therefore deserving the support and encouragement of the Christian community."

Rev. A. D. Gillette has given his name as a member of our Society, and promised his valuable aid.

Rev. Dr. Howe, after noting the influence "medical knowledge possesses over the heathen," and how efficient it would be "combined with woman's piety and tenderness," adds, "I can but say, God speed an effort to bestow on those heroic Christian women who forsake all for Christ's sake and the Gospel, the knowledge of a science which may be a preservative of their own devoted lives, and a mighty auxiliary in the fulfilment of their gracious errand."

Rev. Dr. Brainerd, Rev. D. Ladd, and Rev. Lyman Colman, have each signified their cordial approbation of this benevolent movement.

Nor must we fail to record here the approval of an honored "Friend," Thomas P. Cope, who kindly sealed it by a donation of fifty dollars.

We hope soon to add to our list of approvers that of every Christian clergyman in this city and in the nation. The noble-minded and wise-hearted physicians—will they not also lend their influence and assistance in carrying out this great reform? They will gain honor by every increase of medical knowledge in the community. Only pretenders and impostors need fear the movement. The opposition will come from these. But good men, husbands, fathers—Christians must approve. The PRESS will surely aid. We make our appeal to the common sense, instinctive feeling, and enlightened judgment of the People. Help us to establish our Society, and test its usefulness. Let Philadelphia lead the way in promoting the education of Female Medical Practitioners and Missionaries, and the centre of the movement will continue here.

We hope for much favor. We seek to unite all hearts in the good work, as the following from our "Constitution" will show:—

"RULE VI. As the objects of this Society are to open the way of improvement for their sex in the duties especially belonging to women, and also to offer a wider sphere of doing good to such as wish to work in the Saviour's cause, therefore we invite the co-operation of Christians in every part of our land. Any association of ladies formed for the same object, and paying annually into our treasury, shall receive an annual report; and these co-operating societies may each recommend a female student to the care of the Executive Committee, and designate the individual beneficiary to whose aid its contribution is to be devoted.

"Persons making donations may specify the particular religious denomination their bounty is intended to benefit. The Executive Committee will faithfully fulfil these trusts."

The New England and Pennsylvania Female Medical Colleges are now on a similar plan. A term is to commence in February at Boston. Our Society will be able to pay the tuition fees of that course for four female students—one from each denomination, Episcopal, Presbyterian, Baptist, and Methodist—should suitable ladies be commended by the Missionary Boards. The wife of some missionary may desire to avail herself of this opportunity. In short, we are willing to begin now, and trust in the Providence of God for means to go on.

Those who are ready to aid us, we invite to send their names and offerings.

One dollar, annually, constitutes a Member.

Twenty dollars makes a Life-Member.

Five dollars constitutes a Benefactor.

Donations of fifty dollars or more give the rank of Patron.

COSTUMES OF ALL NATIONS.—THIRD SERIES.

THE TOILETTE IN THE ISLES OF GREECE.

CHAPTER III.

THE women in these Islands wear their beautiful long hair plaited in many tresses, and it often grows with such luxuriance that it frequently reaches to the ground; a handkerchief, folded cornerwise, generally covers the head. The gown is made like the vest worn by the men; it is of purple or maroon velvet, richly embroidered with gold, and with a very long waist. A beautiful girdle is worn under the vest, which always floats open; the girdle is fastened with an immense gold or silver ornament at each side, formed in the shape of a shield. The petticoats worn with this robe are of rich blue or pink silk, beautifully embroidered and spangled. In these Islands stays are unknown. The most graceful form of the vest is its fitting quite close to the waist; the female peasants also wear high heels to their shoes, ornamented with silver buckles.

Embroidery appears, from all the ancient authors, to have attained the greatest perfection in these Islands. It was first invented by the Phrygians, and we frequently find it mentioned both in the "Iliad" and the "Odyssey." Not only were the dresses of the ladies beautifully worked by their own delicate fingers, but they also appear to have embroidered pictures or stories. Thus, the lovely Helen, we are told, was occupied in this manner:—

"Meantime to beauteous Helen, from the skies,
The various goddess of the rainbow flies;
(Like fair Lædicië in form and face,
The loveliest nymph of Priam's royal race);
Her in the palace at her loom she found;
The golden web her own sad story crowned,
The Trojan wars she wove (herself the prize),
And the dire triumphs of her fatal eyes."—HOMER.

The warriors, also, of "olden time," wore girdles or belts covered with the richest embroidery:—

"Stiff with the rich embroidered work around,
My varied belt repelled the flying wound."—HOMER.

The women of Scio, who have always been celebrated for their beauty, have a very picturesque dress, which is thus described by Dr. R. Chandler: "They wear short petticoats, reaching only to the knees, with white silk or cotton hose; their head-dress, which is peculiar to the island, is a kind of turban of linen, so fine and white that it seemed like snow. Their slippers are chiefly yellow, with a knot of red fringe at the heel; some wore them fastened with a thong. Their garments were of silk of various colors, and their whole appearance so fantastic and lively, as to afford us much entertainment."

In Cyprus the female dress is very becoming. The head-dress is modeled upon the kind of calathus which is often seen represented upon Phœnician idols and Egyptian statues: it is worn by all classes. Their hair, which they dye with henna till it becomes of a fine brown color, hangs down behind in a great many glossy braids or plaits. Round the face ringlets are arranged in a very graceful manner, and among the "hyacinthine waves" of these shining curls are placed the flowers of the jessamine, which are strung together upon slips cut from the leaves of the palm-tree. This coiffure, which is as simple as it is elegant and beautiful, is much admired by all strangers who visit the island.

In their dresses they are fond of displaying the brightest and most gaudy colors. The upper robe is generally of a rich crimson, scarlet, or green silk, profusely embroidered in gold; their yellow or scarlet trowsers are fastened round the ankles, and they wear yellow boots, or slippers. Their love of ornament is very great, and they adorn the head and neck with gold coins, chains, and various other trinkets. Around the waist also they wear a large and massive belt or zone, clasped in front by large and heavy brass plates; the waist of the robe is made as long as possible. But, though very handsome, the women of this island are naturally rather corpulent; and, as stays are there unknown, they of course have no means, even if they wished it, of diminishing their size.

In Casos the women wear a bodice without sleeves, opening a little towards the top; a robe of the whitest and finest cotton, edged with a purple border four fingers wide, and elegantly embroidered, descends to their feet, and the waist is loosely girded by a sash, which floats gracefully around them.

The women of Cephalonia wear their hair wreathed in broad plaits over a small thin turban, which is fastened in a knot on one side of the head. The gown, which discloses the neck and shoulders, is closed at the breast, and confined at the waist by a shawl; it flows loosely from the girdle, and is open in front. Under it is worn a pair of loose white trowsers. The bpdkz, mentioned in a fragment of Sappho as being worn at Mitylene, are supposed to be fac-similes of these trowsers; they are drawn tight above the ankle, and leave to view the bare feet, on which are worn a pair of low light slippers that just cover the toes and heels.

The dress of the women of the Isle of Ios is simple and graceful. A light underdress gives the outlines of their elegant forms, without incommoding their movements. Their petticoats are short, and ornamented round the bottom and round the front of the bosom; they also wear loose jackets, and a kind of turban, one end of which hangs down upon the left shoulder.

It is the custom in some of the islands for a bride, on the day of her marriage, to wear a veil of red silk. This practice has been transmitted from the ancient Grecians, with whom the flamen, or red veil, was in general use on this occasion.

The women of Argentiera have the singular fancy to admire clumsy legs, and those to whom Nature has denied this perfection make up for it by wearing several pairs of very thick stockings; they also have velvet boots, either embroidered or ornamented with silver buttons. Their petticoat, which is very short, to show their legs, is white, with a red embroidered border; the rest of their dress consists of an enormous mass of linen, which hangs about them without much shape.

Their gala-dress is very picturesque. It consists of a short petticoat with a colored hem; very wide, open upper sleeves, and tight under ones; a velvet bodice, made rather low round the bosom, which is veiled by a full tucker of linen; and a kind of coiffure, between a turban and a hood, covering the head, and allowing but little hair to be seen.

The most curious part of the costume is a very short ornamented apron, which is sewn into the bodice, about half way between the neck and the waist, and quite conceals the symmetry and grace of the latter.

The costume on a jour de fête, or any great occasion, in the Isle of Naxos, is very curious. The head is covered with a turban of fine white muslin, edged with embroidery; a white linen vest is clasped round the throat; over it is an open bodice with a very broad ornamented girdle: the sleeves of this bodice are tight to the wrist, and the petticoat reaches below the knee. But the extraordinary part of this dress is a short upper robe, immensely full, and curiously arranged in close plaits and folds, in such a manner that, from the hips, it suddenly spreads out into two enormous wings or fans, giving the wearer a most grotesque appearance. A short cloak, richly embroidered, and having holes through which the arms are passed, the short apron above mentioned, and shoes with very thick soles and large bows, complete the attire, which is ornamented with colored borders and embroidery in every part.

In Tinos the dress is very simple. It consists of a garment not unlike a chemise, which reaches to the neck and below the knee, and is frequently of white linen. At the height of the knee, from the bottom, is sewn a narrow-colored border. The sleeves of this robe are very wide and loose down to the wrists, and are edged round the bottom with embroidery; the head is enveloped in a kind of veil, which is twisted into the form of a very small turban, but the ends are brought round the face, crossed on the neck, and then allowed to float down the back; the stockings are neat, and the shoes have high heels. Altogether, it is a simple and elegant costume.

In Patmos the robe is confined at the waist by a girdle, from whence falls the narrow embroidered apron; the sleeves are nearly tight down to the wrists, and an open jacket is worn that reaches as low as the hips. The head is ornamented with a simple, but elegant turban of very fine white linen.

In some of the islands, and even in some parts of the continent, unmarried women braid their hair and ornament it with natural flowers; others adorn their heads with the most tasteful and elegant shaped turbans, formed of light-colored muslins.

FLORENCE SEFTON; OR, THE BORDER WARFARE.

BY MISS B. GARTLAND.

CHAPTER I.

"Do not move the boat from under the shadow of these trees," said a tall figure, on a night in August, 1812, as he sprang lightly from a small boat on the waters of the Niagara to its high bank. "My stay will be brief, and this place seems too secluded to be in danger of attracting notice."

"I will keep her in the shade, sir, if you wish," said the person addressed, a man apparently about forty or forty-five years of age, with a cheerful, sun-burned countenance, a clear, piercing gray eye, above the middle height, his frame apparently combining great strength with elasticity. He wore the dress of an American rifleman; a green cotton shirt and trowsers of the same material, trimmed with yellow fringe, the upper garment reaching below the knee, and confined round the waist with a leathern belt, to which was attached a cartouch box. He was fully armed; for, besides his trusty rifle, which lay across the seats in the boat, he had a pair of pistols thrust into his belt. "I will keep her in the shade, if you wish; but, if we only had four or five of our good marksmen with us, I should not fear to be discovered by half a score of Brook's men."

"But you know, Gottlieb," was the reply, "that I do not wish to be engaged in any skirmish to-night so you will do as I desire." And, folding a large military cloak round his person—for, although it was the middle of August, the night, as is often the case in our variable climate, was damp and cool—he pursued his way, keeping the path by the river, and was soon lost to the view of the marksman, who stood with folded arms gazing after him.

"Yes, there he goes," muttered he to himself, "a noble fellow as ever drew a sword for his country, if it was not for his folly in falling in love with that English gal. To be sure, she was born here; but what signifies that, when she is a relation of old Isaac's, and her father and all his kith and kin are rank Englishers! All but her brother. I had most forgot him. They say he is a fine lad; and, in spite of his father, has joined the army under Van; but if he does no better than old Hull, the poor boy might as well have stayed at home, for all the credit he'll gain under such a general. By Jabsers, it was too bad to keep us a whole month in Canada doing nothing, when we might have marched down to Malden, beaten the Britishers, and had the whole province by this time, instead of being led back to

* General Van Rensselaer, stationed at Lewistown.

Detroit like so many April fools. But, howsom-ever, if, as he says, he only wants to take Brock and his men at one stroke, when they follow us to De-troit, and let them see then what our brave boys can do, why mayhap it may all end well."

Then, after musing for a time, he added—

"As for the gal, it's more her misfortin than her fault that she has such relations. To be sure, she is a pretty crittur, and if Captin Howell will take to her, why there's no help for it as I knows on. Well, well." And, putting a large piece of tobacco in his mouth, which effectually stopped his soliloquy, he seated himself in the boat and continued to ruminate on the folly of young men falling in love with gals, particularly if they had English relatives.

Gotlieb Pretz was a confirmed old bachelor. He had been jilted in his youth by a girl to whom he was much attached, and, though the native goodness of his heart kept him from railing at all her sex—as so many under like circumstances have done—yet he never again thought of marrying. His family, though humble, had suffered much during the Revolutionary War from the British. They had subsequently removed from New York, where he was born, to Kentucky, and where, by listening to his father's and grandfather's tales of English cruelty and oppression, he had imbibed almost an hatred to the name of an Englishman. On the declaration of war with Great Britain, he had joined Hull's ill-fated army as a rifleman. The early part of his life had been passed in seclusion, and, being much alone, he had acquired a habit of talking to himself, which, after he had entered the army, frequently caused much amusement to his companions, who were not slow in discovering it.

We will now leave Gotlieb to his meditations, and, in the mean while, introduce the "Captin" to our readers. Howell Meredith was the only son of a wealthy merchant of New York, who had taken the greatest care that his son should receive a good education; an education not only of the mind, but heart. Yes, an education of the heart; for it is assuredly true that, although the mind be adorned with all the lore and accomplishments of the present and past ages, yet, if the heart be void of truth, honor, virtue, and charity for our fellow-creatures, if there be no moral or religious principle to guide us in the path of duty, even though that path be beset with difficulties and hardships, no restraining voice to bid us pause in the pursuit of pleasure and list to the hiss of the serpent hidden 'mid the flowers—alas! such a mind but resembles the apple of So-dom, beautiful to the eye, but filled with ashes and bitterness. Such was not the case with Howell Meredith. He had grown to manhood all that his fond parents could wish; he had finished his collegiate course in Germany, at the University of Gottingen; and had afterwards made a two years' tour on the Continent, accompanied by his tutor, Mr. Harvey. Mr. Meredith, notwithstanding his immense wealth, thought it necessary his son should have a profession; and Howell was pursuing the study of the law in New York at the time of the rupture between America and England, which, how-ever, with his father's consent, he then relinquished, and repaired to the camp of General Hull, who was preparing to enter Canada.

Mr. Meredith had, some years previously, purchased a place on the Niagara, situated in a roman-tic and beautiful valley, about a mile above Lewistown. Here he built a princely mansion, and em-bellished it with works of art and all the elegancies and luxuries which wealth can procure, and here he had resided, in happiness and content, with his much-loved and still lovely wife. Colonel Sefton, his nearest neighbor, lived about half a mile above, on a hill commanding a magnificent view for miles. Lewistown and Queenstown appeared to lie at the foot of it. The Cataract of Niagara, a few miles dis-tant, rushing and leaping over its high rocky bed into the fearful abyss below, like a sea of molten silver, and the many bright rainbows blending their gorgeous colors in the mist, with the noble Lakes in their calm repose, the vast extent of forest land and fruitful valleys, and the blue hills of Canada in the distance, all, all combined to make the scene from "Sefton Hill"—as it was called—on a bright morn-ing, almost one of enchantment. It was here that Howell Meredith spent many happy hours with Henry Sefton and his sister Florence, on his visits home during his college vacations.

Colonel Sefton was born in England; his parents had emigrated to America while he was yet a boy; and he had many of the prejudices of an English-man, which were derived chiefly from his mother, who was a niece of General Sir Isaac Brock, who had just joined the British forces at Malden, at the time our story commences. The reader may sup-pose, from the title of colonel, that Gerald Sefton was in the army; but such was ~~not~~ the case. A long time before war had been declared, when he was still young, a number of the neighboring gen-tlemen about his own age had united to raise a regi-ment of cavalry in Lewistown and its environs, and had chosen him for the colonel. At first, the young men were delighted to show themselves in their military costume, on parade days and in sham fights, to the fair ladies of the place; but they soon began to tire of the play, so one by one the volun-teers dropped off, until, at last, the regiment was "out of service." But Sefton still retained the title of Colonel by courtesy. He had married an amiable and accomplished American lady, and Henry and Florence were their only children. Howell was two years older than Henry, whom he looked upon as a younger brother. As for Florence, she was the household pet, a lovely, prattling child of six sum-mers when the Merediths came to the valley—to which they had given the name of Arcadia. Howell, a fine manly boy of ten, loved, when he and Henry went fishing, to take the little Florence with them, and see her open wide those deep blue eyes with wonder, not unmixed with fear, when she saw the poor fish dangling from the hook.

And when Mrs. Sefton brought her, as she often did, to the valley, on a visit to his mother—for the two families were on terms of the closest intimacy—he delighted to place her before him on his Shetland pony, and so ride up and down the avenue with her.

But time passed on, and Howell, during his visits to Sefton Hill, which were almost daily during the vacation time, frequently found himself disappointed in his plans of walking, boating, and fishing, by being told that "Miss Florence was with her governess, engaged at her studies." And, although Henry, who was his classmate in college, and his almost inseparable companion when out of it, was always ready to accompany him, he would generally say on such occasions, "Let us put off our excursion until Florence is at liberty, Henry; she will be disappointed if we go without her; besides, it will be so dull." And Henry, who dearly loved his sister, seldom demurred.

Sometimes, when her pupil had been particularly diligent, Miss Manvers would accompany them, if the evening was fine, a few miles down the Niagara, in a small yacht belonging to Howell; and, while he and Henry rowed with ease their light vessel, she would amuse them with Indian legends concerning the caves or the whirlpool in the river between Lewistown and the Falls; or, joining her rich, full voice with the sweet, girlish one of Florence, accompanied by her guitar and the deeper tones of Howell and Henry, "make the shores vocal with melody;" and then they would return delighted with all around them, with themselves, and with each other.

It was Howell's last year at college; he had taken leave of his companions for the last time, and had come home with Henry, who was to return for another year, to prepare for a voyage to Gottingen. Mr. Meredith preferred that University to an English one, as he wished his son, who was already something of a German scholar, to acquire a thorough knowledge of the language, and to become acquainted with the works of the mighty master minds of Germany. Florence, too, who had now attained her fifteenth year, was, for the first time in her life, to leave her happy home. Colonel Sefton thought it necessary that she should finish her education at a fashionable boarding-school in the metropolis, and the two families were making arrangements to go in company to New York—a journey that, in those days, was considered something of an undertaking, when there was no locomotive, as now, to pant and puff, and fly along with you at the rate of twelve or fifteen miles an hour, and the Hudson Canal had scarcely been thought of.

CHAPTER II.

A WEEK or two previous to that decided on for their departure, on a fine, bright morning in August, Miss Manvers, Florence, Mary Aylmer—an orphan niece of Mrs. Sefton's, who, on the death of her sister, a few months before, had taken charge of her child—Howell, and Henry, attended by Thornton, a colored servant, crossed the Niagara a short distance below Lewistown; and, after walking about half a mile, they entered a wood, and in a short time reached a romantic glen, through which ran and sparkled a small stream of water, on each side of which rose large moss-covered rocks, which approached nearer to each other as the stream narrowed, until a narrow passage was formed, in which two persons could hardly go abreast, and then it opened on a smiling valley. In this sweet spot they intended to spend the day. It was a family picnic, and Thornton bore on his shoulders a large basket filled with cold fowl, ham, pastry, fruit, wine, &c. Mr. and Mrs. Meredith, Colonel and Mrs. Sefton were to follow before dinner.

The preceding day, the gentlemen—that is, the two younger ones, assisted by Thornton—had formed a temporary arbor, where they were to dine and rest when tired of rambling. It was strictly a family party; for, although those who formed it had many friends both in Queenstown and Lewistown—for, as yet, the inhabitants of the border were still on a friendly footing—yet they knew many long months must pass before they could again meet in that sweet spot, and they wished not for the presence of any less dear friends to cause restraint.

Thornton deposited his load, Howell placed the cushions he had brought up from his yacht on the rustic seats put up for the occasion, Henry found a snug place for the flute, guitar, and flageolet which he carried, the ladies hung their small work-baskets on the branches above them, and then sat down to rest for a few minutes, and to consider what their next proceeding should be. Henry proposed fishing; their fishing-rods were in order, and the stream, though small, was full of fine fish. So off they went in fine spirits to the creek—all but Miss Manvers, who preferred remaining to finish an interesting work she had been reading; and Thornton, who, when he had procured a sufficient quantity of bait for the young people, began to work, or rather to resume his work, on a table-mat he was making of the bark of a tree, and adorning it with the most brilliant flowers made of stained quills. He had learned the art, from the Iroquois Indians, who had a village a few miles from Mr. Meredith's, and often brought fish, fowl, and game, with moccasins, mats, &c., to Lewistown and Queenstown to dispose of, and, in their way, never forgot to stop at Sefton Hill and Arcadia, and at both places they were treated kindly, and many purchases made from them. Thornton had become intimate with many of them, and he occasionally, when he had an opportunity, went to their village, where he had learned many of their little arts. Being very fond of his mistress, whom he had accompanied, on her marriage with Mr. Meredith, from Virginia—for he was born on her father's estate—he took great pleasure, when he had leisure, in making many tasty little articles for her, and he was now engaged in making her a set of table-mats. While Thornton was busy at his work, humming, in the mean while, an old Virginia air, he perceived a man descending the hill on the west side of the valley, and coming towards them. He was rather below the middle height, and, as he approached nearer, you could perceive that his complexion was dark, his eyes and hair black; he was not stout, but still his frame looked as if he could endure much hardship. He wore a gray linen coat and trowsers, and a Manilla straw hat. Coming nearer, he accosted Thornton with—

"Is 'Colonel Sefton here?"

"No, sar; he hab not yet come ober. Young Massa Henry and Massa Howell is here; and de young ladies is here: down dar, near de creek, a fishin'."

The man turned, and, seeing Miss Manvers, bowed and said—

"I was asking the servant, madam, if Colonel Sefton was here?"

"He is not," she replied.

"But you expect him, madam?"

"We do, every moment."

"Then I may be so fortunate as to meet him," he said, and, again bowing, he continued on the way to Queenstown.

"It is very wrong," thought Helen Manvers to herself, "in me to feel such an aversion for that man. I may wrong him; and, were it not for his cringing, fawning manner to those above him, and his almost laughable assumption of dignity to those he deems his inferiors, and that sinister, snakelike eye of his, I should think I did." And she resumed her book.

"Ya! ha! ha!" was heard, in rather a sotto voice, from Thornton.

Miss Manvers looked up.

"I was only a tinkin', Miss Helen," said he, in answer to her look—"I was only tinkin' dat Massa Lazy O'Lear tink hisseff a great gemman, cause he talk so much wid Col'n Seftin."

"Why should you think so, Thornton?" she replied.

"O, cause he so little, Miss Helen; and he puff hisseff up so big, just like a bullfrog, when he ask for de colonel. But here come massa and missus, and Missus Seftin. I s'pose Massa Lazy cotech up to de colonel in de glen."

Thornton was right. Lazy O'Lear had met the rest of the party as they were entering the glen, and, after many apologies for the liberty, &c., had begged a few minutes' private conversation with the colonel, who acceded to his request; and, having given Mrs. Sefton in charge of Mr. Meredith, remained behind to hear what he had to communicate.

"What, Miss Manvers!" said Mr. Meredith, as he approached with the ladies, and as Helen came forward to meet them, "not a book, I hope?" glancing at the one she held in her hand. "Why are you not fishing with the rest, who appear to be enjoying themselves very much? Were I Newton, I should become jealous of those books of yours, and lay a stricter embargo on them than Mr. Jefferson ever did on our vessels."

Helen smiled and blushed, and Mrs. Sefton replied—

"Helen loves books better than fishing; and Newton above all authors, I believe."

"Well, that is right," said he, laughing heartily at the jeu de mot. "Now I will walk down and see how many fish the youngsters have taken, and, when I return, you will all be sufficiently rested to take a stroll round this charming place." And, stopping a few minutes to admire Thornton's pretty mats, he proceeded to the creek.

"It is, indeed, a charming place!" said Mrs. Meredith, surveying the lovely landscape before them; "and I hope we may have the happiness of again meeting in it without the absence of one of the loved ones who make our party now."

"I know you laugh at presentiments," observed Mrs. Sefton; "but it appears to me as if I should never again see this place; or, if I ever should, it will be at a distant period."

"You are nervous and low-spirited this morning, Isabel, dear," replied her friend. "But here come Florence and Mary bounding along, and the boys with their fish. They will soon chase away your blues."

"Dear mamma, only think, Howell has caught three dozen of fish and Henry only seventeen!" cried Florence.

"Yes; but, Florence, you forget how much better Howell's fishing-tackle was; besides, Henry did not fish all the time," said Mary Aylmer.

Mrs. Sefton smiled and said—

"And how many have you and Florence taken?"

"Mary does not like fishing, mamma, so she and Henry went to gather flowers, and I had to help Howell to fix his line."

The mothers exchanged a meaning glance; when Mrs. Meredith, observing the color deepen in poor Florence's cheek, said, gayly—

"Well, here comes Colonel Sefton, the boys, and Mr. Meredith. He has joined them, I see; so now for our exploring expedition, girls. That wood yonder looks cool and inviting, and, if it be not enchanted, I should like to penetrate a little into its recesses."

"Oh!" exclaimed Florence, "if it only were enchanted!—if it only were, that would be so delightful! Do you remember, dear Miss Manvers, the enchanted wood in 'Tasso's Jerusalem,' through which poor Rinaldo had to fight his way? How I wish the wood yonder was like it!"

"How can you wish anything so horrible, Florence?" said Mary Aylmer.

"We intend invading that wood, colonel," observed Mrs. Meredith, as the gentlemen came near, "in spite of wood-nymphs or satyrs."

"Bravely resolved on," he replied. "But I fear we will lead far more dangerous nymphs into it than any we will find there."

"Nous verrons," said she.

And Howell, having given the fish to Thornton's care, who was to remain to have dinner ready on their return—that is, to spread the white table-cloth on the temporary table, which had been put up for the occasion, and to empty and arrange the contents of the large basket on it—they were soon on their way to the wood.

"Come, Nestor," said Howell, as he was going, to a large Newfoundland dog, who had stayed quietly by Thornton all the morning; "come, sir, you shall go with us and catch some squirrels." And Nestor, wagging his tail, ran after his young master.

The entrance to the wood was clear from brush or underwood; but, after they had advanced some way, a thick growth of it rendered it difficult to proceed. They had gone but a short distance, when the report of firearms alarmed the ladies. The colonel and Mr. Meredith shouted loudly, observing, "There was no cause for fear, as it was only some hunter after game." Howell said, "The report sounded more like that of a pistol than a rifle." But whichever it was, it was not repeated.

The elders of the party, with Miss Manvers, seated themselves under the spreading branches of a large oak, while the younger ones rambled through the wood, picking berries; and, while they are doing so, permit me, gentle reader, to give a short history of Helen Manvers.

She was the daughter of an eminent artist of New York, who had endorsed to a large amount for a friend who failed, and Manvers was ruined. A small annuity of a few hundred dollars, settled by a relation on his wife, was all that was left to them. At the time, his health was declining, and grief and disappointment soon hurried him to the grave. His wife, an amiable, but delicate woman, did not long survive his loss, and Helen, at the age of seventeen, was left an orphan, without money, and, as a matter of course, without friends. They were many, it is true, who affected to pity her, and to deplore the extravagance and want of prudence, as they termed it, in her parents; and those were persons who had always been treated with the greatest hospitality and kindness by her family. Mrs. Meredith and Helen's mother had been dear friends and schoolmates when girls, and that lady no sooner heard of her situation than she immediately wrote to her to come and make her house her home. Mr. Meredith himself came on to New York to bring her. She was talented and very lovely; her father had spared neither pains nor money in her education. After her arrival at the valley, she had become much attached to Florence Sefton, then in her eighth year; and, hearing Mrs. Sefton say they were trying to procure a governess for her, proposed to take the charge on herself, which was gladly accepted. Mrs. Meredith was very loth to have her adopted daughter thus taken from her, and, were it not that the two families were in daily communication, she would scarcely have consented to the arrangement. Helen had now entered her twenty-third year. She had been six years at Sefton Hill, during which time a young merchant of New York, Mr. Newton Leslie, paid several visits to Mr. Meredith, who had been a partner in business with his father, and had seen Miss Manvers and closely studied her character, and had become devotedly attached to her. As both families intended to remain during the winter in New York, they had houses taken in the same street, within a few doors of each other; and Helen, who was to accompany them, was to be married from the house of Mr. Meredith, as soon as convenient after their arrival. Mr. Leslie was expected daily, to conduct his future bride to New York in company with her friends, to whom, after this digression, we will now return.

"Mary! Florence! Howell!" cried Henry from a close thicket, in which he was almost concealed. "Come, do come, and see what myriads of fine, large blackberries are here!"

Howell approached, with Florence and Mary on each arm, and a small basket, which he held in his hand, nearly filled with berries, while Nestor kept bounding and frisking round them.

"They are, indeed, very fine, brother!" said Florence, as he held up a branch laden with the rich, ripe fruit. "But we are too tired to gather more; and hark!" said she, listening; "I hear papa's voice calling us. It is time that we join them."

At this moment, Nestor, who had strayed further up into the thicket, came leaping and barking furiously towards them.

"Down, Nestor! down, sir!" said Howell.

But, instead of minding his master, he again ran to the thicket, and, in a few moments, returned again, barking violently; but, as he came near, he put his head to the ground and commenced a low whining, looking up piteously into Howell's face, and then returned again to the thicket.

"He has seen some animal in the bushes," said Howell. "I will place you in safety, dear girls, and then return to see what it is."

"There is no occasion for that," said Florence. "Only call the dog back, and let us join papa. Nestor! Nestor!" she cried; but Nestor did not come.

"It is, perhaps, only a fox," Howell remarked.

"I do not think a bear would venture so near the town."

And, hurrying the young ladies forward to the rest of the company, he called Henry to follow; but Henry, who was arming himself with a good stout club of hickory, was like Nestor; he did not choose to follow, notwithstanding Florence kept calling on him to do so.

"He will be in no danger," said Howell, seeing how faint and pale Mary Aymer looked; "the dog will keep the animal at bay until we can assist him."

On hearing Howell's account, Colonel Sefton broke a large branch from the tree above him, saying—

"I will leave you to guard the ladies, Mr. Meredith; and, with Howell and Henry to help me, to say nothing of Nestor, we shall soon dislodge the enemy."

"Do be careful, Gerald," said Mrs. Sefton.

"Do not fear, my love," he replied; and then added, laughingly, "We will soon return, ~~for~~ Mr ladies, like valiant knights, to lay our trophies at your feet." He then followed Howell at a quick pace towards the thicket.

"In the mean time," said Mr. Meredith, "let me, too, find a sturdy piece of oak, to give the enemy a salute, should he be driven this way." And he began stripping the leaves from a large stick he had broken off.

It was needless, however; for, a few moments after, they saw Henry running down to the valley, where they had intended to dine, and presently Howell appeared, beckoning them to approach; and, as they met, he said—

"Do not be alarmed; it is an Indian that has been badly wounded. Poor fellow! I fear he cannot live."

"A wounded Indian!" they exclaimed, hastening as fast as they could to the spot.

They found Colonel Sefton supporting the man, and trying to stop the effusion of blood, which came from a wound in the shoulder, with his handkerchief.

"He has fainted from loss of blood," said Mrs. Meredith. "His heart still beats," she continued, laying her hand on his side. "Help me to make some lint, ladies." And she tore her handkerchief into shreds.

The lint was soon made, which Mr. Meredith, as he understood something of surgery, applied, and then bound up the wound.

"He is a Knisteneaux," said Colonel Sefton. "I know the features of the tribe; and, though a fine, noble-looking fellow, I do not think him to be a chief."

"His age would hardly permit that," replied Mr. Meredith. "He is probably one of their young braves; his moccasins are prettily worked, and his blanket fine."

Henry, at this moment, came running along with a bottle of wine he had gone for, and Thornton followed. The news of the "wounded Indian" did not prevent the latter from staying a few minutes to cover up and place in safety the good things he had spread for the party. A little of the wine was forced into the Indian's mouth, which he seemed to swallow with much difficulty; some more, and he began to revive. Colonel Sefton now administered a larger quantity, while the ladies applied their smelling salts. In a few moments he opened his eyes, gazing wildly around; but he soon again relapsed into a sort of stupor, from which no exertions they could make had the effect of arousing him.

"He is the same Indian," said Howell, after gazing for some time earnestly on him, "that I saw yesterday at the Queenstown Ferry, in a canoe nearly filled with buffalo, otter, and deer skins, when a little boy, about seven or eight years old, pressing too far forward to see the baskets, moccasins, &c., which were likewise in the canoe, lost his footing and fell into the water. His head striking the edge of the boat as he fell, he did not rise. The Indian, throwing off his blanket, sprang into the stream after him. After remaining under water for some time, he came up, but without the child. He again went down, and so long did he remain that we began to fear both were lost; but, after some moments more of suspense, he appeared with the child in his arms, from whose head a stream of blood was oozing. The mother of the boy, hearing of the accident, was standing on the wharf weeping bitterly, when the Indian rose the second time; and, though many pressed forward to relieve him from his burden—for he appeared exhausted—he retained it until he reached the mother, when, putting the child in her arms, he said, 'White squaw, no weep; her papoose is safe!'"

"A noble act!" they exclaimed.

"Who, after hearing that," said Florence, "would say that the Indian character is void of fine feeling?"

"Many of them possess it in a high degree, my dear," replied her father. "But what are we to do with the poor fellow? The best plan I can think of is to send Thornton down to Queenstown for a handbarrow and some stout men, and have him conveyed to the poor-house. He will receive surgical assistance there, and be well attended to, I think."

"I do not know that," said Mr. Meredith, after musing for a while; and, looking at Howell, he observed, "He is about your age, my son, I should suppose, and I think that, if he could be taken to the valley, he might be done better for than at the poor-house."

"Yes, so I think, too, massa," said Thornton, who had stood silently by surveying the Indian with looks of pity—"yes, so I think, too; poor-house had place for sick Ingin."

"Well, then, Howell will take Thornton with him to Queenstown, and engage men and a settee, or handbarrow, and he can be easily taken over in a boat from the ferry to Arcadia, where Dr. Baldwin's skill will soon extract the shot, if possible. Does the plan meet your approbation, my dear?" turning to Mrs. Meredith.

"Certainly," she replied. "Nothing can be better: so hasten, Howell—there is no time to lose."

And Howell and Henry, taking Thornton with them, were soon out of sight.

"It is singular," said Helen, "that there appears no sign of a scuffle; and he must have received the shot when his back was to his foe."

"It is probable—indeed, almost certain—that treachery was resorted to," said Colonel Sefton. "The Indian is too quick of eye and ear to be easily stolen upon unawares. He may have been intoxicated; but this stupor appears to me to be the effect of some drug, rather than liquor. Do you not think so, my friend?"

"I do," replied Mr. Meredith. "There is some mystery in the case, I have no doubt. The wound was inflicted by a white man, it is evident; no savage foe would have left his enemy's scalp."

The ladies, in the mean while, kept bathing the poor Indian's brow and temples with cool water, occasionally giving him a little wine to keep up his strength. In a shorter time than could have been expected, Howell appeared with Henry, followed by Thornton with four men and a large handbarrow, on which there were a pillow and blanket. The Indian was soon placed comfortably on it, and the men carried it towards the ferry. Mrs. Meredith gave many charges to Thornton as to his accommodation, desiring him "to go immediately for Dr. Baldwin, and to have Milly—her trusty old nurse—in attendance, and to return to them when he had done so, and had heard what the doctor said of the case."

Our party now returned to the valley, conversing, as they went along, on the customs and manners of the Indians, and conjecturing the probable cause of this poor fellow's misfortune. When they had reached their shady retreat, the ladies set about rearranging the good things which Thornton had covered up, and which they were all soon discussing with a good appetite, which the adventures and exercise of the morning had sharpened. The Indians were still the principal theme of their conversation.

"The Knisteneaux," said Colonel Sefton, "are the most intelligent and gentle of the Indian tribes. I have known some of them to be almost as good improvisors as the Italians. By the by, Howell," he continued, "you have a touch of that gift, I believe; so pray favor us with a little of it."

"It is, indeed, but a touch of it that I possess, colonel," he replied; "so I beg you will excuse me."

But the colonel would not excuse him; and, the rest of the company joining their entreaties, he rose, and, taking down his flute from where Henry had placed it, observed, laughing, "Remember that what I inflict on you is at your own request," and commenced a plaintive prelude to a simple air, in which Henry joined with the flageolet, and sung the following words:—

"Tis sad to part from those we love—

"Tis sad to say adieu—

"Tis sad to leave those scenes so dear,
When life was fresh and new!

"Tis sad to dream on Ocean's bed,

Rocked by the waves to sleep—

That loving eyes upon us smile,
Then wake the cheat to weep!

"Tis sweet when, from far distant lands,

We reach our much-loved home,

To meet the dear, the household band,
No more from them to roam.

"Tis sweet when love and friendship give

A welcome warm and true!

Let such be mine when I return
From distant lands to you!"

If, at the conclusion of the last stanza, Howell's eye rested for a few moments on Florence, and if Florence blushed, and stooped to look for something she had not dropped, as no one chose to observe it, neither will we; but, as Mrs. Meredith's eyes filled with tears, which Colonel Sefton did observe, and that the spirits of the party were saddened, he cried—

"Bravo, Howell! You must show the Italians, when you visit that country, a little of your talent, lest they should fancy they alone possess it."

"By attempting to do so, I should only confirm them in that opinion," he replied.

"When Howell is in Italy," said Mr. Meredith, "I hope his attention will be taken up with acquiring more valuable knowledge than that of improvising."

"Is it not a blessing, my dear sir," said the colonel, "that he can go to Italy, or that he can go to Gottingen at all, and that the wisacres of the land have had at last the good sense to see the necessity of repealing the embargo law?"

"The passing of that law was a very necessary measure," replied Mr. Meredith; "and I sincerely hope the repealing of it will lead to an adjustment of difficulties between England and America. The searching of our vessels and impressment of our seamen were outrages that called for much severer measures."

"England," replied the colonel, with warmth, "does but maintain her own dignity in asserting her right to take her subjects from under any flag that waves on the wide ocean."

"No politics, gentlemen, no politics!" said Mrs. Sefton. "You certainly must have forgotten that we were present, or you could not have been so un-gallant. We came here for amusement, and not to hear a discussion on the affairs of the nation; and, to punish you for your offence, Helen and Florence shall sing an Italian duet, of which you do not understand a single word."

"We are much obliged to you," said Mr. Meredith, bowing, "for so delicious a punishment. It is enough to tempt us to renew the offence."

"Do not think of it," replied she, "or it will call for much severer measures," quoting his words.

They all laughed but the colonel, who looked moody, and

"Still the angry spot did glow on Cæsar's brow."

But it could not long retain its place, listening to those sweet voices, accompanied by the flute, guitar, and flageolet, which formed the "grand band" of our young amateurs. They afterwards sang one or two English songs, in which even the colonel joined.

Thornton now made his appearance. He brought a good account of the poor Indian. Dr. Baldwin had extracted several shot from the wound, which he did not think would prove mortal. The stupor, he said, was the effect of some strong opiate which had been given him. They had, according to Mrs. Meredith's directions, placed a cot in the barn, covered with a buffalo skin, and a pillow of cut straw to rest his head on, as she well knew from his nature that, so situated, he would be much easier than if he were shut up in a palace on a bed of down.

They now made preparations for returning home, and were soon all safely on board the yacht, bound for the valley. The Seftons were to sup there, and then return home by moonlight; and, as Mrs. Meredith perceived still a restraint of manner, or coolness, between her husband and Colonel Sefton, she tried, by her lively sallies of wit and good humor, to restore harmony, and was quite successful for the time. Both Mrs. Sefton and Mrs. Meredith much feared that the friendship which united their families would be interrupted, if not destroyed, by their husbands' political differences.

Mr. Meredith was a true, warm-hearted American. "Our country, right or wrong," was his motto; and Howell inherited his enthusiasm. Henry, too, was ardent in his love for his country, and indignant at the many insults now offered her by her proud rival. The ladies shared the same sentiments. Indeed, the members of both families were all devoted Americans but the colonel. He, as we have said before, was born in England, and came with his parents, when a boy, to America. His father was a warm admirer of our country and its laws, and had become a naturalized citizen of the United States. Gerald, when he had reached his majority, was also naturalized. It is most likely he might not, even to have pleased his father, have been in any haste to take his oath of allegiance to the United States, had he not at that time been much captivated with the lovely and accomplished Isabel Danvers, the elder of the two daughters of a staunch republican—one who set little value on rank or title, unless they were accompanied by qualities of head and heart intrinsically valuable. Captain Danvers had fought as an officer under General Washington, and was on terms of intimacy with that great man, to whom, also, the father of Gerald was much attached. Mr. Sefton had arrived in this country shortly after the conclusion of the Revolutionary War, and was never so proud, or happy, as when visited at Sefton Hill by the general. Gerald's mother, however, partook not of his sentiments. She, it is true, received her distinguished guest with a ladylike and apparently a cordial welcome, but her heart went not with it; she could not like, though compelled to admire, the man, who had been the instrument in humbling her proud country. Her own family was noble, and she looked upon anything republican with contempt. These opinions were, unfortunately, imbibed by Gerald; and, though his mother died, from the effects of an illness she had been long suffering under, before he had reached his nineteenth year, the impression was made that high birth, rank, and wealth were the most invaluable of all blessings, and that Great Britain ought to be, if she was not, the mistress of the world.

But Gerald well knew it would not advance his interest with the fair Isabel, were her father to know the political creed of his daughter's suitor, so he wisely kept aloof from politics; and Captain Danvers, having no suspicion that the son of so democratic an Englishman as the elder Sefton could be anything else than a republican in principle, gave his consent to the marriage, and Isabel became Mrs. Gerald Sefton. Shortly after, Captain Danvers died, leaving his large fortune to be equally divided between his two daughters, Mrs. Sefton and Mrs. Aylmer; and the father of Gerald did not long survive him, being carried off by an epidemic shortly after the birth of Henry, who was born in New York, where his parents were on a visit at the time. They had now been married for eighteen years, and lived very happily; for the colonel was a devoted husband and a kind father; but we cannot add a good citizen. After the removal of the Merediths from New York to Arcadia, Mrs. Sefton and Mrs. Meredith had become much attached to each other, and both deplored the anti-American opinions of the colonel, who took part with Great Britain in all her aggressions against the United States, and both ladies endeavored, as much as possible, to prevent any political discussions between their husbands; but this they could not always accomplish.

On the night of the picnic, at the conclusion of supper, Colonel Sefton spoke of the government having substituted the "non-intercourse law" for the "embargo" in a satirical manner, and insinua-sted, as if he were feeling his way before he could venture to speak plainly, that perhaps the time might come when the Northern States would form a political union with Great Britain.

"Take care, sir," said Mr. Meredith, "that you do not speak treason. You stand on slippery ground, colonel."

Sefton laughed, and replied, "It was only a conjecture as to what might, at some future time, take place."

"Never! never, sir!" said Mr. Meredith; but an imploring glance from the eye of his wife caused him to say no more. He filled his glass, and proposed, "The memory of Washington." This was drank; but even a casual observer might have seen that Gerald Sefton was acting a part.

It was long past midnight, on that same night, that a light was burning in the library at Sefton Hill; and, a short time before dawn, that the muffled forms of two men might have been seen issuing from a small door that opened on the lawn, and, by a private staircase, led to that apartment. As they descended the winding avenue, the shorter of the two said—

"Well, Captain Henry, I think we've done a good night's work," laying an emphasis on the word we.

The taller of the two answered, "You shall be rewarded, sir," and strode on, as if he cared not how little communication he held with his companion.

But the little man was not to be so easily baffled, and he managed, between a half run and a long stride at intervals, to keep up with the laconic captain.

"I think," he said, "our friend, Sir James Craig, will be much pleased with all the letters he gave you to these rich merchants in New England; and, if he did fail in winning over old Meredith, why it's no great loss. We can do without him."

"I was not aware, Mr. Lazy O'Lear," said the person he addressed, "that Sir James Craig was a friend of yours. As to those letters which Colonel Sefton has trusted me with, the least you say of them the better. And, as I before observed, your services shall not go unrewarded."

The little man fell back, saying, "Oh, I only thought"—but, as his companion did not wait to hear what he thought, but continued rapidly to descend the hill, poor Lazy did not express what the thought was, but muttered something about "pride and arrogance."

They soon reached the boat which they had left a little above the town. The captain seated himself, and, Lazy O'Lear taking the oars, they were soon on the Canada shore.

Nothing occurred to prevent the departure of the Sefton and Meredith families for New York. Mr. Leslie had arrived. Minesto, the wounded Indian, was fast recovering from the effect of his wound, under the skillful treatment of Dr. Baldwin and Milly's good nursing. He could give no account of how he had been wounded, or by whom. It appeared he had disposed of his skins, baskets, &c., and had afterwards gone to the sign of King George, where he had some brandy. Many persons were drinking there at the time, many of whom spoke to him, and some offered him drink, which he had accepted. Feeling the liquor was beginning to intoxicate, he strolled up to the wood, where the party found him. He did not wish to be seen tipsy in the streets of Queenstown, and had lain down to sleep the effects of the liquor off. This was all the account he could give of the affair, except that he had been robbed of his money, which he had in a deer-skin pouch his sister had worked for him. He was intelligent, and appeared deeply grateful to all his new friends, particularly to the "great medicine"—Dr. Baldwin—and his "white father," as he called Mr. Meredith.

That gentleman had engaged Gottlieb Pretz, whom we have already introduced to the reader, to overlook the plantation, with two or three men, during his absence. They occupied a snug building about a quarter of a mile in the rear of the mansion. Thornton and his wife were likewise to remain, and to take charge of the Indian until he was perfectly recovered.

CHAPTER III.

We will now pass over a lapse of nearly four years. Four years! what an amount of joy and woe, of deep, bitter, heartfelt anguish, and of almost delirious joy, may be felt in that short space of time! How many of those we loved and cherished in our heart's core may not have passed to "that bourne from whence no traveler returns!" And, alas! how many may not have become estranged or changed by the cold, calculating spirit of the world! Those four years had not passed to the Merediths and Seftons without many changes.

Florence, now an extremely beautiful girl of nineteen, had, with her friend and cousin, Mary Aylmer, spent the most part of two years at Mrs. De Lisle's excellent school. The cousins vied with each other in acquiring useful knowledge and many graceful accomplishments, though cherishing and loving each other as sisters. No two persons could be more dissimilar in person and character than Florence Sefton and Mary Aylmer. Florence, in person, was tall, full, and rounded, her figure approaching to embonpoint; her eyes of deep, very deep blue; her complexion fair as "unsunned snow," tinged with a beautiful tint of the rose; her finely-arched brows, in which lay a world of expression, were some shades darker than her hair, which was a very light brown; her nose something of the aquiline; and her small mouth, when the red, full lips were parted, disclosed two rows of the whites pearl. In disposition, she was affectionate and open; too noble and generous herself to be suspicious, she still possessed an almost intuitive knowledge of character that was uncommon in one so youthful, and, under the instructions of Miss Manvers and those of her gentle mother, had acquired a good share of self-possession and firmness of character. Miss Aylmer was her opposite in many respects. She was timid and sensitive as the plant that shrinks from the touch, and, though her heart was filled with deep, warm affection for her friends, yet still many thought her manner too reserved, and approaching too much to coolness; but those that knew her intimately thought not so. A more tender, gentle, loving heart than that of Mary beat not in the breast of woman. Her mother, on the death of her father, which took place when she was but five years old, had retired to their seat in the country, excluding herself from all society, except that of a few cherished friends. Mrs. Aylmer could not bear the thought of parting with her only child by sending her to school. A governess was procured, who was worthy of the trust reposed in her, and who tried and succeeded in implanting virtues, as well as accomplishments, in the mind of her pupil; but the retirement in which her childhood had been passed, and the subsequent death of her mother, tinged her manner with a sort of sadness and reserve. She was about the middle height, with dark hazel eyes; her complexion, though very fair, had no tinge of color when in repose, but, on the least emotion, the eloquent blood would rush up and bathe the fair neck and brow with a flood of crimson; her hair, when disheveled, would fall in thick, rich wavy masses nearly to her feet; and her features were of the Madonna cast of character, the pure, white, lofty brow, the soft hazel eye, with its deep fringes resting on the fair cheek, as if it would hide beneath them the expression of love and purity which dwelt there, the rose-bud mouth and rounded chin, with the light, graceful, springy figure, all combined to form a picture of loveliness rarely excelled.

Florence was one year older than Mary. They had both "come out," as it is called, the second winter of their stay in New York, when Florence had attained her eighteenth and her cousin her seventeenth year. Both young, lovely, and wealthy, they had created quite a sensation among the haut ton. It was the year preceding the declaration of war, and several British officers of high rank were spending the winter in the American metropolis; among others, Sir Edgar Lee, a distant relative of Colonel Sefton, who was much pleased with the marked attention he paid Florence. He was about twenty-eight years old, possessed of rather a handsome countenance, with a splendid figure, an insinuating address, and the unmistakable manner of man of bon ton; but, what was of far greater importance in the estimation of the colonel, he could trace his ancestors as far back as the Conquest, and was, in prospective, heir to an earldom. To be brief—for we cannot enter into detail, and follow our two young friends through all the gayeties of a New York season—he was deeply captivated, offered hand, heart, title, and fortune to the fair Florence, and was firmly, but respectfully rejected. In vain her disappointed father pointed out to her the advantages of so splendid an alliance, of the brilliant and lofty circle she would adorn, and begged her not to disappoint his fondest hopes of seeing a coronet grace a brow it would so well become, and all for the sake of a girlish passion—for Colonel Sefton knew, before Howell had sailed for Europe, young as they were, they had exchanged vows of constancy—which perhaps was now forgotten, if it was not laughed at, by its object, from whom they had received no letters for several months. "But it was scarcely to be expected that Howell could find time to think of the mere school-girl he had left behind him, when in the company of the most beautiful women of the Continent."

It was all in vain that he thus strove to raise her pride and jealousy. Florence would reply—

"My dear father, I cannot love, nay, I can scarcely respect, Sir Edgar Lee. I will never marry against your will; but do not compel, do not persuade me, to become the wife of a man with whom I never can be happy!"

This was generally all the answer Colonel Sefton could elicit from his daughter; when, fortunately for her peace of mind, her importunate suitor received letters to return immediately to England, as the earl, his uncle, was dangerously ill. When taking leave, he expressed his intention of again returning, as soon as it was possible for him to do so, and try if his deep and ardent love would not eventually soften the heart of his fair mistress.

Mrs. Sefton, who, as well as Mrs. Meredith, had for years cherished the hope that Florence would one day become the bride of Howell, was well pleased at the departure of their noble guest; for he had been spending some weeks with them. Her health had become very delicate. She had taken a severe cold at the beginning of winter, which her physician feared had affected her lungs; and every remedy had been resorted to, yet she appeared to grow weaker daily. Mrs. Meredith was much with her; although the colonel and Mr. Meredith were on very cool terms, caused by their difference of opinion in politics, she would not allow that to keep her from her friend. Florence and Mary were also her devoted attendants; and, on Dr. Baldwin—who had been sent for to Lewistown, as the colonel thought he understood his wife's constitution better than the physicians in New York, having attended her for years—having given his opinion that she could not long survive, Henry, who was at Harvard University, Cambridge, was immediately written for; and, a day or two after, a package of letters was received from Howell. They had been detained by some accident, and were all forwarded together. That of the latest date stated that he would sail for America in a few days; so they were in hourly expectation of his arrival. But, alas! he only arrived in time to be present at the funeral rites of one he had loved almost as he did his own mother.

We will not speak of the deep grief and anguish of those by whom she was so much beloved. It softened the colonel's feelings towards Howell, whom he permitted to visit Florence as formerly, and the two families again appeared to be united in the bonds of love and friendship. But this pleasant state of things did not long continue; the war of politics waged high, not only in New York, but throughout the Union. Great Britain's aggressions and insult would no longer be suffered, and war was openly talked of. Colonel Sefton had joined those who called themselves the "peace party." Mr. Meredith was for a war that would teach England a lesson she would not soon forget. The former now made immediate preparations to return with his family to Sefton Hill. Howell had, according to his father's wish, commenced the study of law, hoping, at the end of the year of Florence's mourning for her mother—in spite of political differences—to obtain the consent of the colonel to their union.

It was in the latter part of April, 1812, that the Sefton family left New York for their home in the west. Mrs. Meredith shed many tears in parting with her young friends, and Helen Manvers, who, shortly after her arrival in New York, had become Mrs. Leslie, wept bitterly at parting from her former pupils. Howell had intended to escort them at least part of the way; but, as the colonel seemed moody and irritable, Florence persuaded him to forego his intention, and to come to Sefton Hill in July, when his parents proposed returning to Arcadia, when, with her sanguine disposition, she hoped that the differences existing between the two countries would be amicably settled, and, with the settlement, would end the coolness between her father and Mr. Meredith. But she was destined to be disappointed.

It is known to most American readers that, on the 20th of May, the sloop Hornet arrived, bringing the news that no change of measures with regard to the United States need be expected from the British government; and, on the 18th of June following, war was declared by Congress against Great Britain. It was not an unlooked-for event, and preparations had been actively making for it. In the January previous, Congress had directed a force exceeding twenty-five thousand men to be added to the army; but this law had been passed so short a time previous to the declaration of war, that perhaps six thousand were not yet enlisted. Volunteers were accepted, and militia called for from all the States; and Howell, as we observed at the commencement of our tale, obtained his father's permission to join the army under Brigadier-General Hull. Howell accordingly raised a company of volunteers, consisting of about one hundred and fifty men, and hastened to join Hull at Detroit, before his invasion of Canada.

Henry Sefton had, about the same time, wrung, indeed, almost extorted, a reluctant consent from his father to join General Van Rensselaer, who commanded the centre division, as it was called, of the troops who were to invade Canada, and was stationed then at Lewistown. The British had already established a fort at Queenstown, immediately opposite. Henry, who was enthusiastic in his love for his country, and anxious to distinguish himself as one of her defenders, had prayed and pleaded, and reasoned and talked his father into giving him a sort of permission to join a company of volunteers under the command of Captain Bolton. Colonel Sefton, though possessing much pride and ambition, had but little decision of character, particularly as in this case, when his almost doting fondness for his son would not permit him to thwart him, in what he saw evidently his whole soul was set on, even to gratify the ambition that whispered to him that, if Henry would but espouse the cause of England, his relative, Sir Isaac Brock, would soon procure him a lieutenantancy in the royal army, and if Florence would but accept the hand of Sir Edgar Lee, whom he knew had accompanied General Brock's army to Canada for the purpose of renewing his attentions to her, if possible—if they only would do so, instead of the former being led away by his foolish notions of freedom and democracy, and the latter being so silly as to love a man without a title, when the coronet of a countess was laid at her feet. It was very provoking that they would not; and, though his affection would not permit him to attempt to compel them to adopt his views, yet it was a source of great annoyance, and he could only hope that some change would take place that might alter the position of things.

SPRING'S MORN.

BY ROBERT G. ALLISON.

SPRING'S sweetly blushing morn,
 "Waked by the dawning hours,"
 Which hill and vale adorn
 With freshly-blooming flowers,
 Diffuses mildly-beaming light
 Where reigned stern Winter's night;
 Extends her beauteous rosy hand,
 Through Nature's works, o'er sea and land:
 Her birds hear her inspiring voice,
 "They move, they waken, they rejoice!"
 And suddenly, from each verdant tree,
 Discourse in sweetest melody.

MODEL COTTAGES.

A Cottage Dwelling of three rooms with back kitchen, cow-house, and other conveniences.

Accommodation.—This is a commodious cottage, and, all the accommodation being beneath one roof, with the exception of a small lean-to, it must be considered as promising to be economical in its erection. By the ground-plan, it appears to contain an entrance, a, from under a projecting porch; a kitchen, b, with a bed-room, c, for a child; principal bed-room, d; parlor, e; back kitchen, f; shed for fuel, g; cow-house, h; dairy, i; water-closet, k, with a cistern of water over it supplied from the roof; and pantry, l. If the cow-house and dairy can be dispensed with, or removed to the yard, then g and k may be got out of h, and the whole building included under one roof, always a desirable object.

Construction.—The walls are, for the most part, shown thick, as if built of earth or stone, and the roof is covered with tiles. These being heavy, require considerable strength of timber in the rafters; but their durability we believe to be greater than even that of cast iron.

General Estimate.—Cubic contents, 13,904 feet; at ten cents per foot $1,390 40, at five cents $695 73.

A Dwelling of four rooms with back kitchen and other conveniences.

Accommodation.—From the entrance passage, a, a door opens to the kitchen, b, which is connected with the back kitchen, c, on the one hand, and with the bed-room, d, on the other. There is a parlor, e, and another bed-room, f, with a closet, g; and, in a lean-to, we have a cow-house, h, pig-sty, &c., i and k. Should use be made of the cow-house and pig-sty, it would be necessary to have a yard joined to that side of the house, and to alter the shape of the platform within it, as in similar cases. Some use may be made of the roof by a trap-door in the ceiling of the kitchen, and the whole may be heated from a fire-place in the back kitchen.

General Estimate.—Cubic contents, 13,700 feet; at ten cents per foot $1,370, at five cents per foot $685.

"MOVING" IN THE COUNTRY.

BY A VILLAGER.

THERE was a great sensation at Elmvale when it was noised through the village that the Bartons had "sold out." Who would have thought of their quitting the old homestead which had been in the possession of the family for the unheard-of length of forty years? It was odd, indeed, that such fixtures as they were supposed to be could possibly think of "moving." If the lovely stream which flows along just south of the village—that river whose romantic windings could scarcely be made more interesting even by the glowing verse in which they have been immortalized by the sweetest bard of modern times—had, of its own accord, changed its course, and, making a channel through the intervening meadows, run up the principal street, there might have been more astonishment; but nothing among the bare possibilities of life had seemed so unlikely to occur as for the Bartons to sell. Amid all the wonder caused by this event, the universal opinion was that they had made an excellent bargain—in fact, had done uncommonly well.

But you shall hear all about it. The way they came to sell was this: The Bartons are an old family, by which I do not mean that they are any better than their neighbors, or have a longer string of ancestors—for they never tried to trace their descent beyond the days of Queen Bess; but what constitutes their antiquity shall appear as we proceed. At the period of the remarkable selling out, the family consisted of three maiden sisters and a niece of seventeen, whom they had reared from babyhood. The marriage of her mother, the sole one of them all who had achieved matrimony, was the great epoch in their modern history. This or that event took place before or after "poor Sarah's wedding." She, the fairest of them all, died just as life's prospects grew brightest, leaving the infant Sarah to the care of her aunts, from whom her father, with a second wife and large troop of children, had never cared to separate her. A humdrum sort of household it would have been if the young girl had not dwelt with them—a genuine sunbeam in that musty old place.

It was a rambling, tumble-down house, full of great echoing rooms and dark passages, built at different eras and for various purposes. An aspiring two-story front had been the hotel of the early days of the settlement; then a wing had been added for a "store;" and, finally, the Bartons filled up a large angle with some snug family apartments. This mossy-shingled, weather-beaten domicile, shaded by magnificent elms older than itself, comprehended nearly the whole of the inheritance left the spinster sisters by their father. Time rolled on—and, as his ravages were not repaired, the old house grew more ruinous year by year. Rats gnawed great holes in the cellar walls, and ate the spinster's winter apples and potatoes; the roof grew sadly treacherous, and admitted the intruder, rain. Often, in the stillness of the night, a crash would be heard which scared the youthful Sarah, but which her aunts unheeded—for it was only the plastering falling from the chamber ceilings, and they were used to that.

Their brothers, "the boys," as they called them—though one was fifty years old, and the other but a little younger—had long been from home, except for an occasional visit, one being a farmer in Wisconsin, and the other a merchant in a not far-off city.

"Come and live with me," wrote he of Wisconsin to the "girls."

"What! give up our home! And, of all things, to go to the West! No, never!" answered his sisters.

"Sell out and buy a city lot, or all of you come and accept a home with me," urged the generous merchant. But they had as great a dislike to the city as of going westward—and neither invitation was heeded.

"We will decay with the homestead," said the three sisters. "Let us stay in peace where our parents died, where the very walls are old friends, and the portraits look at us from the same places where they have always hung. Let us stay under the shelter of the trees where we played when we were children."

So time rolled on. The spinsters' raven locks showed here and there a silver thread; the old roof leaked more copiously, and more industriously gnawed the rats. Still the Bartons clung to their decaying house, from which they seemed decided that their only removal should be that which laid them in the silent enclosure of the family graveyard, where the parents who fell asleep in a good old age, and the sister in her young beauty, slumbered side by side.

But the march of improvement will do what nothing else can. It made the spinsters "sell out." Elmvale "took a start and grew"—a catastrophe which the Bartons had often contemplated with dread. A new store was built, a manufactory put in operation, a plank road was laid through the very street where they lived, and a locomotive thundered by a dozen times each day, just back of the old dwelling. But what mainly contributed to cause an advantageous sale for the Bartons was the circumstance of a village quarrel. Elmvale, from being a most quiet and peaceable community, became, by various causes, divided into two factions, the North Enders and South Enders—each party trying to build up the interests of its own quarter to the detriment of the rival neighborhood. The North Enders declared that the opposite side had had all the business in their quarter ever since the settlement of the town, and they "wouldn't have it so" any longer; and, being in the majority, they succeeded in getting the post-office, the railroad depot, and the academy removed and located at the North End. The South Enders, being the wealthiest, revenged themselves by speculating, and, among other things, resolved to have a grand new hotel, which should carry all before it, and make that part of the village famous. It was determined to buy out the Misses Barton, their house was so large and so conveniently situated "on the corner," remodel it entirely, and get an experienced hotel-keeper from the city to take charge of the new establishment.

The spinsters heard of the proposed plan before a formal offer was made them, and they trembled in their shoes. They were denied to all visitors, especially two or three new-comers with black whiskers and driving gay horses, who, so their excited fancies suggested, resembled speculators or fashionable inn-keepers. Brother Tim, the merchant, got wind of the matter, and posted over in hot haste to Elmvale.

"Sister Betsey," said he, slapping his fist emphatically on the great dining-table, "are you a sensible woman, as I used to think you were, or are you not? There isn't the least necessity for letting the old house rot down over your heads, though you haven't the means to repair it. Why, just think, they'll give you four thousand dollars for it—and then, if you are determined still not to come and live with me, you can build a cottage, plenty large enough and much pleasanter than this, on your own lot across the street, for half that sum, and have something left to invest."

Betsey heaved a sigh, looked at the faded paper on the walls and at the grim black mantel-piece with a glance of affection, and remained silent. But her more voluble sisters Ann and Margaret eloquently remonstrated. "Why, brother Tim, it's home to us, what no other place can ever be. It is a shame to sell it, for its very walls are sacred."

"Sacred?" cried Tim, with a hearty laugh; "and the rats are sacred too, I suppose, for you never kill them; and so is the old plastering that tumbles about your ears. Girls," he continued, more earnestly, "I am fairly out of patience with you. I only ask you to think the matter over, and not reject the offer in a hurry."

Tim loved his sisters, and had their interests at heart; but he had early left the family roof to fight his way, unaided, to a competence, and he could not understand the feeling of mere local attachment, which seemed to be a part of their very natures. However, they were not, after all, unreasonable, nor could they avoid knowing that, in this working-day world, old associations cannot be depended on to furnish food and raiment, or render walls either rat or rain proof. So they followed Tim's advice, and, taking the subject into consideration, made up their minds to sell, being not a little influenced by their affection for Sarah, who thought it would be fine fun to move, and longed for a new house above all things. In short, the bargain was made, the papers drawn up and brought to be signed. The spinsters seldom went beyond the shade of the elm trees, except to church—they had a horror of making new acquaintances, and were especially possessed by a nervous dread of signing a paper. But this ceremony could not, on the present occasion, be dispensed with—so, when the official dignitary came to "take their acknowledgment," though he was an old neighbor of twenty years' standing, they put on long-fronted, antiquated bonnets and great shawls, walked silently into the parlor, and, having affixed their names to the necessary document, hurried away in the same mysterious manner, leaving their mischievous niece giggling behind the sideboard. Well, they were to give possession in three weeks, and it was needful to hire a house till their own should be completed. House-hunting was a queer business for the Misses Barton; but, fortunately, a tenement was soon found almost as large, rather more ruinous, and considerably less comfortable than the old homestead, which the parish minister, having just been turned away, had vacated, and which they hired for six months. It was the only one in the vicinity, among rented dwellings, which they deemed capable of holding their great quantity of household stuff, and it was near the home they were to leave—two good reasons for selecting it.

And now were heard the notes of preparation for moving. The old house had not been the scene of such upturning and confusion since the time of sister Sarah's wedding—nearly twenty years before. Ye dwellers in the city, whom May day witnesses changing your residence of a twelvemonth as a matter of course, and with as much unconcern as you walk from parlor to bedroom—little do ye know of the labors of such a fitting as this! Just think of the old barrels and bottles and other trumpery which fill the cellar, "too good to throw away," and yet not fit to bestow on a beggar; the indescribable and heterogeneous mass which lumbers the garret, and the furniture of all kinds, old and rickety, used and long past using, which crams the remainder of the dwelling—furniture, some portions of which are so massive and seemingly immovable, having occupied the same stations year after year, that the mere attempt to stir it appears futile! Articles long since laid aside were dragged forth from dark closets and dingy corners of the garret.

"What under the sun is this, Aunt Betsey?" said Sarah, hauling after her, down the precarious attic stairs, a strange-looking affair of iron, a great round pan with a handle six feet long. "For mercy's sake, be careful of it, child," cries Aunt Betsey from the hall, where she is emptying the contents of a book-case into a two-bushel basket; "it's our old frying-pan." This obsolete utensil had not seen the light since the Bartons were induced, through Tim's arguments fifteen years before, to introduce a cooking-stove into their kitchen, and shut up the great cavernous fireplace, with its crane and pothooks. But they still cherished it, like many other things whose day was past, for the double reason that it was old and associated with the memory of their parents.

"And what's this?" asked Tim, who had brought a carman from the city to transport their goods, and was directing the important business in hand. He was carrying another incomprehensible thing resembling the frying-pan, but more elaborate in construction, having a carved wooden handle terminating in a capacious brass vessel with a highly ornamented cover of the same metal, on which he played an impromptu tune by banging it up and down.

"Stop that racket, do," said Margaret; "that's the warming-pan our folks have had these forty years; we wouldn't have anything happen it for the world."

The vocation of warming-pans was no longer held in esteem, modern comforts having superseded the necessity of their use, particularly in brother Tim's opinion—for he very well remembered how, when he came home one bitterly cold January night, they put him to sleep in the large north chamber, with its great fireplace, whence the heat of the blazing wood all rushed up the chimney, and the wind roared down into the room; and how, to prevent his freezing to death, his kind-hearted sisters had brought the warming-pan into requisition; how a mass of bed "fuzz" and feathers adhered to it, and, getting scorched, made a most offensive "smudge;" and how some of the coals were shaken out and set the sheets on fire—and he was so irreverent as to pronounce this utensil a useless thing, advising the girls to convert it into a "soap dipper." Most cruel Tim!

While the garret was yielding its treasures, from the dim lumber-room, where superannuated furniture led an easy life, a cradle was brought to view—not one of your modern willow affairs that lasts only long enough to carry one baby through the rocking period, but a substantial wooden structure, painted red, in which two generations of the Bartons had slept away the first months of their existence, and still sufficiently strong to endure the nursery buffetings of many generations to come. Sarah laughed, and clapped her hands at sight of the old cradle. "Won't it be funny, aunty," she exclaimed, "to see a family of spinsters parading along with a cradle when they move?"

But Tim put it carefully on the cart, for he thought of the gentle mother whose soft eyes had watched over him when he lay there, a helpless infant—and as carefully he bore out the two rocking-chairs, a small and a large one, that had stood so many years beside each other in the little sitting-room, just where their venerable occupants had been accustomed to use them. If Tim had small love for the fast decaying old house, it must be said that the tenderest corner in his heart of hearts was filled with a most reverential regard for the memory of those parents, to whom he had been the best of sons; and more than all his father's worldly possessions he valued his dying father's earnest blessing.

For a whole week, the cart "might be seen," as novelists say, standing at the Bartons' door, or slowly traversing the street to their new abode, now with a mass of feather beds piled alarmingly high—anon creaking under the weight of unwieldy cupboards or antiquated bureaus. Tim objected to the great clumsy presses. "What can you want with all those cupboards, sister Betsey?" he asked. "Why not dispose of them to the new owner here, and save the trouble of moving such heavy things? You can have plenty of clothes-presses and china closets built in your new house, and havn't the least possible use for all these."

But the girls were unanimous in refusing to part with even one. "You don't understand it at all, brother Tim," said they. "This long blue closet is for Sarah's dresses; that cherry one we always keep blankets in; this red one, with so many shelves, always stands in the kitchen; we couldn't live without it; and, as for the others, why, you know they have been in the family ever since mother began housekeeping, so there is no use in saying anything about them."

Tim acquiesced, and made no further propositions of a similar nature. But finally, as one load after another was dispatched, and still "Alps on Alps" of rubbish, the accumulations of many years, were revealed to view, there were some things that even the sisters pronounced "in the way;" among which were two or three casks full of "old iron," the results of kitchen breakages and of the wear and tear of time—cracked kettles, broken skillets, smoothing irons without handles, metal teapots noseless and bottomless, with other articles "too numerous to mention." The Bartons were not what is called "keen at a bargain," and—partly from their knowledge of this deficiency, partly because they inherited from their father, who, though residing in "York State," was far from being Yankee-born, a suspicious dislike of traveling merchants in general and tin peddlers in particular—they seldom indulged in a "trade," and, when they did, had reason to regret it afterwards. But on the present occasion, when the stirrings-up consequent on their expected change of residence brought out such quantities of trash, they became anxious for an opportunity to barter.

"I really think," said sister Betsey, "that, if a peddler should come along, we might venture to trade these things off, for it would be no great matter if we should get cheated, and even one tin pan will be more useful than all this old stuff."

And it so fell out that just at this juncture a peddler did "come along"—one of those miscellaneous dealers whose cart contains a little of everything in the tinware and drygoods line, from a pepper-box to a blanket shawl, and who in exchange takes articles infinitely more multifarious. His vehicle presented a striking appearance, moving forward to the music of clattering tins, many of which were bang outside, forming an ambulatory advertisement that glittered brilliantly in the sunlight, while, lifting their well-stuffed bodies through various crevices, were visible many plethoric-looking bags, the nature of the contents of which might be guessed by rags thrusting themselves through rents in some, and feathers poking from others. The Bartons hailed his approach with satisfaction; the "old iron" and all the rag-bags in the house were exhibited, and their pecuniary value, when weighed and summed up, was by no means of small amount.

"Well," inquired the peddler, "han't you got anything else you want to get rid of? I'll take old India rubbers, hens' feathers—no matter what."

Old India rubbers and hens' feathers? Could it be possible that they were salable commodities! How fortunate—for they had half a bushel of worn-out overshoes, and standing in the carriage house were two barrels of hens' feathers, the pickings of the fowlyard for several years, saved there by the spinsters' directions, yet for what purpose saved they themselves hitherto knew not, though doubtless with a vague idea that they would come in use some time or other. These desirable relics were added to the rags and old iron; and now, from the peddler's stock, began the selection of such articles as the Misses Barton wished—several milk-pans, quart and pint cups, water dippers, and things of corresponding nature—and, in particular, a small vessel brilliantly painted in red and green, with the words "molasses cup," by way of inscription, in gilt letters directly under the spout. The drygoods came in for a share of patronage also; a bright handkerchief for William, the serving-man, thread, needles, tape, and cotton hose not only made the traders "even," but brought the ladies a few pennies in debt.

"We'll soon make that right," said the peddler; "han't you got no eggs? I take eggs too."

Eggs and overshoes, feathers, and broken teapots—funny enough, thought the Bartons—and a dozen of eggs speedily made them "square." Meantime, Sarah, who looked on with much amusement, and was delighted to see how readily the old iron was disposed of, called William to a dark recess under the back stairs, and bade him haul out an immense black pot, a "five pail" vessel at the least, and two antiquated teakettles, minus covers and handles. The man came lugging the pot along with both hands, looking very much like the picture of "Greedy Gut" in Mother Goose's Melodies—while Sarah bore the teakettles. No sooner did the big pot appear on the scene than there was an evident consternation among the sisters, as though the peddler, beholding such rich booty, would take it perforce, and Miss Betsey in haste told William to carry it back directly, for it was once her great-grandfather's, and could not be sold on any account. Sarah laughed slyly, and produced her burden, which her aunts speedily consigned to the state tomb they had so long occupied with the pot; "they were grandmother's and great-grandmother's kettles, and should always be kept in the family."

"That's right, girls," put in brother Tim; "those things are useful, in a certain sense, as relics of our forefathers; and I approve of such keeping, in fact of keeping most old things, except great cupboards and crazy, leaky houses," he added, with a smile.

The great trade being concluded, it was surprising to see how the peddler stuffed his additional stock into the already crammed wagon. There seemed no end to its capacity of holding. In went the eggs too—and where they were put to escape crushing remains a mystery to the Bartons to this day. To their astonishment and delight, the tinware proved to be, as represented by the peddler, "first-rate and no mistake, and warranted not to leak;" so they have set it down that there is at least one honest peddler in the world. A single circumstance, however, casts a cloud on his reputation. His dealing in hens' feathers was certainly suspicious. "He must either," they believed, "mix them with goose feathers, or steam them up to make them sell for such, and one would be as unfair as the other." Therefore, after canvassing the whole matter, they concluded that, though he did well by them, "there must be cheaters somewhere about him." As for the peddler, he went on his way, and they saw him no more; but he was reported to have said, at his next stopping-place, that "he never made such a great docker in his life as he did with them women folks in that 'ere old house down street."

To return to the moving—which the peddler's appearance has interrupted. There was one matter which weighed heavily on Miss Betsey's mind, and that was in relation to their domestic fowls, for they had an extensive "hen dairy," as brother Tim called it—and the contemplated task of ousting its members from their convenient quarters and gathering them for removal, presented not only serious difficulties, but its accomplishment appeared prospectively to be attended with considerable risk. A disused smoke-house, the sole appurtenance of their new residence that could be made available for such a purpose, having been prepared for the reception of the fowls, William, the serving-man, set himself to catch them, and after great exertions, secured the fluttering community. They were confined in two large coops, which, being mounted on a wheelbarrow, were trundled off by the captor—the imprisoned birds struggling impotently, while their squallings rose with a muffled sound through the bars of their temporary cells. Brother Tim walked on one side, wholly engaged in steadying the precarious load—an air of intense earnestness pervading his entire man. Miss Betsey's apprehensions were not ill founded, for several of the hens began directly to pine away, and came to an untimely death, a few days after removal, from being pinched and roughly handled by William in his eagerness to catch them—which broke their hearts; an interesting fact—going to show that hens, like other bipeds, sometimes die of broken hearts. And their surviving companions, that had before moving made arrangements "to set," mostly relinquished the idea in the novelty of their abode, so that the Bartons "raised" but two chickens the ensuing summer. This was the only serious disaster that attended the moving, which was signalized by no broken crockery or cracked mirrors. The spinsters themselves went to and fro, carrying small baskets containing their choice China and glass ware, which they would trust to no other hands. And, with their own individual eyes, they steadily watched the transit of the old-fashioned looking-glasses—those time-honored bequests of their grandfather—long and narrow, and encased in dark frames, where dim gilding and carved wood flourished antequely together.

Whatever sad thoughts and tender memories connected with the home they were about to quit rose in the minds of the sisters, there was little opportunity for indulging or expressing them, when fairly engaged in the perplexing tasks in which the final tearing-up and constant supervision of departing goods and chattels involved them. But at times, when by themselves, and busied in the old rooms, as they sorrowfully realized, for the last time, they would give way to the indulgence of childish reminiscences. "Oh, sister Maggie," said Ann, on such an occasion, as on her knees, hammer in hand, she was taking nails from the carpet of the apartment which had been their nursery and playroom in the far-away period of childhood, "do you remember our 'acting' in this dear old place—how you and I used to stand in that corner and make up plays as we went along?"

"Indeed I do," said Maggie, as she folded the ancient and somewhat faded window curtains of green moreen; "and just how we always ended off too—one going out at the hall door here, and the other at the kitchen entry, saying 'exeat omnes' as we went." Then they laughed and cried together—though the tears predominated.

"And this," continued Maggie, as she reached, in the employment of taking down curtains, an "end window," which afforded a view far along the pleasant street, "this is where sister Sarah used to sit and watch for Julius in the summer evenings, before the fall when they were married;" and Maggie sighed at the recollection of those bright, mirthful-looking eyes, that closed so early on all their possessor loved in this world. Then came the often-recurring thought of those parents whose earthly cares and exertions for their children this enclosure of home had witnessed through their course and to their termination; but over the hidden, cherished recollections of the dead—those memories so often filled with "bitterness" which alone "the heart knoweth"—we draw a veil.

Well, the last day of their stay in the house no longer theirs arrived, though they would willingly have deferred it, and "kept moving" another week. Even Sarah arose that morning with a load at her heart, and their breakfast was a sad and silent meal. There remained but the cooking-stove and the bedsteads which they occupied to be taken down, and this was speedily accomplished; then they made ready to depart—lingering a few minutes to take a last look at the familiar rooms. It was one of those chilling, bleak days which so often come in the latter part of May after a period of bright, balmy weather, and dampen our hopes of approaching summer. The wind whistled drearily down the open chimneys, and the rooms, empty of all else, were full of dismal echoes. A few bits of string and pieces of torn paper were scattered on the dusty floors, and on one of the mantels stood some cracked vials—and this was all, where lately had been so much of the warmth and happiness of life. The sisters looked at each other, but did not speak, for they knew the effort would only make their tears burst forth. Small would have been the comfort, then, had any one said "it is wise to leave here—you will be much better off in a new house"—which, indeed, they felt to be truth; yet none who quits the home of a lifetime fails to realize the utter fallaciousness of such consolation when the hour of departure is at hand. They would not allow themselves to wait long, but presently passed out in slow procession from the shelter of the old roof-tree, to return no more; Sarah following her aunts with a subdued countenance, carrying a geranium in one arm and the little white house dog in the other. And, by the way, small "Tom," the funniest and most knowing of quadrupeds, and the barn-door fowls did not constitute all the live stock of the Bartons, which also comprehended a cow, a trim Durham of invaluable qualities. Just at the mournful moment when the spinsters issued forth, came William also from the rear of the house, leading "Bossy" by a rope tied to her horn, at which the man vigorously tugged. The cow, not understanding why she was driven from her usual resting place, and not desiring a strange stable or unfamiliar milking ground, pulled as violently in the opposite direction, rolling her eyes and tossing her head in a manner entirely at variance with her naturally submissive ways. There are times when little circumstances, which ordinarily would be unnoticed, seem fraught with peculiar meaning, and such was the present, when the behavior of the cow appeared very inauspicious. Maggie, always alive to portents, and somewhat superstitious, set it down in her own mind as a bad omen—an ill-defined indication of some equally ill-defined misfortune to result from the "moving"—and, looking back anxiously on reaching the gate of their new residence, she felt relieved to see that "Bossy," though her eyes still glared with the light of suppressed rage, had submitted to her fate, and was advancing in unresisting dignity. "Poor dumb thing!" said Maggie; "I can sympathize with you." As for the ill luck foreshadowed by these ominous shakings of the head, it is yet to come, thank Heaven!

Tim stood waiting to receive his sisters, having seen that one room at least was made comfortable for their induction. He wiped some tears which rushed unbidden to his eyes as they approached, for he did not like that they should see him giving way so, and welcomed them in a hearty voice. They had need to be met with smiles, for all but this one room, where the old family clock stood ticking away so homelike in one corner as to give the place a natural aspect, looked unpromising enough. The carpets had been put down, and, so far, all was well; but everything besides was pitched in helter-skelter. And what a place the kitchen was! for it had been made the receptacle of whatever could not be stowed anywhere else—a pyramid of chairs and tables in the centre, and the doors blocked up with all sorts of things—parlor, kitchen, and bedroom furniture in most admirable juxtaposition. Not only did the idea of having anything to eat that day seem preposterous, but to the sisters so faint was the prospect of ever "getting settled" at all, so unused were they to the discomforts of "moving," that they were thrown into a state of absolute despair. Maggie seated herself on an inverted wash-tub and began to cry outright, partly at the dismal scene before her, and partly because the tears which she had been checking down all the morning could be kept back no longer. Good brother Tim busied himself in flying about, giving directions, and trying to compose "the girls"—while Sarah, who was too buoyant to be long weighed down, was not inactive; so, through their cheering influence, the others gathered resolution to do what all who feel despair under similar, or indeed any circumstances, had best do—bestir themselves.

Before dark, a passage having been cleared to the cooking-stove, and a good fire kindled, the teakettle began to sing, announcing that a meal was in prospect; and what can make people feel so at-home-like as sitting down to a cosy cup of tea? The table was not, though, truth to say, there was little on it, for nobody knew where anything was to be found in either the crockery or eatable line; but Miss Betsey had taken care to send for a loaf of "baker's bread" (home-baking had been out of the question in the confusion of the last week), and they were now of a refreshing draught of tea, for Ann had brought the caddy in her own hands. Alas for human expectations! When the tea was tasted, no one could drink it; in fact, it was not "tay-tay," as the Irishman called the real China product, but an undisguised decoction of spearmint leaves, which Miss Betsey, who was famous for curing herbs, had dried the previous fall, having heard they were "good for some complaint," she didn't know what, and which had, in the turmoil of moving, got into the "wrong box"—in what way, the Bartons cannot tell to this day. They were in great tribulation, as they saw no remedy, and particularly on Tim's account, he so relished a good cup of tea—but Tim, sympathizing with the perplexity into which he saw their novel surroundings had thrown them, protested that it was quite drinkable, kindly following up the assertion by swallowing a cupful—an effort it cost him too, for the stuff was villanous. Considerate Tim! Then he bade them an affectionate good-by, and, springing into his buggy, drove off very fast towards town. What made him check his horse at the gate of the deserted homestead?—and did anybody hear footsteps in the lonely house that evening? Surely, there stood a man under one of the elms and leaned his head against the rough bark, as night threw its shadows over the silent spot. Tim never told his sisters that he stopped there that evening; but he said to his wife, "I didn't think I should feel so bad as I really did at last." They have not re-entered the old house, and most probably never will.

The spearmint tea was but the first of many similar trials and mistakes which attended the Misses Barton's efforts at "getting settled." Not the least of their troubles arose from the awkwardness accompanying the explorations of a strange abode—a serious undertaking to people who had spent all their days in one spot. They ran headlong against each other in passages with the windings of which they were totally unacquainted; and many hard bumps were the result. And then, what a fuss they had to find anything! Books, table linen, sweetmeat and pickle jars had been put in most unsystematized array on the same shelves; hunted articles "turned up" in the least expected places; pocket handkerchiefs and dish towels, hastily thrust away, were discovered crammed into pillow cases; and wearing apparel emerged from wooden water pails. By degrees, everything looked for made its appearance, and, as perseverance and industry can smooth the most rugged difficulties, so, in a week's time, matters began to go on with somewhat of their accustomed good order and system.

But, among the consequences of the "selling out," a new trial, and a different one from those which had followed the event hitherto, now awaited the spinsters. It remained for them to be made acquainted, how unwillingly soever, with the total overhauling which took place at their old home. They had been not many days established at their temporary residence when Maggie, who sat near an open window enjoying the first balmy breath of June, heard a great clatter and crash, and, throwing a glance, as she often did, down the street where the weather-beaten walls of the old house were plainly discernible, she beheld men on the roof, and discovered that the process of demolishing the chimneys was begun. The sound of the falling bricks, as they rattled over the shingles, smote on her ear like a knell; she shut the window, and retreated to her bedroom. But regrets and sighs could not stay the work of reform; every fireplace was removed—"they took up so much space," the new proprietors said. The great vacancies thus made were walled and plastered, while more modern chimneys, to accommodate stovepipes, were constructed. The demolition of the kitchen chimney, which of itself occupied as much room as any moderately-sized apartment, hurt the feelings of the Bartons most of all. That pleasant old corner where they used to sit, a knot of brothers and sisters, when they were children, in the long winter evenings, enjoying the blaze of the immense "backlogs," and listening to their grandfather's funny stories; and the adjoining brick oven, where the Christmas cakes and pies had, ever since they could remember, been baked, and from which not even the innovation of stoves in later years had drawn their patronage, for in its capacious depths their bread was baked to the last—to know that all vestiges of that brick oven and ancient chimney-place were gone, was sorrowful enough. But the change did not end there. The partition walls were torn away, and the very landmarks that distinguished different apartments were entirely destroyed. A staring piazza was built along the front, extending quite to the paternal elms which waved their arms protectingly before the house; and, to crown all, the whole was painted of a dark-brown color.

In due time, the new hotel was opened for the reception of visitors, under magnificent auspices. Brilliant red and embroidered muslin curtains occupied the place of the sober, old-fashioned hangings of the Bartons; where their parlor and dining-room had been was now a long counter, displaying many bottles and decanters; and the windows that looked out from a little western bedroom, which had been a sacred spot where they had closed the eyes of their beloved dead, now lighted a public resort, where men waited for the stage, and which was always full of loungers and cigar smoke. Sarah, who reported progress to her aunts, came in from a walk one day, exclaiming, with an air of disgust, "And what do you think, aunty, I saw at the old place to-day? A horse-pail right at the front door! Just think of it!"

But a new object was rising on the spinsters' vision, to divert their thoughts into a more pleasing channel. From the windows of their present residence they could observe a modest cottage advancing into being, which, in the course of a few months, appeared complete; its walls of cream color prettily contrasting with the young elm and fir trees which embellished the court-yard, and a terraced garden occupying a graceful slope at its eastern end. Thither was the second sitting of the spinsters, when November winds piped loud and shrill, and as they went they blessed kind Providence for such a snug home as awaited them the coming winter. Nor did they neglect to praise brother Tim, whose good taste and judgment had assisted in planning the new house. But now, alas! they were forced to give up some of the cumbrous furniture that had never before seemed to be "in the way," for there was absolutely not space enough for it at the cottage—obtaining in its stead other of more appropriate size. High-post bedsteads it was necessary to curtail of their dimensions, to which fate some were subjected, while others were exchanged for modern ones; even some of the vast cupboards were dispensed with; but there were many other articles with which nothing could induce the Bartons to part, and among these ranks the long mahogany clock. There is one story high enough to accommodate at least that faithful monitor, and it still ticks away in the cottage dining-room as vigorously as it has been doing for the last forty years, while its clarion-like bell rings out the passing hours clearer than ever. The reason of which last improvement is that the Bartons consented, during their final moving, to commit it to the hands of an experienced clockmaker to be cleaned, and, the dust of twenty-five years being brushed away, the husky voice of age has been replaced by the animated notes of its early existence. Miss Betsey says she would rather have it than a dozen French clocks, and would as soon think of selling Sarah, for it is quite as much one of the family. In keeping with its honest face, stand those two ancient rocking-chairs, more prized than the most luxurious of modern seats, as helping, with other articles of furniture no more elegant than these which are disposed about the house, to keep "green the memory" of those who owned and used them once, but who have left behind all earthly possessions.

In fact, the inanimate belongings of the cottage, blending old and new—with more, however, of the former than the latter—may be compared, not unfitly, to its human occupants: the spinster sisters quietly but surely going on in the vale of years, the brightness of their early youth forever passed; and their sprightly niece, on whose round cheek age and care have not yet come to set their lines, and whose golden locks have not been touched by the gray blight of time.

"What a pretty place the Bartons have," say the neighbors; "and what a good bargain they made in getting the cottage for their large, inconvenient old house." While the Bartons, grateful and contented as they are in their new and cheerful abode, look back at times with fond regret even to the discomforts of the homestead, and Miss Betsey has been heard to declare that "it is well we don't know to what we are coming in this world."

New, kind reader, if it so happen that you belong to the sex masculine, suffer a word of advice. Perhaps you will pause at Elmvale while on a deer-hunting excursion, in the cold winter months, for it lies not far from great hunting-grounds, and you may repose yourself at that famous hotel where the gas lights gleam with such a comfortable air through the crimson-curtained windows. If so, give not way, we beseech you, to boisterous mirth in those gayly-furnished rooms, neither indulge in the potations which those decanters so temptingly display; but remember that the spot you occupy was once the scene of quiet, domestic comfort, of the mingled griefs and joys of home; and that, perchance, on the very spot where you stand the bride assumed her marriage vow, or the dead was laid out for burial. Or, in the warm days of summer, while seeking a refuge from the city heats, you may stumble upon Elmvale; and I am sure you could not find a more charming place, for, notwithstanding the rival factions of North and South Enders have caused scowls and hard words among the inhabitants, yet Nature, undisturbed by man's quarrels, wears here a pleasant aspect, and speaks in sweetest tones from echoing wood and rolling river. On the gently sloping hills at whose base the village nestles, you may wander, finding new views of loveliness at every step, for to their calm, green summits no sound of strife rises, and they smile on in the glancing sunlight as beautifully serene, whether the Academy, justice's and post office be at one end or the other of the broad street below. If from the piazza of that same hotel, as you sit in one of those once-inviting arm-chairs, enjoying the soft summer twilight and the flavor of your Havana, you note at a little distance the cream-colored cottage with its verdant terraces, we advise you to take a closer view of its beauties. Don't be afraid of the maiden sisters, for they were never known to "set their caps" at any of your race; while, as for Sarah, her aunts think her yet much too young to "have beaux," and the contented country girl divides her time between the little garden and the smaller library of the cottage—so, if you happen to espy her in the first, she will probably retreat to the second, not caring to bestow a look upon yourself. But, if you have the least wish to make a good impression, be careful not to strut, and remember to throw away your cigar on approaching those precincts, for both Sarah and her aunts have a horror of city airs and tobacco.

And here, good reader mine—whom I have carried through a "plotless tale," which yet may not have failed to interest, if you are tired of the heroes and heroines of Broadway and Chestnut Street, and would fain enjoy a whiff of country air, albeit redolent of rusticity and haystacks—we will leave, so please you, the cottage and its inmates. For, as the sisters say most emphatically that "they shall never move again," it is unlikely that anything so eventful as their first flitting will make any part of their future life worthy of record; and certain I am you will join with me in hoping that life will be—what they themselves most wish—quiet and serene, unfretted by anxieties, and yet not so intensely comfortable as to cause forgetfulness of that last narrow home whither all alike are tending.

THE "WRONG PASSENGER."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "MISS BREMER'S VISIT TO COOPER'S LANDING," "GETTING INTO SOCIETY," "PLEASEING THE PARISH," ETC. ETC.

Mrs. WILLIAM AUGUSTUS FLANDERS was going to pass a winter at the South.

It was quite an event in the life-history of the lady, a resident of 2 Hancock Court, Boston. It had always troubled her that it was only a court over which she reigned. It was not orthodox, but she would have preferred to govern a street; to be the observed of a place, at the least. Mr. Flanders was particularly obstinate in some few points, one of which was that the house he and his father before him occupied was good enough for his wife and children; nor did it avail that new dwellings, with bow fronts, and "hot water in every story," were unusually cheap at the south end, and that his old partner, Moses Sanborn, occupied one of them. "What Mr. Sanborn chose to do was none of his business," he often pertinently remarked; he had chosen to leave the firm of Flanders & Sanborn because it did not make money fast enough, and, if he chose to live fast, he only hoped he had made enough to pay for it. You might as well have tried to remove Old South as Mr. Flanders, when his foot—no very small one, it is true—was once put down.

However, Mrs. Flanders had always one refuge, into whose impregnable fastness she invariably retreated, under all social attacks. If Mrs. Potts, at No. 4, hired a third maid-servant, she could tell of the two her cousin, Mrs. Jessup, always had about her. If Mrs. Himes bought the first strawberries in market, Mrs. Jessup's last letter had said "green peas were over with them for the present." Mrs. Moses, an assistant officer in the Mite Society, went to pass a few months in New York, and Mrs. Flanders observed, "her duties as a wife and mother had led her to decline at least fifty invitations to pass a winter in Charleston; Anna Maria was always urging her to come out."

Whether it was that her "duties as a wife and mother" interfered no longer with her social relations, or that Mr. Flanders, after six months of coaxing and teasing, had heroically given up his new chaise for the present, and appropriated the money drawn for its purchase to his wife's use, we cannot say; but certainly Mrs. Flanders had been induced, either by a more pressing invitation than usual from Anna Maria, or the rapture of possessing a new velvet cloak, and having no place but the church, and that only once a week, to display it in—to forget her usual self-sacrificing disposition so far as to consent to pass a winter in Charleston. It was put on the plea of her health. Of course, no one ever went South in the winter without that certificate to the kind attentions of those they meet. To be sure, Mrs. Flanders had not passed an entire day at home, much less in her own room, for the last five years; but then, as she told Mrs. Potts, "many and many 's the time when a sense of duty alone kept her up." A sense of duty, be it remarked, is always the brace and supporter which ladies of Mrs. Flanders' active benevolence chiefly patronize. For once, therefore, "she really was going to be self-indulgent." Johnny was able now to relieve his father from a great deal of business care, and to see that he took the omnibus on a wet day. Minerva could overlook the servants, and hear Martha Washington's lessons for school. In fact, if she ever did expect to travel, now was emphatically her time. Two weeks before Anna Maria's last letter arrived, she had stepped into Bedlock's to look at a hat-box and traveling trunk. She wanted them very strong, as they were for a sea voyage. The foreman politely assured her those in the first row would be just the thing for going to the World's Fair with. Indeed, one of that very pattern was to be exhibited there, and it was but natural the rest should take the same road.

Mrs. Flanders did not attempt to explain the construction he had evidently put upon her remarks, neither did she resent it. She had on her velvet cloak, though it was early in October, and carried a silver porte-monnaie. Why should she not be suspected of a right of entrée to the Crystal Palace, especially as Anna Maria once went to the same school with Mrs. Lawrence? and no doubt she would be presented at court, if she chose to go, on the strength of that early attachment. Therefore the first purchase, after the trip had finally been decided upon, was the sole-leather trunk, including bonnet-box, of the same pattern that has since taken a medal at the Great Exhibition, and has made the name of Bedlock famous in the annals of travelers from all nations.

The cup of Mrs. Flanders' enjoyment brimmed during the next two weeks. There were shopping, and farewell calls, and announcements to make; and her hands—she wore sevens and a half—were emphatically full. Her milliner was informed that she would have a brown trimming upon her straw hat, because the spray would take the color out of green, her usual choice. She did not wish a tulle-ton lining, as salt water so soon took the stiffness out; neither must it be too expensive, for she should only wear it for a hack—in—Charleston! And then she looked for the expression of surprise which this announcement called forth, and was amply rewarded by the expressive "You don't say!" which Mrs. Brown's upraised hands, eyebrows, and voice united in.

Mrs. Potts was equally struck. With almost heroic calmness, Mrs. Flanders had withheld the precious information from her opposite neighbor during the first three days. She had intended a grand coup de théâtre, when the time for her parting visit drew nigh. But a twenty dollar sole-leather trunk, with "A. F., BOSTON," in large letters, could not proceed the length of the court, and stop at Mrs. Flanders' door, without notice. No wonder Mrs. Potts was cut down when she learned the truth. Mrs. Moses, too—what a triumph over her paltry New York trip! It was all a triumph, from commencement to close; from the foreman at Bedlock's to her last Sunday in the Meeting Street Congregational Church, where everybody shook hands in the lobby and wished her a pleasant voyage.

That was the principal thing of interest in the journey itself. She forgot to admire the elegance of the boats on the Fall River route, the beauty of a first glimpse of New York Bay, or the stately elegance of the city itself. She passed by Trinity with a "quite sweet," and did not give the Astor a second glance; they were quite too near home for any ecstasies. Besides, Mrs. Moses had seen them. Stewart's was the only thing which she condescended to admire; and then "a feeling of sadness and longing" came over her, as she saw a still later style of velvet cloak displayed in his superb shawl-room—later than that reposing in yards of clean towel in the topmost tray of the new trunk.

So she was very glad to find that the Marion would sail exactly at the hour specified; and it was with great satisfaction that she found herself deposited in the saloon at three o'clock of the same day. Here she parted with Mr. Flanders, who had made a business-pleasure trip, thus far escorting his wife, "as a man and a father should do"—we quote Mrs. F.—and, at the same time, getting a large order for shoes and palm-leaf hats, the principal commodities in his line, which more than repaid him for the loss of time and both steamboat tickets, supper included. The adieus were not very sentimental; for all the romance Miss Minerva Flanders was distinguished for "came from the mother's side of the family," and this, as may easily be understood, was somewhat faded in the light of nineteen years of matrimony. Besides, she was too much interested in the novelty of her situation to indulge in any unreasonable grief. The red eyes and swollen face of a steerage passenger, a young Irish girl parting with her betrothed, quite excited her disgust; nor could she understand the "ochone! ochone! acushla machree!" which the girl muttered as she rocked backwards and forwards, after he had gone, with tears in her eyes, I am bound to say, as being the evidence of anything more than a perverse desire to make the spectators uncomfortable. On the contrary, Mr. Flanders' "take care of yourself, Angeline," with a hearty squeeze of the hand, and the "good-by, Mr. Flanders, and don't forget those shoes for Martha," was quite a lesson to all beholders on the propriety of avoiding family scenes in public.

Mr. Flanders was not of the crowd who stood upon the deck to wave parting signals with hand and handkerchief. The Irish girl's lover leaned out, with his arm clasped around a beam, far over the dirty tide of chips and sea-weed that was washing into the slip, and waved the old tattered beaver that she knew so well; but Mr. Flanders had a business engagement with one of his correspondents at four, as high up as John Street, and no one ever knew him to be unpunctual. His wife did not mourn this seeming inattention on his part, but stood on deck wrapped in a new Bay State shawl, and the contemplation of her own newly-acquired dignity as a traveler. Two California steamers were moving down the bay at the same time. The signal guns, and the crowds attending their departure, were placed solely to the Marion's account. It was really much more than she had anticipated. Quite a triumphal progress as well as departure. But, after all the excitement was over, and the vessel moved steadily down towards the Narrows, the forest of masts lessening in the distance, and Governor's Island floating like a skiff upon the water, Mrs. Flanders had "no more use" for the scenery of New York harbor, but returned to the saloon to reconnoitre, or, to use her own phrase, "look about her."

There were fewer passengers than usual at this season of the year; but then the Savannah packets were now established and patronized, as well as the land route, by those who included a passing glimpse of Washington in their flitting north or south. However, the bustle and confusion that reigned there were delightful to Mrs. Flanders, and her enjoyment was furthermore heightened by finding that one of the most eligible berths had been secured to her. She did not at all like the large provision of white basins which the proprietors of the line had generously furnished, for she suspected the use they might be intended for; but she did not betray her inexperience as did the young lady from Vermont, who had never even seen the sea, and inquired if every lady was expected to make her toilet in her berth. Besides this unconscious maiden, there was the usual complement of ladies in every style of traveling costume, from chenée silks to "shilling calicoes," or "levy chintzes," according to the latitude, and some who, more experienced, or more provident than our heroine, had already assumed comfortable dressing-gowns, and were stretched upon the lounges with a book or paper, taking everything as a matter of course.

Among the last, Mrs. Flanders particularly remarked a lady of twenty-five, or it may be thirty, whose unusually fine hair, as she carelessly twisted it into the most compact form she could devise, had attracted the attention even of the stewardess, who does not usually condescend at first to acknowledge the existence of her temporary guests. She had a plain printed flannel dressing-gown, which Mrs. Flanders at first took for a mousseline-de-laine, and had exchanged her gaiters for comfortable slippers. Mrs. Flanders still sat in the dignity of her plaid dress, made in the latest Boston fashion, stiff linen collar and cuffs, and a gold chain at least a yard long, with a large gold pencil and a thick gold watch attached. The lady wore no jewelry but a cameo brooch, which fastened her collar, and a little child she had with her was dressed quite as plainly, having only a ruffle in the neck of her dress. The child was too young to talk very plainly, but she called the lady "nana;" while the stewardess, after a little time, addressed her, with a smile of recognition, as "Miss Fanny," and made many polite inquiries for various relations, which she remembered in turn, which were as politely replied to.

Mrs. Flanders could not account for it, but she was deeply interested in her, although she could see at once—discerning Mrs. Flanders!—that she was by no means wealthy. So she took a private opportunity to question the stewardess as to her name, and was informed that she was Miss Fanny Page, and known to the yellow mistress of ceremonies in her schoolgirl days, for she had been educated at the north. So it was settled in her mind that Miss Page had the misfortune never to receive an eligible offer, and was situated as a kind of head governess in some more fortunate relative's family. This explained her taking such excellent care of the child, and the family resemblance which she fancied she had detected. She resolved to extend the protecting ægis of her position as a matron, and the wife of a Boston merchant, to the unprotected Miss Fanny.

However, there was little time for any extension of courtesies at the present moment. The Marion had already entered the long rolling swells beyond Sandy Hook, and the promenaders were fast disappearing from deck. Mrs. Flanders began to find her situation in the large rocking-chair, which she had appropriated, extremely uncomfortable, to say the least; and, at last, was forced to take to her berth, still in the glory of her plaid laine de Saxony, which troubled her not a little at first, as might be seen from her frantic attempts to relieve herself from it. Even in the agonies of approaching sea-sickness, it distressed her to think of the creases and rumpling it might sustain ;—

"For, though on pleasure she was bent,
She had a frugal mind,"

as is related of the wife of the celebrated equestrian, Gilpin.

Little aid could be hoped from the stately lady who was responding to at least fifty calls of "Stewardess!" "Stewardess!" "Oh, stewardess!" She did what she could; but her attentions had, of necessity, to be divided. She could not be holding the head of the lady in No. 3, spreading a mattress for the cottage bonnet and dark merino dress in the upper saloon, bringing a towel to the weak request of berth 7, getting cologne for the pale face in No. 9 from the bottom of a deep hand-basket, picking up the child whose mother had taken to the sofa, talking to the captain at the door, endeavoring to convince the husband of No. 12 that she would take care of his wife, but he must not come into the ladies' cabin, assuring the Vermont young lady that she was not going to die, this time, at any rate, and be unfastening the tight laine de Saxony for Mrs. Flanders at the same time.

No wonder, then, that our heroine returned a grateful look—speak she could not—to Miss Page, who most kindly volunteered her services. She was accustomed to the voyage, and never suffered from it. "Stewardess" found her aid invaluable, and most freely it was given to any who needed it, through all the horrors of the evening, resting only when the pathetic moans and exclamations had, in some sort, subsided, and the sufferers sank into uneasy slumber by the

"To be sure, it's no more than she's accustomed to, poor thing!" thought Mrs. Flanders, as she composed her exhausted self to sleep; and so she fell into a dream that Mrs. Potts had bought a traveling dress exactly like hers, notwithstanding she had evaded all her inquiries on the subject, but that her own had been ruined completely by being left in a bath-tub of salt water by a chambermaid with a face like Miss Page's.

I cannot, as a faithful chronicler, record that much spirited and congenial conversation passed among the lady passengers of the Marion the following morning. Mrs. Flanders insisted that she was not at all ill, but always preferred to keep quiet on Sunday; the Vermont young lady, who, by the way, was going out as a teacher, had not yet been reassured as to reaching land in safety; No. 12, who was a bride, and could not raise her head from the pillow, was principally occupied in sending messages to her husband, who did not seem to move from the cabin-door; and No. 9 was fretfully denouncing all chambermaids, sea-sickness, and steamers in a breath. No. 7, who proved to be a very dashing lady of thirty-five, passed most of the morning at a trunk, which had been brought into the cabin for her accommodation, or in making a magnificent dinner toilet that would have been quite sufficient for a Saratoga table d'hôte. Mrs. Flanders was particularly struck by No. 7, who had her own maid; and, from their conversation, not at all in a minor key, she learned that her name was Humbert, and that she had been at every considerable watering-place at the north during the summer. She was now returning to her children, whom she had not seen for five months, and had her husband as well as her maid with her, a diminutive-looking man, who now and then came to the door to see if she would be pleased to call on him for anything.

Miss Page was neatly dressed at the usual hour, and was occupied principally with her little charge, who seemed very fond of her. The two were in company with a lad, who called Miss Page "Aunt Fanny," and the child "Gertrude;" but, as they did not choose to go on deck, they needed little attention.

Sunday is not exactly the day to introduce "poms and vanities" into conversation, but, somehow, Madame Humbert and Mrs. Flanders grew very confidential towards evening, telling each other a great deal about their families and position as regards society. Madame Humbert told of her town house, that it had lately been refurnished direct from Paris; that southern servants were such plagues, they having about thirty-five on their home lot, though she troubled herself very little about the plantation people. Indeed, she hated the plantation, and would willingly consent to have it sold, only it had been in Mr. Humbert's family for ever so long—from the time of William the Conqueror, she believed, or Pocahontas, or some of those people—and he couldn't be induced to part with it. For her part, she detested the very sound of cotton; there was sure to be a bad crop when she particularly wished to give a large party; though, as for that, she always would give parties, never mind what happened, or what Mr. Humbert said. "One must keep up one's visiting list, and mine is perfectly immense, and always has been since I persuaded Mr. Humbert to buy a house in town," she remarked.

Mrs. Flanders was delighted with her new acquaintance, and informed her, in turn, that her own family was quite as old as Mr. Humbert's; they had come over in the May Flower, as could be proved by a chain now in her possession as the oldest daughter. It had been a great trial to her family—Tufts was their name, distantly related to the Otises and Hancocks—when she consented to become Mrs. Flanders; but, then, his family was one of the very best in New Hampshire, related to Governor Hill's, on his mother's side. Hillsborough was named for them. However, he was a fine business man; business talent was appreciated in Boston, and he had already been spoken of for alderman in their ward. Mrs. Flanders coughed a little, and added she was going out for her health, their climate was so severe; and, since Mrs. Humbert knew so many people in Charleston, she must have met Mrs. Henry Morton Howard.

Mrs. Humbert's manner grew several degrees more tropical at the mention of this name. "Mrs. Howard! Oh yes! one of the most fashionable women in Charleston, and very exclusive. Was Mrs. Flanders to be her guest?"

"No—that is, not exactly. Her cousin, Mrs. Jessup, visited her intimately, and, of course, she should expect a great deal of attention from her."

"Mrs. Jessup?" Mrs. Humbert placed her finger in a meditative manner beside her very fine Roman nose—"Mrs. Jessup? She couldn't recollect the name; but no doubt she was one of the exclusives, too. Indeed, she must be, if she visited Mrs. Howard. She should be delighted to make the acquaintance of Mrs. Flanders' cousin, and hoped their acquaintance would not stop here. This was unusually fine cologne, direct from Lubin's, Paris; would Mrs. Flanders try some?"

It so happened that Miss Page dropped her book just then; she was sitting very near them. Indeed, she could not help overhearing the conversation. However, as Mrs. Humbert went to the mirror a few moments after to adjust her hair and bracelets, for the tenth time at least, Mrs. Flanders remembered how serviceable Miss Page had proved the evening before, and she had quite forgotten her intention to patronize and patronize the solitary lady, to whom no one but the stewardess seemed to pay any attention. Miss Page very politely closed the book, as she saw her kind intentions, and responded modestly to Mrs. Flanders' acknowledgments.

She started, at first, at hearing herself addressed by a stranger as Miss Page, but seemed to recollect, in an instant, that the stewardess had probably mentioned it.

"I suppose you have a pretty dull time of it?" said Mrs. Flanders, who had the popular idea of governess oppression, derived principally from modern English novels.

"Yes, rather dull on the plantation; but we are gayer in town."

"The family, I suppose. You haven't got many children to see to?"

"Only two: this little girl, and a brother almost old enough to go to school."

"Boys are dreadful unruly!" sighed Mrs. Flanders, who remembered three among her household jewels.

"Yes, a little spirited now and then; but I like spirit."

"I suppose you walk a great deal in town. Did you ever meet Mrs. Howard in?"

"King Street?" suggested Miss Page.

"Yes, King Street, like our Washington. Mrs.

Henry Morton Howard. You wouldn't be likely to meet her anywhere else, I suppose?"

"Not very," said her listener.

"Then you know about her. Do governesses mix much in society? I'm told not, however. Southerners are all so aristocratic, I'm told. My cousin, Mrs. Jessup, thinks so. She's very intimate with Mrs. Howard."

"Indeed!" Miss Page seemed more interested than before.

Surely there was magic in the name of her cousin's stylish friend. Mrs. Flanders' manner unconsciously acquired a new self-importance. She was more condescending than ever to the quiet, unfriended Miss Page.

"Oh yes," she continued; "and I expect to see a great deal of her this winter. She was north this season, and stopped at the Revere. I did not call on her, for Anna Maria's letter came just after she was gone; but I heard of her visiting the Winthrops and the Spragues, though we did not happen to meet."

Mrs. Flanders forgot to mention the reason they had not met—that she did not visit in either family.

Miss Page had frequently seen Mrs. Howard, indeed, she might say every day; but she had never spoken to her.

"Oh, of course not!" Mrs. Flanders had not expected that. She only wished to impress the humble governess with her own dignity as having a cousin who did speak to Mrs. Howard. The effect anticipated had been produced. Miss Page certainly regarded Mrs. Flanders much more attentively than before, particularly the next morning, when the captain politely escorted them to the deck, where the Vermont young lady and our heroine executed sundry involuntary polkas, to the edification of those who had learned to walk a plank more steadily. Mrs. Flanders prided herself on her benevolence and good feeling. She came up to Miss Page, when the captain had left her side, to say that to be sure it was very kind in him to walk so long with her, but unmarried, and particularly unprotected ladies, ought to be very careful, when so many eyes were upon them. Miss Page kept her eyes steadfastly upon the tip of her gaiter during this lecture, with an expression of becoming gravity, as if she at once saw and acknowledged the propriety of Mrs. Flanders' remarks, and was rewarded by an hour's conversation with her kind protectress, in which the great cost of housekeeping, Minerva's expensive education at the Abbott Female Seminary, the enormous charges of her milliner, and the number of new dresses she considered necessary for her southern campaign, formed the principal items. Miss Page was an excellent listener, and Gertrude was with the lad who called Miss Page Aunt Fanny. The bride sat near the flag-staff, with her husband's arm around her, and her head upon his shoulder, most of the day. The young lady from Vermont cried over Jane Eyre, and imagined herself being carried away from a lonely country-house by some devoted Rochester. Mrs. Humbert walked up and down, overshadowing her meek and attentive husband, as she displayed a toilet outshining that got up the day before expressly for the cabin. The weather was unusually mild, the passage especially fortunate. The intimacy between Meadames Humbert and Flanders increased at a similar progression, that is, nine knots an hour. Miss Page was patronized by both ladies, and did not at all presume upon their kindness. "Very proper in a governess," said Mrs. Humbert.

It is astonishing how soon one gets accustomed to faces on a steamer. There was quite a parting scene in the cabin next morning, as the tall spires of Charleston rose clear and gracefully before them. Mrs. Humbert said she should come very soon to see Mrs. Flanders, and took Mrs. Jessup's direction upon an ivory tablet with a gold pencil in the form of a cross. They were not on deck to see Miss Page drive away in an elegant private establishment, sent for her by the family; but Mrs. Flanders had previously parted from her with the advice to be particularly careful as regarded her conduct towards gentlemen, and the consolation that industry and humility were always rewarded sooner or later.

Mrs. Jessup and her cousin were having a confidential talk on the back piazza, as relatives who have not met for some years are apt to have. Mrs. Humbert's card had been left for her dear friend, Mrs. Flanders, the day after her arrival; since when, nearly two weeks, nothing more had been heard from her. But Mrs. Howard had sent invitations for a party that very morning, which was even more than Mrs. Flanders had expected. Mrs. Jessup was really surprised. The truth was, her acquaintance with Mrs. Howard was very slight, a talking acquaintance; that is, one to be talked about, though held on little more than speaking terms. In her own mind, she was quite convinced that her cousin would see no more of Mrs. Humbert from the moment she should discover Mr. Jessup was only manager for the great house of Gadsden & Brothers, although his salary was sufficiently ample to allow of their living in excellent style, and her relatives had always been given to understand he was "taken into the firm;" a vague, but suggestive post, occupied by the husband of many a lady anxious to get on in society otherwise than as the wife of a confidential clerk. It was to this last situation the clever Boston boy had risen since he first came south, as so many Yankee boys do, to seek his fortune.

Mr. Jessup, who did not share in the ambitious views of his lady, was sure there was some mistake about Mrs. Howard's invitations, though warned not to continue the subject, by an admonitory nod from his wife, before their cousin. However, Mrs. Flanders was settling in her own mind what she should wear upon the grand occasion, and had not heard them. Mr. Jessup could not deny that the cards were very distinctly written. And so to return to the back piazza. The ladies were about to separate for their all-important toilet.

"So you saw the governess in at Kerison's to-day. Did you notice whom she was with?" asked Mrs. Jessup.

"A tall gentleman, with a moustache; and she was talking as confidentially as possible with him. I gave her such a look! Girls are so careless. By the way, I was almost certain I passed Mrs. Humbert in a carriage as I came out; but it could not be, I saw in a moment; for, though I looked directly at her, she did not bow."

Mrs. Jessup, in her own mind, did not consider this at all conclusive. However, she did not say so, but called "Vic" to a little black damsel that was hurrying across the lot, and bade her come directly to attend Mrs. Flanders. Mrs. Jessup's fifteen servants, be it remarked, included three babies, four boys just old enough to get into mischief, and two old crones that kept the lot in a perpetual broil with their disputes and exactions.

Mrs. Flanders grew quite nervous over her toilet. She could not decide whether she had better wear her chenée silk with four pinked flounces, or a Mazarine blue poplin with very wide sleeves. The silk was finally decided upon, with the addition of a collar and undersleeves of showy application work—a à la window curtain—a throat ribbon and bracelets, of cherry velvet, the first being wide, and having the air of a flannel cold-curer. Also white kid gloves, with a deep finish of lace, the indispensable watch and chain, and a collection of flowers in her hair that would have puzzled a botanist, had they not been so evidently composed of silk and muslin; nor must we forget a small marabout feather on the left side.

Mrs. Jessup was scarcely more collected. It was a grand event for her, a party at the Howards! She had told her visitors of it for the past three days—Mrs. Howard was to give the party to her cousin, Mrs. Flanders, from Boston; neither did Mr. Jessup feel exactly comfortable as he offered his arm to the ladies in the hall. He held a high position for integrity and enterprise in Hague Street; but he did not know whom he was to meet, apart from his employers, who were the cousins of Mrs. Howard.

No wonder Mrs. Flanders' head grew giddy as she entered the brilliant rooms. The decorations were so admirably disposed, the lofty ceilings, the pictures, the statuary, the crowd of well-dressed people, and in the centre of the most prominent group stood the lonely governess of the Marion, receiving her guests as Mrs. Howard! She did not know this until they stood before her, or she never could have found courage to approach. As it was, she knew not what to say; but the calm self-possession sion of Mrs. Howard cured the too perceptible embarrassment of her late patroness, as she introduced her husband, the tall gentleman with the moustache. Poor Mrs. Flanders! it was quite too much, and she was very glad to escape to a recess and think over her mistake; and there she sat quite miserable, the very artificial flowers writhing with her mortification, when she was joined by her hostess.

"You must forgive my little ruse," said Mrs. Howard, blandly. "When I found that the stewardess had given you my maiden name, I understood your conclusion of governess-ship, particularly as Gertrude always will call me 'nana' for mamma."

"But you were alone," faltered Mrs. Flanders.

"Yes. I could not wait for Mr. Howard, who arrived only yesterday. My son—we had left him at his aunt's—was not well. I was under the charge of the captain, however, who is well known to Mr. Howard."

"And no servant?"

"I had left the Irish nurse, who had been a perfect annoyance all summer, in New York. Gertrude gives very little trouble, and has her own 'manner' here. You will find that we do not make servants of our governesses. That young lady in blue, talking with Mr. Graham Howard, teaches my sister's children. We consider her quite one of ourselves. There is one thing, though, that must seem strange to you—Mrs. Humbert's professed intimacy. I do not think she knows me by sight. She is one of our new people, and, I confess, we of Charleston do not take kindly to them."

Fortunately, Mrs. Flanders was not yet aware of Mr. Jessup's exact relation to Gadsden & Co., or she might have fancied her polite hostess personal.

"I must once more beg your forgiveness for keeping you in the dark," said Mrs. Howard, after a pause not exactly comfortable on either side; "but I hope to make amends by showing you anything in our city or neighborhood you would like to see. Miss Page, you find, is grateful," she added, laughingly. "And I must beg you not to tell Mrs. Jessup our little adventure until the evening is over. Mr. Howard has a great respect for her husband."

Mrs. Howard had not intended to be unkind; but the measure of her guest's mortification was full when she heard some ladies speak of that presuming Mrs. Humbert taking one of the front pews of St. Michael's." The drooping artificials could not be made to revive.

It was in vain that the really kind-hearted Mrs. Howard paid Mrs. Flanders every attention during the remainder of her stay. She never could feel quite at ease with the ci-devant Miss Page, or forget that she had boasted to her of expecting these very attentions.

Mr. Flanders seems to have got hold of the story in some way, for he invariably says, "Don't forget waking up the wrong passenger, my dear!" when his wife enlarges, to Mrs. Potts and Mrs. Moses, on her last winter's trip to Charleston.

POETRY.

THE SPIRIT OF THE PAST.

BY MYSTERIA.

THAT night of gorgeous beauty, and my thoughts had swept afar,

'Mid regions of bright dreams and hopes, where fairy visions are,

When a cloud seemed hovering o'er me, and a mist around me cast—

Dark figures rose before me, and I dreamed upon the past.

Methought I followed Caesar 'mid a dark and bloody war;
I crossed the seas and stood with him on Albion's rocky shore;

But soon, alas! I saw him fall, a corpse, at Pompey's feet;
His dying groan, and "Brutus, thou!" my listening ear did meet.

And next I saw Zenobia—Palmyra's beauteous queen—
In all her regal splendor, and in proud majestic mien;
Ambition written on her brow—pride sparkling in her eye,
As, in its splendid majesty, her gorgeous train swept by;
And then again I saw her great Aurelian's triumph grace—
Deep sorrow, too, had cast its blight upon that lovely face;
She's brought in wondrous beauty to adorn the victor's feast;

Oh! where has all thy glory fled, fair sovereign of the East?

21*

By valiant Cœur-de-Lion's side, I—naked sword in hand,
And England's banner waving high—fought for the Holy Land;

The battle o'er, I soon to Berengaria's tent depart,
And saw that love could conquer e'en that monarch's "LION HEART!"

With William Wallace then I led the gallant Highland band,

Who strove to save their country e'en from Edward's grasping hand;

I saw his high and noble head upon a scaffold fall—
And I wept for that brave spirit who, for Scotland, lost it all!

And next I gazed with burning eye, my heart o'ercome with dread,

On a fair girl in armor clad, and sword waved high o'erhead;
I followed that bright youthful form to dark and bloody scenes,

And saw the hard and cruel fate of Joan of Orleans!

With Christopher Columbus I sailed across the sea,
And on "the dark blue ocean" rolled in vague uncertainty,
Till my spirit leaped with rapture for that adventurous band,
When, almost yielding to despair, they heard the cry of "land!"

And then, with Queen Elizabeth, I sat on Britain's throne,
And saw the homage thousands paid—but to her power alone;

For soon my vision showed, alas! a dark and bloody stain,
That tarnished all the glory great of her illustrious name—
That all its splendor and renown, each brilliant action, blots—

The death of her the beauteous yet hapless Queen of Scots!

With Bonaparte's victorious troops to Moscow I did go,
And with them traversed Egypt's plains, and crossed the Alpine snow;

And when the Duke of Wellington the hero overthrew,
I heard the shout that rose upon the field of Waterloo!
I wept with Josephine in grief and solitude alone—
Her noble spirit would not stoop to sorrow for a throne;
Her tears fell not because she saw her glory all depart—
For what did aught avail when she had lost Napoleon's heart?

And, last, a vision fair and clear arose before my sight—
I saw a brow with laurel crowned, a form with glory bright;
'Twas he who fought to set his bound and shackled country free;

'Twas he who gave unto his land the boon of LIBERTY!
Whose patriot nobleness engraved his name our hearts upon—

The Father of his country—the godlike WASHINGTON!

The dream was past—my thoughts returned back to the earth once more;

Too soon the bright illusion fled—too soon the vision's o'er;
But many other dazzling scenes their lustre round me shed,

And many other forms I saw—now numbered with the dead!

THE CROWNED.

BY CAROLINE CHESBRO'.

WHEN, through th' expectant stillness, "Lo, I come!"

Broke, with a sudden gladness, on the ear,

That, but for faith, had grown too dull to hear—

Few hearts replied, "Hail, Master! hail, our own!"

And when He said, "My Father's work is done,"

And took for throne the cross He erst while bore,

The people, turning, looked, as they'd of yore,

To throne of pride, for their Redeeming One.

The Meek and Lowly was no Lord for them,

Their sceptre not for Him—the Sorrow-bowed;

And so they led him from Jerusalem,

And never saw God's anger through the cloud.

In bitter, jesting mood they crowned His head,

And only women wept when He was dead.

Since He, to whom all crowns are subject, won,

From man's appreciation, but a wreath

Of thorns, entwined by mocking unbelief,

Why look for man to judge what thou hast done?

Yield thy account, O striver! unto One

Whose wisdom knows not an obscuring cloud,

Whose life is doomed not to the funeral shroud;

To Him, whose mind is brighter than the sun,

Self-crowned with faith, strive to thy utmost strength

In thine own field, and yet another crow

Around thy spirit shall be laid, at length,

No shadow from its circle drooping down.

Only thy faith and deeds for tribute bring,

And He will never ask, "Wert thou acknowledged king?"

LORD BYRON.

BY THE "BARD OF BALTIMORE."

THINE was a mind of most unearthly cast,
Which held no kindred with its fellow kind,
But, soaring on the pinions of the blast,
It towered amid the clouds—while, far behind,
Earth's humbler millions, wond'ring, shrunk aghast
From sights which strike the weaker vision blind—
While thou, like eagle soaring to the sun,
Hidst deemed thy giant race but scarce begun!

And hadst thou still maintained such dizzy height,
And dreamt thy dreamings out amid the skies,
Thou mightst have shone, a bright unfading light;
But, like the setting sun, thou didst but rise
To lose thy peerless splendor in the night
Which set its seal of darkness on thine eyes;
And, blind and tottering in its moral gloom,
Thy traitor Genius shaped its master's tomb!

Life is a cup—its surface sweet to taste;
And he who would enjoy must learn to sip;
For, quaffing it with much too eager haste,
Its dregs soon turn to "ashes on his lip,"
And leave his soul a bleak and wintry waste,
With all the visions of his fancy nipped
E'en in their bud: and thus it was with thee,
Poor Byron! fallen child of poetry!

With bold and fearful power thou didst tear
The mystic veil from all life's hidden things,
And then thy rebel soul was doomed to bear
The penalty which too much knowledge brings:
Life's brighter lights to thee grew dark and drear—
The mortal drooped, though perched on angel's wings!
And now, with all the gifts of Genius blest,
Thou didst but ask of Death the boon of—rest!

"I SLEEP, BUT MY HEART WAKETH."

BY MARY A. FAY.

I SLEEP, but my heart waketh—it waketh to dream
Of joys that have vanished like the sun's parting beam;
Of hopes that, like flowers, in life's springtime were gay,
But withered like flowers in the sun's fervent ray;
Of friends, the true-hearted, the constant, the dear,
Whose soft tones and sweet smiles no more bless me here,
But who bend o'er me still from their bright home above,
And watch me and guard me with unfailing love.

I sleep, but my heart waketh—it waketh to sigh
O'er the visions that gladdened the hours gone by;
When life was all sunshine, and care but a name,
And my bosom ne'er glowed with passion's wild flame;
When I walked forth with Purity, Innocence, Truth—
Those guardians and guides of the heart's early youth;
Alas! that such guardians should ever depart,
And leave all unsheltered the tempest-tost heart!

I sleep, but my heart waketh—it waketh to muse
O'er love that just dawned, then fled like the dews;
O'er friendship I deemed till life's evening should last,
But faded away ere its morning was past.
When memories like these glide over the heart,
Its quiet is broken, its sweet slumbers depart;
Such memories e'en the sleep of the senses oft break,
And thus, though I slumber, my heart is awake.

A PORTRAIT.

BY MISS E. E. CABLE.

SHE was fair in maidenhood,
Very beautiful and fair;
With a tender, loving smile
Shrined 'mid clustering golden hair;
And an inward grace of soul
Into all her motions stole:

And a stately dignity,
Like a statue's velling fold,
Hung around the polished stone,
In the temple's perfect mould,
To preserve from aught too rude
The beautiful similitude.

Charity had holy work
In her ever-gentle heart;
Patience was perfected there,
Waiting was her kindly art
For she knew the paths astray
More tempting than the perfect way.

Pity, like a soft dew, fell
From her ever-open soul,
Soothing the weak, wearied ones,
More than all her daily dole;
Almonies thus doubly given
Sent her to the store of Heaven.

And she learned another part—
Or 'twas woman's native skill—
But she'd power a shrunken heart
With her precious love to fill:
Who the joy had never known
Thrilled to hear her magic tone.

And another love she cherished,
Growing ever holier;
By the altar of her prayer
Grew it, casting out her fear:
So in peace and perfect love
Passed she to her home above.

MY BOOK.

BY ALPH OF THE MANOR.

Come out, old honest friend—"my book,"
This winter night, so drear and cold;
Come out—from out thy dusty nook—
And talk to me as wont of old:
My lamp, grown dim, I will retrim;
My fire shall be renewed, I trow;
For this is meet when two friends greet—
And such two friends as I and thou.

My life has changed since last we met;
Thou'lt mind, I think, that summer time
When, every hour, my heart was set
To music breathed in thy sweet rhyme:
My life has changed—yet still a place
My heart has sacred kept for thee;
And, of all other friends, no face
Than thine to-night would welcome be.

Nor is this strange, when I reflect
How thoughtless late I've been of thee,
Who always, spite of my neglect,
Has proved so true a friend to me;

Who always had a word of cheer,
Just fitting for my mood of mind,
And one that I believed sincere,
As it was ever warm and kind.

Then leave, old friend, thy dusty place;
Come, bring to-night back "other days,"
And, sitting here, thus face to face,
Rechant to me thy charming lays;
For they have power, thou know'st, of old,
To take from me all fear of ill,
And, by their tenderness, to mould
My stubborn passions to their will.

OUR SEAT BENEATH THE BOWER.

BY D. ELLEN GOODMAN.

There is a little rustic seat
Beneath our garden bower,
Around which light and nimble feet
Have pressed full many a flower
Into the green and golden turf,
That, like a carpet spread,
Glows 'neath the silver rays that creep
Softly from overhead.

A large old elm is just behind,
With thickly clustering leaves,
And boughs that cross and intertwine;
And their deep shadow weaves,
Over the mossy ground beneath,
And with the bright-eyed flowers,
A trembling wreath of light and shade,
Fit for a princess' bowers.

The sky peeps through the quivering crown
At morn and noon and even,
Throwing its glances meekly down
Like a blue eye from heaven;
And stars gleam through the parted leaves,
Like diamonds on the brow
Of Beauty, and the soft wind sighs
In murmurs sweet and low.

That little rustic seat—oh! there
We've gathered, many a time,
To listen to the humble prayer
That, with melodious chime,
Stole on the quiet eve. For he,
Our aged, holy friend,
With eye of faith and heart of love,
Would on the green meads bend.

And with his calm and furrowed brow,
So meekly raised above
That shaded seat (I see him now,
And hear his tone of love),
Would ask that Heaven's rich gifts might shower
Upon each youthful head,
And that a bright and flowery way
Our feet might ever tread.

I see him now—on his white hair
The dewdrops brightly glowing,
And from his thin cheek, pale with care,
The long gray tresses blowing.
But he has gone to rest: no more
Will his slow trembling feet
Press heavily the moss that grows
About our rustic seat!

THE FIRST BORN.

BY ANN E. PORTER.

LIKE the sweet snowdrop 'mid its sheltering leaves,
 So lay my babe within its cradle bed;
 Its little hands were folded on its breast,
 And calm as angels' brow its quiet sleep;
 One tiny foot from 'neath the mantle's folds
 Had strayed, all stainless from the dust of earth.
 I hushed the song that hung upon my lips,
 For voice like mine wrought not such blest repose
 But music, such as cherubs chant in Heaven,
 Had lulled the slumberer in the arms of peace.
 I bent me o'er the couch of this sweet babe,
 And all the gushing tenderness of love
 Came welling up from my fond, happy heart;
A mother's pangs were all forgotten then,
 All lost in the o'erwhelming tide of love.
 Just then the babe awoke, and turned its soft Blue eyes up to my own, and smiled. It was His first bright smile, and to my spirit seemed Like Heaven's blessing on the holy bond.
 Oh! there are moments in this fleeting life
 When every pulse beats love, and the soft air
 Is full of fragrance from a purer clime.
 And then how sweet it is to pray—far better
 Than to praise—that is the voice of gladness;
 But deepest joy doth vent itself in prayer—
 And thus my o'erfraught heart found sweet relief.
 O God! I thank thee for this precious gift;
 Oh! make me pure, my spirit fresh baptize,
 That I may guard my precious treasure well,
 Nor dim its brightness by a breath of sin;
 But, with a sleepless vigil in a world
 Of guilt, be faithful to the holy trust,
 And bear it back to thee when thou shalt call
 A polished jewel for my Maker's crown.

EVENING.

BY CATHERINE.

DAY declines—

The last bright tinges of the setting sun,
 That robed in splendor the empurpled clouds,
 And gilded the surrounding scenery
 With streaks of crimson and of burnished gold,
 Have gently faded from the western skies.
 The soft reflections from the greenwood side,
 Seen in the bosom of the clear blue waters—
 They too have vanished like a morning dream.

The winds are hushed;

The shades of Evening are gathering fast,
 And o'er the Highlands floats a shadowy cloud;
 Soaring away above the distant hills
 The feathered songster seeks her downy nest—
 While wild birds skim the surface of the deep.
 On yon tall tree that bends above the river,
 Whose boughs seem shattered by the wintry storm,
 Sits the lone night owl, looking o'er the brake
 Where the mute partridge and her timid mate
 Stand ready to hide their little heads
 Under the sedgy grass.

Time moves apace—

Night's sable mantle now hangs o'er the scene,
 Wrapping the forest trees in deeper gloom.
 No moon breaks forth, no twinkling stars appear,

To guide the weary traveler on his way—
 But all is settled into dark'ning night,
 Though soon the morn will burst her golden gates,
 And gladden nature with her cheerful beams.

Thus ends the Christian's life:

He slowly journeys on his homeward way;
 His sun goes down; the night of death comes on;
 Breathing a prayer, he calmly sleeps the sleep
 That knows no waking in this mundane sphere—
 But his freed spirit soars on angels' wings
 To realms of light, where peace and glory reign:
 There, in the mansions of eternal day,
 He joins the music of the heavenly choir,
 To praise the Saviour in more lofty strains.

THE HEART'S PICTURES.

BY ANN D. W. SWEET.

THOUGH some may boast of pictures rare, from ancient cities brought,
 Instinct with all of beauty, that the limner's eye hath caught
 And traced upon the canvas, with a skill almost divine,
 I envy not their gems of art, nor wish to call them mine.

Yet think not that unto my soul the joy hath not been given
 To prize each gleam of beauty as a radiant beam from heaven;
 Oh no; for to my heart belongs, coeval with its birth,
 To almost worship, when it meets, the beautiful of earth.

But safely ranged in memory's halls, all free from cost and care,
 Are lifelike portraits to my soul, a thousand times more fair
 Than aught enriched by softening time, the work of masters old,
 Stamped with Italia's gorgeous grace with genius rare and bold.

And first among the treasured group, the crown of all the rest,
 Stars of my earthly pilgrimage, the dearest and the best,
 Are they who blessing first invoked upon my infant head, Whose changeless love I pray to God may soothe my dying bed.

You 'd almost wonder could you see how truly they are traced
 Upon the tablets of my heart, each dear and absent face;
 My brothers' looks of earnest truth, which speak the soul
 as fair—
 The same sad smile my sisters wore at parting—all are there!

And one, a sweet and aged face, in saint-like beauty drest,
 Unerring transcript of a soul, now entered into rest—
 All holy are the thoughts that sweep, the chords of memory's lyre,
 As reverently o'er this I weep, the mother of my sire.

Many are there, besides my kin, friends of my early youth,
 'Twas when my heart received each word, and smile, and grasp, as truth;
 But some are gone, and some estranged, and many with the blest,
 "Where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

No feudal towers, nor lordly halls, nor splendor there I trace—

Oh no! such gorgeous glittering things would ill besecm the place;

But in their stead a picture rich, with earth, and flowers, and sky—

A scene of quiet beauty, which an earldom could not buy.

The willow near the door was sketched with a likeness true as fate—

Nor less the two large locust trees, that guard the "old farm gate;"

The rose-trees and the creeping vines, the maples on the lawn,

With white walls gleaming through the leaves, by a skillful hand are drawn.

Would ye know from what mysterious source its wealth and worth arise?

For to me it has a beauty that I prize above all price;

Why oft my heart to its peaceful haunts, like a weary bird has flown?

Oh! that spot is sanctified and blest with the hallowed name of home!

SPEAK TO THAT YOUTH.

BY ROBERT JOHNSON.

SPEAK to that youth; thy timely warning
May save him many years of pain;
Though he appears all counsel scorning,
One gentle word may him restrain.

Check that young man—but do it mildly,
Nor pass him by with cold neglect;
While now he seems to rush on wildly,
Thy voice may make himself respect.

Speak kindly, sister, he's thy brother;
Throw round love's fetters when he'd roam;
Thy voice, thy smile, so like none other,
May win the wayward to his home.

Frown not, but smile, whene'er you meet him,
For sorrow's cloud may dim his day;
Sweet words of kindness, when you greet him,
Will cheer him on life's gloomy way.

Speak to that youth, with prospects blighted,
And soul debased by hoarded store;
Thou, parent, art the cause he's slighted—
And shouldst thou turn him from thy door?

Stop that young man, thy friendship proffer;
Let confidence his feet restrain:
Should he, in haste, reject thy offer,
Forsake him not, but try again.

Speak to that boy, ere sloth has given
Its giant power to chain his soul,
And idleness her car has driven
Beyond the power of man's control.

Teach him respect for good behavior;
Show him that vice engenders strife;
And, most of all, make the world's Saviour
A pattern for his future life.

While here, keep trying—never falter;
Do good in every way you can;
For, if you cannot wholly alter,
You may improve the state of man.

TO AN EAGLE.

BY A GOTHAMITE.

SOAR on, imperial bird, nor check thy flight—
No storm-clouds roll above yon mountain's height;
There speed thy course—there stay thy pinions wide;
The storm but beats against the mountain side.

Soar upward still, and cleave the stormy sky;
Rise on broad wings, and o'er the tempest fly:
There, on yon lofty mountain's beetling height,
Furl thy swift pinions—stay thy rapid flight.

Above the storm 'tis calm as summer's morn,
When dewy tears the blooming flowers adorn;
There thou canst spread thy "wet wings to the sun,"
And watch thine eyrie till the storm be done.

Go—lest the serpent, seeking for his food,
Strike, with envenomed fang, thy callow brood;
Go—watch thine eaglets; on yon craggy peak
The wheeling vulture whets his murderous beak.

Soar on, soar on; the lark that mounts the sky
Is large as thou, so distant from mine eye;
A spot—a speck; thou 'st faded from my view,
To soar at will through fields of azure hue.

Oh! could my mind, unfettered as thy wing,
Soar through the clouds, an unembodied thing,
I'd leave the earth to visit worlds unknown,
And skies, with glowing stars, should be my throne.

There the bespangled vault of heaven I'd tread,
With circling rainbows arching o'er my head;
Not he at Chindara's* fount such music hears
As I, when listening to the chiming spheres.

But no; earth's fetters chain my spirit down,
As men are governed by a despot's frown;
But more like thee when struggling hard to soar,
And, harder struggling, sink to rise no more.

* A fabulous fountain, where instruments are said to be constantly playing.

THE CONTENTED WIFE.

BY NILLA.

I WOULD not change this happy scene
For all the earth calls proudly great;
I would not change my humble home
For kingly rank or queenly state.

I would not change my husband's love
For all that earth can give of fame;
Nor barter his approving smile
To wreath a halo round my name!

I would not change my child's sweet glance
For all the love earth's wealth could gain;
Nor change the certain bliss I feel,
For all ambition might obtain.

What blessings, great and numberless,
My God with sweetest hopes hath blent—
A happy home, endearing friends,
With health, and love, and true content!

THE NURSERY.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 3.

Fig. 1. An infant's robe intended for great occasions, as it would be quite too expensive in the getting up for the daily routine of nursery life. The skirt is of fine French cambric, very full and long, and ornamented only by several narrow tucks near the hem. The corsage has a small basque attached, which is quite a novelty in an infant's robe. This, as well as the sleeves, is finished with narrow tucks, and a very fine edging of needlework. The richly embroidered insertion of which the waist is composed is beautifully given in our cut, the front of the corsage being inclosed by insertion placed en tablier, or lengthwise. The broad cambric strings are intended to tie sashwise. This is not the christening-robe of which we spoke in our last, being, elegant as it is, far inferior.

Fig. 2. Dress for a young child of richly ornamented needlework, the skirt being of tunic fashion, and edged by heavy scollops, put on in easy fullness. The waist is separated from the skirt entirely by a belt, but is made to correspond with it in fashion. The sleeves are also very pretty, while the corsage is en chemisette. The sleeves of infants' robes are looped with ribbon, or gold bracelets, as the mother may choose.

Fig. 3. Child's drawers, with pantalettes of ornamental needlework, in scollops, as all the cambric patterns now are. It will be found an excellent pattern, the pointed waistband in particular.

We shall, from time to time, give other articles suited to the nursery.

KNOTTED NECK-TIE.

Materials.—Of two shades of pink floss silk, four skeins dark, and three light skeins of brown ditto.

For the mode of knitting, see the diagrams and instructions for the hair-net in our last number.

For this neck-tie the floss silk is cut into lengths of $1\frac{1}{4}$ yard each; 4 lengths of brown, 16 of the darkest pink, and 8 of the light. They are arranged thus: 2 brown at each border, then 8 dark pink, and 8 light for the centre. To give the ends a richer appearance, the strands are used double, short extra pieces, 8 inches long, being used with the others, and a short and a long used together as one. Begin by knotting the ends together, in one firm knot for every pair, that is, 2 short and 2 long, leaving a fringe $2\frac{1}{2}$ inches long; then proceed with the usual knot, working alternately with the outer (No. 1) strand, and the inner (No. 4). Where a succession of knots are made, they are always thus reversed: Do 4 knots with the same set along the row, then 4 with the intermediate, omitting altogether the two pairs at the edges: allow half an inch of silk between the rows of knots. When the short pieces are used, secure the ends by an ordinary knot that will not slip, and continue with the single strands, working a length of 10 knots (5 on each side with every four), until only 8 inches of silk remain, when add short strands, and make an end to correspond with the first. This neck-tie would be very pretty if made with cerise and black chenille, or any other colors suitable for winter wear.

WORK-BASKET.

The foundation is formed of fine wicker-work, on which flowers are embroidered in pink and cerise-color chenille; the leaves in different shades of green chenille. To produce the raised effect which is observed, the flowers and leaves are previously worked in white Berlin wool, over which the chenille is drawn in long stitches like what may be called coarse embroidery. The ground is worked in the gobelin stitch with straw-colored Berlin wool. The basket is lined with green satin, and finished at the edge with chenille of the same color.

KNITTING FOR THE NURSERY.

INFANT'S LACE SOCK.

Seventh row.—Knit thirteen, knit two together, † make one, knit three, make one, knit three together, † repeat seven times, finish with—make one, knit three, make one, knit two together, knit twelve.

Ninth row.—Knit fourteen, † make one, knit two together, knit one, knit two together, make one, knit one, † repeat seven times, finish with—make one, knit two together, knit one, knit two together, make one, knit thirteen.

Eleventh row.—Knit fifteen, † make one, knit three together, make one, knit three, † repeat seven times, finish with—make one, knit three together, make one, knit fourteen.

Twelfth row.—Purl thirteen, purl two together, † make one, purl one, make one, purl two together, taken at the back, purl one, purl two together, † repeat seven times, finish with—make one, purl one, make one, purl two together at the back, purl fourteen.

Thirteenth row.—Knit fourteen, slip one, knit one, pass the slipped stitch over, † make one, knit one, make one, knit two together, knit one, slip one, knit one, pass the slipped stitch over, † repeat seven times, finish with—make one, knit one, make one, knit two together, knit thirteen.

Repeat the twelfth and thirteenth rows twice more, purling the alternate rows as usual.

Eighteenth row.—Repeat the twelfth, then commence again at the seventh row, and work until the eleventh row is completed. Now purl the twenty-fourth row, knit the twenty-fifth and purl the twenty-sixth rows.

Twenty-seventh row.—Knit fifteen, † make one, and knit two together twenty-six times, † knit thirteen.

Twenty-eighth row.—Purled.

Twenty-ninth row.—Knitted.

Thirtieth row.—Purled.

Thirty-first row.—Knit fourteen, knit two together, † make one, knit one, make one, knit two together, knit three, knit two together, † repeat, finish with—make one, knit one, make one, knit two together, knit thirteen.

Thirty-third row.—Knit thirteen, knit two together, † make one, knit three, make one, knit two together, knit one, knit two together, † repeat, finish with, make one, knit three, make one, knit two together, knit twelve.

Thirty-fifth row.—Knit twelve, knit two together, † make one, knit five, make one, knit three together, † repeat, finish with—make one, knit five, make one, knit two together, knit eleven.

Thirty-seventh row.—Knit thirteen, † make one, knit two together, knit three, knit two together, make one, knit one, † repeat, finish with—make one, knit two together, knit three, knit two together, make one, knit twelve.

Thirty-ninth row.—Knit fourteen, † make one, knit two together, knit one, knit two together, make one, knit three, † repeat, finish with—make one, knit two together, knit one, knit two together, make one, knit thirteen.

Forty-first row.—Knit fifteen, † make one, knit three together, make one, knit five, † repeat, finish with—make one, knit three together, make one, knit fourteen.

Forty-second row.—Purled. Repeat the pattern, commencing at the thirty-first, and ending at the thirty-sixth row, which will be purled, and will make after the repetition forty-eight rows.

TO FORM THE HEEL.

First row.—Knit thirteen, make one, knit two together, knit three, knit two together, make one, pick up a stitch, and knit it. Leave the remaining stitches on the needle, and purl back; every alternate row to be purled until the seventeenth.

Third row.—Knit fourteen, make one, knit two together, knit one, knit two together, make one, knit two.

Fifth row.—Knit fifteen, make one, knit three together, make one, knit three.

Seventh row.—Knit fourteen, knit two together, make one, knit one, make one, knit two together, knit two.

Ninth row.—Knit thirteen, knit two together, make one, knit three, make one, knit two together, knit one.

Eleventh row.—Knit twelve, knit two together, make one, knit five, make one, knit two together. The five next rows to be purled and plain knitting, purling the first and last rows.

Seventeenth row.—Knit two, knit two together, knit the rest plain.

Eighteenth row.—Purl sixteen, purl two together, purl two.

Nineteenth row.—Same as the seventeenth.

Twentieth row.—Purl fourteen, purl two together, purl two, cast off. Take off on another needle forty stitches for the instep, which will leave twenty for the other part of the heel, join on your cotton, and proceed as follows:—

First row.—Knit one, make one, knit two together, knit three, knit two together, make one, knit twelve, every alternate row to be purled until the seventeenth.

Third row.—Knit two, make one, knit two together, knit one, knit two together, make one, knit thirteen.

Fifth row.—Knit three, make one, knit three together, make one, knit fourteen.

Seventh row.—Knit two, knit two together, make one, knit one, make one, knit two together, knit thirteen.

Ninth row.—Knit one, knit two together, make one, knit three, make one, knit two together, knit twelve.

Eleventh row.—Knit two together, make one, knit five, make one, knit two together, knit eleven.

The next five rows to be plain purling and knitting, purling the first and last rows.

Seventeenth row.—Knit sixteen, knit two together, knit two.

Eighteenth row.—Purl two, purl two together, purl fifteen.

Nineteenth row.—Knit fourteen, knit two together, knit two.

Twentieth row.—Purl two, purl two together, purl thirteen, cast off.

Pick up twenty stitches at each end of the needle, from the inside of the two heel-pieces; you will then have eighty stitches on your needle, join on your cotton, and knit the thirty-seventh to the forty-second rows, purling the alternate rows; then knit the thirty-first to the forty-second rows three times, again purling the alternate rows; you will then have five perfect diamonds up the front.

FOR THE TOE.

First row.—† Knit seventeen, knit two together, knit two, knit two together, knit seventeen, † repeat. Second row, and every alternate row purled.

Third row.—Same as the first, but knitting sixteen instead of seventeen; the fifth as the third, but knitting fifteen. Continue in this way, decreasing the number of plain stitches until the fifteenth row, which will work thus:—

Fifteenth row.—† Knit ten, knit two together, knit two, knit two together, knit ten, † repeat. Take another needle, and purl twelve stitches, and with

EDITORS' TABLE.

It is curious to note the contempt for woman's intellect expressed by men generally, with the compliments, or confessions rather, of her wonderful sagacity, which are implied before the scene described or incidents recorded are concluded. We were amused by a recent specimen of this inconsistency. In a work lately published—"Correspondance entre le Comte De Mirabeau et le Comte De la Marck, pendant les années 1789, 1790, et 1791," &c.—the Count De la Marck says of Marie Antoinette, "The queen, so far from having any taste or desire to meddle in public affairs (before the Revolution), had a positive repugnance for doing so—probably arising from the usual levity of the female character." We have marked this last profound observation, to make it more emphatic. The levity of the female mind or character is set down as an established fact! Yet, in this same "Correspondence," as it progresses, are brought out the true strength, steadfastness, and sagacity of each character mingling in that awful drama; and the queen, by the united testimony of the most eminent men, attests the loftiest part of all. De la Marck acknowledges her superiority and the natural power of her mind, to unravel the dark intricacies of deceit and danger around her. Mirabeau, commenting on the royal counselors, says, significantly, "Le Roi n'a qu'un homme, c'est sa femme." The king has but one man—it is his wife.

But there is a testimonial of her great abilities more sure and solemn than the acknowledgments of men: it is the emanations of her own mind. In this "Correspondence" is a letter of the queen to Comte De Mercy, dated August 16, 1791. The British reviewer says of this "remarkable letter," that "it far exceeds in interest any letter in the 'Mirabeau and La Marck Correspondence.'" On reading it, it is difficult not to come to the conclusion that, if Marie Antoinette had been sovereign, either royalty would have perished in her hands, or she would have died in the field, and not on the scaffold."

The result of the opinions of these men is this: La Marck and Mirabeau acknowledge the talents of Marie Antoinette to be far superior to those of Louis XVI., or any man of his court and cabinet; while the British reviewer places her in sagacity above both La Marck and Mirabeau. Yet, while these confessions are extracted from men by facts which they cannot but admit, they still persist in stigmatizing the female mind as "frivolous," "weak," and unable to comprehend the general principles of philosophy and science. The aim of female education, when any mental culture at all is permitted, has been to keep the mind of women engaged in frivolous pursuits—the accomplishments, as these are called—besides then, because they devote themselves chiefly to what they have been taught to value as most befitting their talents and station, they are accused of "natural levity of character."

Give women some pursuit which men esteem important, and see if their work is not well done, provided they are suitably trained. Now, we do not desire to change the station of the sexes, or give to women the work of men. We only want our sex to become fitted for their own sphere. But we believe this comprises, besides all household care and domestic duties, three important vocations, requiring that female education should be as amply provided for, and conducted on a scale as liberal, as that of the other sex.

Women are the teachers—they should be qualified for this great department, and employed in it; if not entirely to the exclusion of male teachers, yet certainly in a tenfold proportion.

Women are the preservers—they should be instructed in medical science, and become physicians for their own sex and for children.

Women are the helpers—they should be intrusted with the management of all charities where their own sex and children are concerned. They might manage Savings Banks, and they would do this to better advantage for the poor depositors than is now the fashion. The idea of Savings Banks was originated by a woman, Mrs. Friedlla Wakefield.

WHAT WOMEN ARE DOING.—We have just enumerated three pursuits that we call truly feminine. The first, that of teaching, is happily progressing in our land. We will treat of it more at large in a future number. The second, female physicians, is rapidly gaining ground in public favor. Our "Appeal"—see page 185—will demonstrate this. Since that was written, the first public Commencement of a Female Medical College ever held in the world was witnessed in Philadelphia. It was a proud day for the true friends of moral progress, which can only be attained by placing the female sex where God has ordained their power—as conservators of home, health, and happiness.

The graduating class, consisting of eight ladies, deputed themselves with that modest, womanly dignity commanding admiration and respect from the immense assemblage. Probably fifteen hundred persons were present, and witnessed with approbation the conferring of full degrees of Doctor of Medicine on these young women. And such is the call for female physicians that, had the number, instead of eight, consisted of eighty, or even eight hundred, we believe they would all succeed in finding places open for their practice. We advise every young woman who has a taste for the profession, and wishes for the means of supporting herself and doing good, to enter on the study of medicine without delay.

THE TROUBLES OF A POET.—A popular poet relates that one of his friends expressed great anxiety to obtain a sight of a new work of his, just then publishing. Accordingly, he took some pains, and went to some expense to gratify so laudable and flattering a curiosity. Having procured a copy, he hastened with it to his friend; and, not finding him at home, left the precious volume on his table. They met some weeks afterwards, and the critic began to upbraid the poet for not complying with his request. An explanation ensuing, it appeared that the new book had lain, during this interval, not unseen, but unopened on the table. "Truly," says the critic, "I heard you were at my chamber, but it never occurred to me that you had left the book; for which I am sorry, as it was but yesterday that I suffered Betsy to take it: she complained so grievously of wanting paper to put up her hair with." The poet's mortification was heightened by having filled a blank leaf with an epigrammatic dedication to his friend, which he intended as a prodigy, not only of wit, but of penmanship. The volume was forthwith reclaimed from the toilet; but the epigram, and one of his choicest episodes, had descended from the lady's brows to some receptacle of dust and ashes, from which they were irrecoverable.

FEMALE WRITERS.

"Soyez plutôt maçon si c'est là votre talent,
Ouvriers estime dans un travail nécessaire,
Qu' auteurs méprisé on prête vulgaire."

Thus speaks a judicious critic, and with him we fully concur. Such women as Miss Edgeworth and Mrs. More, who instruct nations and delight successive generations, are to be prized above all stitchers and knitters, as far as spirit is beyond matter; but a good pair of stockings, or a well-made petticoat, is a much better thing than a feeble attempt at literature. Many persons mistake a desire, for the ability to perform; pale reflections of the brilliancy that has dazzled in the writings of others; exaggerations of common ideas; incidents that have been rechauffé a thousand times; a tyrannical father, an angel for the lover, a mercenary and defeated speculator, a triumphant heroine—stories are every day produced from such materials. But will these be read? Will they bring as much satisfaction, credit, or reward to the manufacturer as might be obtained by the despised NEEDLES?

OUR TREASURY.
WONDERFUL CHILDREN.

BY LADY MORGAN.

"So wise, so young, they say do ne'er live long."

RICHARD III.

It is a curious fact that, in the present times, we have none of those precocious prodigies so numerous in the olden time. It seems to have been one of the peculiar privileges of the wisdom of our ancestors to produce those infant miracles of learning and science, the "admirable Crichtons" of the nursery, who studied in cradles and lectured from go-carts. "I was not," says the quaint, but most amusing Mr. Evelyn, "initiated into any rudiments till I was four years old; and then one Friar taught us at the church door of Wotton!" This—"till I was four years old"—marks his conviction of his own backwardness, in comparing himself with other children of his age and times; but it was more particularly in reference to the superior wit, talent, and learning of his own son, at that early period of his brief existence, who was, to use his afflicted father's words, a "prodigy for wit and understanding." A prodigy, indeed! for, "at two years and a half old, he could perfectly read any of the English, French, Latin, and Gothic characters, pronouncing the three first languages exactly," &c. &c.

The termination of this most short, splendid, and unnatural career is worth marking: "He died," says Evelyn, "at five years, after six fits of quartan ague, with which it pleased God to visit him; though, in my opinion, he was suffocated by the women and maids who tended him, and covered him too hot with blankets, as he lay in a cradle, near an excessive hot fire (in a quartan fever)! I suffered him to be opened, when they found he was what is vulgarly called, livergrown!" What a picture! what a history of the times, the state of science, and the wisdom of our ancestors! In the first instance, the attributing an inflection to the Divine visitation, which was, at the same time, assignable to vulgar nursery maids and hot blankets. In the next, the vain father not perceiving that the genius of his child was but disease, and his supernatural intelligence only the unnatural development of faculties, most probably produced by mal-organization, which the style of his rearing and education was so calculated to confirm. "Before his fifth year, he had not only skill to read most written hands, but to decline all nouns, conjugate the verbs, regular and irregular, learned out 'Puerilis,' got by heart almost the entire vocabulary of Latin and French primitives, could make congruous syntax, turn English into Latin, construe and prove what he had read, knew the government and use of relatives, verbs, substantives, ellipsis, and many figures and tropes, and made a considerable progress in Comenius's 'Janua,' and had a strong passion for Greek."

This is too frightful—it makes one shudder to transcribe it. Such, however, was the education by which an accomplished and really knowing parent—knowing for the age in which he lived—hesitated not to hurry his wonderful child to an untimely grave.

Such, however, were the times, when learning was dearly prized and knowledge little diffused; when monastic universities, founded by the church, through the influence of its royal and noble dependents, were the sole depositories of the little that was known worth the labor of acquiring; and when the most learned of the community had less solid practical information than the operative mechanics of the present day. Such were the times when plague, pestilence, and famine were events of ordinary occurrence; when corruption in morals and baseness in politics flourished, even to the extent of surrounding a king, at the altar of his God, with the ministers of his vices, and converting the "brightest" and the "wisest" into the worst and meanest of mankind. These were the times of the most brutal ignorance in the people, and the greatest profligacy in the nobility; and these were the times that produced such learned little prodigies as young Evelyn, under a system of education calculated to make such prodigies; but not to form citizens for a free state, nor legislators for a great nation.

Whatever may have been the natural abilities of this poor child, to have made such a progress in the learned languages at five years old, he must have been the object and victim of a very laborious system of study, all applied to the exercise of his memory. He must therefore have submitted to close confinement in warm rooms, to the privation of air and exercise, and to a sedentary and cramped position; and he was probably much injured by the gross habit of eating and the want of personal purity, so remarkable in an age when meat was devoured three or four times a day, even by the most dainty, and when general ablutions were resorted to more as a remedy than a daily habit.

The overworking of the brain at the expense of all the other functions, must also have had a fatal effect even on children of robust temperaments; and the Indian practice of flinging their offspring into the sea to sink or swim, as strength or feebleness decided, was humanity and civilization to the system pursued in times quoted with such approbation—a system by which infant intelligence was tortured into intellectual precocity, and hurried to an early tomb under the precipitating concurrences of "maids, women, hot blankets, and excessive hot fires."

What is most notable in all this is that Mr. Evelyn, the father of the unfortunate infant, was one of the cleverest and most advanced men of his time, and much celebrated for his translation of, and his essay prefixed to, the "Golden Book" of St. Chrysostom, "concerning the Education of Children."

SORROWS AND THEIR USE.

BY FREDERICK BREMER.

It is the time of sorrow and care, souls draw near to one another. When outward adversity storms around us, we gather together, and the most beautiful flowers of friendship and intimacy spring up and grow beneath the tears of sorrow. In the family circle, a common source of grief destroys all little dissensions and disagreements, and brings all hearts, all interests to one point. Especially if the death of one of the family is threatened, then all disorders are silent; then all hearts throb harmoniously, though mournfully; all thoughts agree and form a soothing garland of peace, in whose bosom the loved invalid rests.

And yet earthly cares, wasting sorrow, those sharp words that pierce the inmost soul, do not kill! The wonderful germ of life can draw nourishment from sorrow; in, like the polypus, be cut apart, grow together again, and live, and suffer. Mourning mother, wife, bride, daughter, sister; hearts of women, which care ever crushes and pounds the deepest, bear witness to it! You have seen your beloved one die, have longed to die with him, and yet live, and cannot die. What do I say? If you can resign yourself to live, is it not true that a breath from Heaven will pour consolation and strength into your soul? Can I doubt of this, and think of thee, noble Thilda R., mourning the loss of the noblest of husbands? Thou didst receive his last sigh, thou lost with him thy all upon earth; thy fortune was dark and joyless, and yet thou wert so resigned, so gentle, so kind, so good! Thou didst weep, but saidst, trustingly, to thy sympathizing friends, "Believe me, it is not so very hard to bear!" Ah, that was a peace which the world cannot give. And when thou saidst, to dissipate thy grief, "I will not disturb this peace with my sadness," he believed that he from his grave cared yet for thy happiness, encompassed thee still with his love, and strengthened and consoled thee—"And there appeared an angel unto him from Heaven, strengthening him." Patient sufferers, blessings on you! You reveal God's kingdom on earth, and show us the way to Heaven. From the crown of thorns we see eternal roses spring.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: Helen and Bella: a Leaf from Life," "March," "Song—the hearth was piled," &c., "A Sabbath Morning in October," "Single Solitude" and "Single Blessedness," "Softly enter my Spirit Stealing," and "The Sunny South." No letter accompanied the article entitled, "Glimpses of the Life of our Minister."

Literary Notices.

FROM LIPPINCOTT, GRAMBO & Co. (successors to Grigg & Elliot), No. 14 North Fourth Street, Philadelphia:—

THE LADY KILLER. By Rebecca Hicks. The author of this modest-looking little volume is already widely known as a contributor to the "Lady's Book" and other periodicals. A sprightly vivacity marks the story, and some of the characters are sketched with spirit and power. Miss Frances Penn, the maiden aunt, is the most conspicuous personage, well drawn and sustained. We are glad to see the gifted daughters of the South contributing thus to the literature of their country. Miss Hicks deserves a warm welcome.

A GUIDE TO GERMAN LITERATURE. By Frantz Adolph Moschzisker. Published in London, 1850. 2 vols.

This excellent work is, we are happy to learn, soon to be republished in the United States. The author, a German scholar, has come to reside in our land, where his brilliant talents and great acquirements will, we trust, soon be appreciated. His work, now before us, is highly praised by the British press, and received many warm commendations from the most eminent British writers. Among other distinguished names, Mr. Carlyle has thus given his testimony to the merits of the author, after highly praising his "Guide," &c.: "I am bound to acknowledge a good service done, on your part, to the whole English world." We trust its republication here will prove a "good service" to the American world, and to the author of the book.

FROM BLANCHARD & LEA, Philadelphia:—

A HISTORY OF CLASSICAL LITERATURE. By R. W. Browne, M. A., Prebendary of St. Paul's, and Professor of Classical Literature in King's College, London. Greek Literature. This work, as its title plainly indicates, will be valuable in the hands of the literary, as well as in those of the historical student. It abounds in facts in relation to men and principles, once the moving and impulsive directors of a great and warlike people, which should be reflected on by those who are now, perhaps, running the same race of glory, to be lost in the same mists of obscurity. The facts which have been preserved in this volume of the classical literature of Greece, are presumed to be the most authentic that have ever yet been compiled.

ECLOGUE EX Q. HORATII FLACCI POEMATIBUS. This volume of the classical series, edited by Drs. Schmitts and Zumpt, contains nearly all the poems of Horace, those only being excluded which cannot be applied to educational purposes.

FROM GOULD & LINCOLN, Boston, through DANIELS & SMITH, Philadelphia:—

THE EXCELLENT WOMAN, AS DESCRIBED BY THE BOOK OF PROVERBS. With an introduction by Wm. B. Sprague, D. D., author of "Letters to a Daughter," "Letters to Young Men," &c. At a time when there are so many temptations offered to induce women to throw off the modesty and the dignity of their sex, and to seduce them from their natural sphere of duty and usefulness, the appearance of such a book as this should be received with more than common interest. We think it better calculated than anything we have read for a long time to elevate, adorn, and Christianize the female heart and character.

NOVELTIES OF THE NEW WORLD; or, the Adventures and Discoveries of the First Explorers of North America. By Joseph Banvard, author of "Plymouth and the Pilgrims." With illustrations. We understand from the publishers that the first volume of Mr. Banvard's series of American histories met with a rapid sale. We anticipate for the volume before us a reception equally flattering to the author, whose style is peculiarly adapted to fascinate, while it instructs the youthful mind.

THE ISLAND HOME; OR, THE YOUNG CASTAWAYS. Edited by Christopher Romaunt, Esq. We have here another work for the amusement and instruction of youth, in which the author has been very successful. Also for sale by Daniels & Smith, 36 North Sixth Street.

YOUNG AMERICANS ABROAD; or, Vacation in Europe. Travels in England, France, Holland, Belgium, Prussia, and Switzerland. We have still another work of the same character as the above, and from the same publishers and agents. It has numerous illustrations, which, with its contents, will render it most agreeable to those who are just commencing their "travels." Also for sale by Daniels & Smith, 36 North Sixth Street.

From HENDERSON & Co., Publishers, Philadelphia:—
THE BIZARRE. A Serial for Fireside and Wayside. Conducted by Joseph M. Church. The editor of the "Bizarre" is not only universally known as a man of business, but universally esteemed for his rare and versatile literary attainments.

From M. W. DODD, New York, through LINDSAY & BLACKSTON, Philadelphia:—

WINTER IN SPITZBERGEN. A Book for Youth. From the German of C. Hildebrandt. By E. Goodrich Smith. This book is written in a very familiar style of dialogue, comprising ten evenings or chapters, and abounds in highly interesting incidents and descriptions. It contains a number of handsome illustrations, and, altogether, will form an agreeable fireside companion for the family during the long winter evenings.

THE SOVEREIGNS OF THE BIBLE. By Eliza H. Steele, author of "Heroines of Sacred History," etc. This is an elegantly printed book, and contains a number of memoirs of the principal characters of the Scriptures, collected from the books of Samuel, Kings, Chronicles, and the Prophets. It is very beautifully illustrated.

SELECT POETRY FOR CHILDREN AND YOUTH. With an introduction by Tryon Edwards, D. D. First American from the twelfth London edition.

THE FIRST WOMAN. By Gardner Spring, D. D. This is an essay on the education and duties of woman, which makes home her proper sphere.

From CHARLES SCRIBNER, New York, through A. HART, Philadelphia:—

DREAM LIFE: a Fable of the Seasons. By Ik. Marvel. Most of our readers will probably recollect the entertaining stories of Ik. Marvel. Well, here is a very curious and a very interesting volume from that same Ik., which we think will be received with as much pleasure, and, we hope, with as much profit, by our young friends, as anything that has preceded it from the same source.

HOMOEOPATHY. An Examination of the Doctrines and Evidences. By Worthington Hooker, M. D., author of "Physician and Patient," etc. It appears that this is one of the "Fiske Fund Prize Dissertations of the Rhode Island Medical Society," and embraces a most searching investigation of the merits of the new system of Homoeopathy.

EXAMPLES OF LIFE AND DEATH. By Mrs. L. H. Sigourney. Like everything that has fallen from the pen of Mrs. S., the work before us is eminently conducive to the elevation of the human heart to the highest degree of moral and Christian excellence.

From J. S. REDFIELD, Clinton Hall, New York, through W. B. ZIESS, Philadelphia:—

CLOVER NOOK; OR, RECOLLECTIONS OF OUR NEIGHBORHOOD IN THE WEST. By Alice Carey. The contents of this volume comprise many faithful and beautiful sketches of humble life in the West.

DREAM-LAND BY DAYLIGHT. A Panorama of Romance. By Caroline Chesbro'. The name of the author of this volume has long been familiar to American readers, and, as it ought to be, is cherished as that of one of the most gifted female writers of our country. We have here, in a compact form, all those beautiful sketches which have, from time to time, given so much pleasure, and imparted so great an amount of moral instruction to her readers, and are perfectly sure that no person, who has not already become acquainted with the purity of sentiment and the glow of feeling which pervade the entire volume, will peruse it without forming an elevated idea of the character and attainments of Caroline Chesbro'.

From TICKNOR, REED & FIELDS, Boston, through W. P. HAZARD, Philadelphia:—

GREENWOOD LEAVES: a Collection of Sketches and Letters. By Grace Greenwood. Second Series.

RECOLLECTIONS OF MY CHILDHOOD, AND OTHER STORIES. By Grace Greenwood. This is a very neat little volume, containing a number of entertaining stories, which cannot fail to have their effect upon the gulleless hearts of the little readers for whom they were prepared, and flowing as they do, most evidently, from a heart that truly appreciates their innocence. The embellishments are very beautiful and appropriate.

THE SNOW-IMAGE, AND OTHER TWICE-TOLD TALES. By Nathaniel Hawthorne. This volume contains many of the author's earliest productions, as well as many of his latest, all of which have been heretofore published in the periodicals of the day, and upon which the literary reputation of the author was first established.

A BOOK OF ROMANCES, LYRICS, AND SONGS. By Bayard Taylor. The author of this volume of poetry is well known to the public, with whom, whether deservedly or not, he has been, and perhaps still is, a favorite. We opened the "book" with a consciousness of this fact, without being particular as to the page, and commenced reading the seventh verse of "Mon-da-Min; or, the Romance of Moile," as follows—

"This boy, by nature, was companionless;
 His soul drew nurture only when it sucked
 The savage dugs of Fable!"—

"Stop there!" said a friend, who had taken a seat near our book table. "I never before heard of the dugs of Fable. But, even though Madam Fable, who, it appears, suckled the boy, had dugs, what reason is there to suppose that they were 'savage dugs'?" We could not answer, and turned to a distant page, where we met with "a savage beauty," which turned out to be a wild cat, with whom the author, or somebody else, notwithstanding her "brutish nature," had lain down, and "slept at last," his "arm was on her neck." Here our friend stopped us again, with the remark that he did not think there was so much of the savage in Taylor's poetry; whereupon we laid the "book" down for a perusal hereafter, at our leisure, when we shall doubtless be recompensed by the discovery of innumerable beauties, worthy of the fame and better society of the author.

We hope, however, that this will not be looked upon as a criticism of the "book." Bayard Taylor is a man of genius, and, of course, a man of deep thought and of deeper feeling. There are, doubtless, many beautiful and rare poetic gems within the leaves of the "book," many noble and sublime sentiments expressed in chaste and animated diction, which will entitle the author to a high and honorable distinction among the best poets of his country.

From SAMUEL S. & WILLIAM WOOD, New York, through DANIELS & SMITH, Philadelphia:—

THE GRAMMAR OF ENGLISH GRAMMARS. With an Introduction, Historical and Critical. The whole methodically arranged and amply illustrated; with forms of correcting and parsing, improprieties for correction, examples for parsing, questions for examination, exercises for writing, observations for the advanced student, decisions and proof for the attainment of disputed points, occasional strictures and defences, an exhibition of the general method of analysis, and a key to the oral exercises; to which are added four appendixes, pertaining separately to the four parts of grammar. By Gould Brown, formerly Principal of an English and Classical Academy, New York; author of the "Institutes of English Grammar," "The First Lines of English Grammar," etc. We have copied the entire title of this work, which we presume will be a sufficient guide to those who may desire to possess a complete work in the subject of English grammar. It contains upwards of a thousand closely printed pages, and, for the rest, must depend upon the author's well-earned reputation for success.

From JOHN TAYLOR, New York, through T. K. COLLINS, Jr., S. E. corner of Sixth and Arch Streets, Philadelphia:—SALANDER AND THE DRAGON. A Romance of the Paris Prison. By Frederic William Shelton, M. A. A second edition of a very pleasant allegory, which we have before favorably noticed, intended to illustrate the danger and the wickedness of slanderous and unkind insinuations.

From BUNCE & BROTHER, and H. N. SKINNER, New York, through T. B. PETERSON, Philadelphia:—HOME AND ITS INFLUENCES. A Story for the Home Circle. This is a very interesting tale of its class, written in an agreeable and natural style. It is from the pen of Maria Sidney, who, it may be as well to state, is the daughter of Lord De L'Isle and Dudley.

NOVELS, SERIALS, PAMPHLETS, &c.

From Henry Carey Baird (successor to E. L. Carey), Philadelphia: "The Practical Calculator." No. 5. Price 5 cents. A valuable work for engineers, mechanics, etc.
From the Publisher, Carlisle, Pa.: "The Temple: devoted to Masonry, Literature, and Science." An interesting and popular work, ably edited by B. Parke and F. Bismuthal.

OUR FASHION PLATES.—Some persons, of whom it may be added that they possess a peculiarly nice appreciation of effects without a peculiarly nice appreciation of causes, are in the habit of condemning our fashion plates, because, in their judgment, the female form is represented in what they deem to be a "wasp-like shape," or in that of an "hourglass," an "inverted cone," etc. And, having satisfied themselves that their premises are correct, they proceed to enumerate the awful consequences that will inevitably result to the health and happiness of the rising generation, from the contemplation and imitation of the loathsome and demoralizing fashion plates. These good people, however, do not seem to reflect that the fashion plate is simply a picture of the human form enveloped in certain robes, or outward dress and covering, and that the effect, whatever it may be, is produced by the ingenious and artificial arrangement of the said dress or costume, more than by any compression, contortion, or expansion of the living and moving human form itself. It is not our fault, therefore, if the ladies, in the exercise of their own good taste and discernment, wear skirts of such wide and flowing dimensions that a fair representation of them in our fashion plates reduces the apparent size of their waists to what may seem, to the uninitiated, to be an unnatural, an uneasy, or an unhealthy slenderness.

We could, indeed, wish that such benevolent persons as entertain these sad apprehensions of the effects of the fashion plates, would take the trouble, in order to render themselves more happy in regard to the health and comfort of their female relatives and friends, to make a fair mathematical comparison between the dimensions of the busts and upper portions of the female form, in our plates, and the length and ample dimensions of the lower part of the dress. We think they would discover more ingenuity than iniquity in the device, which presents a delicate human form, not, as they apprehend, by lacing and screw, but by simply enveloping it in full and flowing robes. We have never, by example or precept, been the friends or admirers of tight lacing. Something, however, is due to personal neatness, and to a pure and refined taste, which may not be referred to here.

MEZZOTINTS.—Our readers have an opportunity in this number of comparing the styles of two rival artists—"The Cottagers' Sunday Morning," engraved by Welch; "The Soldier's Dream of Home," by Walters. Both are admirable engravings. This number, it will be perceived, contains three model cottages: another of our new style of model cottages, and two in the ordinary way. "It is a Secret," our subscribers may call a fashion plate, or what they please. They must say it is a beautiful engraving.

THE COTTAGE in the present number is from "Ranlett's" incomparable work on architecture, which can be procured of Messrs. Dewitt & Davenport, New York.

OUR LITERARY MATTER in this number is worthy of commendation. There are several articles that may be specially mentioned: "Moving in the Country," by a Villager; "The Wrong Passenger," by the author of "Miss Bremer's Visit to Cooper's Landing," a lady who writes for no other publication than the "Lady's Book;" and "Florence Sefton," by Miss B. Gardland.

APPLICATIONS FOR AUTOGRAPHS.—We are frequently asked for our autograph. There is one certain way of procuring it: Remit us three dollars, and we will send it, affixed to a receipt, in our most flourishing style.

We have been forced to reprint the early numbers of this year. They are now ready, and orders received in the morning are mailed the same day. We cannot insert the very favorable notices we have received, both written and printed. Our "Book" would not contain them all. Indeed, we are doing very well, for our subscribers know that they will receive a good work the year through; and they also know that there is but one "Lady's Book" published in the United States—but one work that caters exclusively for American ladies—and that is "Godey's Lady's Book."

We make a few more extracts from our London correspondent's letter, a portion of which was published in our last number.

London.

MY DEAR MR. GODEY:—

On the death of great personages, but especially of those of royal descent, there is generally displayed, in countries politically constituted as this is, a great amount of hypocritical sorrow and ostentatious testimonials of affected regret. Such, however, I do not think was altogether the character of the testimonials paid to the memory, the virtues, and the sufferings of the late Duchess of Angoulême, who deceased at Paris a short time since. This lady, Maria Theresa Charlotte de Bourbon, was the only daughter of Louis XVII., and Marie Antoinette, of Austria. She was born on the 19th December, 1778. Through her mother, she was the granddaughter of the Empress Maria Theresa, whose names she bore. The whole course of this noble woman's life, from the execution of her parents to the last moments of her eventful career, has been, as has been feelingly expressed, one entire course of misfortune—one long martyrdom. But I cannot follow that eventful career, from the breaking out of the French Revolution, through all the changes and vicissitudes of the various governments of the people, without doing violence to the restrictions imposed upon my pen. In all of them it may be justly said that the Duchess of Angoulême was interested and intimately connected. But throughout all of them, whether in exile or in the palaces of her forefathers, she maintained the character of a pious woman, of much amability of disposition, of great charity and patience, and of great good sense.

The princely munificence of the American Minister, Mr. Lawrence, forms a new era in the diplomatic representation of the United States at the Court of St. James. What ever might have been thought of "republican simplicity" fifty years ago, people here have now quite an exalted opinion of republican wealth. It is gratifying to find, however, that all its displays are not made exclusively for the gratification of aristocratic tastes. The American Commissioners and Jurors of the Great Exhibition were recently entertained by Mr. Lawrence and his lady, at their residence in Piccadilly. There was quite a number of the American Exhibitors from the United States present.

The National Gallery, on its re-opening, presented three new pictures: One, a little portrait of an old man, by Van Eyck; second, a portrait of Rembrandt, by himself; the third is "De Ruyter and his Officers Embarking," by Backhuysen. The first was purchased from Lord Middleton's collection for £366, and the second from the same collection for £400. The third was bequeathed to the nation by Mr. Bredel, lately deceased.

You must caution our American authors and compilers, Mr. Godey. It is understood here that a treaty "for the suppression of literary piracy" has been actually signed between Great Britain and France. The nature and extent of the punishment are not named. Death is the usual punishment for piracy on the ocean. But that would be too severe for petty larceny. Besides, it would take a very learned jury to determine to whom the various small literary articles in circulation at this late day, in the progress of letters, originally belonged.

THE MECHANICS' INSTITUTE, of Ohio, at Cincinnati, have awarded their DIPLOMA to "Ayer's Cherry Pectoral," the widely celebrated remedy for colds, coughs, and consumption. This honor was richly merited by the inventor of that invaluable medicine, which has secured not only the above commendation, but also that of the most eminent physicians in this, as well as the highest medical authority in other countries. And what is a far greater encomium on its usefulness is that it has won its way to almost every fireside of the American people.

MR. BROW has shown us a beautiful piece of penmanship—"The Declaration of Independence"—done by himself, in a most masterly manner. It is intended as a present for Kossuth.

We promised, in a late number, to give a description of the manner in which Honiton Lace is made. This kind of lace is a great favorite with our fashionables.

HONITON LACEMAKING.—This lace has, within the past few years, gained such favor with the ladies that it bids fair to supersede the use of all others. Two points which may explain the reason for this preference are, the very great utility and durability of the Honiton lace, and its capability for producing the most elaborate and the richest patterns. The method of making all laces is fundamentally the same; and, in describing the mode of operation in the one case, we at the same time show how all others are made. The difference in the Honiton being that the pattern is produced separately, and then transferred to the fine ground net, while in most of the other laces pattern and grounding are produced at the same time. This gives the Honiton lacemakers the greater facility in the production of elaborate designs; and, as it admits of the constant retransfer of the pattern from one grounding to another when the original is worn out, conduces to its durability, and to the esteem in which it is held by ladies who, though they like to wear only good and rich laces, are still careful enough of their husbands' purses to choose those which will wear the longest.

In former days, lacemaking was a favorite employment even with ladies of rank and station; and, in some rural districts, there are yet found many ladies who practice the art for their amusement; but perfection in it, as in every other handicraft, can only be attained by constant practice. and therefore these amateurs are never very formidable rivals to their more humble sisters to whom this labor is a source of gain. The work is by no means an ungraceful one; and, though trying to the eyes, not nearly so injurious to the health as the stooping over and leaning the chest against a hard frame, a practice in which many of our fair young friends unfortunately persist in indulging. The lacemaker has on her knee a large cushion or pillow, covered with black or dark green material, and on this cushion the pattern for the lace is transferred by pins from the paper design, the pins being placed close to, or more distant from, each other, according as the pattern is close or open. The material for working consists of marvelously fine flaxen thread wound on reels, and these threads are thrown round and between the pins with such unerring exactness that the most graceful lines and minute effects of shading are carefully given. In making a comparatively narrow pattern, several hundred reels are required, and when the design is more elaborate the number increases in proportion.

THE following notice of "Arthur's Home Gazette" we take from "Graham's Magazine," for February:—

ARTHUR'S HOME GAZETTE.—We call the attention of our readers to the prospectus of this valuable literary journal; and we do it with the more heartiness as we have known its editor intimately for many years, and have known him as one of the most upright, consistent, laborious, talented, yet modest of our literary men. Mr. Arthur is an earnest, good man—practically the moral editor he pretends to be—there is no sham or flummery in his composition; but, truthful and fearless, he conducts his journal as much as a matter of conscience as a matter of dollars. He is totally free, too, of all small jealousies of other people's success; but, with a keen eye to life and its surroundings, he attends rigidly to his own concerns, and labors to embody his observations and experiences, so as to make men wiser and better.

To his well-known ability as an author, Mr. Arthur unites the rare gift of a capital writer for a journal, seizing with happy tact upon the passing occurrences of the hour, and so combining them with his own manly reflections as to give us just views of life, and of its responsibilities, too, at the same glance. In the management of his journal, Mr. A. has had the sagacity to enlist brains—the best writers are among his regular contributors; and, without any parade or pretence, he quietly issues his sheet each week, brimming with thought, and overflowing with the generous sentiments of a thorough Christian gentleman.

If any of our readers desire to see a copy of the "Gazette," he will furnish it upon application; if they desire to subscribe, they can have this magazine and that paper for $4, or Godey's Lady's Book and Arthur's Home Gazette for $4. We have spoken frankly of Mr. Arthur and his paper—we have spoken what we believe.

THE "London Medical Gazette" gives the result of numerous experiments with roasted coffee, proving that it is the most powerful means not only of rendering animal and vegetable effluvia innocuous, but of actually destroying them. A room in which meat in an advanced degree of decomposition had been kept for some time was instantly deprived of all smell on an open coffee-roaster being carried through it, containing a pound of coffee newly roasted. In another room exposed to the effluvia occasioned by the clearing out of a dung-pit, so that sulphureted hydrogen and ammonia in great quantities could be chemically detected, the stench was completely removed, within half a minute, on the employment of three ounces of fresh roasted coffee, whilst the other parts of the house were permanently cleared of the same smell by being simply traversed with the coffee-roaster, although the cleansing of the dung-pit continued for several hours after.

The best mode of using the coffee, as a disinfectant, is to try the raw bean, pound it in a mortar, and then roast the powder on a moderately heated iron plate until it assumes dark-brown tint, when it is fit for use. Then sprinkle it in sinks or cess-pools, or lay it on a plate in a room which you wish to have purified. Coffee acid or coffee oil acts more readily in minute quantities.

WE have frequently given accounts of royal balls at the court of England's Queen. We now give another of one in very different and distant part of the world.

"A ROYAL BALL AT TAHITI.—On the first of May, I witnessed a most interesting scene. Mr. Bruat, the French agent, made every effort to entertain the Tahitians. In the morning, the French sailors enacted a little sham fight on the water. Several boats were brought out, manned by skillful rowers, and at the bow of each boat was placed a kind of step or ladder, on which stood a combatant armed with a stick. The boats were steered very close together, and the combatants tried to throw one another from their landing-places into the sea. A May pole was erected, at the top of which fluttered colored shirts, ribbons, and other articles of finery, the prizes of those who could fetch them down. At noon, the chiefs and other important personages among the natives were feasted. Salt meat, bacon, bread, roast pork, fruits, &c., were piled up in heaps on the lawn in front of the governor's house; but the guests did not content themselves around these as might have been expected: the chiefs divided everything into portions, and each person carried his share home. In the evening, there were fireworks and a ball. This was one of the most interesting things I met with. I here saw the most abrupt contrasts between art and nature—elegant French ladies beside coarse, brown, native women; staff-officers in full uniform among half-naked Indians. Many of the natives, indeed, wore, for this occasion, wide white trousers and a shirt over them; but others had no further garment than the pareo and the short shirt. I, this evening, saw Queen Pomare for the first time. She is a woman of six-and-thirty, of large and coarse figure, but still in her prime. (I found, generally, that women do not so soon become passée here as in other hot climates.) Her face is not bad, and an extremely good-natured expression played about the mouth and chin. She was dressed in a gown, or rather a kind of blouse, of sky-blue satin, which had a double border of expensive black blonde. In her ears she wore large jasmine blossoms, in her hair a wreath of flowers; in her hand she carried, very elegantly, a lace pocket-handkerchief beautifully worked. For this evening, she had confined her feet in shoes and stockings—usually going barefoot. The complete dress was a gift from the King of the French. The queen's husband, younger than herself, is the handsomest man in Tahiti. The French, jokingly, call him, 'Prince Albert, of Tahiti,' not merely on account of his good looks, but also because, like Prince Albert, of England, he is not called king, but only the husband of the queen. He was dressed in the uniform of a French general, which suited him very well; the more so, that he knew how to deport himself in it; only his feet were not to be looked at, being very coarse and ugly. There was more royalty in the company besides these two high personages, namely, King Otoume, lord of one of the neighboring islands. His appearance was most comical: over very short, but broad pantaloons, he wore a coat of sulphur-colored calico, which certainly was not the handiwork of the Parisian artist—it was a complete pattern-card of misfits. This king went barefooted. The queen's dames de compagnie, four in number, and the wives and daughters of the chiefs, were mostly dressed in white muslin blouses. They also had flowers in their ears, and wreaths in their hair. Their demeanor and behavior were, in general, wonderfully good; nay, three of the young ladies danced French quadrilles with the officers, without erring in the figure. Only I was constantly in fear for their feet, for none besides the royal pair wore stockings. A few old married women appeared in European bonnets. Young matrons brought their children with them, even their infants. Before supper, the queen withdrew into another apartment to smoke a cigar; her husband, meanwhile, killing time with a game at billiards. At supper, I found myself between Prince Albert, of Tahiti, and the canary-colored King Otoume; both were sufficiently advanced in their education to show me the usual attentions of the table, to fill my glass with water or wine, to hand me dishes, &c., and it was evident they took as much pains as possible to master European manners. Nevertheless, some of the guests forgot their parts now and then: thus the queen, for instance, asked for a second plate, which she heaped with sweetmeats, and put aside to carry home with her. Others it was necessary to restrain from devoting themselves too fondly to the champagne; but, on the whole, the entertainment came to an end with great gayety and propriety."

Receipts.

THE TOMATO is an excellent purifier of the blood, and the following is a very simple mode of preparing it: Place the tomatoes in a Dutch oven for a few minutes before the fire, adding a little vinegar. When they are warmed through, the rind is easily peeled off, if it be preferred so to do. In this way they may be eaten with every kind of roast meat.

A GOOD PLAN OF PRESERVING APPLES is as follows: Into the bottom of a glazed jar, well dried, place some pebbles, just to cover the surface; fill the jar with perfectly sound apples, rubbed dry; cover the fruit with a piece of wood made to fit exactly, and over that lay some fresh mortar. The apples are thus preserved from the pressure of the air, and will keep good for a length of time. Apples may also be kept the whole year by being immersed in corn, which receives no injury from their contact.

In dwelling-houses lighted by gas, the frequent renewal of the air is of great importance. A single gas-burner will consume more oxygen, and produce more carbonic acid to deteriorate the atmosphere of a room than six or eight candles. If, therefore, when several burners are used, no provision is made for the escape of the corrupted air, and for the introduction of pure air from without, the health will necessarily suffer.

MILK OF ROSES is made thus: Put two ounces of rose-water, a teaspoonful of oil of almonds, and twelve drops of oil of tartar, into a bottle, and shake the whole till well mixed.

TO GET RID OF FLIES.—The most harmless way of getting rid of flies is to expose in a plate a strong solution of quassia chips and brown sugar. The fly-papers sold for the purpose are made by smearing melted resin with a little sugar on paper.

The preparation used for wetting linen, previous to marking it with ink, is a drachm of salt of tartar in one and a half ounce of water.

Fashions.

DESCRIPTION OF STEEL FASHION PLATE.

Fig. 1st.—Morning, or home-dress, of plain stone-colored grape mousseline; the skirt is made very full and quite plain, the corsage low, and ending in a long bodice. The sleeves are quite a novelty, being made full at the wrist, and gathered in two frills, the edge finished by a cording of crimson silk. The undersleeves of lace are also finished in deep frills. Over the corsage is worn a pelerine of crimson dotted muslin, made in Grecian fullness, and crossing at the points. Small apron of thick brown silk, finished by puffs of the same around the hem and the pockets. A broad crimson velvet ribbon, tied in a careless bow, encircles the throat. Hair in plain braids and bandeaux.

Fig. 2d.—Carriage-dress of plain green silk. The skirt is full, and finished by frills, or narrow flounces of white lace, the edge in a broad scallop pattern. The sleeves, demure long, are trimmed in the same way, and a pelerine of rich white lace is made to correspond. White chip bonnet, with lace and ribbon mixed in the trimming, and small brides of white ribbon inside the brim.

THE NURSERY.

Our chit-chat this month has been suggested by seeing a beautiful child sent out to pay morning calls, in a dress that we will describe to our lady readers. There was no excuse, so far as the means of the parents were concerned, as will be seen from some of the articles described. The embroidered cashmere cap and cloak were in excellent taste; but beneath this was flannel too coarse for ordinary skirts; and, while the petticoats were of exquisite dimity, the underclothes were of cotton instead of linen lawn. The inconsistency was so glaring, that one could but remark upon it, and the discomfort which the delicate little limbs of the child must have been subjected to. It is often a subject upon which young mothers are entirely ignorant, or, if they have experience, they are thoughtless, rather than neglectful. As no one is more dependent upon dress for comfort than the little helpless babe, and as an infant's wardrobe is a matter in which unusual taste may be displayed, we have prepared some hints with regard to it.

In the first place, it is an essential of comfort, as well as a matter of economy, that all the materials should be of the finest quality. Coarse flannel washes thick directly and becomes discolored easily; cotton should never be suffered to touch the delicate skin; and, as far as trimming is concerned, if neat thread lace or cambric edging cannot be afforded, it is better not to use any. Indeed, this last rule holds good for every article of dress in use. There is another thing to be considered. It is much better to have plenty of good neat clothes than a few expensive dresses. We have known ladies to save an expensive christening robe out of the proper allowance for ordinary articles, very much diminishing their neatness or quantity. As to the last particular, as frequent changes are essential to health as well as comfort, it is very bad policy to have a child in state to be admired once a week, and the rest of the time an object of aversion from its untidiness. Embroidered cambric dresses, when the little thing is sent to pay visits will never compensate for finding it not fit to be seen when you go to return them. The first rule, then, should be to have everything neat, good, and in abundance. Neatness, however, should be observed in the trimming and cut of every article. A large pattern of embroidery, for instance, is not suited for an infant's slip, neither are wide ruffles nor a coarse pattern of lace, and, however rich the material it may be ruined by "botching," either in fit or stitches. There is nothing in which the accomplishment of fine sewing can be so well displayed as on an infant's wardrobe. Every stitch should be set with neatness and regularity, the hems and falls as narrow as possible, as a large seam even causes irritation.

To come to our list, then, of a complete infant's wardrobe, and to commence with the article of bands: they should be of the finest possible flannel, as they are worn next the skin; a half yard will make four. Robins, or knitted shirts, are to be had in any trimming store; but for those not in cities we will give plain and excellent directions for them, as well as knit boots or socks, in our next article. Those of linen—not cotton—should be of the finest lawn made plainly, and edged with narrow lace or "tetting"; and here we once more advise our lady friends against having any great difference in the style of them. All should be equally good and neat. A yard and a half of lawn will cut six, and a quarter of a yard of linen cambric ruffles them about the arm. The ruffles may be made with a very narrow hem and two tucks, or with only a narrow lace on the edge of the hem. Then we have a waist-blanket three-quarters of a yard in length, and the full width. The waist should be of linen, and a half yard in width. Four of these are sufficient. The flannel skirts should be three-quarters of a yard long, and the edges buttonholed in scoops with linen floss, as it washes better than silk. A plain hem, with a chain stitching of silk, is also very neat. Dimity or cambric skirts come then, and should come nearly to the bottom of the dress skirt. Seven-eighths of a yard is a good rule, for ordinary dresses a yard in length. It is quite necessary to have a dressing-gown of a saque form, of flannel in winter, and double fine plaided gingham in summer, the sleeves long and loose. Add to these articles six little slips of dimity or cross-barred muslin for night wear, and we have the set complete, with the exception of dresses, which, being an ample subject, we reserve until our next, together with directions for washing and preserving flannel, etc., and the worsted knitting receipts before spoken of.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK!

LITERARY AND PICTORIAL.

THE BOOK OF THE NATION AND ARTS UNION OF AMERICA!!

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK is now in the twenty-second year of its publication by the same Publisher—a fact unprecedented in the history of any American Magazine. Nothing but real worth in a publication could be the cause of so prolonged an existence, especially in the literary world, where everything is so evanescent. Hundreds of magazines have been started, and, after a short life, have departed—while the “Lady's Book” alone stands triumphant, a proud monument reared by the Ladies of America as a testimony of their own worth. Many persons, who seek no further than our title, presume that the “Lady's Book” is intended merely for amusement of a class, and that it does not enter into the discussion of those more important questions connected with the realities and the duties of life which every well-informed woman, mother and daughter, should be acquainted with. But such is not the fact. It is now, as it has ever been, our constant care to combine, in the pages of the “Lady's Book,” whatever is useful, whatever is elevating, whatever is pure, dignified, and judicious in sentiment, with whatever may afford rational and innocent amusement.

GODEY'S SPLENDID ENGRAVINGS ON STEEL.

It is the fashion with many magazines to announce in their advertisements, “Splendid Engravings, Fashion Plates,” &c. What is the disappointment of the duped subscriber when he receives the numbers of a magazine thus advertised, to find all his splendid engravings dwindled down to paltry wood-cuts—as contemptible in execution!

The publisher of the “Lady's Book” performs all he promises, and, as some of our exchanges are kind enough to say, “more than he promises.” Each number of the “Lady's Book” contains at least

FREE ENGRAVINGS FROM STEEL PLATES, ENGRAVED BY THE BEST ARTISTS, in LINE, STIPPLE, or MEZZOTINT, and sometimes FOUR.

GODEY'S RELIABLE FASHION PLATES

Published monthly, and are considered the only really valuable fashion plates that are published. They have been the standard for over twenty-one years. In addition to the above, every month selections from the magazine are given, with simple directions that all may understand:—

Doubtless Receipts, Model Cottages, Model Cottage Furniture, Patterns for Window Curtains, Music, Crochet Work, Knitting, Netting, Patchwork, Crochet Flower Work, Hair Braiding, Ribbon Work, Chenille Work, Lace Collar Work, Children's and Infant's Clothes, Capes, Caps, Chemisettes—in fine, everything that can interest a Lady will find its appropriate place in her own Book.

The Poetry by Charles Mackay, LL.D.

The Music of Pan.

Musical score for the song "Come back, come back, thou youth - ful time, When joy and". The score is written for voice and piano. The key signature has two sharps (F# and C#), and the time signature is 3/4. The tempo is marked "Slow." The lyrics are: "Come back, come back, thou youth - ful time, When joy and". The score consists of three staves. The first staff is the vocal line, the second is the piano accompaniment, and the third is a continuation of the piano accompaniment.

in - no - cence were ours; When life was in its ver - nal prime, And earth was bright with bud - ding flow'rs. Come back, and let us roam once more, Free-heart-ed, through life's pleasant ways, And ga-ther gar-lauds as of yore— Come back, come back, ye hap-py days.

back, come back! 'twas pleasant then,
To cherish bath in love and truth
When nothing in disparage of men
Had sour'd the temper of our youth.
Come back, and let us still believe
The gorgeous dream Romance displays,
Nor trust the tale that men deceive—
Come back, come back, ye happy days.

back, oh, freshness of the past,
When every face seem'd fair and kind;
When sunward every eye was cast,
And all the shadows fell behind.
Come back—oh, ye! true hearts can turn
Their own Decembers into Mays;
The secret be it ours to learn—
Come back, come back, ye happy days.

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL, 1852.

JAMES WATT,
IMPROVER OF THE STEAM-ENGINE.

(See Plate.)

It will probably be considered a superstitious fancy, in the present enlightened century, to attribute to an overruling Providence any of those mysterious triumphs of genius which, from time to time, have ennobled and benefited mankind. Many men, we fear, have become so entranced on the subject of human reason, that it may be asserted with some justice that they are far more inclined to worship humanity, on account of the blessings that have been bestowed upon it, than to manifest their veneration, or their gratitude, for the holy and transcendent Source of power from whom all the graces and all the perfections of humanity have emanated. In our proneness to adore the creature, we, in a great measure, neglect the Creator, and may therefore be charged with being guilty of a species of idolatry scarcely less degrading than that of Paganism. But shall we therefore cease to encourage men of genius—cease to emulate the virtues, the graces, and the labors of the great and good—cease to record the patient struggles of the generous benefactors of mankind—cease to cherish the fame of those who have been the recipients of good and perfect gifts? By no means. And yet it behooves us to be careful that we do not, in the pride of humanity, encourage a disposition to pay an undue amount of homage to one another, rather than humbly acknowledge the power that first called humanity into existence, and which can alone sustain it in its legitimate career of manifesting the glory of God.

We are not ashamed, dear reader, to confess that such were the reflections that pressed on our mind while contemplating the beautiful picture to which your attention has been invited at the head of this article; and we are sure you will confess that, though it is extremely simple, it is wonderfully touching. The fair, quiet face of the boy, childlike, but thoughtful and studious withal; his calm, steady eye attentively watching the boiling and foaming of the tea-kettle on the fire before him, the lid alternately rising or falling, as the power within either gains or loses its strength—present us at once with a lively idea of that peculiarly precocious inspiration, which only a life of arduous application and incessant anxiety was destined to develop and perfect. It was well, indeed, for the artist to place the musing cat also in the front ground, apparently as greatly interested, as profound, and as sedate, but still unconscious of the reflective powers of the boy. We say it was well to place the animal there, to form a contrast between instinct and spirituality, and to show the higher attributes, and the more glorious aims and ends of human reason.

In the back, or side-ground, it was also strikingly appropriate in the artist to depict, on the countenance of the benevolent aunt, that intense anxiety for the sanity of her little nephew, which she so expressively indicates by placing the point of her finger on her forehead, the region of the mental perceptions. Neither is the sympathizing countenance of the female, to whom the aunt is relating her apprehensions for the soundness of the child's mind, wanting in the lessons which it was intended vividly to convey to the imagination. But, as we shall have occasion to refer again to this interesting picture in the course of our article, we shall, for the present, proceed in another direction.

In the following sketch, we propose to present to the reader, in connection with the life of James Watt, a condensed history of the steam-engine, from its earliest inception to the latest improvements effected by his genius. In this effort, we shall only aim at a faithful compilation from the best authorities at hand, introducing only such matters as may be easily rendered familiar to the understanding by plain descriptions, or by the help of engraved illustrations.

With regard to the great and almost inconceivable power of steam, it may be asserted that it is no longer a mystery, or a subject of wonderment, even to our children. Its extensive introduction into almost all the mechanic arts, in propelling every description of machinery, in the navigation of the great ocean, and its application to steamboats passing to and fro on our beautiful lakes and rivers, and to railroad trains pursuing their devious courses throughout a great portion of our country—these everyday occurrences having rendered the power of steam so evident and so familiar to all, it would seem that any attempt to illustrate it would rather have a tendency to weaken our subject. Still, however, all those who have witnessed the force of steam may not be so familiar with the energies of the human intellect, which have been so long and so anxiously employed in adjusting the application of that force to safe and useful purposes in the hands of man. Many persons, perhaps, are not acquainted even with the names of those who have been made eminent by their labors to perfect the machinery of the engine, which at once confines, controls, and renders the power of steam efficient. It is true, indeed, that the mere fact of a mechanical force being produced when water is evaporated by heat, was known nearly two thousand years ago, having first been pointed out by Hero, of Alexandria. But it was not until a century and a half ago that any successful attempt was made to apply that power to practical purposes. About that time, a steam-engine, constructed on an imperfect principle, was first used to raise water out of mines; and, though greatly improved during the subsequent eighty years, was never applied to any other purpose. Indeed, as we shall presently see, it is only from the time of the grand discoveries of Warr, that the application of steam power to the extensive and varied uses to which it is now adapted must date its commencement.

But to return to Hero, of Alexandria. The annexed cut has been given as a pretty faithful representation of the machine invented by him as a mere toy, and which, after the lapse of nearly two thousand years, appears to have been recently revived, and rotary engines, constructed on the same principle, and resembling it in some respects, are said to be now at work in this country.

This machine is described as a hollow globe, or ball, placed on pivots at A and B, on which it was capable of revolving: steam was supplied from a boiler through the horizontal tube at the bottom of the machine, which tube communicated with the pivot B. This steam filled the globe, and also the numerous arms attached to it; while a lateral orifice, at the end of each of the arms, allowed the steam to escape in a jet. The reaction consequent on this produced a recoil, and drove the arms round; if, therefore, there had been a pulley, as represented at the upper part of the machine C, and a strap passing round it, the effect would have been to set the machinery in motion, to which the other end of the strap might have been attached.

There are many evidences on record that the ancients perfectly understood the mechanical power of steam, and some anecdotes, going to establish the fact, are very amusing. One of these relates to Anthemius and Zeno, between whom a feud existed for a long time. It seems they were neighbors, and that Anthemius, desiring to annoy Zeno, placed several boilers supplied with water on the ground floor of his own house, under which he lighted a fire, and the steam thus produced rushed in such quantities through flexible tubes into an aperture previously made in Zeno's walls, that his floors were made to heave with all the usual symptoms of an earthquake. It is told, also, of an idol erected on the banks of the Wiser, and formed of metal, that its head was hollow, and inclosed therein was a small stove, and also a pot of water; the stove was filled with charcoal, which, being lighted, gradually heated the water in the head, and, when the vapor acquired sufficient force, wooden plugs, which had previously stopped up the mouth, and a hole in the forehead of the idol, were ejected with a loud noise, followed by two jets of steam, to the great consternation of the worshippers.

But, passing over these, and similar experiments of the ancients, we come now to the first attempt, which we find recorded, to render the power of steam a practical agent. In the year 1543, during the reign of the Emperor Charles V., of Spain, a naval captain, named De Garay, made propositions to that monarch for the trial of a machine by which, he said, he could carry ships out of and into harbor against wind and tide. The experiments were ordered to be made in the port of Barcelona; and, on the 17th of June, De Garay appeared on the quay with his apparatus moored along-side. The experiment answered in every respect. The vessel was found to progress at the rate of a league an hour, or, according to some, at the rate of three leagues in two hours, and was found to be easily controlled, and turned with facility to any point to which it was directed. Favorable reports were made to the emperor and his son, Philip II.; but an expedition, in which they were at that time engaged, prevented the carrying out of the design to any practical extent. De Garay appears to have kept his invention perfectly secret, and thus the world was deprived for two centuries of the immense advantages that would have resulted from the adoption of steam navigation.

It appears also, in the history of the progressive attempts to render steam power subservient to practical purposes, that a work was published in the year 1615, at Frankfort, written by Solomon De Caus, from a passage in which, M. Arago, a French philosopher, claims for the author a share of the honor of the invention of the steam-engine. The invention of De Caus, upon which this claim was founded, is illustrated and described as follows:—

Let there be attached to a ball of copper, a, a tube b, and stopcock c, and also another tube d; these tubes should reach almost to the bottom of the copper ball, and be well soldered in every part. The copper ball should then be filled with water through the tube b, and the stopcock be shut, when, if the ball is placed on a fire, the heat acting upon it will cause the water to rise in the tube d, as indicated in the engraving.

A few years later, an Italian engineer, named Giovanni Branca, published a book, in which he pointed out various novel applications to which steam power might be directed; but they have no resemblance to any application of steam power in use at the present day.

It appears, however, that to the Marquis of Worcester, a follower of the fortunes of Charles the First, belongs the honor of being regarded as the chief inventor of the steam-engine. On account of his devotion to the royal family, he was greatly harassed by their opponents, and was finally imprisoned in the Tower. One day, while cooking his own dinner, he observed that the lid of the pot was continually being forced upwards by the vapor of the boiling liquid contained in the vessel; and, having a taste for scientific investigation, he began to reflect that the same power which raised the iron cover of the pot might be applied to a variety of purposes. On obtaining his liberty, he constructed a machine, which he described as "an admirable and forcible way to drive up water by fire." "One vessel of water," he continued, "rarefied by fire, driveth up forty of cold water; and the man that tends the work has but to turn two cocks, that one vessel of water being consumed, another begins to force and refill with cold water, and so successively; the fire being tended and kept constant." The boiler of this machine, or engine, as represented in the following figure, was composed of arched iron plates, with their convex sides turned inwards, fastened at the joinings by bolts passing through holes in their sides, which also pass through the ends of the rods i, i, i, a series of which rods extends from end to end of the boiler, being a few inches apart. The ends of the boiler are hemispherical, and are fastened on the plates h, h, h. Thus, each plate being an arch, before the boiler can burst, several, if not all the rods i, i, i, must be torn asunder from the bolts at the point of conjunction; and, as the strength of the rods and boiler may be increased to any extent without interrupting the action of the fire, there can be no doubt that a boiler might be so constructed as to be perfectly safe under any pressure that could be required for raising water in a given height; because the pressure in such a boiler will never exceed the weight of a column of water of equal height to the cistern. b, c represent two vessels which communicate with the boiler a, by means of the pipes f, f, and waycocks m, n, and with the reservoir from which the water is to be drawn by the pipes l, l. g, g are two tubes, through which the water is elevated to the cistern; they reach nearly to the bottom of the vessels b, c, and are opened at each end. The pipe b, as well as f, f, communicate with the vessels b, c, by means of the waycocks, m, n, which, by moving the handle o, p, can be so placed that either the steam from the boiler, or the water from the reservoir, shall instantly have access to the vessel b, c. Fire having been kindled under the boiler a, in the furnace d, the cock n is placed in the position represented in the drawing, when the water will have free access from the reservoir to the vessel c, which being filled, the handle p is turned back, so that the cock shall be relatively in the position shown at m; the steam then fairly enters through the pipe e into the vessel c, and, having no other mode of escape, presses on the surface of the water, which it forces up through the pipe d. During this operation, the pipe m having been placed as shown at n, the vessel b is filling from the reservoir through the pipe l, so that the water in the vessel c being consumed, the handle o of the cock m is turned, which admits the steam on the surface of the water in b, shutting off, by the same operation, the communication between b and the reservoir.

In relation to the claim set up for the Marquis of Worcester, as being the original inventor of the steam-engine, it should here be stated that the French writers assert that he took the idea from De Caus, and produce a letter, written in 1641, in evidence. But, as we have no great interest in the controversy, we shall pass on to the discovery by Papin, a French philosopher, of a moving power, by means of a piston working in a cylinder, to be effected by the condensation of steam into water. It is generally known that a pint of water, when converted into steam, swells to the extraordinary amount of two hundred and sixteen gallons, filling seventeen hundred times more space than it occupied in its liquid form. Of course, when the steam is reconverted into water, it subsides again into its former dimensions. Papin's plan was, after having raised the piston by the elastic force of the steam beneath it, which filled the cylinder, to condense this steam into water, and thereby create a vacuum. On this being accomplished, the piston was pressed down again by the force of the atmosphere above. Papin constructed a model, but no steps were taken to carry out his important discovery.

In 1698, Thomas Savery devised a machine for the purpose of drawing off the water which continually accumulated in the Cornwall mines. This was a combination of the machine suggested by the Marquis of Worcester with Papin's discovery, an apparatus for raising water by suction into a vacuum produced by the condensation of steam. Savery, however, claimed it independent of Papin's discovery, having formed the idea from an incident which happened to him in Florence. Having drunk a flask of wine at a tavern, he flung the flask into the fire, and called for a basin of water to wash his hands. A small quantity of the wine that remained in the flask began to boil, and steam issued from the mouth. It then occurred to him to try what effect would be produced by inverting the flask and plunging its mouth in cold water. Putting on a thick glove to defend his hand from the heat, he seized the flask, and the moment he plunged its mouth into the water the liquid rushed into the flask and filled it. Savery then came to the conclusion that, instead of exhausting the barrel of the pump by the usual laborious method of a piston and sucker, it might be accomplished by filling it with steam, and then condensing the steam, when the atmospheric pressure would force the water from the mine into the pump barrel, and thence into any vessel connected with it, provided the vessel was not more than thirty-four feet above the level of water in the mine. The following is a drawing of Savery's machine.

The engine was fixed in a furnace, so contrived that the flame of the fire might circulate round the boilers. Before the fire was lighted, the two small gauge-pipes and cocks, O and N, belonging to the two boilers, were unscrewed, and the large boiler L filled two-thirds full of water, and the small boiler

D quite full. The pipes were then screwed on again as tight as possible. The fire b was then lighted; and, when the water boiled in the large boiler, the cock of the vessel P—shown in section—was thrown open. This made the steam rising from the water in L pass with irresistible force through O into P, pushing out all the air before it through the cock R. When the air had left the vessel, the bottom of it became very hot; the cock of the pipe of this vessel was then shut, and the cock of the other vessel P opened, until that vessel had discharged its air through the cock R up the force-pipe S. In the mean time, a stream of cold water—supplied by a pipe connected with the discharging pipe S, but not shown in the cut—was passed over the outside of the vessel P, which, by condensing the steam within, created a vacuum, and the water from the well necessarily rose up through the sucking-pump—cut off below N—lifting up the cock M, and filling the vessel P.

The first vessel, P, being emptied of its air, the cock was again opened, when the force of steam from the boilers pressed upon the surface of the water with an elastic quality like air, still increasing in elasticity till it counterpoised or exceeded the weight of water ascending in the pipe S, out of which the water was immediately discharged when it had once reached the top. The wood-cut represents two reservoirs, P, P, designed for alternate action; the tube E was for the purpose of conveying water from the discharging pipe to replenish the boiler L, when the water began to get consumed; this was done by keeping the boiler D supplied with water, and, by lighting the fire at B, generating a sufficiency of steam to press the water into L through the pipe K.

In this machine, we have, in reality, the germ of the steam-engine as we have it at the present day; the principle being manifest through all the changes and improvements that have been made. It was not, however, until the alterations made by Newcomen, in 1705, that it was brought into extensive use. Nevertheless, it was rather an atmospheric than a steam-engine, although it was the grand connecting link between the old and the complete machine afterwards improved by the hands of the immortal James Watt.

The following is a representation of the engine as improved by Newcomen:—

In this engine there was a cylinder c open at the upper end, through which a piston h worked. The end of the piston was fastened to a beam, i, resting at the middle on a pier or shaft, and weighed at both ends by a curved piece of iron, something like a small portion of a rim of a wheel, in order to give a greater effect to the pump with which the beam was connected at the other end. At the lower part of the cylinder there was a chamber, which, by means of a steam-pipe e, communicated with a boiler a. In order to preserve it air-tight, the upper part of the cylinder was kept about six inches deep in water. On each side, at the bottom of the cylinder, there was a cock—one communication—with a reservoir of water g, and which, when opened, allowed a jet of water to enter the cylinder through the pipe d; another which allowed the condensed steam and air to escape through f down the pipe o. In the accompanying diagram of Newcomen's engine, the interior of the lower part of the cylinder is shown for the purpose of representing this portion of the machine. The safety-valve b was raised when the steam produced by the boiler exceeded the pressure of the atmosphere by more than one pound on the square inch, and the steam escaped through it. The water being boiling, the cock k in the steam-pipe e was opened by the attendant, who pushed down the handle to j; this gradually filled the lower part of the cylinder with steam, but the power of the steam, being only sufficient to equal the pressure of the atmosphere, would not of itself raise the piston and beam; this was therefore effected by means of the weight or counterpoise l, and the elevation of the piston forced down the pump rod m into the pump below. The attendant then returned the handle to its original position, which prevented the admission of more steam from the boiler, and, at the same time, opened the cock n, which, communicating with the reservoir g, threw a jet of cold water into the cylinder. This instantly condensed the steam, and the piston, as it descended, in consequence of the pressure of the superincumbent atmosphere, drove out the water and air from the bottom of the cylinder, and raised the pump-bucket in the mine. The steam-cock was again opened, and the piston again rose; again the steam was condensed, the piston descended, the water and air were driven out, and so the process went on so long as the services of the engine were required.

In the preceding cut, the reader will observe the figure of a boy, apparently engaged in the management of a portion of the machinery. There is an incident connected with this figure which deserves to be preserved along with the other improvements of the steam-engine. Humphrey Potter, a mere lad, says our authority, who was occupied in attending to the cocks of an atmospheric engine, becoming anxious to escape from the monotonous drudgery imposed upon him, ingeniously contrived the adjustment of a number of strings, which, being attached to the beam of the engine, opened and closed the cocks with the most perfect regularity, as the beam moved upwards and downwards, thus rendering the machine totally independent of manual superintendence. The contrivance of Potter was soon improved upon, and brought into complete working order, in 1718, by an engineer named Brighton. Newcomen's engine, improved in several ways by Brindley, Smeaton, and others, continued in effect the same until the days of Watt, and, until his time, was almost entirely employed in the pumping of water.

But we have now arrived at a point in our narrative, the most appropriate, in our opinion, for the re-introduction of the little boy whom we left seated by the fire, anxiously contemplating the fury of the boiling tea-kettle. We present him here an experienced and an honored man, after having elevated himself, by his industry and application, to the very highest rank among the mechanical geniuses, if not among the greatest benefactors of the world.

James Watt, says Dr. Lardner, was born at Greenock, in Scotland, in 1736. From his birth, he was extremely delicate in constitution. Being too sickly to submit to educational restraint, he was permitted to choose his own occupations and amusements. It appears, however, that he made the best use of the freedom allowed him. One day, a friend of the father found the boy stretched upon the hearth tracing with chalk various lines and angles. "Why do you permit this child," said he, "to waste his time so?" Mr. Watt replied, "You judge him harshly. Before you condemn us, ascertain how he is employed." The observing father, after this, placed at his disposal a set of tools, which he soon learned to use with the greatest skill, taking to pieces and putting together again all the children's toys he could procure; and, subsequently, in constructing a little electrical machine, the sparks proceeding from which became a great subject of amusement to all the playfellows of the poor invalid. He had, however, a great repugnance to repeat, like a parrot, anything which he did not understand, and the natural tendency of his mind was to reflect on whatever came before him, which gave him, to superficial observers, the appearance of dullness.

The following incident is probably the origin of the beautiful plate to which we have referred in the commencement of this article. One day, Mrs. Muirhead, the aunt of the boy, reproaching him for what she conceived to be his idleness, desired him to take a book and occupy himself usefully. "More than an hour has now passed away," she said, "and you have not uttered a word. Do you know what you have been doing all this time? You have taken off and put on, repeatedly, the lid of the tea-kettle; you have been holding the saucers and the spoons over the steam, and you have been endeavoring to catch the drops of water formed on them by the vapor. Is it not a shame for you to waste your time thus?" Mrs. Muirhead, continues the biographer, was little aware of the splendid career of discovery which was subsequently to immortalize her little nephew. She did not see, as we can now, in the little boy playing with the tea-kettle, the great engineer preluding to those discoveries which were destined to confer on mankind benefits so inestimable.

At the age of nineteen, Watt was apprenticed for three years to a mathematical instrument-maker in Finch Lane, Cornhill; but remained there only a year, when he returned to Glasgow. This incident in the career of Watt is thus related by Sir R. Kune: "A young man," says our authority, "wanting to sell spectacles in London petitions the corporation to allow him to open a little shop, without paying the fees of freedom, and he is refused. He goes to Glasgow, and the corporation refuse him there. He makes acquaintance with some members of the university, who find him very intelligent, and permit him to open his shop within their walls. He does not sell spectacles and magic lanterns enough to occupy all his time; he occupies himself at intervals in taking asunder and re-making all the machines he can come at. He finds there are books on mechanics written in foreign languages; he borrows a dictionary, and learns those languages to read those books. The university people wonder at him, and are fond of dropping into his little room in the evening to tell what they are doing, and to look at the queer instruments he constructs. A machine in the university collection wants repairing, and he is employed. He makes it a new machine. The steam-engine is constructed; and the giant mind of Watt stands out before the world—the author of the industrial supremacy of this country, the herald of a new force of civilisation. But was Watt educated? Where was he educated? At his own workshop, and in the best manner. Watt learned Latin when he wanted it for his business. He learned French and German; but these things were tools, not ends. He used them to promote his engineering plans, as he used lathes and levers."

It was about the year 1762, or 1763, that Watt's attention was first practically turned to the principles of the steam-engine, and his sagacious mind soon perceived that the ill-working of Newcomen's machine was owing to its demand for two almost irreconcilable conditions—the requirement of water at a high temperature, and a perfect vacuum, which could only be obtained by an injection of cold water. This laid the foundation of his discovery, in 1765, of his plan for a separate condenser, which he afterwards carried out so successfully, and the effect of which was a great saving in the cost of fuel, as it prevented a great waste of steam power. During the progress of this invention, he found that steam of only forty-seven or forty-eight degrees of heat was sufficient to make water rise to the boiling heat of 212° Fahrenheit's thermometer. Another great improvement was the employment of steam instead of atmospheric air to drive down the piston to the bottom of the cylinder. This was effected by letting the steam from the boiler enter above and below the piston alternately, the vacuum below the piston being also produced by the property of steam. Three years afterwards, a patent was taken out, in partnership with Dr. Roebuck, and an experimental engine was constructed on a large scale, the success of which was most complete. Dr. Roebuck, however, becoming embarrassed, Watt formed a partnership with Mr. Matthew Bolton, of Soho, and, under a new patent, granted in 1775, applied himself vigorously in the perfection of his invention in all practical details; the result of which was the construction, on a large scale, of what is now known as his single setting steam-engine. Meantime, several other ingenious contrivances were invented to remedy the irregularity of action caused by the suspension of power during the ascent of the piston-rod; but these inventions were afterwards superseded by the flywheel.

To remedy the irregularity of motion produced by the unequal supply of steam from the boiler, Watt invented the throttle-valve, which, being placed on the pipe through which the steam is conveyed from the boiler to the cylinder, the opening and partial closing of it, by means of a lever, increased or reduced the supply of steam, according as it was required. This improvement had the effect of enabling the engineer at all times to regulate the monster of motion under his care to such a nicety, that, although there is the power of some millions of horses now continually engaged, an accident is an unfrequent occurrence. Such a degree of security, indeed, has been obtained, that it is said to be by no means uncommon, on the presence of visitors, for the director of an engine at the Cornish mines, where the most powerful engines in the world are employed, to step on the valve of his vast machine and stop it, until, perhaps, if checked one moment longer, it would blow him and all around into ten thousand atoms—a foolish feat, which no one, with a proper regard to the lives of others, would venture to put in practice.

Thus we have seen that Watt's improvements of Newcomen's engine, the first of which was an alteration of the mode of condensing the steam, have been of incalculable importance to the world. Instead of using the method for condensing the steam which had been adopted by Newcomen, he had a condenser attached to the cylinder; and he still further improved upon it by surrounding his condenser with a tank of cold water, which was drawn from an adjoining well, or reservoir, by the pump of the engine. Another of the early improvements effected by him was the custom which he adopted of closing the top of the cylinder, the piston being made to work through a sort of neck, called a stuffing-box, which was rendered steam-tight by being lined with tow saturated with grease, which greased the rod and made it move easily. By this alteration, as we have already seen, the elastic force of the steam was used as it now is, to impel the piston downwards as well as upwards. Before this, no means had been provided to enable the piston to move upwards as well as downwards; and, when it had reached the bottom, the counterpoise at the pump-rod raised it up again. To obviate this, Watt contrived a means by which the steam, after having served its purpose, was allowed to go under the piston, and to pass thence into the condenser, through a passage opened at the proper moment, something on the plan devised by the boy Potter. The machine, hence, became a steam-engine, instead of an atmospheric one, and all that continuous action, from which so much benefit has been enjoyed, was attained by this simple device.

We might still prolong our narrative, but find it necessary to conclude, which we do with the gratifying fact that, unlike most men of rare genius, Watt retired from business with an independent fortune; and, until the close of his valuable life, resided on his own estate of Heathfield, Staffordshire, enjoying the company of a large circle of friends, by whom his amiable qualities were appreciated as they deserved to be; but, as may be imagined, to the last devoting his mind to intellectual pursuits.

THE OLD FARM GATE.

BY RICHARD COE.

(See Plate.)

I love it! I love it! and oft pass it by,
With a sigh in my breast and a tear in my eye,
As backward I gaze on the days that are past,
Too sunny and joyous and happy to last:
Oh! my life was young and my spirit elate
In the time that I dwell by the old farm gate!

How oft have I mounted that old gate astride,
With a rope and a stick, for a frolicsome ride;
And, when it would open with slow gentle force,
"Gee! whoa!" would cry to my gay mimic horse!
Who so merry as I, as I fearlessly rode
On the broad topmost rail of the old farm gate?

And by turns we would ride on a "real live horse"—
We called his name "Raven," so black was his gloss;
And our plump little pony, so frolic and wild
When he carried a man, was never so mild
If he knew my sweet sister, the pert little Kate,
Was to ride on his back from the old farm gate.

And Trowler, our little dog Trowler was there,
With his bark of delight sounding loud on the air;
And if we were happy as happy could be,
Little Trowler, I'm sure, was as happy as we:
We wept when he died, and we laid him in state
At the foot of the tree by the old farm gate.

Long before we grew up my kind father died,
And soon my dear mother was laid by his side;
Then Tommy, and next my sweet little sister;
Oh! how we did weep as we bent o'er and kissed her!
And Willie will have it he saw little Kate
Pass homeward to God through the old farm gate!

I love it! I love it! and still pass it by
With a sigh in my breast and a tear in my eye;
As backward I gaze on the days that are past,
And wonder if I may yet rest me at last
With father, and mother, and sweet little Kate,
In the churchyard back of the old farm gate.

MARCH.

Inscribed to Funny Fules.

BY MISS N. E. HUBBARD.

No wintry winds are here,	Sings, by his love's warm nest,
With wallings loud;	With wild, sweet will!
No snow-sprite weaves for us	A death-like shroud!
No cold skies o'er us bend,	Gay birds and flowers, tho' sweet
With cloud and gloom,	Your song and bloom,
Taking Old Winter from	I'd leave you all to see
His new-made tomb.	My northern home—
The lilac's sweet perfume	To list thy walling winds,
Scents all the air;	O wild, bleak March—
Buds and flowers are spring-	To see the changeful skies, ing	That o'er thee arch—
Everywhere.
Soft air, like summer's breath,	To gaze upon those hills
Comes wand'ring by;	And mountains old,
To yon deep blue looks up	Wearing their winter crowns,
The violet's eye.	Like burnished gold—
	To sit beside the hearth
Emerald robes now wear	With loved ones dear—
The forest old;	Though kind, true hearts,
Crocus' bedeck our bowers	and warm,
Like stars of gold;	I've found me here.
The "lily of the vale"
Looks meekly up,	But none so near as those,
Kisses the light, then hides	Far, far away,
Her waxen cup.	O'er whom thy dark skies bend
	Unlovingly
Upon this sweet rose-bower,	However bleak the hills,
The livelong day,	The vale how cold,
The mocking-bird pours forth	To all there's one bright
His thrilling lay;	spot—
Or, by the moon's pale beam,	Home's shepherd fold.

SOME THOUGHTS ON LETTER WRITING.

BY H. HASTINGS WELD.

IN clearing away an accumulation of old letters, business, friendly, and miscellaneous, the hasty securing of their contents has suggested some thoughts which we are tempted to put upon paper. So various is the character of such a medley, that a human crowd could not show more faces; and yet there are prevalent errors running through nearly all, which constitute a family likeness, and show that "The Art of Letter Writing," as they say of some other venerable things, is "yet in its infancy." Some of these blemishes we purpose to notice. In doing this, we expect not originality. Certain essays which we have read from time to time, linger, in shreds, in the garret of our memory; and if they chance to become woven in, they will improve the texture rather than otherwise. Neither do we think to say anything which has not occurred to our readers before. But, if we succeed in putting their own ideas in form for them, it may enable them to carry out the suggestion of our amiable friend, Capt. Cuttle, "When found, make a note on."

Many a person, clear, ready, collected, and fluent in conversation, is put in a perturbation by the idea of writing a letter. Words which flow from the lips appear to congeal at the point of the pen; and he who converses best is oftentimes among the very worst of correspondents. Some put off the evil day of writing; others draw up a most formal and even enamped epistle. And others, conscious of inability, or rather underrating themselves, knowing that they cannot be excellent, and fearing that they cannot even be tolerable, set elegance, and even correctness, at defiance, and make an intentional burlesque of the thing, in order to disarm criticism. David Crockett, when he discovered that he could not compete with adepts in the elegancies of the drawing-room, exaggerated his wild-wood eccentricities, and masqueraded as a bear. As his artifices was readily seen through, so is that of letter-writers who adopt the same expedient. Others again are always "Yours in haste," as if that sentence, like the "E. E." at the foot of an account of mercantile items, apologized for all deficiencies. If you are really in haste, and must write notwithstanding, it is allowable to say so; but haste without reason, like other negligence, unusual contractions, and slipshod sentences, is disrespect.

There must be a reason for the disgust and aversion with which many people look upon pen and ink otherwise employed than upon their day-book and ledger. And this reason, we take it, may oftenest be found in the fear of falling short of what others can do. But few hesitate to speak, when they desire to be heard, because others can talk better than they—though to this observation there are some exceptions. Those who are too modest to speak are sometimes too ready with their pens. Of such persons, more anon. It is indeed a rare accomplishment to write letters well, but to write respectably—that is to say, fairly to represent your mind on paper—is within the power of every person who has received a common school education. And here, by the way, we may remark that letter writing should occupy a much more prominent place among school exercises than at present. Instead of working upon themes for "composition," which would defy the imagination of a poet to invest them with any possible interest, the pupils should be accustomed to letter writing. The school-boy theses, commencing with some such startling proposition as that "salt is an article of general use," might thus be superseded by something of real utility.

In these days of thousands of newspapers, there are frequent inducements and occasions to write for the Press. This being a matter which touches the interest of printers and publishers, there has been no lack of advice and suggestions upon the subject, addressed to the scribbling public. Everybody knows that the correspondent of a newspaper or magazine should pay his own postage; that he should write on but one side of the paper; and that he should write legibly. If a man should pride himself upon talking indistinctly, we should consider him either insane or idiotic; yet we have met some persons who boast of their illegible scrawl as a mark of the eccentricity of genius. There are thousands who could write distinctly, by a habit of painstaking, which would soon admit of expedition. Yet comparatively no trouble is taken to obtain so desirable a result—so necessary an accomplishment, if we would avoid blunders, and not be continually charging printers and proof-readers with the faults of the vile penmanship of writers. We cannot understand why a gentleman should not feel as much ashamed of illegible writing as of ungrammatical speech. Ladies are sure to write both neatly and in a readable hand. So much for the mechanical part; now for a few words on the style. There is no need whatever of commencing an article upon the last shower, at the Flood, or of beginning everything where Diedrick Knickerbocker commences his History of New York—at the creation of the world. The long, irrelative, and verbose prefaces which unpracticed writers make are even more troublesome to editors than bad manuscript is to printers. "Come to Heecuba" as quick as possible, and reach the pith of your argument without any waste of words. If you must write a long introduction to a small affair in order to warm yourself into a writing mood, cut it off before you send your article to the printer, and it will never be missed. Very many newspaper articles, and magazine contributions, with their pompous beginnings, and most lame and impotent conclusions, remind one of the cry of the Mohammedan huckster—"In the name of the Prophet!—Ag's!"

Business letters should be as brief as is consistent with perspicuity, but minute and clear in specific directions, except where it is intended to allow something to the discretion of the person addressed. And even in such a case the discretion should be well defined and limited. In no case should desultory or complimentary matter, or relations and discussions foreign to the subject of the letter, be introduced and intermixed with business. Business men have often no leisure to read discursive correspondence in business hours; and where they are required to glean the true purport of a letter from amid a mass of useless words, they are liable, if not to errors and misapprehensions, at least to a failure in the attempt clearly to understand the intention of the writer. And, indeed, the writer himself, if he interlards a business communication with witticisms, politics, or other extraneous matter, will most probably fail in making himself understood, though his correspondent spend a day over his letter. In business correspondence, the old forms are the best. If you are answering, commence with a notice of the date, and the date of your receipt of the letter to which you reply. Then give an abstract of the contents—or an indication of your impression of the contents of the letter you are answering. In this way you will advise your correspondent of your own position, and enable him to correct you at once, if you have misapprehended him, and you will also recall to his mind the contents of his own letter, by your rejoinder. Then, having settled those preliminaries, answer the points clearly and definitely; state, so as not to be misunderstood, what you have done, or shall do, in compliance with your correspondent's request; what you decline; and what you defer until you receive further instructions. If information is asked for relative to markets, &c., or to the standing of third parties, be sure that, in giving it, you state nothing that is not of a perfectly reliable character, unless you give the evidence upon which it rests; give nothing as of your own knowledge which you do not personally know, and always cite your authority. In writing of the standing of others, think first, with yourself, whether your correspondent has a right to examine you as a witness. If his business relations with you, or his connection as a friend, do not warrant him in making such a demand upon your time and your discretion; and if it farther appear that you may make yourself liable by your answer, decline the service promptly, giving your correspondent your reasons. And in all cases, even with friends, be very careful how you speak of a third party. If the person in question has given you as a reference, then you are at liberty to state honestly what you know, for he has authorized it. And you are bound to give the exact truth, if you say anything—by which we mean that you must convey a correct impression of your opinion, or of your knowledge, stating clearly what is opinion, and what is fact; unless, indeed, from prudential motives, you decline to write on the subject. A letter is likely to be preserved. If its business contents are important, it is sure to be.

At the close of your letter, after your business is treated, you may add any general matter of friendship, or of business information, which you think may prove useful or acceptable to your correspondent. But remember always the important rule, that a business communication is to be kept clear and unumbered. In these days of cheap paper and cheap postage, reserve familiar letters for separate sheets from business communications. More enmities among business men have arisen from the careless admixture of compliments with figures than from any other cause, or all other causes.

If you are writing a letter, either upon your own business or upon that of the person you are addressing, not in answer to him, but opening the subject between you, follow the rule we have already alluded to, of clearness and of business brevity. Come to the point at once, in order that the person addressed may easily comprehend you. Put nobody to the labor of guessing what you desire, and be careful that half instructions do not lead your correspondent astray. If you have so clear an idea of your operation in your mind, or if it is so simple a one that it needs no words, except specific directions, or a plain request, you need not waste time, but, with the proper forms of courtesy, instruct him at once to buy, sell, or negotiate for you. In whatever you write from your counting-room desk, remember that time is valuable; and that embarrassing or indefinite letters are a great nuisance to a business man. We need hardly remark that punctuality in answering correspondents is one of the cardinal business virtues. Where it is possible, answer letters by return mail, as you will thus save your own time, and pay your correspondent a flattering compliment. And in opening a correspondence, or writing upon your own business, let your communication be made at the earliest proper date; in order that your correspondent, as well as yourself, may have the benefit of thought and deliberation. Remember the mail is always open, and that any new information, or after thought, may be written in a second letter. In matters which pertain solely or chiefly to yourself, or in proposing a joint operation, pay your own postage. At the present rates this may seem a small item. At so much cheaper price, then, do you purchase the reputation of a gentleman.

We have said that, in business letters, the "old forms" are the best. This recommendation does not apply, however, to certain phrases, in general epistles, which have formed a portion of the style of persons unaccustomed to writing from time immemorial. Some of these appear almost too puerile even to be mentioned; but will still be found in the letters of persons who, to hear them converse, one would fancy might write respectably. Avoid them. It is to be presumed that you do not write without a quill pen, or a metallic substitute, and there is therefore no particular necessity for informing your correspondent that "you take your pen in hand." Nobody, except the remarkable personage without arms who was exhibited a few years since, takes the pen between the toes. Neither need you tell your friend that your letter "comes hoping." It may leave you "hoping;" but that any emotion of hope or of despair can be predicated of a sheet of paper is hardly to be asserted. And, in the use of this phrase, an extra "p," or a mispronunciation on the part of the reader, implies a slander on the gait of the epistle; a slander which, if the contents are "precious," identifies the letter in some respects with the poet's notion of a toad. If your ink is pale, that is a fact which speaks for itself; and, if the pen is poor, he must be a good penman who hides that deficiency.

These are among the most absurd of letter blemishes. But those less palpably ridiculous are only comparatively less intolerable in a class where all are bad. Current bywords—for which in modern days there appears to be a passion—should be rigorously excluded, except indeed when, in a very familiar letter, such a phrase can be introduced with the appearance of being an apt and witty quotation. To say enough, and not too much; to avoid careless negligence on the one hand, and, on the other, too painful precision; to escape discourteous reserve, and still withhold improper confidence—all these considerations are to be borne in mind. Too much study gives an epistle an air of stiffness and restraint which destroys all pleasure in receiving it. It may even suggest a suspicion of the sincerity of the writer. And, on the other hand, neglect of etiquette in writing is still more offensive than neglect of courtesy in personal intercourse. Practice only can teach the proper medium, and every one's discretion must guide him between too great formality and too careless ease.

Many people write what they have not confidence to speak. The most modest and reserved in conversation pour out their souls in a cataract of words upon paper; particularly where love or friendship is imagined to be the animus. We need not refer to the cases, in this world of changes, in which ink and paper stubbornly retain the expressions which have long been effaced from the heart, if indeed the inscription there was ever more than "sympathetic," requiring a strong heat to make it legible—but paling out entirely when cold or absence removes the glow. When these declarations are spoken, the party to whom they are addressed cannot, even after an estrangement, repeat them without sharing in the ridicule which, in this mocking world, they are sure to provoke. But letters can be shown. Letters are sometimes shown, even when there is no quarrel; and, therefore, while all proper confidence is felt and shown, it is as well always to write as one would speak if conscious that he might be overheard. Overseen is quite as embarrassing, and much more likely to happen.

Nor are love-passages the only correspondence in which people run into extravagance. Warm friendships—school-girl attachments for instance—provoke the writers into hyperbole. Many a matron has blushed over the letters she may have preserved from the correspondence of her teens—blushed at the thought of what her own epistles must have been, to call forth such rejoinders. Some people, at all ages, go into minute confessions on paper, which were better unwritten, being partly imaginary, and often exaggerated. They are things which they would not speak—and could not, indeed, with the listener looking them in the face. Why then write them? The tongue is a very good guide in this respect. The pen is insensible, and must obey the fingers; but when it expresses what the tongue refuses to say, and the ears would redder to hear, it transcends its proper province. Lamartine was twice the man in the esteem of the world before he published his "Confidences." If we are to take them as truth, he has exposed his weak egotism. If they are affectation, he is weaker still. We cannot wonder that he could not keep his place amid the turmoil of French politics; for it required sterner stuff than that amid which this "weak, washy, everlasting flood" could spring.

Beware how you trust your own secrets or another's to paper. The mischief such records may do is incalculable. And especially avoid any save the kind mention of third persons in your correspondence. Under what has been said of business letters, this caution has been urged; and, in your familiar correspondence, it is even more necessary. Written words have a weight which spoken ones do not possess. They are conned and examined, and oftentimes an occult meaning is discovered in the most meaningless things. Unfounded or uncharitable rumors or statements have lain perdu in drawers and boxes, to be drawn out, after the death of writer and receiver, to the prejudice of innocent persons, or the revival of obsolete facts, better forgotten than treasured. Perhaps the posthumous fame which had hitherto stood fair is impaired or blasted. The statement of a letter thus preserved stands uncontradicted; for, though in a subsequent one the writer corrected the error of the first, the two letters may never meet the same eyes. It is a good rule not only ourselves to forbear writing ill of people, but to destroy what letters of a personal character we receive. There is no predicting what social carrion vulture may devour their contents; or what panderer to evil tastes may circulate them in manuscript, even if they are not found of public or malicious interest enough to publish. Such a collection of letters as those of Horace Walpole, read with avidity and widely circulated, is enough to ruin the character of the correspondence of an age. Flippant, gossiping, and mendacious, their evil characteristics are easily imitated; and, without the wit of the author, many affect his audacious disregard of truth and of the rights of others. Well to this sort of posthumous publication will the line of the poet apply,

"The evil that men do lives after them."

An open attack has some magnanimity in it; a volume of mischief, published after the assailed and the assailant have gone to their graves, and the author cannot be held to answer on earth, or his victims find opportunity to reply, is a pestiferous legacy. Yet such, in some degree, and in some circle wider or narrower, may be the issue of every letter containing personal animadversions. Not a few family feuds, protracted, owe their duration to ill letters, ill saved, and turning up like a hidden weapon to do over again their evil work.

Last, though not least, sincerity in epistolary writing must be guarded. Do not let a person for whom you care little be led into the delusion, from the tone of your letters, that he is a very dear friend. Expressions in writing are presumed to be well weighed and premeditated. Nor, on the other hand, must you suffer those whom you really love to infer, from your silence, that you are indifferent, or have forgotten them. To write a letter, when once you apply yourself to it, is a very small matter; and, done at the proper time, is no task. Attentive correspondence is one of the most delightful interchanges of duty and affection, and one of the best guarantees for prosperity in business. We should count him rude, to boorishness, who should not answer a spoken question; and to neglect writing is little better. It is even more unkind, for it gives rise to many anxieties and surmises of a painful nature, which a few moments' attention would prevent.

THE SAXONS.

BY T. HEMPSTEAD.

"All kingdoms and all princes of the earth
Flock to that light; the glory of all lands
Flows into her; unbounded is her joy,
And endless her increase."—The Task.

O'er the starless tracts of darkness, looking backward far away,
Where a dead world's lamp burns dimly through the ivy of decay;
Where, o'er realms and gorgeous cities, War's triumphant surge hath rolled,
And the thick, grim rust hath settled on the altar-steps of gold;
Gazing back on ages vanished, over History's dread land, Here, at twilight soft and solemn, with my soul and God I stand—
Stand upon a midway summit, where the Past and Future meet,
While two mighty torrents rumble, foam, and glitter at my feet.
Thus, while contemplation wanders o'er each wide and clouded stream,
Temple, city, shrine, and column glimmer in the doubtful gleam,
Tarnished glories, scattered splendors, much of love and more of fear,
All that human heart hath yearned for, wasted, broke, and tumbled here;
All that woman's soul hath bowed for, waited, wept, and watched, and wrought;
All that potentates have toiled for, cities blased, and armies fought—

I behold the crumbled fragments, wreck on wreck to ruin hurled,
Of the dimmed, dust-leveled empires of the vanquished olden world
And from out the lurid vapors that above, around me roll,
From the darkness, from the silence, speaks a voice unto my soul—
Speaks as when, from troubled Sinai, in the Hebrew's triumph hour,
Through the flash and through the thunder, spoke Jehovah's voice of power—
"Not the men who gleam in purple, not the men who mitres wear,
Fill the earth with crackling cities, and with walls the startled air;
Are the men, though all unlabeled, high of purpose, great of mind,
Who, through doubt, distress, and danger, have been beacons to their kind."
Then I hear the clang of armies, feel the fast earth reeling round,
See an empire's turrets crumbling at the trumpet's battle sound,
Hear a sudden blast of clarions rushing on the distant gloom,
Streams above the grappling legions, like a storm, the haughty plume;

Over the thick battalions ringing, over hill and plain afar,
 Flashes red the falling sabre, flashes like a falling star,
 Till the sound grows faint and fainter, till the folding shad-
 dows fall—
 Till a silence deep, Lethæan, settles mournful over all.
 And I hear the swart Egyptian boasting that, through change and time,
 His religion, language, arts shall shine and reign o'er every clime;
 Hear the plastic chisel falling on the gray, sepulchral
 stone,
 And the Pyramid and Idol glitter in the sinking sun.
 I behold the haughty Persian from the Indu's blooming strand,
 To the brow of white Olympus triumphing o'er every land:
 Leaning through the stiffened darkness, on the vine-hung hills of Greece,
 Shouting from the bloody victory, shining in the arts of peace,
 I behold her Aristotels, Solons, sages, warriors, seers, Vindicating that their spoils, their triumphs, shall outlast the flight of years;
 Making twilight through the temple, I behold the holy flame,
 And I catch afar the shouting for the laureled at the game.
 Like a black, indignant torrent bursting from its mountain home,
 Beating down the banded nations, sweep the serried ranks of Rome;
 I behold her reeking eagles, her disastrous shout I hear,
 Over the crash of tumbling ramparts, rolling nearer and more near.
 I behold the turbaned Tartar, fiery Goth, and rushing Hun,
 Mingling in the red death-grapple, rousing at the trumpet's tone;
 Darker grows the storm of battle, louder rolls the roaring gong,
 Till the hills and shrinking valleys quake beneath the belmed throng—
 Till a dark, intense oblivion draws around its funeral pall,
 Till a silence, deep, Lethæan, settles mournful over all.
 Starting from this life-oblivion, from this vanished human scene,
 One there stands of noble bearing, great of heart, and proud of mien,
 And I know the fair-haired Saxon—know him by the kindling eye,
 Know him by the fearless manner, by the soul which dares to die.
 Fade the groans and dies the battle, slowly rolls the storm away,
 Glimpses the dawn upon the Orient, burn the blushes of the day,
 Golden over wave and mountain far the living splendours run,
 Light the doom'd one in his dungeon, give the slave unto his own:
 Gems from the deep fount of knowledge, human rights and laws sustained,
 Planets weighed and oceans measured are thy splendid victories gained;
 Rankings on the lot of woman, triumphs o'er the frowns of mind,
 Realms explor'd and deserts peopled, love unto thy erring kind,

Cities planted, wrong confronted, Error chained to her abyss,
 Tidings, breathed to savage bosoms, of a better world than this;
 Laurels for the brow of Genius, gold from thought's unfathomed mine,
 Deeds that link thy name with angels are immortal trophies thine:
 Thus are prouder names than Cæsar blended with thy glorious line,
 Thus the world becomes thy debtor, fair-haired Saxon of the Rhine!
 Not thy Wellingtons, thy Nelsons, heroes of the breach and sword,
 Not thy plains where haggard Slaughter bath her smoking deluge poured,
 Not thy Waterloos, thy Creecys, Navarinos, Trafalgars, Wreath thy brow with triple glory, write thy name among the stars,
 But thy Miltons and thy Luthers, Howards, Penns, and Washingtons,
 Sent from God with glad evangel to earth's sick and weary ones;
 Priests in Truth's most holy temple, questioners of fate and time,
 These are thine eternal honors, these have made thy race sublime.

“DOST THOU REMEMBER, LOVE?”

BY JAMES H. BROWN.

Dost thou remember, love?
 Dost thou remember
 When thou canst to my poor home
 In cheerless, cold December?
 How lone and dreary seemed our lot—
 Dark grew our days, not lighter—
 How we pressed each other heart to heart,
 And fondly hoped for brighter?

Dost thou remember, love,
 As gloomy days departed,
 Brighter found us still the same,
 Though poor, yet loving-hearted?
 When one by one the sunbeams came
 O'er our pathway, late so dreary,
 How they found us, thankful, side by side,
 And true at heart, though weary?

Dost thou remember, love,
 When fast they came, and faster—
 Those sunny days for which we'd prayed
 To God, our Friend and Master—
 When gloomy hours had vanished all,
 And scenes were bright around us,
 How we said that trials only made
 More strong the ties that bound us?

I well remember, love,
 I well remember,
 Thy love ne'er faded, grew not cold
 In sunlight nor December!
 Come, lay thy head upon my breast—
 Though change may come again, love,
 The flame of love in our true hearts
 Can never fade nor wane, love!

CRAZY MARY; OR, THE DETERMINATION TO MARRY FOR WEALTH.

LEAF NO. III. FROM THE JOURNAL OF RUSH TOURNIQUET, M.D.

BY J. E. M'GILL, M.D.

CHAPTER I.

THE old college clock had just struck seven, and its echoes were dying away as we emerged from the refectory, after supper, on the last day of the collegiate year and of the college session. The period of our studies had terminated, and the whole evening was our own, without the fear of a class bell. Arm in arm, Edward Lalor and myself took our accustomed promenade along the middle terrace of the college yard. We walked long, until, from their homes in the heavens, came out the beautiful stars, the turrets upon which rest the angel watchers who guard the footsteps of the children of men.

The lofty Blue Ridge, clothed with its garments of green, stretching away as far as the eye could reach, marked distinctly its summit upon the western horizon. Between us and the mountain stood the magnificent college edifice, built of granite, with its lofty steeple top away up above the clouds. Tall and beautifully symmetrical poplars fringed the terrace borders. Silence reigned around, unbroken, except, occasionally, by the notes of the night-bird from the adjoining groves, or the joyous laugh of the little knots of enfranchised students, who were scattered here and there, rejoicing in the prospect of a speedy and happy reunion with the loved and dear ones around the paternal hearth, and framing plans for their enjoyment during the period of vacation. On we walked, stopping only now and then with the nearest groups to exchange a word; for we too were planning, not enjoyment for the six weeks of vacation, but for a lifetime. That day was the last of our college life. Together had we received our honors, and proud felt we of the distinction conferred by the Artium Baccalaureum. With the usual confidence in our powers and acquirements, we never dreamed but that now we might plan, and that the stubborn things of life must accommodate themselves to the course we then and there marked out for them. The sunshine of the future, as it rose enrobed with the hopes of our young hearts, smiled upon scenes each more beautiful as it progressed on its course; it beheld a world which fancy alone can frame, which experience can never realize. With the usual presumption and inexperience of our years, we imagined that we could make a paradise even of a desert. Did time justify our expectations? No, indeed. Not that the world deserved the blame for our failure; it is not so bad a place, after all, as the sentimentalists would have us believe. They make a pack-horse of it, and load it down with all their errors and misfortunes. "Oh! this wicked, this wretched, this miserable world!" they exclaim. Rather better, had they said of themselves, "Miserable fools, to be so short-sighted!" But the world is a tolerably good place, and many people live happily in it too, which they could not do if we were to credit all that was said against it. A person beholds, in a swamp, an ignis fatuus, while he passes upon the well-paved highway. He leaves that highway to pursue the object, which flees from him as he advances, and, as he blunders along and splashes through water and mud, now ankle and now knee deep, and is at last brought to a halt, because he has stuck fast in the mire, while the object of his pursuit still dances on before, as if to allure him still farther, he exclaims, "Miserable, wretched, wicked swamp, to hold thus fast in your filthy embrace the person of so distinguished a being as myself!" While another might, perhaps, be tempted to irreverently say, "Miserable fool, to leave the beaten path, and place yourself in such a predicament!"

How often happens it thus that the inexperienced involve themselves, thoughtlessly, in difficulties which embitter the fountains of life, and then blame the world instead of themselves! Our error is that we expect too much from it, and we murmur if we do not obtain the "lion's share."

"So, Tourniquet, you say that you have no fixed purpose for the future?"

"Yes; as I have told you, I intend to leave the direction of my future life in the hands of him who furnished me with the means of advancing thus far."

"Perhaps you are right; but my father can have no claim upon me in that way. The means by which I have been enabled to live here came like drops of blood from his avaricious heart, and now he expects me to make my living by my acquirements without again troubling him. Therefore, I am obliged to decide for myself how I shall do this; and I have decided in part, leaving the rest to mere chance."

"And what course do you intend to pursue, pray?"

"First, I will engage myself as a tutor in some respectable family until I have secured sufficient means to enable me to acquire a profession; what that shall be, must depend upon circumstances."

"As you have planned so far, when, may I ask, do you intend to marry?"

"Whenever I may be able to suit myself as I propose."

"And how may that be?"

"When I have found, first, a wife who will be rich; second, handsome; and, third, accomplished; but on the first qualification only will I insist."

"So then you propose to marry for wealth alone! Do I rightly understand you?"

"You have understood me rightly. For wealth, and wealth only, will I marry."

"You will offer upon the altar of Mammon the holiest impulses and feelings that dwell within your heart, 'leaping up like angels,' to shed around your pathway the light of the only happiness earth can know or Heaven realize. Oh! Lalor, we have long been friends, and I never supposed that I should think so lightly of you as I do since you have given utterance to such a determination."

"You may think of me as you please; only do not suppose me to be a hypocrite. When you have seen as much of life as I have seen, you will be less inclined to sentimentality. From what I have already told you, you know how I have learned to value money. Every tittle of my education, from childhood until I anchored my little bark by this hallowed shore, has engraved upon my heart, in characters to be never erased, the truth that money is the great and only good; and, therefore, will the possession of it be my end and aim."

"The truth!—rather say the falsehood. Does it heal the wounds of the lacerated heart? Can it add one moment to the hours of the wretched outcast who is upon the brink of eternity? Can it restore life to the loved and dear departed? or can it open for you a passage to that better world which is our resting-place hereafter? No! Struggle as you will for it, struggle honorably, and you will obtain it; for, though not the greatest good, it may be to you a means of doing good. Struggle, then, for it; but never for a moment entertain the thought of bartering your happiness for what at best you can but briefly enjoy. Never deceive the faithful heart that may bind itself to you, trustfully confiding in your promises of love; if you do, remember that bitterly, bitterly will you repent of it."

"Talk to your moon and stars about your marriages for love, if you will; my purpose is fixed, and time may teach you to think as I do."

"Sorry will I be if it does."

The clear tones of the nine o'clock bell, summoning all to prayer, broke out upon the stillness of the night, and sent its echoes away up the Blue Ridge, and from its tops to heaven, a notice that worshippers on earth were humbly kneeling to thank the Father who preserved them during the day, and to beg his watchfulness over their slumbers during the night.

Breakfast was over on the following morning.

The coaches, which were to convey us home, were waiting. Our trunks had been strapped on, and the general good-by exchanged. Edward Lalor stood upon the steps as I came up, and he reached out his hand for the last clasp. "Good-by, Tourniquet," said he, while the tears stood in his large eyes, "and, if ever we meet again on earth, I hope I shall be able to prove to you that I am happy with my lot."

I could only reply to him, "Beware"—and away rattled the vehicle in which he rode, followed, in a few moments, by the one in which I traveled, leaving behind us all except the memories which hang round the heart, like the perfume of withered flowers, undiminished even in their faded loveliness.

CHAPTER II.

YEARS had elapsed since our parting. For me, the romance had given place to the realities of life. I had learned to place a juster estimate upon human wisdom and human folly. I had learned, too, to withhold censure upon human weaknesses and errors, from the conviction that perfection is not one of the attributes of our mortality. I had learned that the splendid visions of youth were never fully realized; that I was not to find human nature as perfect as I had anticipated; and I had also learned to draw the veil of charity over the common errors of men, to bear patiently with their failings and their follies, and to strive to make them better.

Years had elapsed, I have said, since the morning of our parting in the old college yard, and our next meeting was upon the steps of the hall of entrance into the medical department of the University of Pennsylvania. It was by a strange coincidence that it so happened. I had gone there to attend the lectures of the distinguished men who conduct that renowned institution, for the purpose of better qualifying myself to discharge the duties of a new position to which I had been raised; while Lalor came from the sunny South, and far away, whither had been his residence. From the day of our parting until that day, neither had heard of the other; and, but for the remarkable shape of his chin, which projected forwards like an advanced guard to his nose, and the peculiar step, which could scarce be imitated—for the foot came flat upon the ground, and, in progression, was gradually raised from the heel to the toe, presenting a resemblance to the rising and falling of an approaching wave; but for these peculiarities, he might have passed me unrecognized, so changed was he. The ruddy hue of health had departed from his face, and the white hairs mingling with the black, as they strayed over his hollow temples, indicated middle age; yet his form was up right as ever, and his tall, commanding person, his broad and full forehead and eagle eye, would cause him to be observed among the distinguished young men who yearly thronged the halls of the first medical school in America.

Arm in arm, we entered the lecture-room. The celebrated Professor Chapman was lecturing on the diseases of the brain and nervous system. As he proceeded to unfold his subject, and dwelt upon the diagnosis and prognosis, detailing the treatment of mental diseases when there is hope of restoration, the rapt attention, the eager gaze, the half-open mouth of my companion evinced how carefully he was treasuring up every word. But, when the lecturer laid down the indications which shut out hope, which determine that the light of the intellect has gone out forever, and that darkness envelops the soul, Lalor's countenance became pale as death, and he trembled like an aspen leaf. His eye was fixed, and his vacant stare would make one dread that his own mind was affected by derangement. When the hour had elapsed, he was evidently unable to attend the lecture of the next Professor, and we went out for a stroll upon Chestnut Street and down to the Delaware. Even the fresh air did not revive him; and the busy throngs, as they hurried along, so annoyed him that, after walking two or three squares, we returned to his boarding-house. He was ill, and to my inquiry, "What was the matter?" he merely replied, "I will be better to-morrow, and then I have much to tell you of my life since last you saw me. Oh! Tourniquet, would to God I had followed your advice! How much of misery would I have been spared! But it is now too late!" and, clasping his hands over his eyes, he wept like a child.

Next day I went early to see him; he was better, and able to relate to me the following:—

"When," said he "I parted forever from our dear, dear old mountain home, I returned to my father's house. I soon became aware that I must have out my own pathway through life, and that, too, without a hope that one helping hand would be extended to my aid, when the heat of the day or the toil might oppress me. I departed thence without bidding my father good-by; but, as I left the old homestead, and stood upon the summit of the last hill where I might obtain the farewell view of the abode of my childhood, the memories of my youth opened the heart that had been seared against my father, and, while the tears filled my eyes, I turned them from that scene heavenward to the happy dwelling-place of my departed mother, and prayed to her to watch and direct the footsteps of her more than orphaned son. Had Providence spared her to me, how different would have been my destiny! Thrown, thus poor and destitute, upon the world, I experienced, quickly, the evils of poverty, and my first determination to escape them came back again more strongly than ever. To the South I directed my footsteps. The first place at which I stopped was ———, in Mississippi. My education soon obtained for me a situation as private tutor in the family of Judge

P——. His son and daughter were my pupils. For three years I labored in my new vocation, and three happier years were never spent than were those to me. My pupils grew up almost under my eyes. I loved them both, because they were my pupils; and I loved one for another reason—because she was beautiful, and loved me, and because her father was rich. I knew that I was loved, from the thousand unmistakable little evidences which lovers only know how to interpret; and, when I first breathed into the heart of that pure and guileless girl the story of my affection for her, my better nature, prevailing over my pernicious education, led me to promise her a love which I really thought I felt, and forever! Fearing to dissipate the dream of happiness in which I imagined myself, I delayed the necessary appeal to Mary's father to sanction our mutual enjoyment, and, by that delay, the appeal was never made; for, in a few short weeks, he fell a victim to the fever of the climate. The tutor, by a kind of right, remained with the orphans; and willingly did I strive to sustain the courage of the bereaved young heart of my betrothed with the promises of unchanging love.

"Judge P—— had been supposed to be very wealthy; but, like many other men, when the day of settlement came, he had bequeathed to his orphans more debts than means to liquidate them, so that my betrothed was penniless. No one had been made aware that we were plighted, that we loved; but God had heard our promise, yet I then forgot that. Forced again to depend upon myself for support, and baffled in my hopes of securing a fortune by a marriage with the daughter of Judge P——, I had no idea of burdening myself with a new charge which would fetter me to the ills of that poverty with which I had already struggled so stubbornly; which had made me selfish, and crushed, with its iron heel, all the noble impulses of my soul, permitting liberty only to the sordid and base aspirations for gold.

"As no one knew of my engagement with Mary P——, I had no popular opinion to combat; there was nothing to bind me but a simple pledge, which could be easily broken. Yet that pledge had been given—it was registered in heaven, and now stands there against me! Without even a farewell, I left ——— for farther south, in hopes of obtaining another situation. For two tedious, weary years, I traveled and taught by turns; but there was no longer any rest for me. From the hour I left ——— until this hour, God only knows the misery I have endured. Awake, the image of the deceived and deserted one was ever before my eyes, and I would start from my sleep with the sound of that familiar voice ringing in my ears 'In mercy, spare!'

"At last I could endure this torture no longer; I must go mad if I did it. I determined to return again, redeem my promise, and give peace to my heart; for I had now been convinced that there is no peace for that heart in which dwells the consciousness of deep injury wilfully inflicted. I did return; but where was my betrothed then, think you? The inmate of a lunatic asylum, and pronounced, too, incurable! When I stood before her, with her hand clasped in mine, and called up all the memories that were deeply graven in my own heart; when I pressed my lips upon her pale forehead, or wet her cheek with my tears, the wild laugh of the maniac was my only answer; and an imbecile shouted in my ears the name of 'Crazy Mary.' The time, from that hour to this, has been spent by me in my efforts to master the intricacies of that science which alone holds out for me a hope that I may be able to restore the reason which my baseness has dethroned. For that purpose am I here; and now, by the memory of our old friendship, I beg of you to aid me."

I promised him that I would do so; and, from that day, the subject of insanity became our study. Not a book which treated the subject was unperused; and even the old authors, whose theories had been long since exploded, were searched by him in hopes that some hint might be discovered which would lead to the detection of the seat of altered function. He imagined that, if it were found, the cure would be easy.

With this view, the brains of the departed must necessarily be examined, and night after night did I sit with him in the dissecting-room, in the fourth story of the University building, amid the mass of fresh and half-dissected carcasses, ourselves alone there, with our solitary night-lamp shedding its feeble light, only sufficiently distinct to mark the outlines, or, perhaps, the features of the outstretched corpses. Often did I sit with him there until the State House clock had tolled the midnight hour, and until, up from Chestnut or Market Street, ascended to us the sound of the watchman's cry, "Past twelve o'clock."

The lecture session terminated, and again we parted; he with his gathered knowledge on his mission of love, and I for my new home in the far West.

CHAPTER III.

One day there came into the office of a justice of the peace, in which I happened to be on business, a woman in search of a police officer: She was tall and well formed, only very thin. She had on an old rusty-brown cloak, with a hood of the same material. This was drawn so closely around her face as to almost conceal her features; but enough could be seen to enable one to judge that the pale and hollow cheek had been once healthful, full, and beautiful, and the lightning of the dark eye, that now flashed beneath the marble forehead, was the index of high mental endowments. I was so struck with her appearance as to inquire of a bystander who she was.

"Why," said he, "don't you know crazy Mary? I thought everybody knew her."

"I do not, indeed. What does she want here?"

"Oh, she is merely making some of her usual complaints; but no one minds her. She says that a young man promised to marry the daughter of the persons with whom she lives; that she is poor, and, on this account, that he will not fulfil his promise; that he is going away, and that the poor girl will break her heart; and she wants an officer to arrest him. Do you not think that something might be done for Mary, with a view to restore her reason?"

I answered that probably something might be done, and that it would be well worth while to make the effort.

Mary overheard enough of our remarks to mistake their purport, and, stepping up to me, while she placed her hand in mine, "Will you," said she, "aid me?" That hand was so thin you could feel every bone and joint articulation, and, as the long tapered fingers rested there, and the clear blue veins shone through the transparent skin, you could notice the sluggish current of the circulation toiling its way backwards towards the heart.

Holding my hand with a tighter grasp, "For God's sake," said she, "aid me! Come! not a moment is to be lost!"

Curiosity, and the strange interest I felt in those poor creatures who have been deprived of their reason since I had studied so attentively their diseases for the benefit of my friend, and besides, the identity of the name with that of his loved one, influenced me, and I went; but, when we reached the house of the kind people with whom Mary lodged, I learned that they had neither son nor daughter. When I told them how I had been led there, "Poor Mary!" said the lady, "she is always talking so; and you did not, I suppose, know her."

I inquired who she was and whence she came.

"I do not know; all I can tell you," said she, "is that one dark and rainy night, about a year ago, my husband was returning home at a late hour. When near the house, he heard the sound of weeping, and, turning his lantern in the direction, saw a woman seated on the edge of the side-walk, with her feet in the water, which was near filling the watercourses. He assisted her into the house, that her clothes might be dried before she went home. But Mary had no home. Her feet were blistered and swollen with walking; but, when I looked at her white hands and arms, and fair sweet face, I knew that Mary had seen better days. We kept her, for she knew not where to go; nor can she give any clue to her former history—only, when she returns, after being out as you have now seen her, she will ask, 'Has Edward returned yet?' When I inquire, 'What Edward?' she will answer, 'My own Edward.'"

Mary's health soon began to decline. Consumption had marked her for its victim, and, with its ruthless grasp, from which there was no escape, the life-spark was crushed until it went out. I stood by her bedside the last day of her weary life; for a while, her senses seemed to return. She spoke of her condition, of her readiness to leave this abode of sorrow for that better world where no shadow clouds the spirit-face, where joy is forever. Taking from her bosom a small gold locket, she handed it to me. "Take that," said she, "and, when I have been buried, open it, and you will learn to whom should be sent the news of my departure. Tell my dear, dear mother that my sorrows, and troubles, and trials are over; that I have gone to join my father in Heaven, where we will await her;" and, she added, in a scarce audible tone, "If you ever meet and know my Edward, tell him that, on her deathbed, Mary forgave him—that she blessed him. Tell him that she loved him more, far more, than life; and tell him, too, that the last name of mortal which crossed her lips was his own."

Next day were deposited in the corner of the churchyard appropriated to paupers the remains of "Crazy Mary."

CHAPTER IV.

I WAS seated in my office, endeavoring to arrange my thoughts for the purpose of lecturing to my class, during the afternoon, upon the physiology of the brain. The demonstrator of anatomy had just announced to me that a subject for that purpose was at my disposal. Before I had completed my preparation, Dr. Edward Lalor stood before me. After the usual greeting at so unexpected a meeting, I inquired how he had succeeded in his efforts to restore the reason of her whom he would make his wife.

"I have not seen her since I saw you last. Before I had returned from Philadelphia, she had escaped; and I have now traveled over nearly the whole country without discovering one trace of her. I have given up the search as hopeless, and am ready to lay down now any hour the life which has been rendered miserable beyond remedy by one fatal error. Willingly, oh! how willingly, would I exchange it, at this hour, but for one look into the bright eye of her they called 'Crazy Mary.'"

"Crazy Mary, did you say?"

"Yes; did you ever hear the name before?"

"I did, and stood by her deathbed."

"For God's sake, tell me where!" and he leaped from his seat in his eagerness, as if he would grasp with his hands the information he desired to obtain.

"I will, if you will first deliver to my class, this evening, the opening lecture on the physiology of the brain. There is a subject on the table for you."

He consented to do this; and I prepared myself to enjoy a rich intellectual feast, for he was an eloquent speaker; and few men could treat the subject to which he had devoted so much attention with a power equal to his.

The lecture hour came round, and, having conducted him into the amphitheatre, I took my seat among the students, in order the better to hear him. He spoke of the brain as the organ through which mind is manifested; as the seat of the soul; as the connecting link between mortality and immortality; of the importance of studying well its physiology, if we would treat understandingly its derangements. "And oh!" said he, "if you yet think lightly of this study, suppose one dear, very dear to you, suddenly deprived of reason; the mind on a 'sea of dreams' bewildered tossed. Upon the knowledge which you now acquire will depend, perhaps, your power over such a malady. How would you not apply yourselves to accomplish such a purpose? Would you not do so daily, and all the day, and through the long night watches, even until the breaking of morning; weeks, months, ay, years, and until your own reason tottered upon its throne from the very excess of your application? If, then, success should crown your efforts, this world could afford you no greater happiness. Even without this consideration, as educated physicians, you owe it as a duty to the community in which you may locate yourselves, to qualify yourselves in the very best manner for your important trust, and the more so, since hitherto these diseases have been so strangely neglected. Yours is a mission of mercy, and, while the messenger of death precedes you, spreading his sable wing over the hearth of men, you must follow him, bringing light and life and joy into his path, and hope and happiness where despair and darkness dwelt. That you may thoroughly understand the nature and structure of this important organ, the brain, we will proceed at once to examine that of the subject before us."

The mallet, and the saw, and the chisel, were on the table, and, as he took the scalpel in his hand, with which to divide the integuments before the calvarium could be removed, he turned down the covering which concealed the head and face. Involuntarily I arose from my seat; while Lalor stood for a moment as if nailed to the spot. Not a muscle nor a fibre moved. His countenance indicated unutterable agony. At last, uttering one wild piercing scream, which will never be forgotten by those who heard it, he snatched up the body from the table, and rushed with it from the amphitheatre. "Mary, Mary, my own Mary, have I at last found—the earth which enshrined your pure soul! Oh! Mary, I would have given my life for one look into those dark eyes, that are now closed forever—to have heard thy stilled tongue utter for me but one word of forgiveness!"

Hard would have been the heart of the being who could, unmoved, have seen that frantic man press to his bosom the cold and stiffened body of his early love, and have heard the ravings of his bewildered intellect as he called upon the departed spirit to return and reanimate the senseless mould. With very great difficulty, could he be induced to give up his recovered treasure. His own mind, so long tottering, had at last fallen; and, when he did give up the body, it was with the remark that "Mary must not forget to come to him to-morrow." For a few days he continued in a condition entirely unconscious of anything; at last a low nervous fever set in, which, in a few days, put a period to his melancholy life;

and, side by side, in the same churchyard, upon the shores of Lake Michigan, where the waves will hymn their requiem, sleep their last long sleep "Crazy Mary" and the victim of a "determination to marry for wealth."

COSTUMES OF ALL NATIONS.—THIRD SERIES.

THE TOILETTE IN PORTUGAL.

CHAPTER IV.

In this smiling and sunny land, the common dress of the lower class of men is the cloak and large broad-brimmed hat so frequently met with in Spain. They have loose trowsers and a coat, bound round the waist with a girdle of leather. The sleeves are tight, and open part of the way up the arm, so as to show the shirt; the throat is uncovered.

Ornaments, such as gold and silver lace, and embroidery, are not allowed to be worn on the garments of the Portuguese; but the higher classes, when they do not follow the French fashions, pay no attention to these rules, but adorn their silk dresses with embroidery and precious stones.

The women among the peasantry seldom wear caps, but have a very becoming way of dressing the hair, and tying it in a net of silk, not unlike a large purse, with a long tassel hanging down the back, and a bow on the forehead. This coiffure they call redecilla, and the men also frequently adopt it. Their gowns usually have a bodice, and short sleeves reaching the elbow, of a different material from the jupe; this bodice is made with a long pointed stomacher, and is cut round at the bosom. Beneath it is worn an under-dress, with long sleeves and a body, that fastens round the throat. White dresses are much worn, ornamented with colored ribbons.

The Portuguese ladies wear very large heavy earrings, and in their hair they are fond of placing quantities of precious stones, which are generally set in the form of butterflies and other insects. Sometimes feathers and colored ribbons are placed among their tresses. No young woman ever conceals her hair under a lace or muslin head-dress. Elderly ladies wear a cap shaped like a caul, of very fine clear muslin.

Their gowns, of which they sometimes wear two or three, one over the other, are richly embroidered; the upper one forms a long train, which sweeps along the ground, and is of black stuff. Their hoops are quite enormous, and their sleeves immensely wide. Instead of a girdle, they encircle their small waists with a string of relics; the ends hang to the ground, and have knots of diamonds in them. Their shoes are of Spanish leather, without any heels; but when they go out they put on pattens, or silk sandals fastened with gold clasps, by which they are raised several inches from the ground. They wear paint, not only on the cheeks, but on the shoulders also.

It is said by many authors that the manners and customs of the Jews and Moors are still, to a certain degree, retained in this country. Perhaps from them they derive their love of jewels; even the fishermen wear gold necklaces and bracelets. The women who sell fruit frequently wear boots instead of shoes or sandals, and black conical caps.

The higher orders of the Portuguese do not appear to admire gaudy colors; black is almost universally worn, ornamented with fringes of gold and colors.

In the "Memoirs of Madame Junot" are many amusing descriptions of the dress of the Portuguese court. A hoop was there considered an indispensable part of the toilette of Madame l'Ambassadrice; and she thus describes her dress, which was arranged according to the fashion of Portugal: "Je mis par-dessus cette monstrueuse montagne dont j'étais flanquée de chaque côté, une belle robe de moire blanche brodée en lames d'or, et rattachée sur les côtés avec de gros glands d'or, absolument comme aurait pu l'être une draperie de croisée. Je mis sur ma tête une toque avec six grandes plumes blanches retenues par une agrafe de diamants, et le fond de la toque était brodé avec des épis de diamants; j'en avais au cou, aux oreilles; et ainsi harnachée, je partis pour Queluz."

The same writer then describes the dress of the Princess of Brazil. Her gown was of white India muslin, embroidered in gold and silver; the sleeves were very short, and the robe was fastened on the shoulders with large diamond clasps. Her hair was dressed in large puffs and plaits, interspersed with splendid diamonds and pearls; her ear-rings and girandoles were quite magnificent.

In another part of this work we read of the following coiffure worn by an old Portuguese lady: "Elle avait ses cheveux blancs relevés sur le bout de sa tête avec un ruban, comme on le voit encore dans quelques tableaux." And, in a note, we find: "Il y a encore beaucoup de Portugaises de haut rang qui restent ainsi coiffées chez elles. Dès qu'elles sortent, elles se mettent à la Française; mais, par exemple, dans l'intérieur des provinces, j'en ai vu qui ne portent jamais d'autre coiffure."

The costume of les dames du Palais is thus described: "C'était la plus étrange mascarade qu'on puisse imaginer de faire revêtir à des femmes Chrétiennes. C'était une jupe de taffetas bien fort, bien épais, d'une couleur bleu foncé, avec une large broderie en or au bas, et puis ensuite une queue, une robe, je ne sais quel morceau d'étoffe d'un rouge éclatant qui leur pendait en manière de traine derrière elles. Les plus âgées, comme le camarieramôr, portaient un petit toquet, une façon de bonnet assez serré à la tête (c'étaient, je crois, les veuves) et sur ce bonnet était une fleur gros bleu, comme la jupe."

Speaking of the ancient dress of Spain and Portugal, Appian says: "We know that the Hispanians and Lusitanians were the saie, fastened with a buckle or brooch; but we are ignorant of its form, and no remains of antiquity have yet been found to explain it." Strabo, too, mentions this garment being in use with the Lusitanians. He also says, "That the Moors wore their hair frizzed and curled, and that they combed their beards."

When Isabella, of Portugal, went to France to marry the Duke of Burgundy, she wore a tabard, or stomacher of ermine, a robe of splendid embroidery, tight sleeves, a cloak reaching to the ground behind, but so narrow that it only fell over the shoulders, and a curious head-dress of white muslin. She had no ornaments of any kind.

THE CAMPBELLS AND THE CLIFTONS.

A DOMESTIC TALE.

BY MISS META M. DUNCAN.

"My dear Mary, I wish I could induce you to send Elinor to Madame Foulard. My Emily is so much improved that I have reason, daily, to congratulate myself upon having placed her with her as a permanent boarder. This sending girls to day-schools, depend upon it, is a bad plan; their minds are distracted from their studies by what they see and hear at home; their lessons are never half learned, and their accomplishments are never thoroughly grounded. At Madame Foulard's they speak nothing but French. Emily is obliged to be up at six every morning to practice her music—an effort I was never able to induce her to make; and throughout the whole day she is never from under the eye of one or the other of her teachers. I believe there is not an establishment in the Union where girls are more completely finished."

"Madame Foulard has a high reputation, I know Louisa; and if my ideas of education entirely coincided with yours, I should, no doubt, send Elinor to her; but the point upon which you lay most stress is the very one upon which I wholly dissent from you. What is to become of the home influence, that most important part of education, if we send our daughters away to live?"

"Why, my dear Mary, the girls whose parents live in town spend all their Sundays at home. So far from weaning them from home, I think it teaches them to like it better. Emily never was so docile and affectionate as she is now, when I have her for only a day and a half in the week instead of the whole seven. You have no idea how glad she is to see us when Saturday comes."

"You misapprehend me, Louisa," said her sister.

in-law, gently; "I do not mean that girls are weaned in affection from their parents and relatives by the system which you advocate. Education does not consist entirely in filling the mind with acquirements and accomplishments. You may successfully instruct a young woman in the languages, music, drawing, and various other useful and ornamental arts, and yet leave the most important part of her education unattended to."

"Oh! I know what your thoughts are running upon, Mary. You think Emily will never know how to make a pie or a pudding."

"Not altogether," replied Mrs. John Campbell, smiling; "though, I confess, I think it an important object to an American woman to know how pies and puddings should be made. I mean by home influence, the direction of the mind, the forming of the principles, and the cultivation of the heart—the hourly precept and the daily example which a parent, and none but a parent, can give. I am satisfied that the ethics which my boys learn every day from their father's lips, as they sit round his table, and the sentiments which my daughter receives from me in our daily intercourse, will influence them more through life than all the theoretical treatises they could study by means of books; and, though I do not undervalue accomplishments, and all the lighter embellishments and graces of modern education, I do not think them of the first importance. I wish my daughter to be well informed and accomplished, and I believe she will be both; but her moral training is my first object."

"Certainly, my dear Mary. So every correct mother must think. Good principles are all important. Madame Foulard has the highest reputation for all that sort of thing, I assure you. Emily, you know, went to Mrs. Osborne's school formerly, and I have the best opportunity of judging of them both. I think Madame Foulard a great deal more particular and severe than Mrs. Osborne, though you seem to think Mrs. Osborne so superior to her."

"I have never made any comparisons between them, Louisa. Indeed, I could not do so, as I know but little of Madame Foulard. Mrs. Osborne I approve, for various reasons besides her moral worth and accomplishments. She is our countrywoman; she was brought up a gentlewoman, and has experienced great vicissitudes; she is, therefore, better qualified to appreciate the requirements of an American girl, and to educate her for a useful as well as an ornamental life. I am perfectly satisfied to let Nora continue with her as a daily pupil."

"As for usefulness, and all that sort of thing, Mary, you know I never trouble myself about it. The position our girls will occupy makes it unnecessary for them to do anything for themselves. They will always have money enough to pay others for being useful."

"We do not know that, Louisa. There is no country in the world where fortunes are so easily won and lost as in ours; and remember that our husbands are still in business. Admitting, however, that no reverses befall us, our fortunes are eventually to be divided into many portions among our children. Our daughters will marry one day, and men of worth are not always men of fortune. If our girls should marry men of moderate means, the necessity for usefulness immediately arises. My sense of our obligation to cultivate our usefulness extends very far. I think no situation in life can warrant an American woman in neglecting to attend to even the minutest details of domestic affairs; for the reason that, no matter how wealthy she may be, if she wishes her husband to be surrounded by comforts, if she wishes his house to be a well-regulated cheerful home, she must attend to it herself. Our servants are uninstructed, therefore they are to be taught; they are frequently careless and wasteful, consequently they must be looked after; and, as no household can be a happy one in which order, neatness, economy, and proper discipline do not prevail, how necessary is it that she upon whom must devolve all these duties should enter upon them instructed, and able to contend with the difficulties before her? Wide as my experience has been, I have never known a well-regulated family in which the nice details of housekeeping could be left entirely to servants; yet I have seen numberless young ladies who, according to a mistaken method of education, have entered upon their duties as wives with the ignorance and helplessness of children. Some, with good sense, commence at that late period their domestic education; others, unable to see clearly their duty, or to break through the trammels of early training, drag through an existence of discomfort, a burthen to themselves, a clog to their husbands, and an evil example to their children, never happy themselves, and never the cause of happiness in others."

"My dear Mary, you look upon everything in such a desperately serious light! Look at me! I have never known anything about housekeeping. I have always left everything to Nanny Foster; yet we get along as well as other people."

"A faithful and devoted servant, like Nanny Foster, is a very rare thing in our country, Louisa;" and Mrs. John Campbell sighed as she thought on the extravagance, waste, and misrule of her brother-in-law's household, even with the aid of old Nanny, who, with the self-devotion which we sometimes see in the lowly and uneducated, had, in the course of years, suffered herself to become the responsible person in her employer's household—quarreling, scolding, and being scolded, till habit had become second nature.

"Mrs. Clifton thinks very highly of Madame Foulard, Mary. She always recommends her to Edward's Southern friends who wish to send their children to the North to be educated. She has been the means of sending several scholars to her."

Mrs. Frederic Campbell, like most weak people, though obstinate in her own views, was always anxious to have her opinions backed by some one of acknowledged weight and judgment.

"I am glad to hear that the lady with whom you have placed Emily is approved of by so judicious a person as Mrs. Clifton, Louisa; and I must beg you to dismiss from your mind the idea that I have any prejudice against Madame Foulard, or, indeed, against boarding-schools generally. Were I living in a remote situation, where schools were not available, I should send my daughter to one, no doubt; though, even then, I should take care not to let her remain away long enough to break up her domestic habits; and, when she was with me, I should make redoubled exertions to teach her to be a good housekeeper, and a thrifty practical woman."

"I should really like to know for once, Mary, what you consider necessary for a lady to know about these sort of things."

"I am afraid your patience would be exhausted, Louisa," said Mrs. John Campbell, laughing, "were I to enter into a detail of all the qualifications I think necessary for a being who may, one day, have the welfare and happiness of husband, children, and servants depending upon her exertions. I will, however, give you a rapid sketch of what I intend my daughter shall be taught. In the first place, if she is ever to have a house of her own—which I hope she may—she must know how to keep it; and, to do so properly, she must learn, by her own experience, how it should be done. I shall teach her early to exercise her judgment, and to understand the value of money, by sending her to make purchases for me for domestic purposes. To give her a knowledge of household requirements, of proper economy, and methodical arrangement, she shall aid me in keeping my house accounts. She must know enough of the details of household work to be able to plan for, and direct, her servants. She must know mutton from veal when she sees it uncooked, and must not faint at the sight of a raw calf's head, as I have heard young ladies talk of doing. She must be able, with a cookery book in her hand, to explain to a cook how she wishes any dish prepared; and it is my wish that she should learn to make pastry and bread with her own hands."

"Pastry and bread! What! Nora, who takes harp lessons, and has the most beautiful little hands in the world? Why her hands will be ruined!"

"Nora takes harp lessons because she has a talent for music; and, though I wish her to learn to make pastry and bread, I do not intend she shall do it habitually. I wish her to know practically all the most important branches of housekeeping, that she may teach others, and, if the necessity should arise, be able to perform them herself. Young as she is, I already take her into the kitchen with me during the preserving and pickling season, and teach her that delicate branch of cookery—so delicate, indeed, that few ladies are blest with servants to whom they can trust it. Her fingers become a little stained, to be sure, but a few days wears it off; and, though as weak as most mothers where pride in their children is concerned, I should think myself highly culpable if I suffered any such paltry vanity to interfere where my judgment tells me I am right. I think it necessary that girls should be taught sewing. All American women are obliged to do more or less of it; therefore, I have already commenced having Nora taught to sew. She will never probably have to make a shirt, but I intend she shall know how one is put together."

"And how will you find time to give your daughter two separate educations?"

"I do not intend to make them separate. I do not think a thorough domestic education inconsistent with the highest degree of refinement, or incompatible with the widest range of mental cultivation. By beginning early, you can make household employments a pleasure to a little girl. She will learn insensibly, and as a recreation under a mother's eye, and, as her assistant, all that it is necessary she should know. For the sewing, during a part of the year, I appropriate half of the time allotted to dancing. Dancing, as a healthful, refining, and innocent amusement, I approve of highly; but, as it is an art which children learn almost instinctively, I steal the time from it rather than from that devoted to more solid studies."

"And you think that all this can be done without impairing the refinement of a lady?"

"Certainly, I do. Refinement is a quality of the mind which, properly understood, dignifies and elevates whatever it is just and right that we should do, and which no conscientious discharge of duties can impair."

"How is it with Nora, Mary? Do you find her an apt scholar in all these matters? I have seen so little of her recently, that the child is quite a stranger to me. I thought her changed when I was at Clover Hill in the Fall. She appears to have lost her wild spirits and independent habits. I used to think her a terrible little pickle, with her fearless daring and boyish pursuits."

"You are right, Louisa. Nora is greatly changed since our calamity," replied Mrs. John, her lip quivering, and her eye glancing down upon her black dress. "I often mourn over the loss of those wild and frolicsome spirits, when I think of the cause which banished them. But it has brought my daughter nearer to me, and made her an inappreciable treasure. I have her full sympathy in every thing I undertake relative to her education, and I find her a most docile pupil."

"You are fortunate, Mary. My experience has shown me that it is easier to talk about education than to carry it out. Children in our day have wills of their own; and I find parents oftener submitting to be overruled than gaining their point."

"Your remark is but too true, Louisa; but let not parents lay the blame upon the young and ductile whom it is their duty to bend and train. It is not so much strength of will in the young as you assert, but a deficiency of that quality in parents, arising from an overweening and mistaken tenderness for their children, which is doing so much injury to the present generation. That part of the duty of parents which consists in checking, curbing, and restraining their children, is but rarely exercised now; indulgence is carried to an unwise extent. We ourselves can remember how crude were our ideas, how limited our experience, and how undeveloped our judgment, even when we were ushered into the world as grown women, to act in a measure for ourselves—how mentally we groped in the dark upon a thousand subjects which, at our age, it was impossible for us to form correct opinions upon. Ought children, then, to be trusted to act and decide for themselves on points which may affect their whole future welfare, as we often see them permitted to do? I think not, certainly; and every parent should beware of that most painful result of a blind course of indulgence, the sitting in judgment of their children upon their conduct when time and experience have taught them to feel its disastrous effects. The story of the young man who, on the gallows, reproached his mother with his fate, because she did not punish him for his first petty theft, is a homely, though a wholesome lesson to all parents."

Frederic and John Campbell were brothers, wealthy and enterprising merchants of Philadelphia. They were partners in business, and affectionately attached to each other, which caused a close intimacy to exist between their families. The foregoing conversation occurred between the wives of these two gentlemen. The intercourse between the sisters-in-law was marked by a greater degree of amicability than is usual in that relation, considering the great opposition of character in the two ladies. This was in a great measure owing to the good sense and dignity of character of Mrs. John Campbell, the wife of the younger brother, and in a smaller degree to the easy nature of Mrs. Frederic, who, though weak, frivolous, and vain, was not ill tempered.

Frederic Campbell married a beauty and a belle, and was the father of five children—the oldest of whom was Emily, the daughter whom we have heard alluded to. Mrs. Frederic Campbell, who had preserved her youthful beauty in wonderful freshness, was devoted to society and pleasure. Having been born an "ornamental" herself, her propensities ran singularly in the line of this natural qualification. To dress, to exhibit, to cause a sensation, to be at the topmost round of every fashionable folly and excitement prevailing, were her chief employments. To live without that vague phantom, "the world," which everybody talks about, and no one can define, was, with her, an impossibility. No wonder, then, that she found it necessary to send her daughter to boarding-school. No wonder that she whispered, confidentially, to Nanny Foster, on her return home, that "she had been listening to a string of the greatest nonsense from Mrs. John, upon the subject of education, it was possible to conceive of." Mrs. Frederic was also somewhat extravagant; and, though her husband often thought her so, he could never bear to check his handsome wife.

Emily Campbell was an object of great pride to her mother. She gave promise of rare beauty; and Mrs. Frederic's great aim was to increase, by the aid of education, the attractions of her daughter. Brought up herself in an atmosphere of frivolous excitement, she was incapable of forming any elevated views on this important subject, and, to render Emily the brilliant ornament of a drawing-room, "the observed of all observers," the achiever of the "best match" of the day, were the vague objects that floated in her mind when she marked out her daughter's career.

To conceive, however, is always easier than to accomplish. Emily was a spoiled child, adverse to study, and incapable, from the influences which surrounded her at home, of applying herself. In vain did her mother tell her she should be ashamed to introduce her when she grew up, if she did not become more studious. In vain did she bribe and persuade. While the atmosphere of her father's house was always at fever heat, and her mother set her no example of usefulness and discipline, Emily's natural propensities triumphed, and she was idle, vain, and unambitious. Incapable of carrying out her plans herself, Mrs. Frederic fell upon the expedient of sending Emily to the boarding-school of Madame Foulard, a French lady highly thought of as a teacher. Relieved inexpressibly by the weight of care and responsibility taken from her by this step, she congratulated herself upon her "excellent arrangement," and, in her exultation, endeavored to persuade all her friends who had daughters to educate, to follow her example.

Mrs. John Campbell was, in all respects, a very different woman from her sister-in-law. She was not beautiful, strictly speaking, but so singularly refined and gentle that she impressed you, through the harmony of her appearance, with a sense of beauty. Endowed with a good intellect, and cultivated mind, and regulated feelings, she was that most attractive of all objects of interest, a perfect wife and mother. Unlike Mrs. Frederic, she was fond of retirement and domestic pleasures, and seldom emerged into scenes of gayety. Conscientious to a high degree, she never considered their great wealth an excuse for the neglect of any duty, but, by a strict attention to justice and economy in dispensing their income, she was enabled privately to aid many a benevolent institution, and succor many a suffering family. Her children loved her, her husband revered her, and all who knew her respected her. She was, at the opening of our tale, the mother of three children—a daughter, now about fourteen, and two little boys, mere infants. Elinor was a twin, and it was to the loss of her twin brother, by a painful accident, that Mrs. John Campbell alluded in her conversation with her sister-in-law.

Mrs. Clifton, the lady whose opinion we have heard quoted with so much deference by the two ladies, was nearly connected with the Campbell families by the closest ties of friendship. She was the daughter of an intimate friend of the father of our brothers, and they had known her from infancy. Little, plain, and unattractive, she had, in early life, been thrown chiefly upon the resources of a naturally fine mind for her happiness. When the freshness of youth had passed from her, she became unexpectedly the heiress of a large property. This sudden change in her fortunes produced a magical effect in her position. An orphan, without any very near ties, her life, except for her intimacy with the Campbells, would have been singularly isolated; but with the tide of wealth came troops of friends, and the lonely woman became an object of speculation and interest in quarters where, heretofore, her existence had been unknown. Her good sense and circumspection saved her, for a time, from that saddest of fates—being sought in marriage for her wealth; but she fell a victim at last. At a watering-place, one summer, she met the elegant, refined, and accomplished Henry Clifton. He was in the first years of his widowhood, and had with him an only child, an interesting but neglected little boy of some six or eight years old. Mr. Clifton was needy, indolent, extravagant, and unprincipled; and he deliberately resolved to marry a woman who could furnish him with the means of indulging in his luxurious propensities. His tastes would have led him to prefer youth and beauty; but, as he had heretofore been unsuccessful in all such attempts, he determined to direct his efforts to winning Fanny Grant. He was a thorough man of the world, and held the key to most of the ordinary weaknesses of women. He soon detected Fanny's tenderness of nature, shown in her interest in, and compassion for, his little boy; and the child was the lever by which he worked. He acted his part well; and Fanny soon began to think that she saw clearly before her the path which her destiny called upon her to fill; and, when the little Edward asked her to come home and live with him and be his mamma, and the wily father, with his pale face and serious eye, looked tenderly upon her and echoed his son's prayer, the simple-hearted, affectionate woman, bursting into tears, acknowledged that the consent which he craved, as the only thing which could insure his future happiness, would add also to hers.

They married, and Fanny's dream of happiness was brief. When restraint was no longer expedient, the selfishness of her husband's character became apparent, and his coldness and neglect soon convinced her of the motives for which she had been sought. With her respect, much of the affection which this ardent, though timid and undervalued, woman had lavished upon him fled. She felt, with bitterness, her lot; and she would, no doubt, have sunk under the weight of her sorrows but for the affection of the little Edward, who clung to her with an earnest love scarcely credible in one so young. The poor boy was entirely neglected by his father, and his new mother was the only thing in life he had to lean upon. Mrs. Clifton, with her newly-awakened tenderness thrown rudely back upon her, turned the whole strength of her love upon the little boy. She loved him for the tie of sympathy between them, as well as for the excellence of his nature and his strong regard for her. She was his playfellow, companion, and friend, his faithful and judicious instructress, till long after the period when he should have been intrusted to teachers proper to fit him for a man's career; and the only occasion upon which she ever broke through the meek submissiveness which had characterized her during her married life, was when she expressed her determination that the boy should have a proper education. The indignation, which had never burst forth to redress her own injuries, burned vividly for him, and she gained her point.

Edward, whose reflective mind caused him early to comprehend the true position of his stepmother, and who deeply felt her wrongs, as well as the neglect which his father exhibited towards himself, even as a boy, seemed to consider himself her champion; but, as he approached manhood, and years and experience had added the wisdom of the world to that of the heart, which had heretofore alone guided him, his respect and reverence for his mother deepened, and no tie more beautiful, more touching, could exist than that which united the neglected wife and son.

Meanwhile, Mr. Clifton followed his career of selfishness and sensuality; he lived but to minister to the pleasures of his own languid existence. Two-thirds of his life were spent at his club. Luxurious dinners and costly wines were his daily indulgences. Horses of priceless value filled his stable and ministered to his pleasure on the "turf." To these pursuits the hints of the world added high play as one of the means by which he dissipated his wife's fortune; while the initiated knew that large sums had gone to pay long-standing and harassing debts, contracted before his marriage.

Edward had scarcely reached the age of eighteen when Mr. Clifton's career of shameless extravagance came abruptly to a close. Money, which it had always been difficult to obtain from him, was now refused with oaths and abuse. Duns, whose errands it was in vain to conceal, beset the house, and execution after execution followed in quick succession, till, driven into bankruptcy, they were deprived even of a home, and were compelled to take refuge in a mean lodging. It would be a vain task to attempt to describe the bitter humiliations through which Mrs. Clifton was dragged by her unprincipled husband during the year of misery that followed. Broken in health, his pride mortified, all his former sources of indulgence cut off, his only means of living derived from the sale of his wife's jewels and valuables, which the consideration of his creditors had enabled her to retain, he continued the same calculating sensualist in penury as he was in prosperity. In the cold selfishness of his nature, he made his wife his victim to the last. She labored early and late at her needle, and he appropriated the proceeds to the indulgence of his palate. She performed the lowest menial offices, and he exacted them as his due. She nursed him with untiring patience during months of declining health, and received only reproaches as her reward. At length, and happily at the time when all her pecuniary resources were exhausted, his end arrived. He died as he had lived—blind, utterly blind; an angel had been in his path beckoning him on, and he knew it not.

This year of misery was the last of Edward's collegiate course. His terms were already paid, and his mother, as well as his kind friends, the Messrs. Campbell, insisted upon his remaining to graduate, opposing his desire to leave college and obtain some employment to assist in supporting the family. Edward, ever docile to the wishes of that kind self-sacrificing friend, yielded to his mother's wishes, relieving her, in the intervals of study, of every burthen which it was possible for him to take from her, and giving her that sweetest of all solace, his earnest sympathy.

In this juncture, the brothers Campbell, whose sympathy for their old friend had never flagged, though they loathed her unhappy husband, came forward to her assistance. Mrs. John Campbell, with that earnest kindness which characterizes a delicate mind, immediately removed the destitute widow to her own house, where she quietly and considerably made every arrangement which would induce her to consider it as her future home. To Edward, the same hospitality was extended, with an offer of a situation in the counting-house of the firm, which would bring in an immediate though small salary. This, though with the promise of their strongest efforts to advance him in life, did not meet Edward's views. Stung and mortified to behold that dear and gentle mother, who had been all in all to him, depending upon the bounty of strangers whom, though old and kind friends, she had no such claim upon, and feeling, with morbid keenness, by whose misdeeds her pitiable situation had been brought about, he would have coined his flesh to place her in the situation from which his father's profligacy had hurled her. We may, therefore, conceive that, with such views, the offer of a salary of a few hundreds a year, with the obligation of waiting the slow progress of events to open the pathway to independence, must, to his ardent feelings, have been wholly inadmissible. To make money rapidly by some unheard-of means, and by unparalleled exertions, was now his sole object. Had the Eldorado, which has since drawn its thousands of eager pilgrims to a golden harvest, then been discovered, Edward would no doubt have found his way to California, there to dig, to accumulate, and to hoard for the object of his dearest love and care; but no such golden vision had, as yet, dawned upon the children of men, and Edward must seek some less captivating plan, some more prosaic method, through the beaten tracks of trade, by which to gather wealth. Unmindful of the tastes and the studies which would have led him to a professional life, as the career to which he was best adapted, he yielded up the visions of his youth without a sigh, and bent all his energies to the schemes which filled his mind.

Edward had but one near relative living, a half-brother of his mother's, living in New Orleans, whom he had never seen. Offended at his sister's marriage with Mr. Clifton, he had refused to have any intercourse with her; a determination which he had carried out fully, the announcement of her death even not having been noticed by him. Edward knew little of his uncle save from report, which described him as an eccentric, fanciful old bachelor, a wealthy and enterprising merchant, benevolent and kind after his own peculiar fashion. Edward determined to write to this uncle and lay before him his situation, and that of his father's widow, and ask for his assistance in pushing his fortune in New Orleans—a place where he believed his energies and will to do would reap the quickest harvest. He wrote, and the letter was a history of his father's second marriage and its results. He dwelt as tenderly as he could upon his father's memory; but, when he spoke of that second mother whom God had blessed him with, described her character, her devotion to him, and told of his love and reverence for her, and of his determination to surround her one day, if life and health were spared to him, with the comforts of life, of which, through her connection with them, she had been deprived, his deep earnestness rendered him eloquent, and no labored picture could have portrayed half so well the manly excellence of character, the high and noble qualities of his heart, as did, unconsciously, his own words in this simple straightforward narrative. To this letter Edward received an immediate reply, which, though it granted all that he had desired, somewhat chilled his ardent feelings. Mr. Fairly acknowledged the relationship, consented to aid his nephew in pushing his fortune, and directed him to set out immediately for New Orleans, enclosing him a check to a large amount for his expenses. But his answer was a dry, short, business letter. There was no reply to the unreserved and heartfelt communications which he had made to his uncle; not a single word of kindness or sympathy appeared in the letter. Checked, but not disheartened, he proceeded immediately to obey his uncle's commands, and, dividing with Mrs. Clifton the sum of money which he had received, he tore himself from that dear friend, whispering, in a choking voice as he left her, a promise that they should, at no distant day, be again united in a home of their own, which it should be his pride to create.

THE PIONEER MOTHERS OF MICHIGAN.

BY MRS. E. F. ELLET.

MARY ANN RUMSEY.*

The first settlement of Detroit dates so far back as to be among the antiquities of our new country; but it was at a much later day that the lands in Michigan came into market. The perils and privations incident to the occupation of these lands by the pioneer settlers were not, indeed, so terrible or so romantic as those encountered at an earlier period, when the adventurous few who penetrated the wilderness were exposed to the fury of a savage foe, whose assaults were far more to be dreaded than those of the wild beasts of the forest. Yet the later pioneers, if they had not to dispute the possession of the soil at the risk of their lives, had their trials and sufferings—their dangers, too—not the less difficult to endure because the narration is rather amusing than thrilling. They had also to struggle with that feeling of isolation and loneliness which presses heavily on those who have severed all the endearing ties of home, where cluster those fond attachments only formed in youth. Many a sad hour was passed in remembrance and regret by the young wife, in the absence of her husband, when she had no sympathizing friend in whose bosom she could pour her griefs. Little given to repining as she might be, faithful to her duties, and disposed to make the best of everything, still thoughts of the loved ones from whom she had parted for life would weigh on her spirits and fill her eyes with tears, brushed hastily away while she busied herself about her household employments. A touching instance of the heart's yearning for companionship occurs to memory, mentioned by one of the female pioneers, who had been three weeks in her new home without having seen the face of another woman. "One Sunday," she said, "I told my husband that beyond the thick wood, just in the rear of our dwelling, I could see from the upper window another log-house. I wanted him to go there with me; we went, and, as we approached, I saw the woman come out, appearing to be busy about something at the back door. That was enough; I did not care to go any farther; we went home, I had seen her, and that satisfied me."

Ann Arbor is the county seat of Washtenaw county. The Indian name, Washtenong, signifies "grand" or "beautiful," and Grand River takes its name from the same word. It was called "Arbor," on account of the noble aspect of the original site of the village—which was a burr oak opening, resembling an arbor laid out and cultivated by the hand of taste. For the prefix of "Ann," it was indebted, according to undeniable tradition, to two prominent women whose husbands were the first purchasers and settlers in the vicinity. Some have maintained that the place owed its entire name to them, from the fact that they lived, until houses could be built, in a kind of rude arbor made by poles covered with boughs. However that may be, it is certain that John Allen and Walker Rumsey gave the name to the new settlement, afterwards confirmed by State authority, and ever since retained. Their first garden was the ground now occupied as the public square; and here Allen, who had considerable skill in these matters, planted and raised a fine stock of vegetables, enabling them to supply the neighbors whom their persuasions had induced to join their little community. The two leaders above mentioned came in February, 1824—Rumsey being accompanied by his wife. This couple emigrated from some part of the State of New York, which has furnished so many enterprising families among the inhabitants of Michigan. Some of the New England stock, who were a little proud of their land of the pilgrims, were accustomed to say they "had stopped some years in the State of New York on their way to the West."

The arbor, or tent, which formed the first shelter for this little party, and served them as such for two weeks, was made of their sleigh-box, with a rag carpet spread over boughs of trees, which were, of course, denuded of leaves; for there grew not an evergreen within miles, except a few cedars on a hill some two miles from the locality. They had brought with them a few barrels of provisions; and as there were no regular roads all the way to Detroit, and the traveling was tedious and difficult, they lost no time in making a treaty with the roving Indians, who agreed to furnish them with regular supplies of corn and venison. On this they subsisted, while they industriously prepared the ground and planted grain and vegetables to serve them for the coming summer and winter. "Ann Arbor" had been the favorite dancing-ground of the Potawattomies, many families of whom lived in the neighborhood. Their place of council was in the light "opening" selected by Allen for his garden, on which at this time there was scarcely a tree. Those that now adorn the square have been since planted; most of them more than ten years afterwards.

The visits of the Indians were peaceable enough, and generally welcome; for they brought deer and wild turkeys to exchange for other articles—game being then abundant in the woods. Sometimes, indeed, when they found none but women at home, they showed themselves a little disposed to encroach upon hospitality. Mrs. Rumsey confessed being frightened at one time by their wild behavior; but, assuming a stern and commanding air, she bade them begone, flourishing a broom at the same time; and, though they could not have been said to be afraid of her weapon, they did not hesitate to obey. All the coteremporaries of Mrs. Rumsey agree in describing her as a woman of remarkable and distinguished appearance, and of energetic character; singularly fitted to be a useful pioneer in a new country, where difficulties and discouragements must be met with unblinding courage, fortitude, and patient perseverance. Her commanding aspect—whether natural, or the result of a habit of being foremost in enterprise—was well suited to her qualities of determination and strength of purpose. Her cheerful disposition, disregard of hardships, and resolute way of "making the best of everything," have often been mentioned with admiration. "When we had been out land-hunting," said Mr. Allen, "or otherwise engaged through the day, so that we returned late and tired out, she was always ready for us with good humor and a good supper." By such aid and encouragement it is that woman—a true helpmeet—can hold up man's hands and strengthen his heart when disquieted by care and vexation. To be enabled to appreciate the worth of such a household companion, one must have spent a year at least in the backwoods. Experience and necessity here furnished the best kind of education, fitting for the endurance of every trial, and the thorough enjoyment of the labor-bought pleasures which are relished most keenly when alternated with privations.

In the course of a few months, other families moved into the neighborhood; and, on the succeeding Fourth of July (1824), there was a joyous celebration of the nation's birthday. The anniversary falling on a Sunday, it was kept on Monday; having been celebrated the Saturday before at "Woodruff's Grove," near the site of the present village of Ypsilanti. About forty guests, among whom were the women of course, sat down to partake of the rustic dinner. It was either on this occasion or on the anniversary following, celebrated also at Ann Arbor, that the family of Mr. White, one of the "neighbors," were put to much inconvenience by the escape of their oxen; which calamity imposed on them the necessity of walking home in terror—for the distant howling of wolves could be heard all the way. At the assemblage on the Fourth of July, 1825, the white inhabitants of the county were present in mass—forty or fifty in all.

The howling of wolves was a species of nocturnal music often listened to by the pioneers of Michigan. A lady, who removed there many years later, says that on moonlight evenings they have often stood to hear their howling, some three miles distant, answered by the barking of their dogs. The sound was distinct, and appeared to be much nearer. In the early settlement of the country, a woman going one day to the spring for water, saw, as she supposed, the dog belonging to the family, drinking, and, finding that he did not get out of the way as she came up, struck him with her pail, which she then filled and carried back to the house. There she saw the dog lying quietly under the bed; and a sudden flash of recollection convinced her that she had seen a wolf at the spring. She roused the men, and the animal was pursued and killed. Notwithstanding the cowardice of the gray wolf, it was always, especially in packs, a terror to the women of the country. Other wild beasts were disposed to dispute with man the possession of their forest domain. A young woman in Lin county, standing one day outside her "shanty," fancied she heard a crackling in the boughs of the tree above her, and, looking up, caught the eyes of a panther glaring upon her, as the animal was preparing for a fatal spring. With a presence of mind which the habit of looking danger in the face alone could give, she stepped cautiously backward, still keeping her eyes steadily fixed on the creature, and, slipping behind the blanket which served for a door, took down her husband's rifle, which was kept loaded and ready for use. Lifting a corner of the blanket, she deliberately took aim and fired; the shot took effect, and the panther fell to the ground in the death-struggle.

In the eyes of her rustic neighbors, Mrs. Rumsey was the most prominent female member of the community; for such qualities of mind, in a primitive state of society, never fail to exercise a controlling influence. Something of romance, too, was added to the interest surrounding her. It was said—though it might have been mere gossip—that her early life had been clouded by unhappiness consequent upon an ill-assorted marriage, and that she had little to regret in the years passed in her former home. Little was known of her story, for she never showed herself inclined to be communicative on the subject, and the intuitive delicacy of her associates forbade their scrutiny into what plainly did not concern them. Those were not the days, withal, when news traveled on the wings of the wind, o with the flash of the lightning; and, if there had been aught in the experience of former years which she did not wish to recall, Mrs. Rumsey was in no danger of having it snatched from the friendly keeping of the past and paraded before the curious gaze of the public. So the mystery about her remained unfathomed, as she did not choose to explain it. Her circumstances at that time were comfortable, and happy in her round of duties, it did not appear that she suffered her thoughts to dwell on the past; though once, in a moment of great distress on the occasion of the sudden death of a beloved child, she let fall expressions which set afloat the conjectures of her neighbors, and awakened curiosity which was never fully satisfied. She was not, however, the less respected on that account. In the first stages of society, when no artificial distinctions are recognized, and social intercourse is unrestricted by form, the standing of individuals is seldom questioned if they prove useful and agreeable. Mrs. Rumsey died in Illinois.

The first sleighs used by these primitive settlers were made by bending two poles, which served for runners, a crate for the box surmounting them. The large double sleigh was an improvement pertaining to a more advanced stage. Before grain could be raised, it was often necessary, notwithstanding the aid of their Indian allies, to go to Detroit to procure flour—a journey which usually consumed a week. Whenever it had to be performed, the labor of every man in the settlement was in requisition to put the roads in order. In one case, when the head of a family was detained two or three weeks by some accident at the mill, the wife dug ground-nuts and picked up every other edible thing that could furnish food for herself and children. Another woman, who was reduced to her last biscuit, declared, laughingly, that she would not have it said they ever were out of bread in her western home, and had the biscuit placed every day on the table for a fortnight, till new supplies came. Game, particularly venison, was plenty in those days, and some of the settlers, who were excellent hunters, killed enough for the use of their families and for the demands of hospitality.

MEN'S RIGHTS CONVENTION AT ———.

EXTRAORDINARY PROCEEDINGS, EXCITING SCENES, AND CURIOUS SPEECHES.

FROM OUR OWN REPORTER, CHERICOT.

December 20th, 1851.

YESTERDAY, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon, an immense mass meeting of gentlemen from all parts of the country was held at Independence Hall. It was convened upon notices to that effect, which were issued directly after the late extraordinary and treasonable Female Convention at Massachusetts, and which, being distributed among the principal cities in the Union, had resulted in the collection of an enthusiastic crowd of gentlemen of all grades, trades, and politics, one common danger uniting them, in the effort to repel the proposed feminine aggression of their rights.

On taking a survey of the meeting, one thing struck us very forcibly—the uneasy and restless anxiety that characterized the demeanor of most of the men; the slightest noise caused a general sensation; and, in one instance, the shrill cry of a fish-woman threw a gentleman into hysterics, which he explained, on his recovery, to have resulted from his mistaking it for the voice of his wife.

When the excitement had, in some measure, subsided, the meeting was called to order by Mr. Wumenheyter, of New York, who said, the first business being the choice of a president, he moved that Mr. H. P. Husband, of Maryland, be appointed.

Brass Blackstone, of Philadelphia, seconded the motion, which was unanimously adopted.

After the vice presidents and secretaries were duly chosen, and a business committee appointed to draw up resolutions expressive of the sense of the meeting, the president addressed the convention as follows:—

"The object which has called this great assemblage together is one which not only concerns mankind in general, but Americans in particular. This is emphatically a land of liberty—liberty which, achieved by the exertions of our forefathers, has commanded the respect of the tyrannical governments of the Old World, and resisted all unhallowed attempts to subvert it. This liberty, gentlemen, is threatened with destruction by the establishment, within the very bounds of this republic, of a despotism that has no parallel in ancient or modern history. Yes, there is a conspiracy afoot in the very midst of us, which, should it succeed in its aspiring aims, will annihilate us as men, and convert us into mere household appendages to that rebellious sex who, after having for years shown a disposition to encroach on some of our rights and privileges, now boldly assert a claim to all. Patience, gentlemen, is no longer a virtue; stern determination and resolute action alone can put down this ambitious usurpation and re-establish our authority on its legitimate basis.

"These firebrands on our domestic hearths must be extinguished, or the sparks, lighting into a flame, will consume us."

Here the sensation produced by Mr. Husband's fiery eloquence was so intense that groans and sobs resounded from all parts of the building, and the gentleman was so overcome by his own flights of fancy that it was some time before he could proceed.

"I have, in the relations of husband, son, and brother, stood aloof. I have borne, with dignity and Spartan fortitude, the assumption, by my female relatives, of those garments which, from time immemorial, have been our rightful badge, trusting that the 'breach' into which they were throwing themselves would prove of such an 'imminent and deadly' nature as to deprive them of any desire to go further. But late events have opened my eyes to the treasonable nature of their designs, and to the danger of the mine on which we have been heedlessly treading; and, regardless alike of family ties and possible consequences, I have boldly sounded the alarm which has brought us together this day. This terrible danger I discovered by chance, having picked up—in my own room, gentlemen—a letter addressed to my wife by a female friend. I will, gentlemen, read a passage from this incendiary production, premising that the preceding paragraphs, after giving an account of the late meeting at Worcester, refer to the female millennium about to commence:—

"Now then, my dear,

We'll smoke and cheer and drink our lager beer;
We'll have our latch-keys, stay out late at nights;
And boldly we'll assert our female rights;
While conquered men, our crewwhile tyrant foes,
Shall stay at home and wear our cast-off clothes,
Nurse babies, scold the servants, get our dinners;
'Tis all that they are fit for, wretched sinners!"

"Imagine my feelings on finding treason at work in my domestic sanctuary—at detecting the wife of my bosom in a plot against my peace!"

Here Mr. Husband was so overpowered by his emotions that he was compelled to pause for a few moments, ere he recovered his voice. Deep sympathy was manifested by the audience.

"I would now repeat the necessity of prompt action, for which I doubt not the wisdom and intelligence of this assembly will be found sufficient. Our business now is to find a remedy for the evil. Let us therefore, in a bold and uncompromising manner, address ourselves to the duties before us."

While awaiting the action of the business committee, the following letters were read from distinguished gentlemen who had been invited to attend the meeting:—

Mr. Webster stated that the onerous nature of his diplomatic duties prevented his accepting the invitation extended to him. Had it, however, been in his power to do so, he should still have declined it, as the handsome manner in which the ladies had defended him in his native State obliged him to remain neuter in the conflict between the great contending parties. He would remark, in conclusion, that, devoted as he was to the Union, faithful as he had ever been in maintaining the Constitution, he had no sympathy with anything tending to infringe the conditions of the matrimonial compact, and therefore solemnly recommended that both parties should meet and conclude a treaty of peace.

Mr. Clay regretted his necessary attendance on Congress precluded his presence at this important meeting; for, faithful to his great principle, he should have endeavored to suggest such a compromise as should reconcile all parties. But he trusted that an amicable spirit would pervade their proceedings, and unity and concord be the result.

Mr. Horace Mann repeated his determination of not siding with either party. He referred again to the book he was writing, which he thought would satisfy both sides.

Mr. Buckeye, of Ohio, wrote to excuse his attendance, as the duties of the pork-killing season required his attention; and Mrs. Buckeye's absence at a Socialist meeting, in the interior of the State, prevented his leaving home.

Mr. Wumenheyter, chairman of the committee, now rose to say that their report was ready. He then read the following resolutions:—

Resolved, That a crisis has arrived in our domestic relations that admits of no temporizing measures, but requires us openly to insist on those rights so boldly and outrageously assailed by that weaker portion of humanity, whose duty it is to be satisfied with the inferior position assigned them by nature, and to yield in all things to man.

Resolved, That an unblushing claim has not only been made on our clothes, but on all our masculine privileges; and as this evil has resulted, in the first place, from the impunity with which the women have put their hands in our pockets, and as it will end only in the usurpation of our business, and of our sole right to the ballot-box, it becomes necessary for us to impress upon this rebellious sex our united determination to resist their aggressions.

Resolved, That this effort becomes imperatively necessary when we consider the treacherous nature of women, and remember that, should they succeed in their attempt, we shall meet no mercy at their hands. Universal decapitation of the men, and an Amazonian form of government will undoubtedly be the result.

Resolved, That, while we shall use our lawful and united authority to put down this revolt, we will show clemency to the culprits, and, tempering justice with mercy, render their punishment as light as may be consistent with our own safety.

These resolutions were ordered to be laid on the table for discussion.

Mr. Wumenheyter said he wished particularly for the attention of the audience while he offered a few remarks on these resolutions. "He was," he said,

"proud to call himself a New Yorker. His city was the greatest in the world. It had a great canal, a great line of steamships, a great many railroads, a great many banks, and"—

Here a voice from the crowd exclaimed, "And a great many other humbugs!" Mr. W. was, for a moment, disconcerted; but, resuming his remarks, he said—

"I do not regard this rude interruption. I shall still assert the superiority of my State to all others; and, at the same time, acknowledge that, with all our talents and business enterprise, we cannot manage the women. I confess that, in our great State, the attempt on our privileges was first made; but I can also assure this convention that we shall be the first to defend those privileges. I have been so unhappy as to have had three wives, but, fortunately, have buried them all; and I can assert, from personal experience, that

'Woman, woman, whether lean or fat, is
In face an angel, and in soul a cat!'

A spirit of philanthropy urges me to warn you against the female snares which my fatal destiny has inflicted on me, and from which I am therefore desirous to save others, as my several wives were so many different forms of evil, and I suffered intensely in consequence. I hope my misery will deter others from such experiments. If I rescue one wretch from the horrors of matrimony, my purpose will be answered, and my past sufferings forgotten."

Mr. W. urged the adoption of immediate and relentless measures, and trusted that some available remedy might be suggested for the evil that was in their midst.

Cotte Bettie, Esq., from Delaware, said, "I fully agree with the gentleman from New York in his views on this terrible crisis. I am as proud of my State as he can be of his. I am not ashamed to call myself one of the 'Blue Hen's Chickens.' Delawarians are true blue—they always were, and always will be blue. They were the first to rally at freedom's call, and would not now be found wanting. While he thus obeyed his instructions in proffering their aid, he must, at the same time, assure this assembly that it was very advisable for them to keep their proceedings as secret as possible, lest a premature disclosure should put the women on their guard."

C. Colesworth Pinckney, from South Carolina, remarked, "Had any one told him a few months since that he should be meeting in amity with his northern brethren, he should have indignantly denied the possibility of such an act. He did not intend now, however, to allude to the difference of opinion that prevailed between the South and North; the several States of Georgia, Alabama, Florida, and South Carolina, that had appointed him a delegate to this convention, having empowered him to bury all sectional causes of discord in oblivion, and to unite energetically with the representatives of other States in putting down this terrible conspiracy. He had come prepared, then, to assure them of the cordial co-operation of the Southern States in any action that might be taken in the crusade against women. He would only remark that there should be no delay either in their resolves or execution—if 'twere done, 'twere well 'twere done quickly.' With this end in view, he recommended bringing before the present Session of Congress a fugitive women bill, by which every man might be empowered to reclaim and punish a runaway or rebellious wife."

Mr. Jonathan Whittle, from Massachusetts, "Guessed that there needn't be much talk about the matter. Wimmen's place was tu hum, and it was man's business to keep 'em there. Pritty much all they was fit for was to dry innions, make squash pies, and get a fellow a good dinner on Thanks-givin'. He calkerlated that if each indiwiddiwell present had the spunk he orter have, he could manage his wimmen himself, without anybody to help him. Yankees knew a leetle somethin' besides makin' wooden nutmegs, mushmellion, and cow-cumber seeds, and they didn't want anybody to come there and tell 'em how to do: they'd better stay tu hum, and take care of their own affairs."

Here Mr. Whittle was called to order from all parts of the house, and sat down in a state of high indignation, wiping his face with a blue cotton handkerchief.

George Washington Patrick Henry John Randolph Powhatan, Esq., from Virginia, said, "I regret the irritable state of feeling which seems to sway the gentleman from New England. I wonder at his assertion of our Yankee brethren's ability to manage their women, when the fact is notorious that Mr. Whittle's native State was the scene chosen for the outbreak of the rebellion. Belonging, as I do, to one of the first families in Virginia, descended in a direct line from Pocahontas on one side, and Richard Cœur de Lion on the other, collaterally related to the Virgin Queen, and a far-off connection of the present British sovereign, I know nothing of those menial duties which Mr. Whittle thinks properly distinguish the female sphere. I cannot, nor can any one associated with me, be supposed to know anything of such menial avocations. In Virginia, nothing is required of the fair sex but to give orders to their servants, and that sufficiently occupies their time. I feel proud to assert my belief that no lady from that State is mixed up in this sad affair; but, knowing the danger of bad example, I cannot answer for the future, and am therefore ready to give my counsel both as to prevention and cure. I know the female character well enough to assure this meeting that opposition will but add fuel to the flame. In short, my advice is—

'Let them alone and they 'll come home,
And leave their whims behind them.'

Dr. Singleman, a middle-aged gentleman, from Vermont, thought the gentleman from Virginia mistaken in his opinion that the let-alone system was the best treatment for the epidemic raging among them. "Acute diseases required active remedies. When the pulse of the domestic frame was disordered, every member of the body suffered, and depletion should be freely resorted to, and the constitution restored to a healthy state, or he would not answer for the consequences. His idea—which he advanced with some hesitation, for, being a bachelor, he knew little of the sex—was that every man should try the effect of the three popular systems of medicine on his female relatives, and he would venture to promise the revolt would soon be quelled. A course of bleeding, leeching, and cupping, with blisters to their heads, and sinapisms on their feet, aided by hydropathic douche and plunge baths, and accompanied with homœopathic quantities of nourishment, would tame the greatest shrew that ever lived."

Mr. Easyled, of Tennessee, said, "There is an old proverb about bachelors' wives being well managed—

'As for my wife,
I would you had her spirit in such another:
Were the third of the world yours, with a snaffle
You may pace easy, but not such a wife.'

The measures that the learned physician proposes are easily suggested; but, I would ask, where is the man in this assembly who would have the nerve to try them? There is another old proverb that says, when you sup with a certain personage you should use a long apron; and, in this case, that precaution is very necessary. It was best to let the ladies have their own way. To quote the immortal bard again—

'Should all despair
That have revolted wives, the tenth of mankind
Would hang themselves.'

He would inform all present, from his own sad experience, that

'He's a fool who thinks, by force or skill,
To turn the current of a woman's will;
For when she will, she will, you may depend on't,
And when she won't, she won't, and there's an end on't.'

Mr. Hoosier, from Indiana, "Didn't want to 'front nobody, but he reckoned Mr. Whittle had said about the only sensible things he 'd heerd that day, and them was his sentiments exactly. There was plenty for wimmen to do in the cabin, with mindin' the children and keepin' the pot a bilin', and out of it with takin' care of the cattle and the farm, while the men was hard at work shootin' and fishin'. Corn-dodgers and cracklins was wimmen's business, and just about as much, he reckoned, as they 'd sense for. He, for one, didn't feel afeerd of any of 'em."

General Boanerges Bluster, from Kentucky, said, "He disagreed very much with Mr. Hoosier. He once heerd a Methodist minister tell what Heaven was like, and, after talkin' a great deal about it, he said, 'In short, brethren, it's a Kentucky of a place!' He reckoned, when he said that, he forgot the wimmen. In their State, where females was three-quarters bacon, and t'other quarter hominy, they was dangerous critters. General, as he was, of the milishy, and holdin' a great many offices under government, he had to mind his wife, who was big enough to lick three of him. Last 'lection he was candidate for Congress; and, just as he was makin' a stump speech to his constichents, and was tellin' 'em what a great soldier he was, and how he 'd fou't the Ingins under Harrison, and would be sure to stand up for their rights, 'cause he wa'n't afeerd of nothin', his woman walked up to him right cool, and, takin' him off the platform, said to the people, 'This man 's a fool. I know it, 'cause I 'm his wife. He an't fit for nothin' but to mind the house and take care of the children, while I go visitin'. I can't spare him; and you mast 'lect the other candidate.' He expected he felt about as mean as dog-pie, and sneaked off as soon as he could; and everybody burrahed for Mrs. Bluster, and said she should go to Congress. And, ever since, she 'd done nothin' but snub him, and had gone off to the wimmen's meetin' in spite of him; and 'twas her that said 'woman was better than man, 'cause he was made out of the raw materi'l, and she was made out of the manerfected,' and he only hoped she wouldn't find out where he was, or there 'd be an orful time of it."

Mr. Sucker, from Illinois, remarked, "That it wa'n't with his own will he was at this here meetin'; but, bein' 'lected, he had to come; and, as it was the season for shootin' prairie hens, he wanted to be off agin. He didn't want to make words himself, and hoped that other people would be short and sweet in what they had to say. As to Mrs. Sucker, she hadn't the spirit of a mouse now; and, if she ever had, which he didn't know, the fever and ager had shuck it all out of her. He reckoned about the best way he could tell 'em of, was to send all the wimmen where they 'd catch it, and, if it didn't end 'em, it would mend 'em."

Captain Salt, of Nantucket, a veteran tar in a blue roundabout and glazed hat, rose, coolly took his quid out of his mouth, and, depositing it in his pocket, made the following short and pithy remarks: "I an't a reg'lar delergate to this here meetin', seein' as I 'm pretty nearly all the time afoat; but, bein' as I 'm ashore just now, I thought I 'd come and see how things was a purceedin'. I know all about whales, and have a pretty good notion of a vessel, but I don't know nothin' about a woman. How'ever, I've heerd them as did say she was like a ship, 'cause her riggin' cost more than her hull. If so be that's the case, why she 's easy manoo-vered. Keep a tight lookout for squalls, and, when you see 'em comin', reef your sails, scud before the storm, and, if she 's bein' down, take to the boats and leave her."

Captain Salt sat down amid shouts of applause, with a very red face after his unwonted exertions, and an earnest request for a glass of grog; but, none being at hand, he contented himself with his quid.

Patrick O'Dougherty, of St. Louis, got up and said, "Jontlemen, this is my first appearance before the public since I left off being an Irishman, and became a native of this country, and I hope yees will excuse all blunders. I needn't tell this enlightened meetin' that, both as an Irishman and 'Merikin, I love the purty cratures of wimmen, and, faith, I 'm sorry they 've got themselves in such a mess. St. Pathrick knows that, with 'my friend and pitcher,' my little Cruiskeen Lawn, and my Molly Astore, I could live all alone in a desert by myself, without any trouble; and sure never a one of me knows why ye can't manage yer wives. Trate 'em like an Irish pig: drive 'em the way you don't want 'em to go, and they 'll take the right track in spite of you."

Here Mr. O'Dougherty was interrupted by a considerable bustle in the hall. There was a great disturbance, and many gentlemen looked pale and anxious; but the excitement was allayed by the appearance of an Indian chief in his war paint, who stalked solemnly up to the platform, and spoke as follows:—

"My nation was once a great nation in the lands near the setting sun. It is now a poor, small tribe, that has sold its hunting-grounds to the Great Father, at Washington, for blankets and corn, and have sent me to have a talk with him. Waw-tu-nobow-te-ma-tu is a brave; his white brothers call him Big Bulldog, and know that he has many wives. While he smoked the calumet of peace with his Father, in the Grand Lodge at Washington, a little bird sung in his ear that his white brothers had trouble in the wigwam with their squaws, and he has come to help them, for his heart feels heavy for them. Let my white brothers keep their women at work, hoeing corn, pounding hominy, drying venison, and minding papooses, and let them have but little to eat, and they will give them no more trouble. If they do, let my brothers take their scalps. I have said." And, whirling his tomahawk over his head, Waw-tu-nobow-te-ma-tu gave a shrill war-whoop, and, bounding off the platform, disappeared in the crowd.

Brass Blackstone, from the city of Brotherly Love, remarked, "That he had listened with attention to the proceedings, and had heard with delight the eloquent speeches delivered on this interesting occasion. It was with the modest timidity so characteristic of a Philadelphia lawyer, that he should offer a few remarks on the subject that occupied them; and he hoped it would not be considered presumptuous in him if his views should differ from those hitherto advanced in the assemblage of talent and influence, with whom it was his high privilege this day to be associated. He had deeply sympathized with all the orators it had been his good fortune to hear on this exciting subject: he had, in turn, been thrilled with the surpassing eloquence of Mr. Husband, the resolute determination of Mr. Wumenheyter, the patriotism of Pinckney, the easy indifference of Mr. Whittle, the dignified hauteur of Mr. Powhatan, the professional talent of Dr. Singleman, the commendable meekness of Mr. Easyled, the heroic submission of General Bluster, the laconic sense of Mr. Sucker, the maritime beauty of Captain Salt's similes, the enthusiasm of Mr. O'Dougherty, and the sententious wisdom of Big Bulldog. For himself, he had always been, and should ever continue to be, an ardent admirer of the fair sex. He was proud to say that his mother was a woman—that his native city was distinguished for its devotion to the fairer part of creation. New York might boast of its canals, its railroads, its banks, and its steamships, but Philadelphia gloried in its women. He could lay his hand on his heart, and proudly assert that even this rebellion had not estranged his feelings—

'Woman, with all thy faults, I love thee still'

He could even say, with the Irish bard—

'Sweet book, unlike the books of art,
Whose errors are thy fairest part:
In thee, the dear errata column
Is the best page in all the volume.'

With these feelings, he was present on this occasion to interpose his humble abilities between them and danger. He acknowledged that his clients had not evinced their usual sagacity in risking their quiet, but powerful influence over man, by endeavoring to grasp 'what would not enrich themselves, but make us poor indeed.' Why they had done so, was a question more easily asked than answered, and he should therefore not attempt to solve the enigma. It was his business to implore that nothing should be rashly attempted on this delicate occasion which might result in wounding the feelings of his fair clients. He would assure them a little skillful management would be more effectual than open demonstrations of hostility; and, should the suggestion he was about to offer prove successful, he asked no better reward, as a man and a lawyer, than the friendship of the sex. In his opinion,

'Fee simple and a simple fee,
And all the fees in tail,
Are nothing when compared to thee,
Thou best of fees—a male.'

Not to detain them longer in suspense, he advised that the gentlemen should fill their houses with looking-glasses, and give the ladies time for reflection."

Mr. Blackstone received much applause for his suggestion; and Mr. Bowieknife, of Texas, who succeeded him, said, "I so fully agree with the gentleman from Philadelphia in his love for the sex, and in all the sentiments he has advanced, that I will only add, should the measure he has recommended fail to make peace, I hope all the ladies will come to Texas. We have hearts and arms for all of them."

'If all other States reject 'em,
Ours will freely, gladly take 'em.' "

Mr. Placer, from California, remarked, "That he was for no half-way measures. It was his opinion that all the women ought to be seized and sent to California; it was a new country, and the miners wanted wives. When they were once there, he thought they could be managed. Judge Lynch was an active man. Show them that there was only the difference of a letter between altar and halter, and, if they would not marry, why let them hang!"

Mr. H. P. Husband said, "He had listened with astonishment to the proceedings of the day. He really thought that, for all the good that had been done or suggested, gentlemen might as well have staid at home. He had a few words still to offer on the subject, which he hoped they would hear with patience. Among other things, he had prepared a list of all the bad women who had ever existed."

Here Mr. Wumenheyter remarked, "That he must remind the gentleman time was precious; and, as all women who had ever existed were bad, Mr.

Husband had better mention only the worst of them, among whom he must not forget his (Mr. W.'s) three wives."

Mr. Husband was so disconcerted at this interruption, that he forgot what he had to say, and could only remember that his list begun with Eve, and ended with the present generation.

"I see clearly, gentlemen," continued he, "that no one enters so warmly into this subject as myself. Well, be it so. I am ready to fall a martyr in such a cause; and I here solemnly declare that no obstacle shall induce me to swerve from the path that duty marks out for me to follow. I will make every endeavor to extirpate this vile heresy among the women. I will immolate myself on the altar of my country. I will sacrifice my domestic affections on its shrine—Mrs. Husband herself!"

"Here I am, my dear!" said a sharp voice, and a small, thin, vinegar-faced lady entered the room, and walked up to the platform, at the head of a numerous procession of females. "My love," continued she, "it is late; I am afraid you will take cold. Hadn't you better come home?"

"If you think so, my dear, certainly," replied Mr. Husband, turning pale, and trembling so he could scarcely stand, perceiving which, his wife affectionately offered him her arm.

Mr. Easyled meekly obeyed an imperative gesture from Mrs. Easyled, and Mrs. Bluster picked up the general, who had fainted, and carried him out in her arms.

Exeunt omnes, in wild confusion.

FLORENCE SEFTON; OR, THE BORDER WARFARE.

BY MISS B. GARTLAND.

CHAPTER IV.

IN the meanwhile, Howell and his volunteers had reached Detroit and were led with the rest of the army into Canada, where, as the reader knows, they remained, doing nothing, for a month, and then returned to Detroit, much to the dissatisfaction of the men. Howell was now sent with dispatches from General Hull to General Van Rensselaer. The news that General Brock had joined the British at Malden, and that they were now on their way to attack the army under Hull, had reached him, and he had besought that General to send another messenger with the dispatches, and not deprive him of the opportunity of "fleshing his maiden sword;" but his request had met with a decided refusal. It appeared to Howell as if his superior officer wished to be rid of him, and for what reason he could not conjecture. Serjeant Laxy O'Lear (for that worthy had joined General Van Rensselaer's division) had only arrived at Detroit a few hours previously with a communication from his commander, and, instead of returning with the answer, was detained by Hull under a pretext "that his services were needed on some service, which his knowledge of the localities of the country for miles round, on each border, rendered of importance;" and Howell was made the envoy, with Godlieb Pretz as an attendant, whom the reader will recollect we left in our first chapter sitting in the boat meditating on the folly of falling in love. We will still leave him there, and follow Howell in his walk along the river's bank, which he pursued alone, "chewing the cud of sweet and bitter thoughts." He had seen General Van Rensselaer and delivered his letters; he had observed (as he was requested to remain in the room) the brow of that General contract and grow dark, as he perused them. When he had concluded, he threw them on the table; then rising, paced the room up and down for a few moments; then stopping abruptly before Howell, he said, "General Hull has two thousand men, I believe, at Fort Detroit?"

"Two thousand five hundred, sir!" replied Howell.

"And the British are bringing against him?"

"About half that number. And there is no doubt we will have a glorious victory. I only hope, sir, I may return in time to partake of it," said Howell.

The general surveyed the noble form, the handsome face, and the dark, flashing eyes lighted up by enthusiasm, of the young soldier, and smiled; but smiled sadly.

"I fear you will be disappointed, Captain Meredith; for I have cause to think that General Hull is"—and here he lowered his voice almost to a whisper, and the words came through his teeth with a hissing sound—"is a coward, if not a traitor!"

Howell started, and almost involuntarily laid his hand on his sword.

"This is the second time," continued the general, not noticing his emotion, "that he has written to me to forward his dispatches to Major General Dearborn for more men, thinking one thousand could be spared from this post; concluding, I suppose, that, were the enemy to attack us here, even with the remainder we would have the courage—which he seems to lack—to defend ourselves like men. But you are fatigued, Captain Meredith; seek some repose. You cannot return to Detroit until I hear from head-quarters. I expect your friend, Lieutenant Sefton, hourly from there."

Howell bowed, and withdrew. What the general had said had opened his eyes to much he thought singular in the conduct of Hull. He was like one awakened from sleep, and wondered at his own stupidity in not discovering that cowardice, if not treason, held sway at Fort Detroit.

He did not retire; but, calling Gottlieb, entered his boat and rowed a couple of miles up, with the intention of visiting Sefton Hill. He had not seen Florence since they had parted in New York, nearly four months before. It had appeared to him as so many ages. He walked rapidly along, but paused a few moments when he neared the place they had crossed from on their last pic-nic, and thought of the many changes that had taken place since. The wounded Indian rose before him; then their departure for New York, his own travels, the death of Mrs. Sefton, and the acclowness which now existed between the colonel and his father. His uncertain prospects of being soon united to her he loved so deeply, and the dangers to which she would, he feared, be exposed, residing, as it were, in the very seat of war, were uppermost in his mind.

Such were the thoughts that filled the breast of Howell Meredith as he entered the long, winding avenue that led to the colonel's mansion. He observed, as he approached, that the lower windows were closed. He ascended the steps and rang the bell. In a few moments, the door was opened by a servant in livery; and, on his inquiring if Miss Sefton was at home, Mrs. Jones, who had been house-keeper there for years, and who was crossing the hall, stopped, and, as Howell came forward, exclaimed—

"Bless my soul, it is indeed Master Howell!" and the good woman pressed forward, extending both her hands to him. "I knew I could not be mistaken in that voice," said she, shaking his hand warmly. "And you look so well," she continued; "only a little sunburnt. And I should have known those dark eyes and short brown curls anywhere, Master Howell."

"And I should have known that good-natured, kind face of yours anywhere, Mrs. Jones," he replied; "and am happy to see that time has made no change in it."

"Well, I see you have not forgotten how to flatter yet, Master Howell," she replied. "But walk in the drawing-room, and I will tell Miss Florence that you are here."

Howell entered the splendidly furnished room. We have before observed the night was cool and damp, and a comfortable fire of hickory wood was burning on the large, bright andirons on the hearth; the furniture covered with rich crimson velvet, the massive mirrors, and curtains of yellow and crimson damask that hung in rich folds down to the gorgeously wrought carpets, from which no footfall could be heard, and the masterpieces of painting and sculpture which adorned the walls—these had been familiar to Howell, and he thought not of them. His thoughts were of the fair being who, in the midst of all this splendor and luxury, might, at no distant time, be in danger of the savage's tomahawk, and of the temerity of that father, who obstinately persisted in remaining there, and of having Florence with him, when she, at least, would be in far greater security in New York, under the protection of his parents. But Howell knew not then the motives that prompted Colonel Sefton to act thus, nor the reasons he had for thinking they were perfectly secure in remaining at Sefton Hill.

He stood thus musing for a short time, when, hearing the flutter of a dress, he turned, and in an instant Florence was clasped to his heart. "Florence!" "Howell!" was all their full hearts could say. After their first emotions of joy at again meeting were somewhat subsided, Howell inquired after the colonel and Miss Aylmer.

"Mary had retired early, in consequence of a severe headache; and my father," continued Florence, "is in the library, where he now spends much of his time in writing, and does not often like to be disturbed. Oh, Howell, I much fear there is something wrong, particularly when I see that dreadful man closeted with him for hours!"

"What 'dreadful man' can you possibly mean, dearest? I do not understand."

"Laxy O'Lear," replied she. "Do not smile, as if you thought the insignificance of the man would prevent his doing mischief. I believe he has art and cunning enough to outwit those who imagine they are making a tool of him to gain their own ends."

"But of what are you fearful, dear Florence, or what is it you think is wrong? You do not suppose your father could possibly be connected with anything dishonorable, and employ this vile man to assist him?"

"Oh no, no! I did not mean that," said poor Florence. "But you know, Howell, papa is an Englishman, and he views things through the medium of prejudice, and not as we do; and I fear this O'Lear is a traitor, and that he is trying to work on those prejudices, or I should rather say that he is employed by others in high station to work on them, by bringing letters to papa, urging him to join the British. Some nights since, before he left for Detroit, he was here until past midnight, when I am sure Van Rensselaer thought he was on his way to that place. I am apprehensive of some plot, which will be discovered, and my father's life forfeited. But he must be saved, Howell!" she continued, clasping her hands passionately, and bursting into a flood of tears—"he must be saved!"

"Listen to me, Florence, my own Florence!" said Howell, as he passed his arm round her waist and drew her closer to him; for a new light seemed to burst on his mind. "You cannot remain here long in safety. Would to Heaven I could this moment ask this dear hand of your father! But that cannot be. I return perhaps this very night, or, at farthest, on to-morrow, to the fort. We are on the eve of a battle; and, should Henry not arrive from headquarters by then, no consideration shall detain me from my post, and General Van Rensselaer must find another messenger. We are sure, in the position we are placed, of a decisive victory. Even were the force the English bring against us double the number it is, victory is certain, if cowardice or treachery do not prevail. I will then procure leave of absence for a few weeks, and return here immediately to ask your father's consent to our union, and will then conduct you and Miss Aylmer to New York, where I will have to leave you, dearest," he added, pressing his lips to her fair forehead, "under the care of my mother, until this war is over; and I do not think it will be of long duration."

"But my father, Howell, will not perhaps give his consent to what you propose," said Florence, looking up in his face mournfully.

"He will, dear Florence, he will; I have not the least doubt of it. I do not wish to wound your feelings, love; but it appears to me as if you were a sort of a clog, that prevented your father from at once joining the British. Loving you so tenderly, he cannot bear to part from you; while, at the same time, his attachment to the English prompts him to join them. But, after Sir Isaac Brock's defeat, which I look upon as certain—for I cannot think Hull will render his name infamous—he will the more readily agree to what I propose, and will then, no doubt, procure a passage for himself in one of their vessels for England—for he has no thought of becoming a soldier, I believe—the only place he will be in security, with his sentiments, until peace is concluded."

Florence tried to believe her lover that all would end well; that there was no danger Laxy O'Lear would have it in his power to implicate her father in any plot; and his assurances that, when he returned to Detroit, he would have him strictly watched, seemed to calm her mind. But poor Florence had not told all the annoyance—persecution would be the better word—she daily suffered from her parent, to gain her consent to cross the Niagara with him to Queenstown, where Sir Edgar Lee, who had procured the commission of colonel in the English army, was now stationed; nor that he had written several letters to her, which she had only taken from her father's hand, that she might be certain they were destroyed, as they would furnish evidence that he held correspondence with the enemy; thinking, if there did exist any that were more treasonable, his prudence would cause him to leave no proof of it; but that Laxy O'Lear was the agent employed she felt certain. All this she could not bear to tell Howell, as she knew it would distress him. He had heard of her rejection of Sir Edgar's suit, but had no thought of his again renewing it, or that her father still favored it. She knew she could depend on her own firmness and decision in refusing to cross the American border, as well as in refusing the English nobleman, and she thought it best not to mention the subject. Nor did she tell him that, on Henry's last visit to the Hill, her father had tried to bribe him with a captaincy in his majesty's army, and his consent to his immediate marriage with the beautiful Miss Aylmer, to whom he was engaged, "if he would but take part with the country of his ancestors," as he was pleased to term it. Her brother had indignantly refused, and the colonel's anger seemed still greatly excited against him. Florence looked all this in her own bosom, or only talked it over with Mary, who was almost as indignant as Henry at the proposal.

"But, dear Howell, you have had no refreshment," said Florence, driving those thoughts from her mind, and observing he looked fatigued. She rang the bell. It was answered by Mrs. Jones herself, who said, as she entered—

"I have had supper prepared in the dining-room, Miss Florence. I thought it likely that Master—Captain Meredith, I mean—had not supped."

"Thank you," replied Florence; "that was kind and thoughtful."

And, taking Howell's arm, they proceeded to the dining-room, where they found the good housekeeper had some excellent coffee and hot cakes prepared, with a variety of preserves. As it was her "preserving week," she said, "she hoped the captain would take some of each kind. She was sure he would, if he only loved them as well as he did when she got first acquainted with him." Howell laughed, and promised to do his best. The birds so nicely cooked, which she pressed him to eat, "were shot that afternoon by Minesto."

"Minesto!" said Howell. "I had almost forgotten him. How is the poor fellow? Does he still continue to live here and at Arcadia, alternately, as I understood he had done while I was in Europe?"

"He does," answered Florence. "But of late he is much with us. It is very singular," she continued, "but there appears to have taken place an almost total change in his nature; for it seems he has but once visited his tribe since we found him in the wood. He is often in Lewistown, where he sometimes takes fish and game to dispose of, when he has taken more than we can make use of. He still retains his attachment to you, and frequently inquires after the 'young chief, his good white brother.' He has been in town all day, I believe; has he not, Mrs. Jones?"

"Yes, Miss Florence, and the most part of yesterday."

"I shall probably see him, then," said Howell, "when I go back to the camp."

And he and Florence returned to the drawing-room, when, observing that the clock was pointing to eleven, he prepared to depart, after again trying to cheer her with the hope of his speedy return; and, pressing her warmly to his heart, he was soon on his way to the boat, where he had left Godlieb. As he approached, he perceived another figure standing on the shore talking with him. It was Minesto, who, when he saw Howell, came forward, saying—

"Minesto is glad to see his white brother. The young chief is well; he walks straight, and does not see the snake trail in the grass. Minesto sees."

"I am glad to see my brother," replied Howell. "The Great Spirit has not given the white man eyes like the red, to see the serpent's trail; but he has given him courage and strength to kill a traitor." For Howell had pondered on all he had heard from Florence of Lasy O'Lear, and had rightly guessed the Indian alluded to him.

"Yes, pale-faced traitor and robber has gone before the young chief to Detroit," said Minesto, and his dark eyes seemed to flash fire as he proudly drew himself up, adding, "The hatchet of a brave drinks the blood of an enemy as the papoose does his mother's milk." He turned to go, saying, "Minesto will see his white brother again;" and, walking slowly towards Sefton Hill, was soon out of sight.

CHAPTER V.

AND now, as we have said so much of Mr. Lasy O'Lear, it is time we give the reader a history of that personage. Notwithstanding his singular cognomen, Lasy was descended from royalty itself. His grandfather, a king of the gipsies, had, years before, emigrated from Bohemia to England, bringing most of his subjects with him; for he was a king whose subjects, unlike the subjects of other monarchs, generally followed wherever he went. His majesty was fond of a sylvan retreat, particularly in summer time, and had chosen a wood in Devonshire, near a village, where he and his people took up their quarters, and where the father of our hero was born. The king himself frequently visited the village; being gifted, it was said, with an insight into futurity, he was anxious to communicate his knowledge to others, and would deign to accept the smallest coin merely as a token from those he so favored of their belief in his prescience. His majesty had, unfortunately, it would seem, left his wardrobe behind in Bohemia, by what accident I could never learn; for he could not have been forced to abdicate and fly, as did Louis Philippe, for his subjects remained faithful and accompanied him; but so it was, and his royal garments frequently fluttered gracefully in the wind, which caused some mischievous wag, who did not regard majesty as he should—for a king is a king, whether in rags or purple—to give him the name of "Old Lear." The boys in the village, knowing little of Shakespeare, and thinking that even a king should have a Mr. before his name, converted it into Mr. O'Lear; and when his hopeful son and heir was big enough to mix with them, as he sometimes did, he was called Billy O'Lear. The king and his subjects frequently made excursions round the country, and would sometimes be away a year or two; but they seldom stayed longer from the wood in Devonshire.

Billy O'Lear led this sort of life until he was about fifteen years of age, when, having stolen a hen from a neighboring hen-roost, cooked and eaten it, without his royal father's knowledge, his majesty had inflicted severe punishment on him when it was discovered, and Billy absconded, and, meeting with a traveling tinker, engaged himself to him. He remained with the tinker several years; when, thinking the western hemisphere might be benefited by his services, he crossed the Atlantic and traveled westward, through the State of New York, scarcely leaving a leaky pan or kettle behind him in his progress. Finding his business so prosperous, Billy began to think of taking a traveling companion in the shape of a wife; and a stout, lively girl, who lived at a farmer's where he had sometimes lodged, expressing a great desire to travel, Billy made his proposals, was accepted, and Sally Hines became Sally O'Lear. But Sally soon found traveling very fatig-

ing, and persuaded her lord and master it would be much more comfortable and economical to go to housekeeping; so they rented a small log-house some few miles from Lewistown, and, while Billy was pursuing his avocation abroad, his better half, who was both active and industrious, by taking in washing and helping the farmers at haymaking and harvest times, soon was able to procure many comforts and conveniences for their humble home. But, unfortunately, a year or two after the birth of our hero, who was also called Billy, after his father, the elder Billy began to frequent an ale-house in the neighborhood, and to acquire the habit of sleeping away much of his time, and of lounging about at home. In vain poor Sally would say to him—

"Now don't be lazy, Bill. Just take your tools and sawdaring-pan, and I warrant you 'll git pots and kiddles enough to mend. There 's no good comes of being lazy."

"I ain't lazy, wife," her gentle spouse would respond; "but I must give them time to melt the old sawderrin' off before I goes round agin. I puts it on thin enough, I 'se sure. But you 're always talkin' about bein' lazy. I wonders as how you don't call that little feller there lazy," pointing to Billy the junior, who was springing about much like a little hoptoad. "Come here, Bill." And, with a single leap, the urohin was on his knee. "Now I want you to bring daddy's hat to him," throwing his old castor some rods from him. The youngster would, at one bound, recover his father's hat, and, at a second, be again perched on his knee. "Well, now, that's lazy; ain't it, Sal? You 're lazy, too, I s'pose, as well as daddy," hugging up his youthful son, in whom, as he grew older, the father took great pleasure, showing the activity of the boy to his mother, by calling to him, "Run and shut the gate, 'Lazy,' the cows are coming in from the road;" or, "Run and feed the pig, Lazy, it ain't had nothin' to eat to-day." And, when our hero would fly like a squirrel to show how active and smart he was, Billy would turn to his wife, observing, "He 's lazy, ain't he? Yes, yes, he 's Lazy O'Lear."

And "Lazy O'Lear" was so often repeated at home, that, when its possessor was sent a quarter to the free school at Lewistown to learn to spell and read—for his poor mother worked hard to spare him—he went by no other name. She herself found it a more convenient name than Billy, as that was her husband's name. It is true, she at first made a distinction by calling him "Bill," and her son "Billy;" but, as every one else called him Lazy, she, too, almost unconsciously, fell into the habit, and thus he acquired so expressive a name.

As Lazy grew up, his father's habits of industry and temperance did not improve, so he undertook his business; and for miles round, on both sides of the border, Lazy O'Lear was well known, and he had as much, indeed more work than he could attend to. About this time, his father died from the effect of intemperance; and poor Sally, having caught the small-pox, lived only a week after him. Lazy, being thus left alone, disposed of such little property as his parents possessed, and, for some time, continued his business traveling round the country; until, at length, he found himself able to rent a small shop in Lewistown, where he bought old iron and sold second-hand locks, keys, bells, kettles, pots, pans, &c., and, by his habits of industry and perseverance, in a few years found himself in rather a prosperous condition, as he was now able to keep a small hardware store. But Lazy O'Lear's early habits had not tended to improve his character; he thought it no crime to deceive, cheat, and overreach, so that it was not discovered, and he could preserve the semblance of honesty. He had the shrewdness to see that sincerity, probity, and good moral and religious principles were esteemed even by those who lacked those qualities themselves; he therefore affected them, and, to hear Lazy O'Lear speak of religious and moral duties, you would perhaps take him for what he was not—a good man. It is true, he frequently went too far, and would cause you to think that, though he "strained at a gnat, he could swallow a camel." He was fawning and servile wherever he found rank, wealth, or power, and assuming, arrogant, and impertinent, as upstarts usually are, where he thought he dared be so with impunity. Money was his idol, and, next to that, there was nothing he so much coveted as a public office that would lead him to distinction, for Lazy, like Caesar, was ambitious; but he mistook low cunning and art for intellect and talent, which he imagined he possessed in a high degree. He had been made one of the overseers of the county poor-house, which he thought was one step gained in bringing him before the public.

A short time before the commencement of our tale, a Captain Henry, of the United States army, arrived in Lewistown, and took up his lodgings in the best hotel. He was gentlemanly and courteous in manner, and had brought letters of introduction from Sir James Craig, Governor of Canada, to Colonel Sefton and one or two more gentlemen near the town, who seemed to approve of all the proceedings of Great Britain. A dinner had been given, at Sefton Hill, to him, at which some toasts had been proposed which Mr. Meredith, who was one of the guests, indignantly refused to drink, and expressed his surprise at the temerity of those who proposed them. But Colonel Sefton, who was possessed of considerable tact, and who was ably seconded by the captain, succeeded in making his noble and truthful-minded friend believe they had been offered in jest; but, as those who were of the opposite party, and who felt, as freemen should, the insults heaped on their country, began to look on Captain Henry with suspicion, he did not again visit the Hill.

In his perambulations through the town, which were frequent, he had met with Lazy O'Lear, and soon found he would be a fit tool for his purpose; and, on the morning of the pic-nic, had sent that worthy to apprise the colonel that he wished a private interview with him that night. He had left his hotel that morning, and was taken, with his baggage, over to Queenstown. For fear of attracting observation, Lasy O'Lear was to bring a boat over for him in the evening, and, after his conference with the colonel was over, was to row him back again. We have already spoken of that interview; but we have not told the reader that, when the gallant captain returned to the governor, upon opening his portmanteau to deliver his letters, he found in their place two or three soiled handkerchiefs. On whom to rest his suspicions he did not know. Lasy O'Lear rose to his mind; but he had traveled far after parting with him, and had met with many other persons, and stopped at several places, so, as there was nothing ever heard of those letters, the governor and he both thought it advisable to let the matter rest.

Upon the declaration of war with England, Lasy O'Lear had been among the most clamorous of the peace party; but, when General Van Rensselaer's army had taken up their quarters at Lewistown, he had changed his politics, but not suddenly. He was always seeking to argue with the other party, and would appear as if their arguments were so convincing that he could not withstand them, and eventually was convinced of the necessity of a war. He now became a great patriot, sold out his stock in trade of kettles and pans to a particular friend of his, called Ashman, or Red Ashman—a sobriquet the good people of Lewistown gave him, as his hair was red. His whiskers, which he wore large, were red; his face was red; his hands were red; the only shades of white visible in his person were his eyelashes; but I should not say they were visible, for he tried as much as possible to hide them under a pair of spectacles, which, as he could not see through, he was obliged to try and look over, which caused him to walk with his head much in the van of his person. After the disposal of his goods, Lasy obtained the rank of a sergeant in the militia. "Sergeant Lasy O'Lear," it was certainly not a very high rank; but, as he observed to his friends, he was only ambitious to do his country service, and he thought he might do as much in his humble grade as if he were a general. But it was rather singular that, though he had deserted from Colonel Sefton's party, he still appeared on good terms with that gentleman; but he never was seen going to Sefton Hill in daytime. He had been made the bearer of dispatches several times to General Hull, when Van Rensselaer received them from headquarters, with orders to forward them; and, on each occasion, was detained by Hull to go on some secret mission, in which it was more than insinuated to the officers that he was employed by Hull as a sort of spy on the British, and that there was no one so well calculated for it as himself, having such a correct knowledge of the country.

CHAPTER VI.

THE morning after Howell's visit to Florence, he set out on his return to Fort Detroit. Lieutenant Sefton had not yet arrived.

It was a bright, lovely day, when Florence and Miss Aylmer, with Nestor, who now belonged to the former, and a servant, took their way to Arcadia. Florence had promised Howell she would finish a beautiful view she had commenced taking from a window in Mrs. Meredith's room. She had mentioned their intention to her father at breakfast, and he did not object, only advising them to take a servant with them, as, in the present state of the country, it would not be prudent to go unattended. He listened apparently without displeasure to Florence's account of Howell's arrival and departure; for he had sent her a short note, on leaving, by Thornton, who had, on hearing of his being in Lewistown, gone there to see his young master. The colonel merely observed "he was glad Captain Meredith was well, and that she was a good girl not to have disturbed him, as he was very busily engaged at that time." He then kissed the young ladies, wishing them a pleasant day, and telling them not to let it be late in the evening when they returned, as they intended to spend the day. He went to the stables to look at his horses, and see how they were attended to. He had not been engaged long, when a servant came to tell him there were two gentlemen who wished to see him: "they had not sent their names." He returned to the house, and entered the drawing-room, bowing slightly as he advanced, and closing the door after him. One of the officers approached, and, laying his hand on his shoulder, said—

"Gerald Sefton, I arrest you, in the name of the commonwealth, for high treason!"

Colonel Sefton started back.

"What mean you, sir," he said, "by this mockery? Of what treason am I accused?"

"I do not wish to use violence, sir," replied the officer; "but I arrest you by the order of General Van Rensselaer, and am ordered, likewise, to conduct you to the fort. I hope you will go with us peaceably. We are also commissioned to examine your papers."

The unfortunate man turned white and red alternately, while Captain Morton spoke. After a pause, he replied, with a sarcastic smile—

"I suppose resistance to such high authority were worse than useless. I will conduct you to the library, gentlemen, where you can examine my papers. In the mean time, there is a favor I would ask: it is that my domestics may observe nothing in your manner which may lead them to suppose I am arrested, as I do not wish my child's peace of mind to be disturbed this night."

"We will certainly do anything in our power to avoid giving Miss Sefton pain," they replied.

Colonel Sefton led the way to the library. After remaining there for some time, they descended together; and, as they were passing through the hall, the colonel called a servant and said—

"When Miss Florence and Miss Aylmer return, tell them not to be the least uneasy, should I not be home to-night." He then stepped into the carriage with the officers, and it immediately drove off.

It was late that afternoon when the young ladies returned from the valley; the night set in dark and rainy. The colonel's message had been delivered; and, after tea, they had retired to Florence's room, where Mary occupied herself with her embroidery, while her cousin read aloud from a work in which they were both much interested. They had not been engaged long, when the door was suddenly thrown open, and Martha—an orphan girl of about sixteen, whom Florence had persuaded Mrs. Jones to engage as her deputy-assistant in the art of house-keeping—entered.

"Oh, Miss Florence!" she exclaimed, "Thornton has just come up from Lewistown, and says as how that Colonel Sefton has been 'rested for bein' an Englishman, and is a goin' to be shot dead to-morrow!"

Florence heard no more, but fell back fainting. Mary sprang to her assistance.

"Oh, laws a massy, what shall I do?" cried Martha. "I have frightened her to death! Oh, what shall I do, Miss Mary?"

"Hand me a glass of water quickly, and pull the bell-cord," said Miss Aylmer.

In a few minutes, Alice, Miss Sefton's maid, made her appearance. She was a kind-hearted, affectionate English girl, who loved Florence dearly.

"She revives," said Mary, after the usual restoratives had been applied.

Florence gazed wildly round, as if she had awaked from some painful dream. "It is, indeed, reality!" said she, throwing her arms round her cousin's neck; and, resting her head on her bosom, she wept and sobbed violently.

"Dear, dear Florence!" said Mary, pressing her closely to her, "do not grieve so; it may be a false report."

"Oh, laws a massy! Oh, don't cry so dreadfully, Miss Florence!" repeated Martha. "I guess as how it's only a story, after all. Oh, what shall I do?—what shall I do?"

Alice whispered to her the best thing she could do would be to go down stairs until Miss Sefton was more composed, which advice she took.

After the violence of her emotion had somewhat subsided, Florence rose, saying, "Dearest Mary, I must be alone. I will soon return to you." Entering an adjoining chamber, she threw herself on her knees and prayed fervently to that Being who never forsakes those who put their trust in Him. She felt her courage and strength of mind return after her prayer, and that she had a friend who was "mighty and able to save." She sat considering for a few minutes, and then returned to her room.

"Dear Mary, this is what I have feared and dreamed of," she said. "But this is no time for me to give way to vain grief, when I am called upon to act. I am going down to the fort to plead for my father's life; and, should I not succeed in that, to try and liberate him by other means."

"I will accompany you," said Miss Aylmer.

"No, dearest, no!" replied Florence; "you could do no good. All you can do is to pray for me. I will only take Alice with me. Alice, you are willing to assist me?"

"My dear young lady, I will try to do it with my life," she replied; "and I think I have courage to help you in any plan you judge best."

"I thought so, Alice. I felt I could put confidence in you. Now tell Thornton I wish to see him."

Thornton's story was the same in substance as that which Martha had repeated. Florence desired Alice "to go to her father's wardrobe and bring her a suit of his clothes, with the case of pistols which were on a shelf in the upper part of it." These she had put in a basket, with two bottles of wine and some crackers.

"Now listen to me, Thornton," she said. "I think you would run some little risk to serve me?"

"Oh yes, Miss Florence," replied the good-hearted black; "I will do anything in de world for you, and to git Colonel Seftin free. Minesto, too, he tell me I mus' say to you he help too."

"Is Minesto here?" said Florence, her hopes brightening.

"Yes, Miss Florence, he here."

"Well, then, Thornton, pay particular attention to what I say. First, go down to Caleb, and tell him to have the carriage ready as soon as possible; then go to the boat—take Minesto with you, and do not let any one know what you are about—muffle the oars, and leave the Indian in her. Return here for this basket, which you will convey as privately as you can, and put on board; then row down to that cluster of trees that are on the bank, about a half mile from here. Now do you understand me perfectly, Thornton?" continued Florence.

"Yes, yes, Miss Florence, I understands. It is where Massa Howell put his boat last time he come to Seftin Hill. I knows."

"You are right. Remain there until you hear from me. And now go quickly, Thornton."

"Yes, miss, I do jis as you say," replied he, hastening to execute his orders.

There was one advantage Colonel Sefton possessed: it was the love of his servants. There was scarcely a member of his household that could be bribed to betray him. He was a kind master. Caleb, his coachman, had lived with him for years, and Florence well knew she could trust him.

After making some alteration in her dress, and putting on a bonnet that nearly hid her face, she threw a large cloak round her person, and kissed poor Mary, saying, "Do not weep; God will help us!" then telling Mrs. Jones to be careful of her, she entered the carriage with Alice, and was soon on her way to the fort. It rained fast, and the night was dark; but for this she felt grateful, as she thought it might perhaps favor her purpose. Her heart beat violently, and, though she appeared calm and collected outwardly, a thousand fears agitated her. She had told Alice her plan, and the part she was to take in it; yet her chief hope lay in the clemency of General Van Rensselaer, who, she thought, could not have the cruelty to have her father executed, even were he proved guilty of treason, as the plot—if he was concerned in one—must have been discovered before any mischief could have been effected. But Florence reasoned as a woman. She struggled hard to retain her self-possession when the carriage stopped at the fort. Caleb dismounted, and informed the sentinel that a "lady wished to see the general." After a little delay, an officer appeared, who conducted her and Alice to a small apartment, which seemed a sort of antechamber, and was very plainly furnished. A few moments elapsed, when he again appeared, saying that "General Van Rensselaer would see the lady;" and, opening the door that led to the next apartment, ushered Florence in.

The general was seated at a table covered with books and papers, but rose as she entered and bowed. Too much agitated to speak, she threw back her bonnet from her face, when he exclaimed, "Miss Sefton!" and, taking both her hands, led her to a chair.

"I am sorry I cannot say that I am glad to see you, my dear young lady," he continued.

"General Van Rensselaer, my father!—why has my father been arrested?"

"Believe me, Miss Sefton, your father was not arrested until the proofs of his treason were too glaring to be longer passed over. His papers and intercepted letters show that he has been holding a treasonable correspondence with the enemy. Indeed, on his trial, he scarcely denied it."

"His trial!" ejaculated Florence. "Has he then been already tried?"

"There was every proof of his treason before his arrest; and he was tried this morning by a court martial. But, my dear—"

"And his sentence!" cried Florence, springing to her feet and interrupting him—"his sentence, General Van Rensselaer! You have not sentenced my father to death? Oh!" cried she, throwing herself passionately at his feet, as he did not answer—

"oh, do not tell me he is sentenced to die! You would not, you could not be so cruel!"

"Rise, Miss Sefton, I cannot permit this. Rise; you must not remain in that posture," said the general, much affected.

"No! no! I will not leave your feet until you tell me my father shall live!" she replied.

"But, my dear child!"—

"Yes, your dear child!" cried Florence, seizing the word. "Only think, if I was your child, pleading to another for your life, how you would wish her petition should be answered!"

"But I cannot listen to anything while you remain kneeling," said he.

"Then you will listen to me?" she said, rising and standing before him with clasped hands; her bonnet had been thrown back on her shoulders, and the thick glossy tresses of her brown hair escaping from their confinement hung round her like a veil. "You will hear me; I knew you would! I felt that you would be too merciful, too humane to deprive a daughter of her only parent."

"Would to Heaven it were in my power to bid your father live!" said he.

"Not in your power! Oh, do not say so! do not say so! General Van Rensselaer, think there will a day come when you, too, will plead for mercy before Him who has said, 'Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy.' Then you will view things in a different light; then the recollection of this one act of mercy will shed sweet peace on your dying moments."

"My God, this is dreadful!" said he. "Listen to me, Miss Sefton; listen to me, my dear young lady. It would be almost as impossible for me to save your father's life as it would be, were he already dead, to restore him to life again. I cannot save him!"

Florence felt her senses reel, caught by the chair, and sank into it. The general opened the door, called Alice, and rushed from the room. Meeting an officer as he hurried along, he said to him—

"Captain Bolton, you will see that that poor girl has an interview with her father. She will doubtless request it. Let it be brief for both their sakes, not exceeding twenty minutes; but let it be also private. Poor child! poor child! I would not go through such another scene for the wealth of Peru."

Captain Bolton remained some time in the outer room, when Alice appeared at the door and said, "Miss Sefton desired to know if she would be permitted to see her father?"

"Certainly," he replied. "I am waiting to conduct her to him."

In a few moments, Florence came out, calm, but deathly pale, leaning on the arm of Alice. The officer stepped forward, offering his arm, which she declined with a bow, motioning him to proceed. He led them through several passages, until they entered one in which a sentry was pacing up and down before a door barred and bolted, at which he stopped. The bolts were removed, and Florence entered, and it was again secured. The captain opened a door nearly opposite, telling Alice "she could remain there until Miss Sefton wanted her."

Twenty minutes elapsed, and a knock at the door told her that her services were required. She rapidly crossed the entry, and, as Florence came near tottering, as if greatly convulsed with grief, she pressed before the officer, and throwing her arm round her, as if to support her, effectually prevented him from aiding the lady. Colonel Sefton was seated with his arms resting on his knees, his face covered with his hands, and his hat drawn over his eyes. He looked the picture of despondency. Captain Bolton showed the way to the carriage. He would again have offered his services in assisting Florence into it; but Caleb, the moment his young lady appeared, took her by the arm, and he and Alice lifted her in; then, mounting his seat, he took the road to Sefton Hill.

CHAPTER VII.

On the night previous to the one on which Lasy O'Lear left Lewistown with dispatches for Detroit, he was sentinel, the only one on the Niagara below Lewistown. In the early part of the night, he had gone up to Sefton Hill, where he held a long conference with the colonel, having procured his friend—Ashman, or Red Ashman, whom we have already mentioned—to take his place. He informed Colonel Sefton of his intended departure, and that he was going the next day, observing that, if he wished to write to Sir Edgar Lee, this would probably be the only opportunity he might have, before some engagement would take place between the Americans and English. It was not likely, he said, that he should return to Queenstown until after the surrender of Michigan to the British; adding—

"I have succeeded so well in frightening old Hull with the terrible threats of Sir Isaac Brock to let loose his savages on the whole garrison at Detroit, and to have his scalp carried on a pole at the head of the English army, that the old coward would creep into an egg-shell if he could. All that General Brock has to do is to come and take possession. Your countrymen, colonel, owe me a deep debt of gratitude."

"Which they will no doubt repay," replied he; "and I will detain you no longer than to write a few lines to Sir Edgar. I expected a communication from him to-night. Did you not bring any?"

"None. You forget, sir, that it is yet too early for the boat to come over."

"Very true; I had forgotten. Well, let the letters, when they come, remain in the cavity; I will get them safely in the morning."

Colonel Sefton wrote his letter, and gave it to Lasy O'Lear, who returned to his post and relieved his friend. A short time before midnight, a boat on the British side of the water appeared slowly floating along, when O'Lear immediately began going through his military exercise. The boat then came swiftly over, propelled by a pair of muffled oars, and glided noiselessly into a nook in the river, overshadowed by a clump of large trees, whose branches nearly touched the water. Its occupant stepped on shore, and, stooping down, deposited a package of letters in a cavity at the root of one of the trees, taking out the letter from Colonel Sefton, which Lasy had placed there, then re-entered his boat, which, like a fairy bark, in a few moments was out of sight.

This was the mode of communication between the English nobleman and Colonel Sefton. Lasy O'Lear contrived to let the latter know on what nights he would be sentinel. Every night the boat would appear on the British side of the stream, but only when Lasy O'Lear commenced his exercises did it venture to cross, as this was the signal that it would be safe. This could not have occurred had there been another sentinel on that side—the south side—of the town, between Lewistown and the Falls; but it was thought that one was sufficient there, as, about half way between Queenstown and the Falls, the whirlpool is situated, and the Niagara is here pent up within a narrow channel not over a hundred yards in width, so that few boats would venture to cross near it, and, of course, there was little danger of an enemy from that side.

Upon the disappearance of the boat, Lasy O'Lear possessed himself of the package of letters; and, when he was relieved by another sentinel, repaired immediately to General Van Rensselaer, and, giving him the packet, stated that he had accidentally discovered it in the cavity of the tree. The general recommended secrecy to the traitor, which was needless, and he left for Detroit. That there existed traitors in the fort, the American General felt certain; but as Lee, in his letter, had spoken of O'Lear as our trusty friend, "our messenger," &c., as had been insisted on by that worthy as one of the conditions on which he would serve his employers, he was not suspected. Sir Edgar also spoke of the surrender of Hull's army as certain; though he did not state explicitly that General Hull held any treasonable correspondence with General Brock, but as if he thought him a coward. He dwelt chiefly on what was uppermost in his thoughts, that the colonel should either persuade, or, if necessary, compel Florence to accompany them to England, and the means to effect this. But in the packet was a letter from Sir Isaac Brock himself, thanking Colonel Sefton for the valuable information he had given him of the best means of succeeding in taking Lewistown, of the number of men in garrison, &c. &c. This was decided proof of his treason.

Van Rensselaer would have had him arrested at once, had not Sir Edgar Lee stated in his letter that it would be most prudent now to discontinue their correspondence until General Brock advanced to Lewistown; and, as he was very desirous of discovering who were leagued with the colonel, he thought it best to leave him at large, having him closely watched, and all that he associated with. He had immediately, on discovering the treason, written to General Dearborn an account of the whole affair, one which greatly agitated him, as he both loved and esteemed Henry Sefton highly, and had, but a few days previous to the discovery, sent him on to Sackett's Harbor with dispatches; and, when Howell arrived, was hourly expecting his return. He knew of Captain Meredith's attachment to Florence, and resolved not to inform him of the matter, but to permit him to return to Detroit without waiting for Henry's return, sending General Hull word that, when news from headquarters arrived, he would transmit it to him by Lieutenant Sefton; thus securing the absence of both young men during what he knew must take place, the trial and execution of Colonel Sefton. Poor Henry! this would be a dreadful blow to him, and the kind general felt much sympathy for the young soldier, of whose loyalty it was impossible to doubt; indeed, no one who looked upon his frank, open countenance, the high, broad brow, the deep blue eye sparkling with intelligence and depth of feeling, with his noble, though slender figure, could harbor the doubt that truth and sincerity had there a dwelling-place. Henry was more free and communicative in his disposition, being younger, and having seen less of the world than Howell. Truthful and noble-minded himself, he had not learned, what a knowledge of the world so soon teaches, to distrust; and this blow would, the general feared, have a stunning effect.

The messenger sent with an account of Colonel Sefton's treason to General Dearborn now arrived with his answer, and still Henry did not make his appearance. But, the very day of his father's trial, just after Florence's painful interview with Van Rensselaer, a countryman came, bringing the dispatches he had expected by Henry, who stated that the lieutenant had been thrown from his horse about half way between Lewistown and Sackett's Harbor, was badly bruised, and had an arm broken; he was now lying at his house unable to move, and had engaged him to bring the letters on to the fort. The general almost uttered a prayer of thankfulness at the accident, which had saved him from the agonising knowledge of what was to take place.

General Dearborn, in answer to Van Rensselaer, ordered Colonel Sefton to be immediately arrested and tried by a court martial, and, if found guilty, shot; adding that he felt deeply for Lieutenant Sefton, who had, only the morning that he had received the news of his father's treason, left for Lewistown, and that it was solely in consideration of his worth and patriotism that he was to be shot, instead of being hanged, as he richly deserved, as the letters proved him to be a spy as well as traitor.

He was, accordingly, as we have seen, brought down to the fort. The court was already formed. It consisted of General Van Rensselaer and the principal officers of the regiment. His papers, which had been seized, fully proved his guilt. In a copy of a letter addressed to General Brock, he informed him, after the English had possession of Michigan, and, as a matter of course, after the surrender of Lewistown, his intention was to visit England, taking both Florence and Mary with him, as he felt sure such a measure would have the effect of causing Henry to follow, and "Florence, he hoped, to forget her Yankee lover," as he chose to call Captain Meredith.

After the letters had been read before the court, the colonel, who had scarcely spoken a word, requested if he might be informed who had discovered the package. When told it was Lary O'Lear, "Double-dyed traitor!" he exclaimed, with vehemence; and he then informed the court that O'Lear was the agent employed; but it was too late, he had already escaped. The result of the trial is already known. He was sentenced to be shot, between the hours of eleven and twelve o'clock, the day following.

Colonel Sefton felt assured that revenge was the motive that prompted Lary O'Lear to betray him. Some months previous, when the colonel first opened a treasonable correspondence with the English through his means, he had the presumption to ask for an introduction to Miss Aylmer, and permission from him, as her guardian, to pay his addresses to that lady. Indignation too strong for words, at the proposal, at first filled the breast of her proud uncle. Mary, the niece of his departed and still loved Isabel, the lovely, the gifted, wealthy Mary Aylmer, one that even he, with all his pride, was delighted to think of as the future bride of Henry, and whom he would rather call his daughter than any princess in existence; that such a creature as Lary O'Lear—his tool, whom, though he employed, he despised from his heart—a fawning sycophant, without wealth, education, or any qualities mental or personal, to recommend him—should have the presumption to aspire to her hand! It was too much; and, after the first shock—if I may use the expression—of astonishment was over, he poured upon the unfortunate sergeant such a torrent of contempt and invective as roused all the fierce hate and malice of his nature.

"Colonel Sefton," he said, his little black eyes glaring like two coals of fire, "I will bear this no longer! I have you in my power, sir! Do you remember the letters you gave to Captain Henry?"

* It is known to most American readers that Captain John Henry, of the United States army, and afterwards of

There they are!" said he, taking a packet from his coat pocket; "and there is that in them that will hang you as high as Haman! Either a promise in writing of Miss Aylmer's hand, or the American government shall know that Captain Henry made at least one traitor. You have your choice!"

The colonel was seated at a table, with a drawer partly opened before him. He sat composedly looking at Lazy O'Lear while he spoke. "You have your choice!" repeated he, looking down exultingly on the packet. In the twinkling of an eye, the colonel's hand, thrown like a dart across the table, had seized the letters, and almost as quickly they were in the fire. At the same moment, drawing a pistol from the drawer of the table, he said—

"So you were the robber and traitor that extracted the letters from Captain Henry's portmanteau; and, bold thief as you are, you have dared to acknowledge it! Do not stir," he continued; "for, if you do, I fire!" holding up the pistol at the same time.

"Oh, do not kill me, Colonel Sefton!" said he; for he had been taken so by surprise, that he had stood perfectly motionless during the transaction. "Do not kill me; I will not betray you."

"No, you will not betray me," replied the colonel, with a scornful laugh, "because you have not the power. But, suppose I let the 'American government know' that you have brought me this letter

Canada, was employed by Sir James Craig, the Governor of Canada, to raise a party in the New England States of those opposed to the restrictions laid on commerce by the American government, from which they were to separate, and to form a political alliance with Great Britain. But he did not succeed.

from General Brock"—the first he had received; "who then will hang as high as Haman?"

"I only said so to try"—said Lazy O'Lear.

"To try," interrupted the colonel, "if you could frighten me." Then, after a pause, he added, "Come, let us understand each other. Your object is money; as for Miss Aylmer, never let me hear her name pass your lips. I may perhaps have said some hard things to you; but let them pass. As I said, you want money; I need your services, and will reward you liberally; but any attempt at betraying what is intrusted to you, and your life will pay the forfeit, though I die the moment after. Do you understand?"

"I do. Money is certainly my object; as for the girl!"

"Silence!" said Colonel Sefton. "Do not dare touch again on that subject."

"I would only say," he replied, "that gold is better than love; and that the lady's money was her principal charm with me."

The colonel's eyes flashed fire at this audacious answer—though it was said in a sort of deprecating tone, as if it were the want of money alone that caused his presumption; but Sefton restrained himself, however, as he thought that, to carry out his plans, Lazy O'Lear's services were indispensable; besides, he felt perfectly sure that he could not betray him without implicating himself, so he merely replied—

"Well, well, I have promised you money, if you are faithful; and you have reason to know that I am not niggardly."

How faithful he proved has been shown to the reader.

POETRY.

SPRING ON THE PRAIRIES.

BY R. C. BIERCE.

How softly breaks the light of dew-gemm'd morn
Upon this wide-spread plain of living green,
So beautifully fringed with blossoming thorn,
And wavy with the shade of dark ravine!
There, sparkling in the early light, are seen
The rainbow's hues reflected from the flowers,
Half hidden by their deep and leafy screen,
All glist'ning with the drops of pearly showers,
That softly fade in tears upon Night's silent hours.

How sweetly, clearly, on the ear now falls
The gushing music of the wild bird's song,
Whose deepest harmony no worldly care inhalls;
Oh! lightsome, glad some swell his notes along,
Poured from a bosom that ne'er suffered wrong;
Gay as the sunshine of this bursting Spring
Are the tuneful warblers of this woolly throng,
Whose cheery notes g'er wild and prairie ring,
Light as the plumes that rest upon the shining wing.

The south wind, flitting o'er the wavy grass,
Bears the fresh fragrance of the flowering dell,
Blent with the shadows of light clouds that pass,
In darkened images, o'er each slope and swell,
Kissing the bright beauty of the wild harebell,
Yet leaves no footprint of its steps so light
On the green turf, or where the cool springs well
Their bubbling waters in a fountain bright,
That lulls the ear by day and sings in dreams of night

And this is in the Spring, the glorious Spring,
When life is mantling on all things we see,
And breathing Nature, on triumphant wing,
Soars upward, buoyant with vitality;
The heart will lighten, though sad Destiny
Press on its pulse with an unbroken chain,
And seek to bind us to the budding earth! We May break away, nor heed the mortal pain,
For spring within the heart should hold eternal reign!

Most glorious Spring! that lifts from earth the shroud
Which chilled the beating of her bloodless breast,

By genial drops distilled from some lone cloud
That rose in softness in the sunlit west—
I greet thee with a bounding heart, though pressed
With care: and when thy swelling tide is o'er,
And thy rich robe with autumn woe is dressed—
When wintry winds wail out their mourning roar,
Wilt thou awake to all this teeming life once more?

This breath of flowers, this song of summer bird,
This balmy breeze upon the aching brow,
Come on the soul like some remembered word
That wakes the past and makes the pale cheeks glow
With feelings that dwell not in the bosom now!
The Past! the Past! Life has no annual spring
To bud our perished flowers, and make them grow;
No hand to bind the harp's long-broken string,
Or plume for loftier flight the fading, drooping wing!

A SKETCH.

BY E. T. CONEAD.

SHE knelt by her lover's gory bed,
For his life was fast receding;
On her panting breast she pillowed his head,
And essayed to staunch its bleeding.

"Oh, look on me, love!" But he heeded not;
"Oh, tell me thou art not dying!"
He heard but the far-off battle shot;
He saw but the foeman flying.

"Rise, fly with me, Albert!" But vainly she wept,
And twined her white arms around him;
For far on the war-blast his roused spirit swept,
And the battle spell still bound him.

He raised from her breast: "On, comrades, on!"
The hot blood gushed as he started;
"Oh, calm thee, my Albert—the battle is done!"
"On! on!" and his spirit departed.

One wild look of terror the maiden cast
On the form of her lifeless lover;
One look—twas the saddest, the loveliest, last—
One throb—and the struggle was over.

Her head on the breast of her hero sank low;
No sobe her sufferings betoken;
And the dew gathered thick on her pale, cold brow,
Cold—cold, for her brave heart was broken!

SONNET.—THE PARTHENON.

BY WM. ALEXANDER.

Still is thy Parthenon, fair Grecia! seen
Upon the temple-crowned Acropolis—
An image of true majesty is this,
Thy virgin's fane. For ages hath she been Opposing her broad brow to winds of time,
Than Nature's self more lasting. Athens! weep,
The skillful builders are in death asleep,
Who reared thy world-famed monument, sublime—
Which yet with "wingless victory" proudly stands,
While mighty empires sunk have in decay,
And rivers have been dried, and fruitful lands
Reduced to barrenness. Erst, day by day,
Up you so sacred steep, in graceful train,
Went thy fair maidens to Minerva's wondrous fane.

ABSENT FRIENDS.

BY WILLIAM H. HART.

We come again with many an old and well-remembered lay,
That breathes of hours long since gone by, and scenes now passed away,

To meet as when in life's first days of happiness we met,
And think of younger, brighter years, we never may forget.

We come again—but not as when we came in days of old;
For many a brow has paled since then, and many a heart grown cold:

And many a young voice thrills no more with each remembered tone—

The lips that breathed sweet music, and the eyes that smiled, are gone.

They tell us some are tolling where the palm in beauty waves—

Their dwellings 'neath the burning sun, and there, perchance, their graves;

And some amid the ruined tombs, that fide on foreign plains—

But naught of theirs, save memory, around their homes remains.

And one departed with the flowers, when leaves were falling slow—

When summer winds, among the trees, had sung a farewell low

We bore her to her lowly home, beneath an autumn sky,
And wept that one so pure and good should e'en thus early die.

A few, perhaps, to view the scenes of childhood's years may come,

To linger round the hallowed spot that once they called their home;

But years have stamped each wandering brow with many a trace of pain—

And never, as of old we met, shall gather we again.

Then breathe a song for absent friends, the beautiful, the gay;

A requiem for the fair young girl who early passed away;

A lay for wanderers far and lone o'er foreign mount and plain,

And shed a farewell tear for those we ne'er may see again.

MY CHILDHOOD'S HOME.

BY J. S. WILSON.

My childhood's home! my childhood's home!
How mem'ry yet returns to thee,
Though severed far from all the ties
That bound thy boyish scenes to me!
What though my wayward course has been Through all the varied climes of earth,
Yet none were half so dear to me
As that bright land that gave me birth.

The spicy gales from Ceylon's groves
May make the wastes of ocean smile;
And India's waves may bear the bark
To some enchanting summer isle;
But dearer far to me the storm

That howls among my native pines,
Than Nature's spicy laden breath,
When she in summer's robe reclines.

And fairer is the little stream
That, frantic, leaps adown the steep,
Than all the phosphorescent waves
That hold their revels on the deep.
Bright vale! thou spot that gave me birth,
Though far remote, I love thee still;
E'en here, where verdure decks the earth,
I long for thy dear mountains' chill!

And, O that I could meet again
The friends that once I met in youth,
To revel there as once we did
In childhood's halcyon days of truth!
I then might smile—perhaps be gay,
Which here I never more can be,
Since all the world has failed to gain
The love I owe, bright vale, to thee.

THE PILGRIM'S ARRIVAL AT HOME.

BY GEORGE JOHNSON.

O'er a desert, all lonely and dreary,
Still onward, from day to day,
A wayworn pilgrim and weary,
Wended his desolate way:
The sun and simoom unheeding,
He journeyeth still on his track;
Though torn are his feet and bleeding,
The traveler turneth not back.

Cheer thee up, pilgrim, cheer thee!
Fear not the dangers around!
For lo! on thy pathway, and near thee,
A resting-place soon will be found.
'Tis gained by the pilgrim—behold him!—
Joy beameth now on his face;
Gather 'round his friends, and enfold him
In a cordial, a welcome embrace.

Now there is not to remind him
Of the way he has journeyed o'er
Forgot are the dangers behind him—
He thinks of the desert no more.
Happiness ceaseless, and gladness,
Pilgrim, belong to thee now;
Nor sorrow, nor grief, nor sadness
Shall e'er again sit on thy brow.

* * * * *
The world is the solitude dreary
That journeyed the pilgrim in;
The Christian's the traveler weary,
The danger around him is sin;
The place where he rested was Heaven—
Forever his pilgrimage o'er;
The embrace of the saints was given
Pilgrims who had gone before.

THE COUNTRY GRAVEYARD.

Bury me where a lone tree will spread
Its cooling shade o'er my lowly head,
That its with'ring leaves each year may rest
On the grassy mound above my breast;
The winds will rustle its branches free,
And breathe a requiem soft for me.

Bury me there, oh, bury me there!

Bury me where, at each coming spring,
Bright birds on its budding boughs may sing
In their sweetest strains, so gay, so free,
While the groves resound with melody:
Methinks from the spirit-land they come,
With their songs to cheer the silent tomb.

Bury me there, oh, bury me there!

Bury me where, from their wintry tomb,
The flowers burst forth in their sunny bloom;
Let ivies twine and the mosses creep
Where lies my dust in its dreamless sleep;
Sweet emblems all, that the blest shall rise
To fadeless glory beyond the skies.

Bury me there, oh, bury me there!

EL SINEUR.

BY NADEHDA.

The evening shades were creeping
The still blue waters o'er,
When, in thy placid beauty,
I saw thee, Elsineur!
The sky was glorious o'er us,
And lovely 'twas to see
The mellow tints thus glanding
Upon each green-leaved tree!
And I gazed until deep twilight
The scene had glided o'er,
And in the dim dark shadow
Thou wert fairer, Elsineur!

We saw each tiny cottage
With its vines all clustered round,
And the fragrant summer flowers
Within the garden bound;
And we saw the gray old tower
Of the good prince Hamlet,
And where the guilty Claudius
His brother's life-blood spilt;
And I wondered if it stalketh,
The tristful ghost of yore,
Within the grim old tower
Of thy castle, Elsineur.

But our bark, it had no moments
To spare, old town, for thee!
And the winds our sails soon wafted
Far toward the Northern Sea;
And ere the light of morning
Upon the waters gleamed,
While in our berths, all calmly,
We travelers lay and dreamed,
Swift o'er the waves we glided,
And I may never more
See thee, in the gray twilight,
Old Danish Elsineur!

On board brig Helen, July 14th.

DEO GRATIAS.

BY D. H. R.

THANKS to the Power Benign, that life doth give,
That 'twas my lot 'mid rural scenes to live
Through childhood's years; that on my earliest hour
The "mighty Mother" laid her spell of power,

Bidding me look on hills and mountains high,
Whose summits blue seemed neighbors of the sky—
On rivers rolling with majestic flood,
And rambling brooks of sportive-seeming mood—
On primitive forests with weird voices haunted,
That with a pleasing awe the spirit daunted,
Whose dim, lone glens and deep recesses green
Showed here a solemn, there a lovely scene,
Where the strong storm-wind and the gentle breeze
Drew various music from the stirring trees—
On the rich pomp the changeful Seasons wore
As each successively Earth's sceptre bore;
And thus that my young soul boon Nature fed
With choicest sights and sounds for daily bread!

Long years have passed; and I have walked, sad-hearted,
In many a funeral train of joys departed;
And I have stood upon life's desolate heath,
Bare of all green and scourged by Winter's breath;
Yet the fair scenes in those young hours impressed
Remain as yet unfaded in my breast,
And not a natural sight or sound but still
With the old rapture can my bosom thrill;
So that, where'er my fortune bids me rove,
Around me still rise objects of my love;
Nor can Fate's sorest stress despoil me quite,
So God's bright earth and sky salute my sight;
And, long as rippling stream, and rustling tree,
And heaving ocean's voice are left to me,
I yet must count the simple boon, TO LIVE,
Right worth possessing—worthy God to give!

THE WANDERER.

BY J. J. BAKER.

Jesus, Shepherd, from thy side
Far I've strayed without a guide:
Rugged are the paths I tread—
Dark the heavens overhead.

Length'ning, as I onward stray,
Boundless stretch the hills away;
Endless wilds around me spread—
Slow and halting is my tread.

As I climb the steeps alone,
Echoes far my plaintive moan;
Lost and faint, athirst I go,
Weary, wand'ring child of woe

Darkness now, serene and still,
Sits enthroned on every hill;
Starless is night's canopy,
Rayless all the world to me.

From the gloomy shades below
Comes the howl of savage foe;
And around the rugged steeps
Loud the gusty night-wind sweeps.

Horror freezes all my blood,
Chains my feet upon the road;
Reckless grown, I drink despair,
None, alas! the cup to share.

Rebourn, shall I longer rove
From thy people and thy love?
For the honor of thy name,
Oh! my erring feet reclaim!

Ope the fountains of my heart,
Cause the tears of grief to start!
Bring me from my wand'ring home,
From these never more to roam!

AN EASTERN SCENE.

FROM VICTOR HUGO, BY K.

Midst tow'r-flanked walls, whose base the Bosph'rus laves,
An open lattice courts the grateful breeze,
And there the young Sultana sits, and sees
The moonlight sporting with the purple waves,
And circling the dusk isles with silvery wreaths.

'Neath her rosy fingers why doth the guitar
Suddenly cease to vibrate? What harsh sound
Startles the fair one? Is it the rebound
Of a deep-fraught galley's bending oars, from the far Ægean, to some Turkish harbor bound?

Is it the cormorant that, with sudden plunge,
Dives, and then, rising, shakes from his bronzed wings
The tide in pearl-like drops? Is't a ghoul that flings
Some tower's down-toppling crest, with spiteful lunge,
Into the deep? Why pause the trembling strings?

Nor Turkish galley, with long, bending oars,
From the far Ægean; nor cormorant with bronzed wings
Suddenly diving; nor a ghoul down flings,
Into the deep beneath, embattled towers:
From a low archway, lo! a light skiff springs!

Two men heave o'er its freight. The lady sees,
Adown the smooth slope of the parting tide,
What seems a human form distinctly glide.
The moon is sporting with the purple seas,
And pouring floods of radiance far and wide.

THE ARTIST'S' DREAM.

A PAINTER is gazing, in reverie deep,
Upon a canvas cold and gray—
Though wide awake seeming,
In truth he is dreaming
Of things far away;
And, though wild birds are singing,
And merry voices are ringing,
And all nature's beauty in the warm sun is gleaming;
Though the waterfall is dashing,
And the pretty brook plashing—
It all does not move him, for still he is dreaming

"Oh! what is thy dream, father? tell it to me!"
Cried a sweet little cherub, with merry blue eyes;
And, from his dream waking,
And his magic brush taking,
He sketched on the canvas a deep, wide sea—
And, beyond it, a fairy land of green shores and blue skies,
Where wild birds are singing much sweeter than here;
Where merry voices are ringing, undisturbed by a care—
And all Eden's beauty in the sun of heaven is gleaming;
Where the waterfall murmurs soft as a song,
And the brook's silver waters, as they ripple along,
Reflect the bright glances of angel-eyes beaming.

"Such is the dream of your father, my son,
And vain would it be with colors to paint:
If you wish a picture, yourself paint one;
Your soul for your canvas—a life free from taint."

MODEL COTTAGE.

A Cottage of one story, with four rooms, a kitchen, back kitchen, and other conveniences.

Accommodation.—There are a large lobby, a; and kitchen, b; with a closet between; bedroom, c; parlor from the lobby, d; three bedrooms, e, f, and g; cow-house, cellars and place for wood, h; dairy, i; pantry, k; and water-closet, l.

Construction.—The walls may be formed of mud, because they have nothing to carry but their own weight and that of the roof. The weight on them of the roof, which is thatched, is diminished on three sides by the columns of the verandah. Such a design is very suitable for brick on edge walls.

General Estimate.—Cubic contents, 29,348 cubic feet; at 10 cents per foot $2,934 80, at five cents $1,467 40.

EMBROIDERED SACHET.

Materials.—Three-eighths of a yard of very rich brown or purple satin; three-quarters of a yard of white silk. Two yards deep silk fringe to match with the satin, fine gold bullion, pearl beads, and green Berlin embroidery silk of four shades.

The design should be drawn very accurately on a sheet of post paper; and then all the outlines pricked with a coarse needle or stiletto, so that the pattern appears clearly marked in the pin-holes so made. Lay this paper over the satin, so that the design may be exactly in the proper place, and put weights round to prevent it from being removed. Strew some fine pounce, or pounded flake-white, over the paper; and, with a flat paper stump, rub it over the pin-holes. Remove the paper lightly, and the design will appear on the satin; it must then be marked with a fine sable brush, dipped in a solution of a flake-white and milk.

Should the embroidery be on white satin, fine charcoal may be used for the first marking, and Indian ink for the second. The satin must then be stretched tightly on a frame, the sides being hemmed, and fastened to the tapes, and the selvages laced.

The leaves in the pattern are all to be worked in three shades of green silk; but, for some of them, the three lightest should be used, omitting the darkest, and, for the remainder, the lightest shade may be left out. The darkest shade of each leaf is the one that should be first worked, from the fibre towards the edge. The stitches should be of unequal length, so that the next shade may blend and harmonise with the first, which it will not do if harsh-marked lines define the extent of each shade. The shape of the leaf is carefully marked in the last shade, which is to be the lightest.

The stems are entirely formed of gold bullion, as are also the fibres. The bullion is cut into lengths, and fastened on the satin by a thread of silk of the same hue running through it. For very fine and delicate parts, a single thread of bullion is thus laid on; but where the stem is to be more solid, short pieces are cut, and laid successively along the line, each one being partly by the side of the preceding one, in the manner seen in the engraving. The clusters of grapes are formed in pearls, threaded on white silk, and the lines crossing each other in every direction. This has a much better effect than putting on each bead separately, which causes a flat, unnatural appearance.

When the embroidery is done, it may be removed from the frame; but, should it be worked on velvet—the pile of which is apt to get flattened—take a warm iron and pass it lightly and rapidly over the back of the velvet, before it is taken from the frame. The face will then be found renovated.

The lining and pockets, of white silk, must be quilted, with two thicknesses of flannel within them. It must then be made up, and trimmed completely round with deep silk fringe. Initials may be worked with gold bullion in the centre; or they may be of silk. In the former case, the plainest old English letters look better than anything more fanciful; but for silk embroidery they can scarcely be of too decorative a design.

EMBROIDERED SCREENS.

Among the many revivals of old fashions which have been made of late years, may be reckoned the embroidered screen, a pattern of which is here given. This very elegant little ornament is generally worked on white satin, with colored silk; and, when this is the case, the satin is lined and sewed to a piece of tape, which is bound round it, and by means of which it is stretched tight to a frame. The mode of embroidering the pattern is not very difficult, the principal care being required to keep the silk from twisting and curling up, which it is very apt to do. The mode of selecting and arranging the silks must depend, in a great measure, upon the taste and skill of the embroiderer; but the best way is to draw the pattern of the proper size, to color it from natural flowers, and then to imitate the colors as nearly as possible with shades of silk. For those who have no skill in embroidery, the pattern may be worked either in Berlin wool or silk, upon silk canvas, without attempting to fill up the background, which would make it too heavy. Whatever material the screen may be worked in, it is generally lined with plain silk at the back; the back and front being sewn together, and finished by a piece of cord being sewn round the edge.

CROCHET.

THE pattern shown may be worked as a square of a counterpane, or used for any other purpose.

The ground is worked in treble open crochet, and the pattern in close long stitch.

COTTAGE FURNITURE.

Fig. 1.

Fig. 2.

Fig. 3.

Figs. 1 and 2 are easy reclining chairs for a library, parlor, or other sitting-room. They are covered with morocco leather, with button tufts, and are very easy to sit upon. Fig. 3 is a stool of cast iron.

LA FRIVOLITE.

A Collar with Rosettes and large Leaves upon Net.

MAKE eighteen leaves and fourteen rosettes; also one hundred and twenty single loops, each one of twenty-six knots. The whole must be placed on a piece of Brussels-net, fixed upon colored paper, on which the design has been traced. The ends of the threads should be left to the rosettes and the large leaves, and then these should be sewed over and over, so as to make the tendrils and stalks. The open work in the centre of the leaves is done with a needle in the usual way. On the outside of the collar, the whole is finished with a neat border made of tape, in the same manner as has been before directed.

PATTERNS FOR SILK EMBROIDERY.

Useful Patterns for Working in Cord, Silk, and Muslin.

THESE are what are called endless patterns, to be worked in cord.

These fashions for embroidering the borders of cloaks, pelisses, sacques, &c., on merino, or fine cassimere, or flannel, with silk, are to be wrought with coarse or fine silk, or with a mixture of the two, according to the degree of intricacy or simplicity in the parts of the pattern.

To facilitate the work, we can furnish casts from the original wood-cuts of these designs. By chalking the raised figure on the cast, the design may be stamped on the cloth, and the whole trouble of tracing or drawing on tissue paper saved. One of our correspondents uses printer's ink, instead of chalk, in putting the design on merino. This requires skill and care to avoid soiling the cloth.

KNITTED BERRIES AND FRUIT.

HOLLY AND ITS BERRIES.

BERRY.

Cast on twelve stitches on three needles (No. 20*), four on each needle, with a bright shade of China silk, wound double, or rather fine purse twist single; knit eight or nine plain rounds, break the silk a few inches from the work, gather all the stitches with a sewing needle, make on a double wire a little ball of scarlet wool, about the size of a pea, introduce this ball in the knitted berry, draw tight the silk with which the stitches are gathered, and fasten it at the top upon the woolen ball. Gather the stitches of the other aperture round the wire, draw the silk tight, pass the needle through the berry, so as to bring it to the top; fold a piece of black floss silk in two, place it across the top of the berry, cross over it the silk threaded in your needle, pass the needle back through the berry, from the top to the bottom, draw it tight, fasten off neatly, and cover the little stem with brownish red silk or wool split.

LEAVES.

Several shades and sizes are required to make a handsome branch. The following receipt is for a middle-size leaf:—

Two needles, No. 19. Cast on one stitch with good size purse twist.

First row.—Make one, knit one.

Second row.—Make one, purl two.

Third row.—Make one, knit three.

Fourth row.—Make one, purl four.

Fifth row.—Make one, knit two, make one, knit one, make one, knit the remainder of the row.

Sixth row.—Make one, purl the row, and continue in alternate knitted and purled rows, making one stitch before, and one after the middle stitch in the knitted row, and one at the beginning of every row, knitted or purled.

When you have about eighteen or nineteen stitches on the needle, after the purled row, cast off five stitches in the beginning of the next front or knitted row, and as many in the beginning of the purled row. Then resume the alternate knitted and purled rows, increasing as before. As the scallops of the middle of the leaves are larger than those of either extremity, increase to twenty-six or twenty-eight stitches, and cast off six or seven on each side. Four scallops are generally enough; the largest leaves may have five. Then split in three a needleful of the same quality of silk, but a brighter and more yellow shade, cover a wire with one of the threads, and with another sew it neatly round the leaf, making the scallops as sharply pointed as possible. Sew another wire folded in two, and also covered with silk, along the back of the middle nerve; then across this, from the point of one scallop to the extremity of the opposite one, a bit of lino, not covered, the ends of which you allow to protrude a little, in imitation of the pricks of the holly.

MISTLETOE AND ITS BERRIES.

BERRIES.

Make the berries in white China silk, exactly like those of the holly; the little spot at the top brown instead of black; no stem.

LEAF.

Two needles, No. 19. Cast on three stitches with green wool or silk of a very yellowish shade. Knit four ribbed* rows, make one stitch at the beginning of each of the two following rows, then four ribbed rows without increase, and two with increase at the beginning; repeat this once more. You have then nine stitches on the needle. Work four ribbed rows and two rows, decreasing one stitch at the beginning of these two last rows; repeat four ribbed rows without decreasing, and two decreasing rows, till five stitches only remain, then work two rows without decreasing, decrease one stitch at the beginning of the following row, and cast off the next row. Take a piece of the common green wire used by artificial flower makers, and sew it neatly round the leaf.

Then take a piece of wire, cover the middle about the length of half an inch with a lighter shade of the same wool; fold the wire in two, twist some wool round the top, so as to make a kind of little knob, place it between two leaves, fasten them face to face; add to the stem a bit of spring wire, about two or three inches long; give the stem its proper thickness with a little cotton wool, and cover it with green wool.

Four or five sprays like this, on the top of a common stem, with two berries, back to back, in the centre, make a pretty bough.

* Cornucopia Gauge.

* Ribbing is made by knitting alternately one plain and one purled stitch: every row is alike.

EDITORS' TABLE.

AMERICAN ARTISTS IN ROME.—A recent letter from our correspondent, for several past years a resident in the "Eternal City," informs us that there are now between twenty and thirty American artists studying in Rome. The greatest work of art in progress there, and, of course, the greatest in the world, is that of our countryman Crawford, "The Virginia Washington Monument." Our friend goes on, "This is to be one of the finest monuments ever erected. An equestrian group, Washington surrounded by six distinguished men of Virginia. The statue of 'Patrick Henry'—one of the six—is completed, eleven feet six inches high, dressed in the costume of 1765. This is very much admired. The Roman artists think these the best costume statues ever modelled. Mr. Crawford is now at work on the statue of 'Thomas Jefferson.' These statues are to be cast in bronze in Munich."

Then follows a eulogium on Crawford's genius, and the honor he is conferring on his country, both doubtless his deserved tributes of admiration. That the sons of America are thus distinguished gives us pleasure as well as pride. Shall we not also rejoice in the successful genius of the daughters of our republic?

AMERICAN ARTISTES AT HOME.—A young lady of Boston, Miss Harriet Hoemer, has lately completed a beautiful medallion, representing the head of Professor J. N. McDowell, of Cincinnati. This medallion, cut from pure white marble, is as large as the natural head, and the features are said to be admirably preserved. What renders this more remarkable is that the resemblance was sketched from memory, only aided by a small, defective plaster cast taken many years ago. The medallion was sent from Boston to Cincinnati; and Professor McDowell, on receiving this beautiful work of art, gave the following history of the young sculptress. We should state that Professor McD. occupies the chair of "Anatomy" in the Medical Department of the State University at Cincinnati, and that Miss Hoemer, a young lady about the age of nineteen, was on a visit to a friend in that city during the fall and winter of 1850-51.

"While the lectures were in progress at the medical school, Professor McDowell says that Miss Hoemer sought an interview with him, and stated that she had resolved to cultivate a taste for sculpture; preparatory to which, she desired to understand thoroughly the science of anatomy. She requested therefore to be instructed by him, and promised indefatigable attention to the study of this difficult branch of learning. Struck with the novelty of such a proposition, from a highly educated young lady, he supposed at first that she was jesting; but, upon being satisfied that she was in earnest, he readily undertook to instruct her. She immediately entered upon the study, and made such extraordinary progress that, in the opinion of Professor McD., when she left for Boston at the beginning of the summer, she had attained a rare proficiency in it. He related further that the now world-renowned Powers and the distinguished Clevenger had both attended his lectures when connected with a medical school at Cincinnati; but that neither of them had then made such progress in anatomy as Miss Hoemer had attained at the time of her departure for Boston. He paid a glowing compliment to the enthusiasm of her genius, her love of art, her brilliant talents, and the maidenly dignity and purity of her character. He predicted for her a brilliant career as an artist, if she should continue to devote her talents to such pursuits."

Whether she does continue to devote herself exclusively to this pursuit of art, so as to win the highest renown, is of less consequence to her sex and to the world than is the example of energy in the pursuit of excellence she has already displayed. She has shown the superiority of the female mind in the study of anatomy, thus pointing to woman's true profession in the sciences, viz., the medical. In this science, females will excel whenever they are permitted to enter on the study.

HOW AMERICAN WOMEN SHOULD VOTE.—"I control seven votes; why should I desire to cast one myself?" said a lady who, if women went to the polls, would be acknowledged as a leader. This lady is a devoted, beloved wife, a faithful, tender mother; she has six sons. She knows her influence is paramount over the minds she has carefully trained. She feels her interests are safe confided to those her affection has made happy. She trusts her country will be nobly served by those whom her example has taught to believe in goodness, therefore she is proud to vote by her proxies. This is the way American women should vote, namely, by influencing rightly the votes of men.

HOW THE "MAINE LIQUOR LAW" MAY BE SUSTAINED.—This law, as our readers are, we hope, aware, prohibits the sale of all kinds of intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal or scientific purposes. It has been adopted and sustained by the people of Maine for the last year or two, and, in that time, has nearly emptied the jails and poor-houses of their miserable inmates, most of whom had been reduced to poverty or incited to crime by INTEMPERANCE. Efforts are now being made to adopt this law in the other New England States, also in New York and Pennsylvania. Will not every woman's heart beat with joy at this prospect of reform, and every woman's voice wish it God speed? And, if women could go to the polls, would not their votes soon decide in favor of this law? Yet that decision could not sustain it, because the law, in its last resort, must be upheld by physical force! Herein lies the reason why men should vote, and women should not. But have women therefore nothing to do in this struggle between order and disorder, temperance and intemperance, heaven and hell? On women and children fall the deepest sufferings from this hideous vice, which sacrifices home and all that makes domestic life—woman's life—lovely to the vile selfishness and brutalizing appetites of wicked men.

The conflict between the friends of temperance and those powers of evil—the rum-selling landlords and their tippling crew—will be fearfully severe; and woman, in the majesty and power of her moral influence, should aid the right. Every man who comes forward as a leader in the cause of temperance is the champion of our sex. He should be honored as a hero. The smiles and blessings of those he is striving to save from the demon of drunkenness—a more ruthless destroyer than the monsters slain by Perseus or Bellerophon—should cheer and reward the true "Son of Temperance."

Some good men lack moral courage. They would face death in the battle-field with less trepidation than they will probably feel when depositing their vote against the sale of intoxicating liquors! Though the sale of other poisons is strictly guarded, the traffic in the rum poison must be free. Though gunpowder cannot be kept or sold but under stringent precautions, every house may be made the receptacle of an agent of destruction more awful than ever issued from the cannon's mouth. Let men who fear that the "Maine Liquor Law" goes too far, remember they are intrusted with a higher duty than any which the mere military commander performs. They are the defenders of society from the powers of evil, which destroy the sources of happiness, darken hope, and deliver over to destitution, disgrace, and death those who cannot defend themselves. Womanhood and childhood rely on the bravery of the good and noble men of our country. Every step onward in moral improvement is an added pledge for the security and happiness of the female sex. Every man who hinders, or strives to hinder these reforms, is an enemy to woman, and deserves her scorn, contempt, avoidance. All her influence should be given to the cause of temperance. The men who vote for the "Maine Liquor Law" are her proxies. Let her approval sustain them in their righteous course, and this "LAW" will be enacted and sustained.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "The Enthusiast," "Forgotten," "Rome," "The Peasant's Song," "White Violets," "Three Songs for three Belles," "Ballad," "To E. on her Bridal," "Let me die," "Stanzas," and "The Snow-Drop."

The following articles are declined. We give this list to avoid the trouble of constant inquiries about the communications sent us. Some of these are quite good, and may find favor with other publishers. We have no room for: "The Night-Watcher," "My Mary's Dead," "The Dead Hindoo Babe," "Logan Assenting to the Treaty of Peace," "The Lady of Harringshaw," "Song," "Lines," "The Traitor's Doom," "Song," "A Visit to the Hermitage," &c., "To a Red Rose," &c., "To Miss M. A. S.," &c., "To Amanda," "To my Infant Boy," "The North Wind," "My Pets," "Not at Home," "The Butterfly," "Sleeping at Church," "Fancies," "The Knights of the Crusades," and "The Importance of Always Telling the Truth."

OUR TREASURY.

POLITENESS.

BY GEORGE S. HILLARD.

True politeness is a very rare thing, gentle reader, stare though you may.

Of the gentlemen, young and old, whiskered and unwhiskered, that may be seen in Washington Street any sunshiny day, there is not one who does not think himself a polite man, and who would not very much resent any insinuation to the contrary. Their opinion is grounded on reasons something like the following. When they go to a party, they make a low bow to the mistresses of the house, and then look round after somebody that is young and pretty to make themselves agreeable to. At a ball, they will do their utmost to entertain their partner, unless the fates have given them to some one who is ugly and awkward, and they will listen to her remarks with their most bland expression. If they are invited to a dinner party, they go in their best coats, praise their entertainer's wine, and tell the lady they hope her children are all well. If they tread on the toes of a well-dressed person, they will beg his pardon. They never spit on a carpet; and, in walking with a lady, they always give her the inside; and, if the practice be allowable, they offer her their arm. So far, very good; but I must always see a man in certain situations before I decide whether he be polite or no. I should like to see how he would act, if placed at dinner between an ancient maiden lady, and a country clergyman with a small salary and a rusty coat, and with some distinguished person opposite to him. I want to see him, on a hot and dusty day, sitting on the back seat of a stage-coach, when the driver takes in some poor lone woman, with, may be, a child in her arms, and tells the gentlemen that one of them must ride outside and make room for her. I want to be near him when his washerwoman makes some very good excuse to him for not bringing home his clothes at the usual time, or not doing up an article in exactly the style he wished. I want to hear the tone and emphasis with which he gives orders to servants in steamboats and taverns. I mark his conduct, when he is walking with an umbrella on a rainy day, and overtakes an old man, or an invalid, or a decent-looking woman, who are exposed without protection to the violence of the storm. If he be in company with those whom he thinks his inferiors, I listen to hear if his conversation be entirely about himself. If some of the number be very distinguished, and some quite unknown, I observe whether he acts as if he were utterly unconscious of the presence of these last.

There are a great many little offences committed against good manners, which people are hardly aware of at the time. It is not polite, for instance, to tease a person to do what he has once declined; and it is equally impolite to refuse a request or an invitation in order to be urged, and accept afterwards. Comply at once: if your friend be sincere, you will gratify him; if not, you will punish him, as he deserves to be. It is not polite, when asked what part of a dish you will have, to say, "Any part—it is quite indifferent to me;" it is hard enough to carve for one's friends, without choosing for them. It is not polite to entertain our visitors with our own family history, and the events of our own household. It is not polite for married ladies to talk in the presence of gentlemen of the difficulty they have in procuring domestics, and how good-for-nothing they are when procured. It is not polite to put food upon the plate of your guest without asking his leave, nor to press him to eat more than he wants. It is not polite to stare under ladies' bonnets, as if you suspected they had stolen the linings from you. It is—but let me remember it is not polite to be a bore, especially in print.

Let no man imagine that his rank, or station, or talents excuse him from an attention to those rules of good breeding, which cost nothing but a little care, and which make a great deal of difference in the sum total of human happiness. They are as imperative as the rules of morality; and there is no one, however great or high, that does not owe to society a liberal recompense for what he receives from it. There is now and then a man so weak as to affect to be rough, or forgetful, or absent, from a notion that his deficiencies in these little things will be ascribed to the largeness of the objects with which he is habitually conversant, and that his mind will be supposed unable to come down from the airy regions of contemplation to such low matters. But such a one should be put into the same stateroom of the great Ship of Fools, with those who twisted their necks to look like Alexander, or spoke thick to resemble Hotspur. A man that can do great things and not little ones, is an imperfect man; and there is no more inconsistency between the two than there is in a great poet's being able to write a promissory note, or a great orator's having the power to talk about the weather.

I will only remark, in conclusion, that good breeding should form a part of every system of education. Not that children should be made to barter their native simplicity for a set of artificial airs and graces, but that they should be early impressed with the deformity of selfishness, and the necessity of thinking of others as well as themselves. Care should be taken that their intercourse with each other be in a spirit of courtesy and mildness. He who has been reared in a brawling and ill-mannered nursery can hardly be expected to ripen into a polite man. The elder members of a family should bear in mind that the influence of their own conduct will encircle the children like an atmosphere. There can be little happiness in that household in which the minutest offices are not dictated by a spirit of thoughtful courtesy and delicate consideration for others. How many marriages are made wretched by a neglect of those little mutual attentions so scrupulously paid in the days of courtship. Let it be borne in mind that the cords of love, which bind hearts so closely together that neither Life, nor Death, nor Time, nor Eternity can sever them, are woven of threads no bigger than a spider's web.

FEMALE ELOQUENCE.

BY ELIZABETH STALLING.

Eloquence may sometimes effect its object by means of splendid images and sublime expressions, but that alone which springs from the heart takes the certain road to success. The flattering results which have on so many occasions attended the exercise of this brilliant talent by the female sex, must be rather attributed to the energetic zeal with which, from their goodness of heart, they have entered into the lists in defence of virtue, than to any studied use of language, as was the custom with the public speakers of their times. The consciousness of being engaged in a virtuous cause has often given rise to the most enthusiastic and splendid eloquence on the part of women, who, weak and helpless by nature, have thus become endowed with strength, not only to urge, but to accomplish the most arduous enterprises. There is no doubt that,

"If the mind with clear conception glow,
The willing words in just expressions flow ;"

and warmth of feeling in women has amply compensated for any inferiority, if such there were, in their talents, to those of the opposite sex. We ought to set much weight on these superior instances of mental capacity, and endeavor not to degenerate from such worthy examples: such patterns of merit should not be thrown away upon us, for they teach us that, if the too free use of speech is attributed as a failing to our sex, the proper use of that speech may be rendered not only a private, but a public benefit; as there is a time to be silent, so it does sometimes happen that there is a time when it becomes a duty to speak; and eloquence, actuated by sincere and virtuous motives, must ever claim universal respect and admiration.

Literary Notices.

From J. S. KIDWELL, Clinton Hall, New York, through W. B. ZIMMER, Philadelphia:—

NARRATIVES OF SORCERY AND MAGIC, FROM THE MOST AUTHENTIC SOURCES. By Thomas Wright, M. A., F. S. A., Corresponding Member of the National Institute of France. If any respectable reader should happen to be fond of contemplating, through practical and measured descriptions, the acts of filly and cruelty of past generations of knaves, fools, and fanatics, he will find in this book an ample field for the gratification of his propensity.

From HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through LINDSAY & BLACKISTON, Philadelphia:—

A POPULAR ACCOUNT OF DISCOVERIES AT NINEVEH. By Austen Henry Layard, Esq., D. C. L. Abridged by him from his larger edition. With numerous woodcuts. Although this volume is merely an abridgment of a great and expensive work, it will be found sufficiently comprehensive in its details and illustrations to gratify every class of intelligent readers. But more especially will it be interesting to those who love to search the sacred Scriptures, and to reflect upon the rise and fall of the great nations and magnificent cities therein recorded, and of whom, and of which, until a very few years ago, it was presumed no other vestige remained to gratify the curiosity of the present age.

TILE CORNER-STONE. By Jacob Abbott. Very greatly improved edition. With numerous engravings. The former edition of this work was favorably noticed, as it deserved to be; and we cannot do less, in view of its re-appearance in an enlarged and improved form, than to recommend it, not only to the young inquirer after Christian truth, and the duties and obligations of a Christian life, but to all who feel the necessity of perfecting themselves in their moral and religious sentiments, whatever may be their age and experience.

A LADY'S VOYAGE ROUND THE WORLD. A Selected Translation from the German of Ida Pfeiffer. By Mrs. Percy Sinnett. The author of this work, which abounds in agreeable descriptions, appears to be a woman of great modesty, as well as of great courage and superior genius.

WESLEY AND METHODISM. By Isaac Taylor. We must beg leave to refer this volume to the polemics and religious controversialists, as we find that it contains a great deal that is not calculated to soothe the easily-excited feelings of sectarians.

THE LIFE AND WORKS OF ROBERT BURNS. Edited by George Chambers. In four volumes. Vol. 1. This is a plain edition of the works of the great Scottish bard, which contains a more full and authentic account of his life and habits than any heretofore published, and which will therefore commend itself to the numerous admirers of Burns.

LECTURES ON THE HISTORY OF FRANCE. By the Right Honorable Sir James Stephens, K. C. B., LL.D., Professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge. This is a volume of over seven hundred pages, embracing twenty-four distinct lectures on the history of France, bringing it down to the absolute monarchy as administered by Louis XIV., and concluded by a comparison of the growth of the French and English monarchies.

From BLANCHARD & LEA, Philadelphia:—

ESSAYS ON LIFE, SLEEP, PAIN, ETC. By Samuel Henry Dickson, M. D., Professor of Institutes and Practice of Medicine in the Medical College of the State of South Carolina. This book will unquestionably furnish the reader, however intelligent he may be, with many new ideas on the interesting subjects of which it treats.

From W. HOLDAMER, New York, through J. & J. L. GIBSON, Philadelphia:—

WOMAN IN HER VARIOUS RELATIONS. In consequence of one or two errors in our former notice of this valuable family work—one which should, by all means, be found in the library of every American mother and daughter—we are induced to refer to it again. The author, Mrs. L. G. Abell, has been long a favorite with the reading public. Her "Gems by the Wayside," and her "Skillful Housewife, and Ladies' Domestic Guide," have elevated her to a distinguished rank among the practical and popular writers of her country.

NOVELS, SERIALS, PAMPHLETS, &c.

From Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia: "The Medical Examiner and Record of Medical Science." Edited by Francis Gurney Smith, M. D., Lecturer on Physiology in the Philadelphia Association for Medical Instruction, Fellow of the College of Physicians, Member of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia, and of the American Philosophical Society; and John B. Biddle, late Professor of Materia Medica in the Franklin Medical College, Physician to the Pennsylvania Institution for the Deaf and Dumb, Member of the Medical Society of Hamburg. New series. Vol. viii. No. 2. February, 1852.

From T. B. Peterson, 98 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia: "Yankee Yarns and Yankee Letters." By Judge Hall-burton, alias Sam Slick, author of "Yankee Stories," etc. etc.—"Sketches in France." By Alexander Dumas, author of "Monte-Cristo," etc. etc. One of the very best of Dumas' productions.

From Harper & Brothers, New York, through Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia: "The Tutor's Wand." A Novel. By the author of "Wayfaring Sketches."—"Florence Sackville; or, Self-Defence." An Autobiography. By Mrs. Burbury—"Maurice Tiernay, the Soldier of Fortune." By Charles Lever, author of "Charles O'Malley," etc.—Nos. 16 and 17, "London Labor and the London Poor." By Henry Mayhew—"Pictorial Field Book of the Revolution." By Benjamin J. Lossing. No. 19.

Publisher's Department.

We have in this number two Model Cottages. It will be seen that the interior of the "Cottage Villa in the Anglo-Swiss style" is the same as that of the "Cottage in the earliest English style," published in our last. The buildings differ only in the exterior. This cottage is also from Ranlett's celebrated work on architecture, which can be had complete of Dewitt & Davenport, New York.

The story of "Florence Sefton" increases in interest. It will be concluded in our next. We commence another interesting story in this number, "The Campbells and the Cliftons." We particularly recommend to our readers, "Some Thoughts on Letter Writing," by the Rev. H. H. Weld.

PARTICULAR NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS.—As we have at present no collecting agents for accounts now due, we must ask our subscribers to make their remittances direct to us, and at once.

If there has been any delay in our subscribers receiving their "Books," although we have heard no complaints, they will please attribute it to the same cause as that which detained their letters from reaching us, the detention of the mails. We have had letters forty days coming from Texas, and thirty from Louisiana and Mississippi.

"THE CATOCHA CHIEF" is the title of a spirited literary and temperance paper published at Auburn, New York. The sister of the editor, Miss Emma Brown, has recently been associated with him in the editorial department of the paper, and her abilities will no doubt impart a new interest to its columns.

RICHARD'S WEEKLY GAZETTE, CHARLESTON, S. C.—This valuable literary paper has been greatly enlarged and improved. It is now published in a form adapted to binding, and, of course, to preservation, and is one of the most interesting and best conducted periodicals of the South.

DEBET, ORTON & Co., of Auburn, New York, have in press a "Life of Kosuth, with Notices of Distinguished Men and Scenes of the Hungarian Revolution; his Farewell to Hungary, Address to the People of the United States, and the most important of his Speeches in Hungary, Great Britain, and the United States." Steel portrait of Kosuth. All orders for the work to be addressed as above.

THE AMERICAN COURIER.—This old family newspaper, better known in years gone by as the Saturday Courier, continues the "even tenor of its way," under the able control of its indefatigable and industrious editor, Andrew M'Makin, Esq. Independent of the spice and variety which distinguish the columns of the Courier from most of its weekly cotemporaries, we can say of a truth that its poetry, original and selected, and its tales, are, for the most part, from the pens of writers of distinguished genius and ability. We observe that the Courier has just commenced the publication of an original nouvellette, "Marcus Warland; or, the Long Moss Spring," by Mrs. Caroline Lee Hentz, author of the "Mob Cap," and other popular tales, which have gained for her a world-wide celebrity. Success, then, to the American Courier! It fills a peculiar position in our periodical literature, which no man so well understands how to fill as Andrew M'Makin, and who therefore deserves success for his enterprise and unremitting exertions to please the tastes of his readers.

MRS. LINDSEY.—We are happy to hear that the success of this amiable and gifted lady, whose chaste and beautiful "Readings from the Poets" we noticed in the January number of the "Lady's Book," has been everywhere received with the highest marks of approbation and personal esteem. This is what we anticipated, as well from her private worth as from the great original powers which she possesses, and by which she so agreeably fascinates the good-will, and instructs the minds and the hearts of those whom she may address.

PUBLISHER'S CORRESPONDENCE.—No. I.

OUR friends have become so numerous, they are so courteous, and seem so truly sensible of the efforts we make for the gratification and improvement of our dear public, that it would be double-dyed ingratitude to pass over in cold silence their kind letters, though time is wanting to answer each in particular.

We agree fully with Dr. Johnson, that disclaiming speeches only seem intending to prove "how much praise we can spare." We therefore accept, with thanks, the encomiums that come to us from Maine to Mexico, and from the "Old Granite State" to the "New Gold Region."

We consider it flattering to have our "Book" largely circulated among the inhabitants of the great metropolitan cities, though there it passes, with many other journals, among people who, habitually and to keep up with the day, skim over all popular literature; but we are rejoiced when we find our periodical saluted by the cultivated and refined who live, like our own friend, "in a quiet, retired little village" of a distant State, who says, after informing us that she has obtained a number of subscribers: "I feel that I have acted less from selfish motives than from a desire to induce habits of reading and reflection, and to cultivate a taste for elegant pursuits in our little community."

From a remote part of New England we have received a picture of domestic enjoyment and social improvement so charmingly described, that we have half a mind to transcribe the whole, but, for want of room, must confine the extract to the opening paragraph:—

"MR. GODEY :—You are not aware of the pleasure with which the 'Lady's Book' is received by a circle of our ladies who meet for the express purpose of listening to its contents upon its arrival; and with what 'gusto' they devour each story as it falls from the pretty reader's lips! Upon the arrival of the 'Book,' all else is laid aside, and the afternoon is passed in listening to Godey. When one reader is fatigued, another willingly relieves her, and the afternoon and evening pass as they are aware of it."

We are by no means insensible to having "presented exquisite pleasures," by association or otherwise, to the caké in Sacramento City.

A correspondent from the regions of the Green Mountains gives us this gratifying passage: "Every person who has a love for the rich, the refined, and the beautiful in art and literature will, I think, subscribe for your 'Lady's Book.'" What a host we may and do expect! But we have to deplore the case of an "old subscriber," whom we have lost, and who has lost us! He professes to delight in our work; but, owing to the pertinacious encroachments of that race of social bandits—the borrowers—his "Book" being always carried off and worn out before he could read it, he has been obliged to give it up. This practice of robbing one under the mask of friendship and neighborly privilege, cannot be sufficiently deprecated. What would be said of the man who would bear off a fine turkey, just roasted for his friend's dinner, on pretence that he—the borrower—had nothing good at home? And then, when he had satisfied his appetite, he would, forthwith, cautiously return the cold and disjointed remains! Why should not mental food be respected as much as the material banquet? Let the borrowers reply.

As we are quite of Sir Toby's mind, that "this is not a world to hide virtues in," we will subjoin two or three additional extracts, rather flattering; but their tone of peculiar humor tempts us to give them unaltered. We beg it to be understood that our vanity is not raised above our business by these compliments; we take them as proof that our friends are satisfied with what we have done.

Thus writes one subscriber: "8— is just married, and his wife says she won't try to live without the 'Book.'"

Another discourses in this pleasant way: "Can love or money procure the January, February, and March numbers of the 'Book' for 1849? I have them entire for several years, except those three numbers. I turned fool at the close of '48, and stopped the 'Book,' and actually lived with my better half three months without its monthly visits. She is a peaceable soul, or I never could have done it. But the March winds, and the want of her 'Book,' got her 'dander' up, and I had to commence again—perfectly cured of my folly. If you have the three numbers mentioned, please let me know, and I will forward the money for them; or send them on, and on their receipt I will remit the amount."

And, to cap the climax, another correspondent says: "In the January number you beat yourself—that's beating the world."

London.

MY DEAR MR. GODEY : It gives me great pleasure to assure you of the increasing interest which is felt in this metropolis in regard to the progress of American literature. Not a book reaches here from the United States, especially if it come from the pen of any one of our gifted countrymen, that does not excite peculiar curiosity in the public mind. It is acknowledged by all liberal and intelligent persons with whom I have conversed, that there is a degree of dignity, beauty, and chasteness in the writings of our female authors, which does not so generally characterize the works of the same class of writers in Europe. In the former, there is observable an ease, a freshness, and, if I may say so, a practicability which does not often sparkle amidst the old and worn out ideas and sentiments of this region of pride and poverty, of aristocracy and oppression. In this respect, your "Lady's Book" is an especial favorite. It does not bring us back the stale sentimentality and gossip of the love-writers and incident-polishers of the English magazines; but, on the contrary, furnishes us with new materials for thought and reflection, and with much that is gloriously indicative of the freedom and the intelligence which pervade all classes in happy America.

A scene was recently witnessed here, which struck me as a sad evidence of the unfortunate condition of a numerous body of humble, but respectable females. It was the departure for Sydney, under the patronage of the Female Emigration Society, of sixty females, their ages ranging from eighteen to thirty years. They were all of the most unexceptionable character, a majority of them having been employed as domestic servants. The separation of these poor women from their families and friends, I say, is a melancholy indication of the crowded state of society here, and of the want and wretchedness, if not of the sin and shame, which are continually pressing upon, and often overwhelming the masses of the people. Another scene, significant of the condition of the poor in this country, was enacted at Liverpool a few days since, in the commencement of operations, as shoe polishers, of a number of boys from the ragged schools. They were attired in a uniform of blue frock and cap, and each had suspended over his breast a box, locked, in which were dropped the pennies earned in their new vocation; and, on their return to school in the evening, the boxes are delivered up, and they are paid a certain sum per day as wages. But still another reflection in regard to the condition of the people of some of the most populous parts of this kingdom, may be drawn from a fact stated in a report made at a recent meeting in Sheffield, by the Rev. Mr. Clark, to wit, that seven out of every ten young men in that town were unable to write their names. Is the destitution, is the ungodliness of such a community to be wondered at? Is the slavery, is the degradation of such a people a mystery to be solved only by deep philosophy and statesmanship?

You have doubtless heard ere this of the dreadful fate of the steamer "Amazon." The details of this catastrophe are too horrible and heart-rending to be dwelt on; and I only mention it here to refer to the fact that the whole matter will be searchingly inquired into. Some censure has been thrown on the conduct of Mr. Vincent, an officer of the watch, and who, it is intimated, was the first to secure the life-boat, in which himself and a number of the passengers were saved.

The poetical works of James Russell Lowell have been republished in this city. One of the weekly papers, which publishes an extract from his work, entitled, "The Fountain," is of opinion that America has few poets of great merit, nor does it think that Mr. Lowell is entitled to that distinction. It admits, however, that he is above mediocrity, especially in his shorter pieces.

A pantomime has been exhibiting at one of the theatres, in which the royal family are represented as witnessing the performance of Hamlet. The theatre was crowded every night of exhibition, and the manager was reaping a harvest at the expense of his sovereign; but, while thus profitably engaged, "the examiner of plays" gave him to understand that scenes in which the court might be introduced on the stage would not be allowed.

In the fine arts, I have only to notice the completion of a statue of Lord Nelson, which reflects great credit on Mr.

GODEY'S LADY'S BOOK!

LITERARY AND PICTORIAL.

THE BOOK OF THE NATION AND ARTS UNION OF AMERICA!!

THE LADY'S BOOK is now in the twenty-second year of its publication by the same Publisher—a fact unprecedented in the history of any American Magazine. Nothing but real worth in a publication could be the cause of so prolonged an existence, especially in the literary world, where everything is so evanescent. Hundreds of magazines have been started, and, after a short life, have departed—while the “Lady's Book” alone stands triumphant, a proud monument reared by the Ladies of America as a testimony of their own worth.

Many persons, who seek no further than our title, presume that the “Lady's Book” is intended merely for the amusement of a class, and that it does not enter into the discussion of those more important questions connected with the realities and the duties of life which every well-informed woman, mother and daughter, should be acquainted with. But such is not the fact. It is now, as it has ever been, our constant care to combine, in the pages of the “Lady's Book,” whatever is useful, whatever is elevating, whatever is pure, dignified, and virtuous in sentiment, with whatever may afford rational and innocent amusement.

GODEY'S SPLENDID ENGRAVINGS ON STEEL.

It is the fashion with many magazines to announce in their advertisements, “Splendid Engravings, Fashion Plates,” &c. What is the disappointment of the duped subscriber when he receives the numbers of a magazine thus advertised, to find all his splendid engravings dwindled down to paltry wood-cuts—as contemptible in design as in execution!

The publisher of the “Lady's Book” performs all he promises, and, as some of our exchanges are kind enough to say, “more than he promises.” Each number of the “Lady's Book” contains at least

THREE ENGRAVINGS FROM STEEL PLATES, ENGRAVED BY THE BEST ARTISTS, either in LINE, STIPPLE, or MEZZOTINT, and sometimes FOUR.

GODEY'S RELIABLE FASHION PLATES

are published monthly, and are considered the only really valuable fashion plates that are published. They have been the standard for over twenty-one years. In addition to the above, every month selections from the following are given, with simple directions that all may understand:—

JANUARY AND MAY.

BY ALICE B. NEAL.

(See Plate.)

"What can a young lassie do
Wie an auld mon?"

WE are a great believer in the inclination of the twig. Early impressions are far more lasting than mothers or teachers have any idea of; but the plastic clay hardens after they are once received, and you must break the image if you would erase the unskillful line.

Mrs. Middleton had known this all her life—at least she had read the opinion, and heard it discussed at her father's table; but, when "spirit sculpture" became her duty in turn, she had forgotten, or laid aside the lessons of her childhood. The case stood thus with her: a fair, but faded widow of thirty-seven, dependent on her husband's relatives for the support of herself and only child, Alice. Alice was delicately beautiful, had already the dignity and repose of manner that distinguished the race from which she sprang, with superciliousness, that had been encouraged rather than checked, and well instructed on the mission of her life—to marry well.

This was held up as the hope and aim of all her movements. She was to hold herself erect; for stooping would impair her figure, and detract, as it were, from the value of the only fortune she possessed—personal loveliness. She was to correct every awkward or ungraceful habit; it would "grow into a bad manner." She was to practice diligently, and master every accomplishment at school, for the one grand object. Her letters from her mother were full of regrets for her lost position and luxury, or careful reminders that she was depriving herself of everything possible, to confer the advantages of a stylish education at a stylish school, where she would make fashionable acquaintances, on her daughter. For all this self-sacrifice, Alice, thus armed for conquest, and introduced into society under the auspices of an easy, good-tempered relative of her father's, and the prestige of their connections, was to reward this devoted parent by marrying well.

She never defined the sentence exactly; but Alice already had an idea of all it implied. Not one thought of moral or social worth, not an inquiry into the possession of amiable traits of character, or intellectual cultivation; any one having any standing in society—the society whose atmosphere she had always breathed—and possessing the fortune that was to gratify expensive tastes and habits, came under Mrs. Middleton's generic term, "an eligible husband."

Naturally, there was much besides mere beauty to recommend Alice Middleton. As yet, the character was but shaping, the hardening process had not commenced. She had her intimate school friends, who loved and admired her unaffectedly, and her bright cheerfulness, as well as her rapid progress, had made her a favorite with her teachers. It was a sway that she held by right, as it were; for even at school she had learned the importance her connections maintained in the fashionable world, and it seemed natural that, on this miniature stage of action, a prominent part should be assigned to her.

Seventeen has some confidences, and perhaps the approaching separation had its influence on the little group in the school-room of Madame Loraine, gathered around the fire, and talking earnestly in the twilight.

"I would like to be an authoress, if I could have my choice, girls." This was Madeline Connor, younger by a year than her stylish friend. "It must have been such a triumph to Mrs. Hemans, when people came from every part of England and America to see her. I wouldn't care who loved me, so every one acknowledged my talent. I don't think we need a great deal of love in this world; but I must be admired, if I only dared to write all I think and feel! I'm sure you like to be admired, Alice!"

"Yes, Maddy; but not for its own sake. I always have too much pride to care for hearing that I am beautiful or accomplished. It would fret me if"—

"If what, dear?"

"Well, then, if I did not know the power it gave me. I shall be married before you are famous."

"So shall I," chimed in Amine Wharton, who made up the trio. "That is, I hope so, if anybody ever will love me. I'd so much rather be loved than admired."

"I did not say anything about being loved, Amine. But I intend to make an excellent match. I wouldn't marry the best and most loving man in the world, if he was poor."

"Oh, Alice!" The earnest, childlike face was raised to her friend's, as if to see whether it was a jest or sober avowal of intention; but she saw, by the flickering blaze, the proud smile that quivered over the still prouder mouth, and she checked the question.

"True, Amine; don't be shocked," she added, gayly. "Chacun à son gout, as our excellent madoiselle would observe. It's a fair choice; you wish love, Maddy distinction and flattery—for the one goes with the other. I am much more moderate in my demands. Rich husbands are more plentiful than good ones—or successful authorships."

"If I thought you were in earnest, Alice, I really wouldn't love you."

"Nonsense, child, you will be wiser when you are older: and that's eight, my practice hour. Now for the harp and M. Bochsa's interminable arrangements."

The practicing commenced. The others still sat and mused over the future; but Alice seemed wholly absorbed in the glissando movement she was attempting.

If this be the school-room purpose, it is but natural that contact with the world should strengthen it. Alice Middleton became a belle in her very first winter. Her pride was at once an armor and a weapon. Her beauty was unquestioned, and her accomplishments loudly applauded whenever she condescended to exhibit them. Madeline and Amine, still in the school-room, heard of her triumphs, and still built castles for their own success; but Alice was carving out her way—achieving her mission.

No school-room modesty prevented her from the gayest dance. She waltzed, she rode, she sang at the watering-places, visited during her first season; and, of course, before it was ended, her conquests were not to be counted singly. Saratoga ended the summer's campaign, and still the important point had not been decided. So courteous to all who had sufficient claims upon her notice, so self-possessed when dignity was called up to repel attentions it would not do to encourage, few would have thought that any deep emotion ever stirred the rich love that trembled to the pulses of her heart, or any tumultuous feeling sent the rich glow to her cheek. And yet, as the leave-taking drew nearer, she could not conceal it from herself, struggle as she did, that her hand trembled in one clasp, and there were eyes beneath which her own long lashes fell. And yet this would not do. The lover had not declared himself, it is true—this she had always avoided; but it needed no words to tell her that she was loved, and for herself, that was strangest of all. Not alone that she was beautiful, or admired by others; but because, even in the frivolity in which they mingled, he had kept a noble heart little tainted, and had the rare talisman to draw forth all that was good and noble in her own.

He was poor.

This she knew from his own lips. He had told her of his plans, his hopes, and aims. They were high, and he had the ambition and energy that would seem to insure ultimate success. And she had listened with true interest and sympathy, until he came to say how much a beacon star would brighten his pathway, and that, if he had the affection and advice of a truly noble woman to rest upon, he should be undaunted by any discouragements, and surmount all obstacles; then she answered more coldly, and talked of other things, leaving him still to feed his love only on her glances and her smiles.

They did not meet again until the winter season was far advanced, and then in the crowd and whirl of a gay saloon. He had hoped to meet her there, for he had much to say. The first step in his career was taken, everything was bright before him—brightened, it may be, by the thought of her approval, and the hope of making his love a more worthy offering. For now his lips should be unsealed; he had a right to profess his honorable attachment; he could not believe that he had presumed in reading those drooping eyes, that trembling hand.

He came upon her party, after all, unexpectedly. He had never seen her look so beautiful, so worthy of homage, and yet it did not daunt him. She stood beneath the full blaze of the chandelier—for her beauty could bear the test; her dress of gauze-like transparency softened the brilliancy of her complexion, and, as she spoke or moved, he saw the gleaming of her rounded arm, as white it seemed as the pearls that clasped it. He stood in the shadow of a curtain and watched her, as one listens to the praises of others on a prize he is conscious of possessing. He could distinguish, even amid the hum of voices, the clear tones that had been his music, as she "shot the silver arrows forth" of graceful jest and repartee. Her mother stood near her, something of her old spirit restored, as she, too, watched her daughter's triumphs. She was leaning on the arm of a gentleman he scarcely noticed at first, until he remembered that he had met him in the summer's travel, and that he had often lingered in the train of the new star. There was a hollow-worn look about the face he did not like. It was carefully made up to conceal the effects of age, and a life of fashionable dissipation; but, in this strong light, and in such immediate contrast with youth and beauty, the end was scarcely served. The thought passed through his mind but as a momentary unpleasant sensation, forgotten as soon as his eyes once more rested on the face of her he loved; for now she had recognized him. He could not be mistaken in thinking the color deepening on her cheek, or that her eyes shone with a smile of more than ordinary welcome.

And now he had claimed her hand for a waltz, as in those early days of her acquaintance. Once more they floated to the graceful measured music; and then it was but natural that, separated from their party, they should turn in quest of them to a room more softly shaded, and where so many eyes were not observing them. She leaned upon his arm with something of the old confidence, and, as he glanced down upon her, the memory flooded his heart, as it were, and he could not resist the impulse to tell her all.

She listened now; there was no one near them, the lamps were softened almost to moonlight, and the air was heavy with the breath of flowers. She stood so silently beside him, not raising her face; but he felt her hand tighten upon his arm as he went on. Then, for the first and only time, he saw her yield to ungovernable feeling. She raised those proud eyes with a look of passionate entreaty, as he ended, as if she would pray him to unsay all.

"I do not deny that I love you, Morris Wharton"—for it was the brother of her friend to whom she spoke—"love you as few women are capable of loving: have loved you;" and the grasp of her slender hand seemed to hold him like iron; "for it is all over now. I know all I could be to you—all I should be, under your influence: that, together, we should achieve all that the most ambitious could desire. But we should have had a weary probation. I have tried to school myself to think of it; but I could not. Present good has decided me. I could not stoop to poverty, or even straitened means. I have been surrounded by wealth and luxury since my birth. I know it belonged to others, but I enjoyed it, and I determined to hold it as my own."

"Alice!"

"Wait. I have not even the power of questioning now. The decision is made. I am to be married very soon. Have not they told you? You saw him to-night: my mother was leaning on his arm."

"Not him! Do not say that, Alice! But you are jesting with me; he is your mother's suitor. Tell me?"

"No, he is mine, and accepted." He offers me unbounded wealth and an assured position. I am still a dependent. I will do him the honor to take his name and his fortune," she added, bitterly.

He pitied her through all his own misery, as she stood there beside him. Now that the color had died from her cheek and lip, he saw how changed she had become. The yearning look of tenderness and entreaty had died away, and there was a painful hardness in her eyes and the firm compression of her mouth. It was as if his love had welled back to its fountain, and a seal had, for the time at least, been set upon it; but there was a mingled tide of pity and contempt in its place.

"Look at this, Alice."

She followed the direction of his hand, and saw the gleaming of a picture-frame before them, and then the figures grew more distinct, and she recognized the outline of the landscape: a proud mansion in the background, with stately terraces overlooking a fair landscape; a home stately enough even for her ambition. But the foreground was filled by two contrasted figures: an old, decrepit man toiling along in second childishness, his steps upheld by a staff, and the arm of a young girl, crowned with flowers, and clad in a velvet bodice, guiding his uncertain steps, but with a sad, listless glance. Beneath it the artist had written, "January and May." The satire was scarcely veiled; no text was needed.

"Forgive me! forgive me!" he said, when the firm lips quivered with suppressed emotion; for, with a glance, she had comprehended his meaning.

"It is scarcely an attractive picture," she said, coldly, and almost carelessly, as pride suggested the response. "But perhaps as much so as if the artist had portrayed the discomforts of 'love in a cottage.'"

It was over, then; so the tide of society is glassed above its deeper undercurrents. Pride and resentment had finished the work of ambition and rejected love. Henceforth there was to be no word of sympathy, no glance of earnest feeling. The cold, polished courtesies of society were interchanged, and they parted. Alice Middleton was not turned from the course she had chosen. The gray-haired wooer received her hand, and her exquisite taste was gratified by a lavish display of all that was costly in art or elegant in association. Her mother, self-satisfied, and more than rewarded, shared in all, and her daughter's proud heart never reproached her with the sacrifice of principle and feeling by which it had been attained. Sometimes a long quivering sigh gave token, in her solitude, that it was peopled with haunting memories of the past, and it may be regret, as Morris Wharton rose to distinction and wealth; but she felt, at least, what had marked him as the cold cynic he was known among men, and that the brightness of two lives had been shadowed by her mother's teachings.

MUSIC.

BY D. H. BARLOW

To any but the man completely absorbed by self, and occupied with catering for self, the welfare of his race is never an object of indifference. He hails, with genuine satisfaction, every token, of whatever description, indicative of social advancement. And among tokens—many and striking at the present hour—he will, doubtless, reckon the increasing value set on music, and the unwonted attention paid to its cultivation.

The evidences of such increase are numerous and everywhere discernible. For example, in Prussia, which can boast the most perfect existing system of popular education, music is made a part of primary school tuition. By the wise framers of that magnificent national scheme, it was judged (and rightly) that, in providing for the development and training of the several human powers, so noble a capability as the human voice should by no means be omitted.

Another token of growing regard for music is the appearance, within a few years, of an unusual number of pre-eminent geniuses in the art. Paganini, Malibran, Ole Bull, Vieux Temps, and De Mayer (to name no others) constitute a galaxy of brilliancy such as the world never, probably, saw before as cotemporary.

And a point worthy of special notice, in this connection, is, that many of these cotemporary artists have excelled with the violin, a fact significant for many reasons. One of these is that, while other musical instruments are strictly limited by their construction, and can fill out only an assignable compass, whoever may handle them, and however large his capacity, the violin, on the contrary, is of immeasurable capabilities, and itself becomes whatever the genius wielding it enables it and wills it to be. "It is," says one of our most charming writers, "like the human heart, with its laughter and its wailing, its sighs and shrieks, its love and fear and sorrow, and its aspirations, that go beyond the stars."

Now, is there no meaning in the fact that, instead of a contented adherence to instruments of cramped and definable power, we witness the cultivation of, and an unmatched proficiency in, an instrument of illimitable capabilities, and that, too, in so many individual instances? Does not this fact symbolize and prefigure an approaching era of larger freedom of movement in all respects?—an era that shall bring to light, and to the general possession, at once new riches in the natural creation, new and more ennobling truths in the realm of thought, and new springs of enjoyment, as well as means of embellishment for the state of man? Does it not, in short, add another to the manifold existing indications, that "old things are passing away, and all things are becoming new?"

The same fact may be supposed to cover another meaning. The violin is reckoned the exactest type of the human voice, which is a main vehicle of man's feeling and thought. From its being so typical, you would naturally expect that, of all instruments, this would be the most difficult to master completely; that, imperfectly managed, it would, like the human passions, make the most hideous, insufferable discordance; and that, expertly wielded, it would create the most thrilling and subduing music.

Now, in the marvelous proficiency made, in our day, by so many persons on an instrument thus emblematic, in the soul-ravishing, superhuman accords now drawn from its strings, do we not witness premonitions and earnest of a coming time, when the voices, as the souls of the great family of humanity, instead of the hostile jarrings and embroiled clangors of the six thousand years foregone, shall blend in a single grand symphony of love and peace and good-will, worthy His approval who is essential, eternal harmony and love?

Action and reaction constitute a law pervading the universe through all its spheres. Nor less does a single electric bond of sympathy, extending from heart to heart, secure, out of myriads of individuals, one indivisible totality of race.

Now, that these sons of genius are capable of such prodigies of musical utterance springs from the fact that harmonies, aforetime either unknown or felt but feebly, now exist in and pervade the universal soul of humanity. Whatever so exists must, by a law of Providence, be somehow manifested. And therefore Ole Bull and his lyric brethren are sent into the world as incarnations and mediators of these wide, prevailing, bodiless heart-tones, yearning for utterance.

And the reason is obvious of their thronged, enthusiastic reception. It is that they make distinct and palpable to the general social heart what already lay therein unconscious, or but dimly perceptive, of itself. No sooner does the artist give expression to the harmony, which his own soul enlodges, than the kindred element spontaneously starts up responsive in a thousand others. The Memnon statue, standing but now so cold and mute, wakes into tuneful life and sympathy at the first glance from the bright divinity of song!

But, as I said, where action is, there also must be reaction. That harmonious social spirit, which produced and informed these master artists, grows and expands in musical love and capability, under the influence of their strains. The wondrous creation becomes, in its turn, a creator, according to that universal law too familiarly known to all to need an illustration.

It might, perhaps, be thought beforehand that we, of this country, are occupied in a manner and to a degree incompatible with a taste for this beautiful art. Our aims and enterprises are mainly material, as our mission would seem that of pioneers charged with preparing the way for the coming of the Lord in the shape of a higher civilization and a more Christian social state, than the world has hitherto witnessed.

Yet even here appear the same symptoms, as elsewhere, of a growing love of music, and an intenser enjoyment of it, than in times by-past. Nowhere do its extraordinary proficients draw larger, more enthusiastic assemblages than in this busy, bustling land. Tight as the Yankee grip proverbially is upon the dollars, these have been poured out in a glittering flood in return for the streams of harmony set a flowing for Yankee entertainment; and, to compensate the creator of sweet sounds, purses, which have been closed with a hard knot against every other appeal, have had their strings pulled absolutely and entirely out.

I said, at the outset, that in this increasing cultivation of music, I beheld an encouraging omen for the future. Such an omen, I think, would be visible did we go no deeper than those purifying and refining influences of the art which appear at first sight. But it becomes far more palpable, when we penetrate into the nature and significance of music.

According to Swedenborg, "the spiritual ground and producing cause of melodious sounds are the good and pure affections; and the embodiment of these affections in truths, standing in proper relation to each other, is the spiritual and real source of harmony."

In the spirit of this same thought, another says: "Music is the voice of God, and poetry his language."

Cranch says: "Music is an attempt to paint on the black canvas of the present, with color-like melodies and tint-like harmonies, the soul's ideal reminiscences of the scenery of its native clime." Elsewhere, he calls music "the soul's homesickness." And, once more, he remarks that "music seems like the soul's effort to speak its mother tongue in a strange land."

Emerson says: "Over everything stands its demon or soul; and, as the form of the thing is reflected to the eye, so the soul of the thing is reflected by a melody. The sea, the mountain-ridge, Niagara, supersist in prechantations, which sail like eddies in the air; and, when any man goes by with ears sufficiently fine, he overhears them, and endeavors to write them down without diluting or dopraving them."

And, finally, Mrs. Child says, with marvelous condensation and completeness: "Music is the soprano, the feminine principle, the heart of the universe. Because it is the voice of love, because it is the highest type and aggregate expression of passionall attraction, therefore it is infinite, therefore it pervades all space and transcends all being like a divine influx. What the tone is to the word, what expression is to the form, what affection is to thought, what the heart is to the head, what intuition is to argument, what insight is to policy, what religion is to philosophy, what holiness is to heroism, what moral influence is to power, what woman is to man—is music to the universe. Flexible, graceful, and free, it pervades all things, and is limited by none. It is not poetry, but the soul of poetry. It is not mathematics, but it is in numbers, like harmonious proportions in cast iron. It is not painting, but it shines through colors, and gives them their tone. It is not dancing, but it makes all gracefulness of motion. It is not architecture, but the stones take their places in harmony with its voice, and stand in petrified music."

Music, then, being the expression of love, and love being God, and the universe being a manifestation of God, we should suppose that music must be everywhere found. And we do so find it. Not a brooklet sets forth from its mountain birthplace to run its life-race, that does not, as though in gayety of heart, sing to itself as it trips along. The four winds talk (according to their several characters) to the big forest trees, to the little shrubs, and, in fact, to everything they meet, and their tones, now gay, now plaintive, now loud, are all, in a degree, musical; though the north wind's voice, it must be owned, is often hoarse with a cold. And what an awe-striking music, "deep calling unto deep," there is in the roar of the ocean, and the far-reverberating roll of the thunder-peal!

So the winged tribes and the insect races salute, some the bright, busy day, and others the hushed, shadowy night, with an infinite diversity of melodies. Music, in a word, would seem, like caloric, to exist latent in all things; and as, with flint and steel, or even by rubbing two sticks together, we can strike out heat, so out of brass, steel, wood, and all other existing substances, can music be extracted.

And if such be the fact with the irrational and inanimate creation, much more with the human voice, the great organ of expression to the soul. In its commonest speaking tones, when love pervades and moves the heart, there is somewhat musical. Nor less does the opposite feeling betray its presence by the opposite of melodious in the voice: so that the very child knows, through your tones, whether there be kindness in your heart, or the reverse.

Thus, again, while no two nations can understand the meaning of each other's words, all can apprehend alike the significance conveyed by music. The explanation of which is said to be, that the human affections, being (in their rudiments at least) identical all round the globe, music (the language of the affections) everywhere awakens kindred emotions. Whereas, words, being the expression of human thoughts or opinions, are not, universally, thus identical in meaning, since different peoples, from their education and conditions, differ in opinion or thought.

A well-instructed, acute observer, can judge, with no small preciseness, concerning a nation's condition, more especially touching its average moral sentiment and aspiration, from the prevailing character of its music. Thus, oriental nations are said to have, in their music, little or nothing of harmony. This fact is accounted for by the degraded position held by woman among them. Instead of being man's equal, companion, and friend, she is his soulless plaything and slave. Music, therefore, the voice of the great social heart, must, of necessity, lack harmony, which is the combination of the differing melodies, representative of the masculine and feminine affections.

The same fact is found existing among our North American Indians, and for the same reason. Their women are inferiors and drudges, and their music, destitute of symphonies, is made up of rude and simple melodies.

Among Christian nations, where woman, the equal associate of man, is believed, not less than he, to possess an immortal soul, and participates the same intellectual and moral culture with him, harmony naturally makes its appearance in music. And, still farther, the condition of the popular music exhibits considerable indication of the state of national cultivation, mental and moral.

National melodies or airs are the heart-voices of the popular masses, and in the characteristic tones of these melodies how distinctly is the popular feeling disclosed! What a vein, for example, of rich pathos pervades those Irish Melodies, collected and "married to immortal verse" by Thomas Moore! Do not their tones plainly reveal a people dowered abundantly with affection, and fancy, and all those finer elements which should place it high on the roll of nations, yet down-trodden and bleeding from long centuries of oppression, and bemoaning their sad present and lowering future? Their very wail cannot be other than sweet, for it is the utterance of a largely endowed heart, thus lacerated and trampled on. The "cloud of rich-distilled perfumes" rises from crushed aromatics most precious in quality!

The Scottish Highland airs have, also, a prevailing plaintiveness of cast. These, too, are the heart-breathings of a conquered people—of the Gaël driven by the Saxons, from their native lowlands, to abide among the heathy, sombre hills, and rocky mountains, where the fir and pine utter their means, and the "celarachs blow their trumpets from the steepes," and far-stretching, billowy mists often swathe the whole region in a chilling shroud. Spirits originally hardy and resolute would naturally be tempered to a stern, solemn mood by such a history, and the influence of such an abiding-place. Their music, accordingly, is grave, pensive, and plaintive, though not, I apprehend, of an unnerving, debilitating character.

The Italian and French, the German and Spanish races, have each a music of their own, reflecting the differing character and cultivation of each. The English and American peoples, both compounds alike from various other nations, are both much accustomed to borrow, in their crude state, the suggestions of foreigners, and work out and appropriate them to their own use. So, both nations hitherto, without originating much themselves, have been content to adopt and repeat the melodies and harmonies of Europe. The sole exception, I believe, if this be such, is in sacred music, in which they have, perhaps, created something. And in this circumstance we see another illustration of the principle we are considering, since if, in any particular, the Anglo-Saxon race, on either side the Atlantic, be individual and very strongly marked, it is in their religiousness. The "great English rebellion" (so named), which decapitated a king, was mainly religious in its character, as it was from a religious instigation that the Pilgrims planted the seeds of our empire among the ice-bound rocks of the Plymouth shores. It was in keeping, therefore, that, if England and America should be impelled to express themselves through original music at all, that music should be religious.

The African melodies, again, which every school urchin hums, are a not less striking confirmation of what has been advanced. Everybody finds them attractive, yet nothing can be simpler and less artificial. Nor is it easy to find, on analysis, in what their attraction lies. Sweet, however, as they are, there breathes, invariably, through this sweetness, a plaintive, softly-wailing tone. This tone is not absent even from the most amusing of the comic specimens. The ever-ready laugh is half smothered in a regretful sigh.

Music, then, being what it is, is there not adequate ground for what I began by saying, viz: that the growing attention to its culture is an auspicious sign of the times?

But, besides showing well for the present, music is also a mighty instrument to help forward the race in its advance. Was it Bacon that said, "Let me make the songs of a people, and he that will may enact its laws?" It was wisely said, whoever the sayor. Not the words of a ballad, or the meaning they cover, are the principal things, but the melodies themselves. There is no comparison between tones and thoughts, as to their several capacity instantly and powerfully to rouse and sustain sentiment and emotion. How, for example, can the soldier, by martial strains, be kindled into a frenzy of valor, which, annihilating all shade of fear, hurls him into the cannon's fiery throat, and the "imminent deadly breach?" And how, on the contrary, by different strains, can a quite ether flame, the divine flame of devout aspiration, be lighted and fanned in the soul to that degree, that all secular, earthly thought and feeling are utterly burned up, and we seem to breathe the very atmosphere of the empyrean itself!

"I took in sounds, that might create a soul Under the ribs of death," is Milton's well-known and hardly exaggerated description of what lies within the resources of this art. And who better knew these than that prodigious spirit whose thoughts and fancies seemed, in his own language, to

"Voluntary move harmonious numbers!"

How incalculable must be the influence of music (even unconsciously to ourselves) in the development and fashioning of our natures, to verify that undoubted fact touching the Swiss absentees! The simple notes of that pastoral "Rans de Vaches" are potent enough to dim all the more numerous and brilliant attractions of the stranger dimes, to nullify the terrors of the military oath, and to transform the machine, fashioned by war's discipline, into the child all made up of sensibility, and yearning for his rude Alpine home with a desire so irrepressible, as to brave, for its gratification, the doom of the deserter, or else die of a breaking heart!

Ancient mythology and tradition are crowded with testimonials to the power of music. It was, as all know, fabled by the Greeks that Amphion raised the walls of far-famed Thebes by the sound of his lyre, and the fable, doubtless, covers a historic fact of some sort. It may have been that the hero brought into play the resources of his great musical skill to lighten the toil and temper the weariness, as well as to fire the zeal and augment the activity of the laborers employed in the work of construction, and thus the walls literally went up at the sound of the lyre. Or, the eloquence and persuasive power of the leader may be represented under the type of music. Or, finally, both ideas may be intended to be conveyed. But, in either case, a high tribute is paid to the might of sweet sounds.

The old familiar fictions of Orpheus, at whose witching harmonies the wild beast forgot his sanguinary thirst, the headlong torrent hushed its roar, the trees and rocks tore themselves from their fixed foundations, and remorseless Hades itself unloosed its gripe on the beloved dead; and of Arion, by whose harp the dolphin, the wildest-frisking of all the finny tribes, became subdued into the most manageable of steeds to bear him shoreward through the billowy deep, are both, doubtless, general delineations of the subduing and humanizing power of genius, acting through religion and the fine arts, on the rude, savage, and brutish elements in man's nature. But they also alike contain, both directly and by implication, a witness to the meliorating and refining influence of music especially on the human soul.

The well-known anecdote of Napoleon's application of musical force, in his celebrated passage of the Alps, always struck me as exceedingly fine, for many reasons. You recollect that, whenever the army reached one of those rough, precipitous places where, heavily burdened as they were, they felt as though it were impracticable to advance another step, Napoleon ordered the trumpets to blow the battle-charge. The effect was such a kindling of military ardor, through this striking on their habitual associations, that the soldiery stormed the difficult crags just as they would have done the walls of a hostile fort or city. The very evils of genius are fertile of suggestion, for they are but extraordinary goods upside down. And this device of Napoleon intimates plainly what beneficent uses might be made of music even in the ordinary concerns of industrious life. Why not employ the functions of sound to cheer, to kindle, to invigorate the battalions of labor, when busied in useful, creative endeavor, as well as to fire the armies of destruction to the work of butchery, demolition, and laying waste?

In fact, since I have named war, I may remark that nothing presents so vivid a type of what our present perverted society is, while suggesting, by contrast, what it might actually be made, as this same matter of war. Here is that which involves and unites everything repulsive and repugnant—the severest toil; the most intolerable privation and hardship; peril in every shape; liability to wounds, mutilation, keenest pains, and agonizing death—a foul work of butchery, and blood, and devastation well befitting fiends of the nether pit! And yet, what a witchery is flung over it; and how does it appear a thing of grace, and beauty, and nobleness, and splendor!

And how is this effected? By combination and discipline; the showy garb; the flaunting banner; the thrilling, soul-stirring music in all its varieties; and titles and honors glittering, starlike, in the distance: these suffice to draw a mask over war's fiendish lineaments, and impart to this creature of the lowest abyss the semblance of an angel of light!

Now can any sound reason be assigned why that which is thus done for the work of destruction, may not equally be done for the work of production, of building up, of creation? We pay taxes, enormous taxes, and in other ways incur expenses vast beyond all calculation, in behalf of war—in great measure for the very purpose of giving to military service its attractiveness and fascination.

Would it be so very absurd, then, to devote some of our money to the end of alleviating the hardships, of lightening the burdens, and removing the repulsiveness of honest industry, and of making attractive and agreeable those productive occupations on which hangs the very subsistence of the race? Among the means that might be so employed, music is one of the most effectual, as well as the most capable of diversities of appropriation.

I am reminded, in this connection, of the anecdote of Whitefield, which, I presume, most of you have heard. He was in the habit of adapting to the use of his religious meetings any popular melodies which specially pleased him, even though they should chance to be convivial tunes. Some brother clergyman found fault with the employment, in divine worship, of airs which had been chanted over the wine-cup in honor of Bacchus. Whitefield's rejoinder was, "Why should the devil have and keep all the best tunes?"

In the same mood I would say, "Why should the devil, the world, and the flesh, monopolize the best of the immense resources and appliances of music? Why not, at least, endeavor such an employment of these as may tend to better, instead of to worsen the condition of mankind; as may co-operate in the work of the construction instead of the destruction of human well-being?"

It is, I think, Harriet Martineau who suggests the experiment of introducing music into our halls of legislation. She proposes that, before engaging in the consideration of great vital measures, there should be brought to act on the minds of legislators that species of music which calms and tranquilizes all heat and agitation, and tends toward a solemn and equable mood of feeling. Passing then to the discussion of momentous topics, would they not be more than, under other circumstances, likely to decide in accordance with justice, truth, and propriety?

When we reflect a moment on what is the actual composition, often, of our legislative bodies, and then take into view how matter-of-fact, unpoetic, and reverse of picturesque we are in our prevalent usages and ways of life, I know the above suggestion will have a touch of the absurd and ludicrous. But certainly, in the nature of the case, there is no absurdity, but something quite the opposite. I think I have somewhere seen that the ancient orators and actors were sometimes accustomed to be accompanied in their declamation by instrumental music, and to make their utterance and their gesticulation keep time with musical measure. This would seem to us quite as ludicrous as the practice above suggested. And yet those old Greeks and Romans were no fools. Nor should we do unwisely to adopt some of their methods of throwing somewhat of poetic grace and beauty around the coarse, unshapely forms and homely features of our everyday existence. Even now we introduce music into the church, and reckon it an indispensable part of divine worship, both as being in itself an utterance of devout emotion, and as attuning the soul to a fitness of mood for all other services of the place and time.

Why not, then, employ the same preparative elsewhere? Is it that the church is the only spot where God is to be recognized, or to receive service at our hands? And this vast field of life, with its immense multiplicity of duties, relations, and doings—has God no connection with these, or these with God?

That same legislative hall, for example, where laws are framed, operating to mould the minds and hearts, the character and welfare of millions, and that, often, for ages—is it an indifferent thing from what mood of mind such laws issue? Is it not, on the contrary, of inestimable moment? And if music be adapted to fit the mind for the offices of the sanctuary, why not for those of the senate house?

When the day arrives that men, besides accepting the apostolic precept, "Forsake not the assembling of yourselves together," shall regard as of equal weight that other injunction, "Whether ye eat or drink, or whatever ye do, do all to the glory of God," then it will not be deemed absurd or ludicrous to prepare for the execution of high duties by the use of noble means.

I once heard it said by an expert musician that children, early enough commenced with and judiciously taught, might all be made, to some extent at least, performers in both vocal and instrumental music. For one, I could wish this idea might be universally acted on. I know hardly anything that seems to me more desirable. I would have, were it possible, every child grow up, from the very cradle, amid an atmosphere of sweet sounds. It would be an influence unseen, yet potent, incessantly moulding the expanding mind to all finer issues. Soothing disquietude, calming down turbulence of temper, sweetening acidity, and holding in check the elements of disorder, its moral action would be far above that of all precept. Plato said (2500 years ago), "as exercise imparts health to the body, so music imparts the power of self-government to the soul;" which corresponds with the above remarks.

The harp of David had power to drive away, for the time, the evil spirit, which troubled the soul of Saul. This evil spirit was probably the moodiness springing from uncontrolled, excessively-indulged passions; a morbid temper aggravated by habit and the circumstances of kingly state. Even this fled before the touch of the harp.

How much rather will the same agency put to flight the superficial tumults and moods of the childish heart, and what must be the influence for good, on so susceptible a subject, of a power competent to so difficult results?

The case of Saul has a parallel, in modern times, in a Spanish king, who was plunged in profoundest melancholy, from which nothing could rouse him, and under which he sat, solitary, in a darkened chamber, neglectful of all affairs, and totally oblivious of life. Of this he was cured, after the failure of all other means, by the singing of the famous Italian vocalist, Farinelli.

The ancients thought highly of music as a medical agent in bodily disease, independently of its action on the body through the intervention of the mind, and many curious anecdotes are related of their superstitions on this subject. Probably their estimate of its value to this end was really not exaggerated, though they might mistake as to its manner of action. There is a large terra incognita of which even physicians have little idea, relating to the connection of the mind with the body, and the action and reaction of each on the other, with their bearing on health.

Thus far, even now, it is certain that a sound mind goes, of itself, far towards securing a sound body, and vice versa. Its moral influence, therefore, of which I have spoken—its power to soothe, to calm, and harmonize the passions and emotions—is, in no small degree, friendly to physical health.

Over and above this, the mere mechanical exercise of the lungs and other required organs in singing is, like all exercise, physically healthful, and greatly so. Dr. Rush, therefore, recommends singing as one of the most effectual safeguards against those consumptive maladies which are the scourge of our climate.

To these moral and physical benefits of music we may add intellectual no less. Says a teacher of large experience as well as wisdom, "The study of music, from its very nature, cultivates habits of order. All must follow a precise rule; all must act together, and move in obedience to a leader; and the habit, acquired in one part of our pursuits, necessarily affects others."

He might have added that the very nature of music, dealing with proportions, adaptations, accordances, right sequences, may be reckoned almost identical with order itself, and therefore the mind, trained up amid and habituated to its influences, contracts, in the common course of things, usages of order and correctness in general, unless marred by some superior counteracting force.

Of course I must not be understood to intimate that music, alone, is adequate to shield the child or youth from the thousand contaminating and misleading influences to which even the early years of life are exposed, or that a taste for this art and its pleasures may not coexist, in maturer age, with great moral imperfections. I would merely suggest that, as co-operative with other fit educational means, this would be found a powerful agency for good to the moral, intellectual, and physical being.

Finally, as an amusement for all ages and classes, music would be of inestimable worth. Trivial as this point may be reckoned by the superficial, the philosopher knows it to be vastly otherwise. As are a people's amusements, so, emphatically, is the people. Originally the outbirth of the popular mind, they react, with tremendous force, to mould and shape it.

The gladiatorial shows sprang from that warlike element in the Roman mind that made the city of Romulus the conqueror and robber of the world. But how much must those bloody exhibitions have aggravated the hardness and cruelty of the national temper! The two main plagues of the Anglo-Saxon race, in whatever clime, are intemperance and fanaticism. Does it never occur to us how much these are owing to our interdict of amusements in almost every kind—thus leaving no authorized means of satisfying that demand for recreation which is imperative and will not be denied, save the table and the conventicle?

Music, as a national recreation, would not only tend to soften, to humanise, and refine the popular tastes, but, occupying the place of those sensual enjoyments to which recourse is otherwise had, would elevate the tone of national thought and intellect. As a collateral benefit, it would secure from a multitude of temptations assailing those who betake themselves abroad for recreation. This can be had at home, with parents and kinsfolk, and the two sexes in company—the last alone a point of incalculable moment.

And, best of all, such pleasures, unlike so many others, leave no sting behind. We are led onward and upward, along a pleasant, flower-bordered path, to one stage after another of that intellectual and moral progress which fits us for that heaven whose truest emblem is music, as its reality is the love, of which music is the voice!

THE BEAUTIFUL SEMPSTRESS.

BY SAMUEL LAURENCE JAMES.

SHE sits by the window, sewing all day,
With a quiet and winning grace;
And oft, from my chamber over the way,
I gaze on her beautiful face.

She busily plies her needle and thread,
And always is tidy and neat;
She's sprightly and modest, nor lies late abed,
And seldom is seen on the street.

When down on the floor she gracefully goes,
While her patterns before her lie,
I'd lie on the floor myself, heaven knows,
For a glance of her bonny bright eye.

Her lot is too low for lovers who woo
For offers of silver and gold;
But she has a heart, and energy too,
That are better a thousandfold.

Now often I wish she'd lay her work by,
Nor labor so hard all the day—
For I fear it will dim the bonny bright eye
Of my neighbor over the way.

MRS. SMITH AND MRS. BROWN.

A DOMESTIC DIALOGUE.

TIME—Morning.

[MRS. SMITH, having allowed her cook to go out, allows her housemaid to be generally busy in departments not usually pertaining to the "neat-handed" Sarah; while Mrs. Smith herself, in morning dress, and remarkably pretty cap, dusts china ornaments in her "own sweet little drawing-room," pulls down Venetian blinds to spare her carpet, and arranges, softly and lovingly, a few books on an ornamental table: but she loiters in a manner that a deputy-housemaid ought not to do, dipping into the lovely illustrated "Evangeline" for full five minutes, still standing, but resting first on one side and then on the other, as little girls are always scolded for doing, and dropping into a chair, when in the dusting she glances at a page of the "Casa Guidi Windows," that had not struck her with its full force before. A patter of little feet is heard; the book is closed, and enter Susan the nursemaid, equipped for walking with Master Willy and Miss Katey, aged respectively four and two years. Bright eyes, soft, rosy cheeks, silken, curly locks, streaming beneath large sun-shading Leghorn hats; short full skirts, and little Katey's coquetish casaweeck, and snow-white socks and coal-black polished leather shoes, must be shown to paint their picture. Several demonstrative hugs between mother and children, somewhat to the detriment of Mrs. Smith's cap, are accompanied by crowing laughter. "Dood-by, mamma; dood-by! Tusan take us to see the twans; and such a nice walk! Dood-by!" And the four impatient little feet scamper away; Mrs. Smith watching them out of the gate, as she peers between the bars of the blind. Then with a sudden thought she unrolls some new music, opens the piano, and with the manner of a brilliant player when trying a strange piece, repeats one or two queer passages three or four times. A sharp double knock is heard, and the busy Sarah shows in Mrs. Brown: civil neighborly greetings ensue.]

Mrs. Brown. I heard the piano going, and so judged you would see me, though it is hardly ten o'clock; but neighbors ought to be neighborly; and, as I said to Mr. Brown, I was sure if you could help me you would.

Mrs. Smith. I am sure anything I can do——

Mrs. Brown. Oh, what a difference [looking round with envious admiration]. You can sit down in comfort to music the first thing in the morning.

Mrs. Smith. It is not my usual time for playing, but my husband brought me home some new quadrilles and a polka last night; and as we are going to a little carpet dance to-night, where I may be useful, I thought I would try them over. But what is it that I can do for you, Mrs. Brown?

Mrs. Brown [sighing]. My dear, you are a young wife—not married above five or six years—and you have had the luck to have treasures (trebly italicized); but as for me, servants are my torments. I sent off the whole pack last night, and have only a horrid washerwoman in the house. Does your cook know of any friend she can recommend? That is what I wanted to ask you.

Mrs. Smith. I hardly think it likely, but I will ask Sarah if she knows any one. Cook is not at home; she is gone to the Institute.

Mrs. Brown. What, again! Then it was she that I saw so smart getting into the omnibus. Well, I must say you spoil them.

Mrs. Smith [smiling]. And yet I get on remarkably well. It is cook's third visit. I actually sent her to-day because she had neglected to go over the model lodging-houses, and I wished her so much to see them.

Mrs. Brown. My dear Mrs. Smith, what could it signify?

Mrs. Smith. A good deal, I think. However, I do not wonder at the omission, as I believe on the first occasion she had no eyes for anything except the kitchen-ranges; her account of which interested me particularly. I know, with all my Friday and Saturday visits, I have not found them out yet.

Mrs. Brown. Is it possible you talk to your servants in this way?

Mrs. Smith. Why not? I assure you we always consider our servants as humble friends, and interest ourselves in all that concerns them.

Mrs. Brown. But you wouldn't if you had such wretches as I have to deal with. Why in eight months I have had five cooks, three housemaids, and four little imps in buttons: they have nearly broken my heart, and quite made differences between Mr. Brown and me; and it has been so all my life. Oh, Mrs. Smith, how do you manage; and where did you get your servants from?

Mrs. Smith. I hardly remember how I procured them; through some ordinary channel of recommendation, I believe; and I know I received excellent characters, which experience has convinced me they deserved. In fact, I would not engage a servant unless her appearance, acquirements, and general recommendation were an earnest that she would suit. Then, when one has a good servant, kindness and consideration, with fair wages, will always keep her. In fact, I believe kindness is thought more of than wages by many; though we are of opinion that servants ought to receive good wages—enough to lay by for their old age.

Mrs. Brown. But they never do. It all goes in finery, and that is what I will not allow; it was a quarrel about a bonnet ribbon that made me part with Mary at last. I put up with her impudence for four months, but couldn't endure it any longer.

Mrs. Smith. Certain limits are no doubt desirable, but a thoroughly good and happy servant usually saves from her wages, and generally has sense enough not to dress absurdly. I do not care how good my servants' clothes are, both for the sake of their appearance and for economy, knowing well that cheap things are always the dearest in the end.

Mrs. Brown [shaking her head with the wisdom of forty-five addressing the inexperience of twenty-eight]. I see we shall never agree. I don't know what the world is coming to. Now there's the post-man. I should not wonder if there are letters for the kitchen as well as for you.

Mrs. Smith. Very likely, for all the servants have relations in the country.

Enter SARAH, with a letter for MRS. SMITH, and another in her hand.

Mrs. Brown [to Mrs. Smith]. May I ask her?

Mrs. Smith. I was just going to do so. [To the housemaid.] Sarah, Mrs. Brown wants a cook; do you know of one?

Sarah. I think I do. [Hesitates and stammers.] That is, no; I am afraid the young person I was thinking of would not suit you, ma'am.

Mrs. Brown. Not suit me, Sarah! What do you mean? Is she honest, clean, sober? A good cook?

Sarah [indignant for her friend]. Oh yes, ma'am, but—but perhaps she would not do.

Mrs. Brown. Why not?

Sarah. You see, ma'am, it would be such a dreadful thing if she didn't suit, to lose a five years' character, and only leaving because her master has lost money, and is reducing his establishment; and she wants to stay with half wages, only he won't let her, and so she is teaching the eldest daughter to know about cooking; and so, ma'am, she couldn't leave yet, and of course you couldn't wait. No, I don't know any servant, I am sure, that I should like to recommend.

Mrs. Brown [with a half glimmer that Sarah does know of a treasure, but won't consign her to No. 5]. Oh, very well, I don't wish it to be considered a favor.

Sarah. Of course not, ma'am.

[Sarah curtsies, and leaves the room.]

Mrs. Smith [almost timidly]. If it would not be considered presumptuous in me, so much younger a housekeeper, to give advice, I would say to you, when you can succeed in procuring good servants, to try the plan of treating them indulgently. They are our fellow-creatures—with the same hopes and desires, failings and weaknesses, and infirmities of temper—we must not expect perfection; and if we show them sympathy, it is astonishing the influence —

Mrs. Brown [decidedly tartly]. Now I know what you are going to say; but I never will give in to those new-fangled notions. I won't allow followers, and I won't allow letter scribbling; and what I say in my own house shall be done, and I won't be answered by a minx; and if I choose a thing to be done one way one day, and another way another, what's that to them? What business have they to say that I don't know my own mind, and begin to cry, and to talk about their characters?

Mrs. Smith [a little warmly]. Oh, Mrs. Brown, anger often terrifies a timid girl, not naturally dull, into seeming stupidity and obstinacy. I pity them from my heart; and I deeply feel a mistress has grave responsibilities towards her female servants. Servitude at best is an abandonment of liberty, and must bring many trials; how cruel of us to make it needlessly bitter by our caprices and exactions! And, on the other hand, what a happiness it is to feel one's self served from affection as well as duty! I speak from experience: our household is a household of love; these walls have never echoed to an angry reproof; there is no fear, there is no deception in the house; and I believe our servants feel it to be their home; it always gladdens me when I hear them call it so.

Mrs. Brown. It is all very fine; but how do you know that you are not cheated?

Mrs. Smith. From many circumstances, besides my own faith in those about me. I give you one, for example: I know that our expenses are nearly a hundred a year less than those of many friends who appear to live more plainly. But all in the house draw together to avoid waste, and all act without separate interests. The servants themselves are like sisters, and help one another—as is the case to-day—in affectionate fellowship. If I give one of them a holiday, I scarcely know the difference in the house. I know people say I have been particularly fortunate; but is it not strange, dear Mrs. Brown, that one person should have all the bad servants, and another all the good?

Mrs. Brown. Not at all, if you give them high wages, and let them have their own way.

Mrs. Smith. Not their own way, unless it is my way also. I assure you I am extremely particular; but then we are also very regular in our habits; and knowing myself that I dearly like to be praised when I do well, why I give praise to those about me when they deserve it.

Mrs. Brown [rising, and with a Burleigh shake of the head]. They won't bear it.

Mrs. Smith. Oh, yes they will—do try just for three months with your next set of servants. But don't go yet; here come the "trots" from their walk—you must see them.

Enter SUSAN and the children; the latter laden with hedge-flowers. MRS. BROWN admires and caresses the children, whom SUSAN, at her mistress's bidding, has left in the drawing-room. MRS. BROWN says something about "spoiling," which KATEY does not understand, though she opens her large eyes still wider, as if in the effort to comprehend. Kitchens in general not being very remote from drawing-rooms, a sound of bitter violent weeping is heard proceeding from the lower regions. MRS. SMITH rushes to the stairs to ask what is the matter; MRS. BROWN following, in charge of the children.

Sarah [sympathetic, with her apron corner to her eye]. Oh, ma'am, poor Susan has got a letter from home, and her sister that's been ill so long—that was in the hospital for months—is dying; the doctors say she can't live three days.

Mrs. Smith [going into the kitchen]. Oh, I am so sorry! Is it the poor girl that had the "bad knee" from that hard place?

Sarah. Yes, ma'am; the brutes that kept her scrubbing from morning till night; I wonder they can't be hung for murder.

Mrs. Smith. Hush, Sarah; it will do no good to reproach them more. No doubt they have learned a lesson from their severity, and will regret it as long as they live. [To Susan: putting her hand kindly on her shoulder.] My poor girl, what can I do to comfort you?

Susan [sobbing violently]. Oh, ma'am, she do so fret to see me once more! There's—only—a—year between us; and we came up to London together.

Mrs. Smith. Then go to her, of course, by all means.

Susan [sobbing still, and kissing one of Mrs. Smith's hands]. Oh, ma'am, I was afraid—cook—being out—you couldn't let me; and if I don't go to-day I may never see her—again—O ma'am—bless you!—bless you!—ma'am. No one ever had such a mistress.

Mrs. Smith. Hush, my poor girl; try to be calm—she may recover still—doctors often make mistakes—and if not, remember, it is the will of God—and think how much your poor sister suffered. Sarah, fetch her a glass of wine, and then look for the paper—it is in the breakfast-room—that we may see when the next train to Reading goes. That is the one she wants, is it not?

Exit SARAH, who returns with the paper and a glass of wine. SUSAN revives a little. The paper states there is a train 1 h. 55 m.; MRS. SMITH observes there is only just time to arrange, as there is a long omnibus ride to the station. SUSAN shakes her head at the mention of dinner, and MRS. SMITH suggests to SARAH a packet of sandwiches to put into the traveler's bag. WILLY and KATEY promise to be very good with dear mamma, and kiss "poor" SUSAN—little lids trembling with the ready tears.

SUPPLEMENTARY SCENE.—No. 5. MR. and MRS. BROWN anathematizing mutton-chops cooked (?) by washerwomen.

Mr. Brown [crossly]. Mrs. B., as my mother, who was a Norfolk woman, used to say, "The proof of the pudding is in the eating;" and I do maintain Smith's is the pleasantest house I know to go to: he never sits down to a dinner of fat and cinders, I know—and what does it signify if she spoils the servants, if she gets the best sort of work out of them nevertheless? I never saw plate so polished—and they've no man. As for the spring-soup, the other day, it was fit for an alderman; and in the winter, that venison I shall never forget—why can't we have hot-water plates, I should like to know?

Mrs. Brown. Brown, you are quite a brute to talk of such things at such a time—when you know I am almost frantic.

Mr. Brown. I am not a brute; but this I do say, that the young wives seem to me in the main the best managers.

Mrs. Brown. You had better bury me—I shall soon be worried into my grave—and then you can have a young wife.

Mr. Brown. Don't talk like an old fool. Hang it—it is enough to make a man savage—scold, scold, scold—change, change, change.

Mrs. Brown [weeping]. Because I get hold of a parcel of wretches, and Mrs. Smith has treasures.

Mr. Brown. I fancy she helps to make them treasures; and it isn't as if she could be very active in the house herself—I am sure she isn't; such a charming accomplished woman—the life and ornament of society, and as pretty—

MRS. BROWN bursts into a fit of hysterics. MR. BROWN acknowledges he is a brute; calls her "darling," and "dear Nancy," and the scene closes on mutual flatteries and condolence, MR. B. promising never to set up MRS. SMITH as a pattern again.

A GOSSIP ABOUT GLOVES.

BY MRS. WHITE.

One of the most pleasant tasks which falls to the lot of the essayist is that of surrounding common things with a degree of interest unthought of by people generally—to impart novelty to those in common use, and freshness and romance to what the world deems overworn and vulgar.

Familiar things as gloves are, few persons, when drawing them on, remember more than the necessity of wearing them. Their connection with the past—the pleasant anecdotes in which they figure—the religious, historical, and courtly interest appertaining to them, are only treasured by the encyclopedists and the curious. The beaux of modern times, in making purchase of them, forget the period when casting down the glove became the gage of knightly battle—when chivalry wore it in its helm—at once a charm and token, the honorable badge of woman's love, invested with the potency of her virtues. As little does the lady, bending her delicate hand above the glover's counter, recollect the time when these essentials now, were costly gifts (and rare as costly) from courtly dames and nobles to their queen!

If we follow the reading of the "Targum," or commentary of the Scriptures used by the Jews, the invention of gloves may be traced back more than thirteen hundred years before Christ, for the Chaldean paraphrase has glove where the common version renders the word shoe; a translation which shows that even in those remote times the glove was given in confirmation of redeeming or exchanging: "For to confirm all things, a man plucked off his shoe (i. e. glove), and gave it to his neighbor; and this was a testimony in Israel."* In Ireland at this day, when men are making bargains one may often hear the expression, my hand and word upon it; and the glove with us, as the type of an engagement, may have been used in lieu of the hand itself. With Eastern nations, it was the custom, in all cases of sales and deliveries of lands or goods, to give the purchaser their gloves by way of investiture.

If we bear this antique signature in mind, it will throw much light upon the uses of these articles in comparatively modern times.

According to Xenophon, the Persians wore gloves, which he notices as a proof of their effeminacy; but so do the Samoiodes and Tartars, or something equivalent to them, to protect their hands from the inclemency of the weather.

In the time of the younger Pliny, gloves were worn in winter by the Romans; and Homer, speaking of Laertes engaged in agricultural pursuits, describes—

"On his hands mittens, lest they should grow red."

It is possible that these gloves, like those of the Greek archers, were fingerless, and intended solely for the protection of the hand, and not, as they afterwards became, for ornament also.

With us, the etymology of the word, which is derived from the Anglo-Saxon phrase (glof), a cover for the hands, is a sufficient proof of the antiquity of their use, though Strutt supposes them to have found their way to England from the Continent, and does not think they were known before the close of the tenth century; and, in proof of their uncommonness even then, refers to a law of Ethelred II., in which five pairs of gloves make a considerable portion of the duty paid to that prince by a society of German merchants for the protection of their trade.

But the gloves worn as part of the regal and pontifical dress were of a very different manufacture from those made use of simply as a defence from cold or in laborious occupations; and it is probable that "harvest gloves" were common, when embroidered ones were rare, even at court.

In the thirteenth century they were adopted by the nobility, who wore them richly worked, and reaching to the elbows; but, as they hid the rings, they were not popular with ladies, whose long hanging sleeves, while they served for mittens, and concealed the hands, could also reveal them when desired. And, in all likelihood, hawking first rendered the glove a necessary adjunct of female dress. In the reign of Charles V. of France, these articles were worn with high tops, or wristbands, and were ornamented with embroidered dots of gold and silver. We have no means of discovering the fashion of those in which Mathew Paris tells us Henry II. kept cold state in his tomb at Fontevraud; perhaps they were white, like those which Chaucer describes in the Knight's tale—

"Upon his bondes were his gloves white," or made of linen, like those of the Saxon priests in the 11th century. At any rate, the mention of them is interesting, as showing the antiquity of the custom which Misson alludes to in his description of funeral usages in England, of covering the hands of the corpse with gloves.

From a very early period, the clergy appear to have made use of gloves, in order to the more reverend approach to the altar, and the handling of the sacred elements. The black gloves of medical men and lawyers are likewise a relic of those times, when these articles were worn as distinguishing marks of certain functions, rather than for comfort or convenience's sake. Walpole, in his pleasant anecdotes of painting, tells us that the prelate Kemp, Archbishop of York, and afterwards of Canterbury, wore thin yellow gloves, which are well represented.

The practice of investiture by gloves, as we before observed, accounts for many usages in connection with them, and was perhaps the origin of presenting them to sovereigns and great men on the occasion of their coronations and entrances into certain towns and cities. On Elizabeth's visit to Cambridge, in 1564, the secretary, Sir W. Cecyl, presented her, in the name of the University, with four pairs of Cambridge gloves, edged and trimmed with two laces of fine gold. And at Oxford, in 1566, she received six very fine pairs. But the most magnificent of these presentation gloves on record were those which the Cambridge men offered her in 1573, through their high chancellor—perfumed gloves (she had learned to relish no others since Edward Vere, Earl of Oxford, on returning from his travels, had presented her with a pair of the odorous ones worn in Italy),

"Gloves as sweet as damask roses,"* garnished with embroidery and goldsmith's work, and with some verses attached to them; they were valued, says the chronicler, at sixty shillings. Speaking of the verses reminds us that on this very occasion the chancellor suggested that it would be well to provide some gloves, with a few verses on a paper joined to them, to be presented to the Lord Chamberlain and Lord Oxford; and added that, if Mr. Vice-Chamberlain (Hatton) might have a pair (he being a lover of all learned men), it should do well to conciliate his good will.

On other occasions, we find certain corporations offering gloves to this queen monarch in her progresses; and sometimes their contents added not a little to their value. Thus at Kingston-on-Thames, which she passed through on her way from Richmond, Oct. 20, 1561, she received a pair of gloves, cost 40 shillings, and a gift of £4 6s.

The custom of presenting the English sovereign with gloves, on the occasion of visiting the universities, is still continued; and at Trinity College, Cambridge, the judges, who are lodged in the royal apartments, are likewise presented with them.

The nobility in Elizabeth's time, like my Lord Burleigh, had their arms emblazoned on their gloves; and the description of many of those presented by her attendants and courtiers to this royal lady accounts for the value in which they were held, and the uncommonness of their use. In the catalogue of new year's gifts to her majesty in 1577-8, we find

* Shakespeare.

—"Item by the Lady Mary Gray, 2 pair of swete gloves, with fower dozen buttons of golde in every a sede pearle;" and again, "By the Lady Mary Sidney, 1 pair of perfumed gloves, with twenty-four small buttons of golde, in every of them a diamond!"

In 1600, perfumed gloves appear to have poured in from the gentlemen, no less than fifteen pairs being delivered to Mrs. Hide for the queen's use. But in spite of the gold and sede pearle lavished on most of them, her majesty appears to have retained a preference for those presented to her by the Earl of Oxford, which were ornamented with tufts of rose-colored silk, and generally sat for her portrait in them. In fact, these articles accumulated so fast, as to originate a new functionary at court; and the famous Dr. Dee was nominated Keeper of Gloves. His account of the transaction is so quaint, that we cannot abstain from quoting it. The queen has paused in her approach to his house at Mortlake, and having espied him at his door, making reverent and dutiful obeisances to her, he continues—"her majesty with her hand beckoned me to come to her, and I came to her coach side; her majesty then very speedily pulled off her glove, and gave me her hand to kiss; and, to be short, her majesty willed me the keeper of gloves to her court, and by some of the privy chamber to give her to wear when I am there."

In Shakespeare's time they appear to have been greatly in request as love-gifts. The clown purchases for Mopsa, in the "Winter's Tale," certain ribands and gloves of the rogue Autolycus. And in "Love's Labor's Lost," the Princess inquires of Katherine—

"But what was sent to you from fair Dumain?"

"Kate. Madam, this glove."

"Prin. Did he not send you twain?"

"Kate. Yes, madam."

And by reference to the passage previously quoted, scented gloves were in request on these occasions. Katherine de Medici of France is said to have used, for fatal purposes, this pretty fashion, and with the same cruel subtlety that converted a nosegay of fresh flowers into a death-draught for her son, to have made these graceful gifts the medium of her vengeance, by poisoning those who wore them. It was during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, in 1556, that the London Glovers' Company became incorporated; but the ordinary of the Glovers' Society of Newcastle is dated January 20, 1436, and enjoined them to go together in procession at the feast of Corpus Christi, in a livery, and play a play at their own charge.

The oldest relics of this craft extant are the gloves given by Henry VIII. to Sir Anthony Denny; a pair presented to his son's wife by Queen Elizabeth; and those given by James I. to his son Sir Edward Denny.

Gloves were formerly presented to the clergymen at weddings; and in Arnold's Chronicle (1521), one of the articles into which inquiry was to be made, in the "visitations and ordynaries of chyrches," was, "whether the curate refuse to do the solemny sacyon of matrimony before he have gifte of money, hoses, or gloves?" And a writer in the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana" observes that he remembers, at the nuptials of two parties of distinguished rank, to have seen a pair, richly fringed, presented to the bishop who officiated.

Gloves bore the symbolism before referred to, when given as tokens of betrothal, just as rings and pictures have done since. And it is supposed that the custom of presenting them at weddings originated from the old usage at bridals, when the bride-boys, who amongst moderns had displaced the par-nymphs of the Jews, were given gloves by the bride, as a compliment for their attention on her.

It is singular that the same observance should obtain at funerals, where gloves are still given away to the friends and followers of the deceased. As substitutes for the hand, do they embody the sentiment of the last act of friendship?

In Wales, in the towns and villages, at the Peak in Derbyshire, and formerly in Ireland, it was the custom to deck with white gloves, cut out of paper, the graves of young unmarried persons, or to hang them over the seat which they had occupied in church; and we remember, some years since, to have seen in the pretty church of Milton, near Sittingbourne, in Kent, England, a pair tarnished and soiled with time, hanging above the place some dear one had vacated.

In an "Argus" of 1790, under the head of Dublin, July 31, it is recorded, "Yesterday being St. James's Day, the votaries of St. James Churchyard attended in considerable crowds at the shrine of their departed friends, and paid their usual tribute of paper gloves and garlands of flowers on their graves." And every visitor to the minsters and abbey churches of England must have frequently noticed the gauntlets mouldering by the rusted helmet above the effigies of buried knighthood; those of Edward the Black Prince drop to dust beside his surcoat over his tomb in Canterbury Cathedral.

This placing of gloves and gauntlets above the graves of those who wore them reminds us of the ceremony still used at military obsequies, when the empty gloves are laid upon the coffin; and this again of the Roman custom of bearing the casque and gauntlets in their ancient marches of ceremony.

Formerly judges were not allowed to appear on the bench with gloves on—a prohibition so singular that, except upon the supposition that bribes might be concealed in them, we know not how to account for it.

That the glove was in ancient days occasionally made a receptacle for money we have many proofs; but a recent circumstance which occurred in the presence of a friend, and shows us how old customs are still mixed up and leavened with modern practices, appears too germane to our subject to be passed over.

A falconer of a certain English duke was throwing up his birds at the Devil's Dyke, Brighton, when our friend and a companion approached; the novelty of the proceeding interested them, and they inquired of the man what he would charge on the following day for a similar exhibition. The falconer informed them that he made no charge; but added that if the gentlemen chose to bring some friends with them he would fly the birds and send round the glove.

Formerly a local custom existed at rustic weddings, of collecting a little fund amongst the visitors for the benefit of the bride and bridegroom, and these contributions were placed in a glove decorated with white ribbon, and laid on the table to receive them.

Money, called glove money, was customarily given in England to servants, and barristers on circuit; and justices of the peace in that country, when called over in court by the judges, continue to give it to the officers of the court.

Clavell, the highwayman, who, upon receiving the King's pardon, wrote his "Recantation of an Ill-led Life," makes it appear that the gloves formerly presented to the judges when no prisoner was capitally convicted were given, not as now, by the sheriffs, but by such prisoners as received pardon after condemnation:—

"Those pardoned men who taste their prince's loves (As married to new life) do give him gloves."

Might not this gift be significant of their engaging to keep the laws in future, and in this case also stand for the hand itself, which, when a man gives on any agreement, intimates that he will not deceive, but stand to it?

It is in this sense that we must regard the custom of sending or dropping the glove as the signal of a challenge; people could not well shake hands upon such an arrangement, for "palm to palm is holy palmer's kiss;" so the vacant glove, and in knightly times, the gauntlet, expressed the challenge and its confirmation.

The old custom (only in late years exploded) of the Royal Champion riding into Westminster Hall at the Coronation feast, is too well known to need repetition, save as it bears upon the subject of our paper.

Nicolls tells us that, at the coronation of Queen Elizabeth, whilst her grace sat at dinner in the hall, Sir Edward Dimmoke, knight, in his championly office, came riding into the Hall in "faire complete armour," mounted upon a beautiful courser richly trapped in cloth of gold, and in the midst there cast down his gauntlet with offer to fight with him in her quarrel that should deny her to be righteons and lawful queen of the realm. At the coronation of George the Third, it is averred by more than one eyewitness, that, when the herald proclaimed the challenge, and the champion threw down his gage, the gauntlet disappeared, and a white glove remained in its place, with a written challenge; and the Jacobites aver that it was thrown by the Pretender himself, who they say witnessed the ceremony in the disguise of a woman. Sir W. Scott has introduced the incident in his novel of "Redgauntlet."

Before the art of weaving them was known, gloves were sometimes made of velvet, tiffany, and satin, as well as of various kinds of leather; at present, the skins generally made use of are chamois, kid, lamb, doe, dog, beaver, elk, and buff. Yeovil, in Somersetshire, is famous for their manufacture, as are Worcester and Woodstock; the latter for driving gloves. Of late years the silk gloves of Derby have been much in request, and manufactories of thread, cotton, worsted, and other woolen gloves, have sprung up; but for dress, kid have always been most approved.

There was formerly a proverb, that for a glove to be well made, it must be the joint production of three nations; the leather must have been dressed in Spain, the glove cut in France, and sewn in England; but to the cost of English gloves as well as ladies, France has of late years so perfected the art that at present they are as superior in point of dressing and sewing as in cutting.*

In 1840, the leather gloves imported in England for home consumption, amounted to 1,503,862 pairs, and yet the home trade supports a vast number of men, women, and children, who are employed in their manufacture, the cutting out, sewing, binding, setting on the buttons, lining, and trimming, in large manufactories (like that of Dent's, at Worcester), affording as many different branches of occupation. An instrument for glove-making has been invented, which enables the sewer to effect the utmost accuracy in this process. It was the production of an Englishman, and has realised a handsome fortune for its proprietor, being most extensively used in Paris.

Of all the gloves which we have been gossiping about, white ones are those to which most interest attaches. In the purity of these, the priest approached the altar, and the bride exchanged her vows with her betrothed; they lay upon the graves of the youthful, and were the offerings of wrongly accused innocence, or forgiven guilt; and they were also evidences of affection, and the gentle gage of faith.

White gloves were much worn by ladies in the time of Louis XIV., and long previously, for Shakspeare, in "Love's Labor's Lost," alludes to them:—

"By this white glove—how white the hand God knows;"

an expression that reminds us that the luxury of wearing gloves soon induced a desire to make them subservient to the beauty of the hand; and they were medicated, and waxed, and made of various materials to insure whiteness to the delicate member they covered. Dogskin gloves were much worn for this purpose, and Sir Kenelm Digby, who, curious in cosmetic effects, is said to have dieted his wife with vipers' broth, for the purpose of beautifying her complexion, in his treatise on natural antipathies, remarks, "We daily see dogs which have an aversion from gloves that make their ware of dogskins." Henri III. of France indulged in gloves at night for the purpose of rendering his hands more fair, a practice which a modern poet (Lord Byron) is said to have been also addicted to. But Henri likewise had his face covered with a cloth dipped in essences to improve his complexion during the same period, though he painted over it in the day. According to Evelyn, who wrote a poem on the vanities of ladies' dress in the time of Charles the Second, it was customary to wear gloves of chicken-skin by night—

"To keep their hands soft, plump, and white."

There is a mystery about these chicken-skin gloves which we cannot solve; we can scarcely understand the term literally, though it is set down that Limerick is famous for the manufacture of a kind of ladies' gloves called chicken gloves. Do those delicate bipeds, redolent of spring and asparagus, do they really render their fine outculls for such a purpose? Are there tanners who deal in such investitures, and farm-yards prolific enough to find the raw material?

London salesmen can tell us nothing of the matter, and the encyclopedists say no more than we have quoted, and thus, for aught we know to the contrary, those beautiful gloves, with their peculiar dye and elegant texture, packed in walnut shells fastened with satin ribbon, may have originally covered the bosoms of innocent birds. We say may, conscious that it is better to plead ignorance than to affect a knowledge to lead others astray.

Though the fashion of gloves from necessity can never suffer from such eccentric caprices as other articles of dress, we found them in the thirteenth century reaching to the elbow, while at present they come no further than the wrist; in our mother's time it was thought graceful to let them wrinkle on the arm; in our own the three-quarter gloves have buttoned tight upon it. Sometimes an attempt has been made to introduce again embroidery on them, and silk mittens but a few years back were worn in dress elegantly ornamented with patterns wrought in gold. We have also seen gloves from Spain, with a garniture of silver flowers and fringe, rich in its effect; but, for the appearance of the hand, commend us to the exquisitely fitting French kid glove, which, from the time of De Grammont to our own, has always retained its superiority in this respect, and been a coveted article of English ladies' dress.

The value of gloves in former days perhaps gave

* The Parisians have lately manufactured and introduced ladies' gloves made of raz skin!

rise to the daring exploit to win them which Gay alludes to in his pastoral, and the great Scotch novelist has so charmingly embodied in the "Fair Maid of Perth," who imprints a kiss on the brow of the sleeping smith, Harry Glover,

"For custom says, whoe'er this venture proves,
For such a kiss demands a pair of gloves."

With their lessened cost the usage has exploded, and is only heard of now as a remnant of the past.

Perfumed gloves were still to be found on the counters of Exeter Change when Pepys, in the security of his Bramah-lock cypher, confided to the pages of his diary his purchases of them for the charming Knipp.

Talking of scented gloves reminds us of the celebrated "Gauntti de Frangipini," a perfume so called after the inventor, the last of the Roman house of Frangipini, a Maréchal of France in the reign of Louis XIII., and because it was in the first instance applied especially to gloves. In many old family receipt books we have found various directions for scenting them, proving that perfumes were as essential to these articles then as studs are now; and, by the way, though precious stones and goldsmith's work no longer dazzle the beholder from observing the symmetry of the hand beneath this heaviness of ornament, we have seen these appendages at the wrist of a plain white glove, sparkling from one side of the London Opera House to the other, while with less good taste, and infinitely more effeminacy of affectation, the finger of a gentleman has produced as brilliant an effect from the circumstance of his wearing his ring outside his glove, a vanity which a certain celebrated leader of fashion, before he learned to feel the manliness of his own genius, is said to have indulged in even when driving and riding in the park.

At present the change of colors to suit the varying seasons is the principal alteration in gloves, and ladies' hands are as variously hued in these days as their hoods were in those of Addison; otherwise, except in the ornaments finishing them for dress, or the addition of velvet or fur tops for winter, the form of the glove is generally the same, the chief distinctions being in size, cut, and quality.

Dundee, in Scotland, is famous for gloves of a superior quality; and Nottingham and Leicester for the cotton ones so generally worn by children and the humbler class of women.

THE PIONEER MOTHERS OF MICHIGAN.

BY MRS. E. F. ELLET.

ANN ALLEN.*

THE second "Ann," who gave the village of Ann Arbor its name, came to Michigan in October, 1824, with the parents of her husband, and his brother, James Turner Allen, who has ever since resided there, and raised a large family. The Allens were from Augusta county in Virginia, and well to do in the world, and they brought several horses and other stock with them, a useful accession to the means of the little settlement. The women performed nearly all the journey on horseback, Ann Allen carrying her only child in her arms. This child is, now the wife of Dr. Waddell, and is living in Virginia. Mrs. Allen entered with a ready spirit of enterprise into the laborious duties required of the wife of a settler. As the community increased, her husband was called to fill official stations of importance. He was afterwards twice elected Senator to the Legislature; but the roving habits of his early life, like those of Daniel Boone, were in the way of his living contented in a settlement that could no longer be termed "wild," when lands further west were yet unexplored. He went to California when the gold fever was at its height, and died there. His widow returned to Virginia, but his mother still lives at Ann Arbor. The character of this excellent matron, who is often described as the ideal of a pioneer, is so remarkable as to call for a brief notice.

Coming so early to the backwoods, she had to encounter not a few dangers as well as inconveniences from the frequent visits of savages, as yet not used to the sight of civilization. In her youth she was eminently handsome, and even at the age of seventy-six retains a most prepossessing appearance, having a tall and symmetrical figure, but slightly bent, with a complexion showing the freshness of habitual health. Hers was a proud and happy bridal in the Old Dominion, and she was fondly attached to the country where her best years had been spent; but she murmured not when it became her duty to follow her husband to a distant land. He now lies buried near the spot he chose for his home, with many relatives around him; and, by the widow's direction, a place beside him is reserved for herself. Her religious faith, always sound and bright—for she had made it the staff and guide of life—has been strengthened by the chastening sorrow she has been called to endure; and the humility with which she has submitted to every painful dispensation offers a salutary lesson both to the afflicted and the prosperous. She has always been noted for the strong practical sense which fits its possessor for every event and vicissitude, in every station of life;

* This sketch was prepared for Mrs. Ellet by Miss MARY H. CLARK.

yet is her heart open and kind; her benevolent impulses being regulated at all times by sterling judgment. She is one of those persons of whom it can be said, "Place her in any situation, and she will appear well."

In her reminiscences of those early days, Mrs. Allen often speaks of two young women in particular, who did much to enliven the society of the place. One of them, Miss Tillson, undertook the charge of the school, kept in a small log house, a mile or so down the river, to and from which she and the scholars walked every day. The exposure in all weathers, and with but indifferent protection against the cold and wet, injured her health, and one evening she informed the school she should not be able to teach any longer. James, one of Mrs. Allen's grandchildren, then under her care, came running home, so out of breath he could hardly speak, and entreated his grandmamma to take the teacher to live in her house. She promised to decide after consulting her husband, who was then busily engaged in making "Michigan bedsteads" of tamarack poles stripped of the bark. Plenty of beds had been brought from Virginia; but some arrangement might be necessary for the accommodation of another inmate. However, the child's entreaty was so urgent for an answer before Miss Tillson should have dismissed her pupils and gone home, that his grandmother bade him "tell her she may come and take us as she finds us." He ran back delighted, and presently returned with the teacher, so grateful for the offer of a home which enabled her to continue her beloved occupation that, when the little boy led her in with, "Grandmamma, here is Miss Tillson," she sank upon a seat and wept for joy. This little incident throws an interesting light on the manners of that day. When asked how they enjoyed life in the privation of so many comforts, and of the society of old friends, Mrs. Allen would reply: "We were all brothers and sisters then. When my son Turner was married, he said, 'You have always given the other children a good wedding; I want you to do as well by me,' and so we invited everybody in the village, and had as good a supper as could be got up."

True to the habits of a matron of the olden time, Mrs. Allen has always shown a delicate sense of propriety in her deportment and conversation. She looks back with some pride to the days of her bellehoo, and speaks occasionally of the sixteen offers received before she was eighteen; but, with her characteristic regard for decorum, tells of the reproof she once administered to one over-forward suitor. In the mountainous parts of Virginia, where carriages were but little used, the men and women were accustomed to travel altogether on horseback. Miss Tate (afterwards Mrs. Allen) was one day in attendance at a funeral, after the conclusion of which the newly bereaved widower rode up to the side of her horse, and, to her extreme surprise, expressed a wish that she might be induced to consent to fill the place of the dear departed one whose mortal remains had just been laid in the grave. The young lady regarded him with astonishment and displeasure, and sternly forbade him to name that subject to her again under a year. Just a year from that day he proposed in due form, and was rejected!

Mrs. Allen is accustomed to express herself at all times in a manner so forcible and decisive, and at the same time with so much dignity, as to evince talent of no ordinary kind. Frequently her language rises almost to the poetical, without the least design of ornamental expression. Speaking of a grandchild who was extremely cold in her manner, she said, "I loved her much, that is, all she would let me get at to love." At another time, when a young mother, showing her little daughter, apologized for the dirt on her hands, as she had been playing in a sand heap, the matron replied, "It will do her no harm; there is always rain enough in God's heavens to wash such clean;" thus unconsciously using a figurative phrase nearly identical with the words of Shakespeare, a poet with whom she was by no means familiar. Being once asked if she had not reared a large family, she answered, "Oh no, I have only had seven children. I laid out to have no less than a dozen; but the grandchildren left motherless, whom I have brought up, perhaps make out the number." She has reared five of these, and has lived to see the third generation.

There was a single piano in the settlement, owned by a Miss Clark, now Mrs. Kingsley; and seldom did she touch the keys without unexpected listeners. Often, as a shadow darkened the window, could she discern the form of a Potawatomie Indian, accompanied perhaps by two or three squaws with their papooses. This patriarch of pianos is still extant, and stands as prim as ever upon its thin legs, a type, amongst the scores that have succeeded it, of a by-gone age, and representing something of the stately politeness and formal breeding of the ladies and gentlemen of its own date.

Some, with an obstinately rustic taste, seemed to prefer the rudest articles of furniture, used in the infancy of the settlement, to the modern improvements afterwards introduced. A housewife in Michigan, finding the men of her establishment too busy clearing to lend her much aid, set about contriving a press in which she could make cheese. She succeeded in making one in the corner of a rail fence; and it was observed that, thrifty as she was, she could not be induced, without great reluctance, to exchange this press of her own contrivance for one of more pretensions, though adopted and praised by all her neighbors.

Among the privations of the early settlers, not the least was the difficulty of hearing from the friends they had left at "the East." Not only were the mails slow and uncertain, but the postage of a letter was twenty-five cents; a fourth of a man's pay for a hard day's work. So expensive a treat could not be often indulged in; and, accordingly, it seldom happened that more than one or two letters were exchanged in the course of a year by a single emigrant family.

The burning of the prairies has often been described, and presented, in truth, a sight that might well fill an artist's imagination. Sometimes, however, accidents happened sad enough to mar the beauty of the spectacle. An enterprising and industrious young emigrant had built a comfortable house on prairie ground for himself and his sisters, one of whom had charge of it. One day, while she was alone, the brother being absent on business, she discovered that the grass was on fire, and that the devouring element was rapidly approaching. All her efforts were bent to keep it from the premises; but, finding she could do nothing to check its progress, and that the outhouses were in imminent danger, she ran to the door of her dwelling for her bonnet, threw in her apron also, which she pulled off hastily, from a woman's instinctive impulse of neatness, and, without looking back, hurried to the nearest neighbors, some three miles off, for assistance. As soon as possible, she returned with help; but they were greeted by a melancholy sight. The burning of the grass, it was evident, had not extended to the house; but the building was in flames, and past the hope of saving even an article of furniture. The poor girl then discovered that the fire must have originated from her apron, which probably concealed a spark when she threw it in; and thus she had the chagrin of knowing that her very eagerness had been the means of depriving herself and family of the only shelter they could call their own.

The mention of fire reminds us of another curious anecdote, recorded in the annals of Detroit. There was, at one time, a town ordinance that every house should be provided with a butt of water for use in case of fire, the owner being subject to a fine in case of disobedience. A widow whose neglect had been passed over several times by the inspectors, one day saw them coming on their usual errand, and, resolved that they should not have it to say they had found her cask empty, jumped into it herself. The stratagem so pleased the men that, laughing heartily, they fetched water and filled the butt for her.

Some other incidents, illustrative of the times, are mentioned by the old settlers. One tells how a large sleighing party went at night to Dexter, and how Judge Dexter figured as a seer, and told the fortunes of the company. They were very merry returning, though it was near morning, and intensely cold. A sudden breakdown took place, and one of the gentlemen was obliged to go back some distance to borrow an axe to repair the damage. Those left waiting, fearing that without some precaution they should perish with cold, spread the buffalo skins on the hard snow, and had a lively dance upon them; till the sleigh being mended, they returned to Ann Arbor without further hindrance.

The inhabitants of Detroit may remember a remarkable old woman, Mrs. Chappel by name, a true "Betty O'Flanagan," who followed in the rear of Wayne's army before the last war, and afterwards kept pushing away from civilization. At the time my informant knew her, she kept a small tavern on the Pontiac turnpike, much resorted to by the young men of the town, it being just distant enough for a pleasant ride. As the hostess was very homely, they were accustomed to call her, in jest, "Old Mother Handsome;" listening often to the reminiscences with which she was wont to interlard her preparations for supper. When grumbling at the trouble given her, she would declare that she should have been better off had "Mad Anthony" lived. She would have been a fine character for a romance, and deserves more than a mere mention, as a representative of the spirit of her day among the ruder class of settlers.

MY MOTHER.—A DREAM.

BY MARIE J. CLARE.

"There is none
In all this cold and hollow world—
No fount of deep, strong, deathless love,
Save that within a mother's heart."—HERMANN.

I DREAMED that she lay dying—
And none had power to save;
Suns rose, suns set—methought I stood
Above my mother's grave.

No heart was now with mine in life,
Like hers beneath the clay;
No loving heart! and yet no tear
Adown my cheek found way.

An icy weight was at my breast—
I gasped, convulsed, for breath;
The one I could worst spare from earth
Lay in the arms of Death.

Gone! gone! I madly raised my eyes,
And cursed God high in Heaven;
Cursed all things! for the Fiend that hour
Had will to tempt me given.

Then at my words grew black the skies—
God's heavens seemed shut from me!
From the worn spirit's depths went forth
A cry of agony.

"Jessie, dear Jessie," said a voice—
Ah! in what tones of bliss!
"Wake, dearest! 'tis a fearful dream!"
I turned to sister's kiss.

Then stealing to my mother's couch,
I watched as she calmly slept,
Until the morning stars looked on
The quiet tears I wept.

O God! if thou decree that first
Her heavenly crown be won,
Give me to pray, with blessed trust,
Thy holy will be done!

THE PHANTOM OF THE WABASH.

A BALLAD.

BY WILLIAM E. GILMORE.

"THANK God for this shelter to-night,
And the fire so cheerful and warm!
The snow falls fast, and bitter the blast;
Didst ever see such a storm?"

"And Heaven was kind to me,"
Said the weary traveler,
"That led my feet through the snow and sleet,
To find thy cottage here."

"Ay, indeed," quoth the kindly host;
"Thou hast reason for gratitude:
Hadst thou passed this, thy bed I wist
Had been in the howling wood."

"For the nearest roof to mine
One must ride all day to see;
And—nay, sit still! that scream so shrill
Is no strange thing to me!"

"God help us!" the traveler said;
"Twas a dreadful sound to hear!
Did it not seem far out in the stream?
Some one is drowning, I fear."

"Nay! go not forth from the door,
Lest thou wouldst see a sight
Thou wilt try in vain to forget again,
In the broad Wabash to-night."

"Now what is this fearful thing That I must not look upon?"

"What Heaven has sent as punishment
For a deed of murder done!"

"Tis now a twelvemonth since
To my door a stranger came;
And her he led was his wife, he said—
But I never learned his name."

"A stern and dark-browed man,
While she was wondrous fair;
And, if his wife, ne'er in my life
Saw I such ill-mated pair."

"That night fell dark as this;
The sky was overcast;
The air was chill, but very still;
The stream flowed smoothly past."

"The wife turned deadly pale
When thus the husband said—
'Our way is long, the urgency strong,
To-night we must proceed.'

"I stood by the river's side
Till the boat was out of sight;
Then I heard a plash in the dark Wabash,
And a bitter laugh that night!"

"The boat returned with him,
But he spake not a word,

Save that his wife had lost her life
By falling overboard."

"I thought of the fiendish laugh,
As we walked side by side,
And could but fear he had murdered her—
His young and lovely bride."

"We sat by the fire again,
But he showed no trace of grief;
'Twas silly, he said, to weep for the dead,
For life at the best is brief."

"He liked not my troubled look,
And walked in the open air—
A moment passed, and all aghast,
I shook for very fear."

"The sound thou heardest but now
Was but a stifled moan,
Were it compared with what I heard
That night when he had gone."

"I rushed to the river's side—
O God! what a sight to view!
The broad Wabash was all asfash
With flames of dismal hue."

"And the murdered woman's head
In the midst of the heatless blaze;
Her tresses hung all dankly strung
About her pallid face."

"Her cheeks so humid and cold,
Her lips so thin and blue,
Yea, even her eye one might descrie
Half shut and of stony hue."

"When I could turn away,
Lying prone upon the ground
The murderer, half dead with fear,
A crazed man, I found."

"A babbling idiot since,
He strays by the water-side,
And every night appear the light
And ghastly phantom bride."

"To-day, when I gave him food,
He cried, with giggling glee,
That to-night one year he'd wandered there,
And the morrow would set him free."

Then up rose the traveler:
"Now I would see this sight;
Pray, let us go amid the snow
To the water's side this night."

Together they went their way,
'Mid the snow, to the Wabash side;
The corpse of a man, all pallid and wan,
They found by the foaming tide."

FLORENCE SEFTON; OR, THE BORDER WARFARE.

BY MISS B. GARTLAND.

(Concluded from page 283.)

CHAPTER VIII.

THE morning was fine and clear, after the rainy, dark night on which Florence Sefton had pleaded so unsuccessfully for her father's life. It was about seven o'clock when an Irish servant at the fort entered the room in which Colonel Sefton had been confined since his arrest with a breakfast-tray, on which were coffee, toast, &c.; he was likewise desired to tell the prisoner that the Rev. Mr. Norris, of the Episcopal Church at Lewistown, to which he belonged, would visit him as soon as he had breakfasted. Dennis had advanced but a few paces into the apartment, when the sight of a beautiful girl seated on the side of the bed, and appearing as though the noise made by the unbarring of the door had awakened from sleep, had the effect of causing him to send forth a prolonged "Wh-e-e-w!" accompanied by the fall of the tray and the smash of china, which caused the sentry to enter, demanding, "What is the matter?"

"By Saint Pathrick, sir, it is ony jist an exchange of prisoners that has tuk place!" said Dennis.

The soldier looked with wonder at poor Florence—for it was she; then saying, "I must inform General Van Rensselaer," and causing the scattered fragments of the lost breakfast to be gathered up, he left the room with Dennis, barring it after him.

It is almost needless to explain that the twenty minutes' interview with her father, granted to Florence, had been passed in disguising him in the cloak and one of the dresses she wore. She had read and heard of such a stratagem having sometimes succeeded, and she determined, if her entreaties could not save his life, to try it. She could but fail; and perhaps would, had she not been so ably seconded by Alice. For some hours after the colonel had left the fort, she would, at every slight noise, assume the attitude of despondency that had succeeded so well in deceiving the officer when her father was going from the apartment; and it was not until near morning that she could persuade herself of the certainty of his escape. Then she arranged her dress and hair, and, throwing herself on the bed, slept soundly until roused from her slumber by the noise made in unbolting the door to admit Dennis with the breakfast. A short time elapsed after the sentry had left her, when the door was again opened, and General Van Rensselaer entered, followed by the Rev. Mr. Norris. Florence rose.

"Miss Sefton—madam!" exclaimed he, "do you know that you have drawn on your own head?"

"Any punishment you please to inflict, sanctioned by law, so that my father is saved. You cannot blame me, General Van Rensselaer, when you would not hear my prayer to save his life, if I had recourse to stratagem."

"You have placed me in a position, Miss Sefton," he replied, "in which my honor may be impeached, by supposing that I was privy to his escape. Where so much treachery and so many traitors abound, it is hard to know who is true. Your father fled to the English fort at Queenstown, I suppose?"

"He did," replied Florence.

"Pursuit is out of the question, then," he said.

"But, my dear general," said Mr. Norris, eager to assist poor Florence, "you cannot suppose any one would dare to doubt your honor? No, no, believe me, that will not be. And surely you cannot, with your kind and noble heart, blame this dear child for aiding her father to escape an ignominious death; and you will not detain her from her home?"

"The manner of this escape must first be strictly inquired into," replied the general; "and the lady must please tell me if there were any traitors in the fort who aided her plot?"

"None, none, General Van Rensselaer! As I hope to go to Heaven, there was none!" said Florence, eager to save the innocent from suspicion. "The plot, as you call it, originated with myself. My maid and my father's servants were my only assistants; and they only obeyed my orders," she added, fearful lest they might suffer, if taken.

After a pause of some minutes, the general said—

"You must excuse me, Miss Sefton, if I detain you some time longer as a prisoner." And, taking the clergyman with him, he withdrew.

Two dreary hours passed heavily by, when Mr. Norris returned, a smile brightening his venerable face, as he said to Florence—

"The general has given me permission, Miss Sefton, to take you to Sefton Hill in my gig, if you will grant me that pleasure."

Florence thanked him warmly; then throwing a large cashmere shawl—that she had worn beneath her cloak the previous night—over her head, she accompanied him, and, in a short time, was again at home.

We must now follow the colonel in his flight. Florence had informed him where the boat awaited him; and, when the carriage had arrived opposite to where she lay, he left it, and divesting himself of the cloak, bonnet, and dress in which he was disguised, he was soon safely seated in the boat, which Thornton and Minesto began to row across the stream, with as little noise as possible. As we observed before, the night was dark and rainy, which favored their escape. As they approached the shore near the English fort, they were challenged by a sentinel with, "Who goes there?" Colonel Sefton had scarcely pronounced the word "A friend," when the report of a musket was heard, and he fell back with a groan, feebly exclaiming, "I am wounded!" Thornton immediately began to call out, at the top of his voice, "Hollo! don't fire no more, you kill Colonel Sefton!" By this time they had reached the shore, and the soldier stepped down, demanding "who they were?"

"It is Colonel Sefton," repeated Thornton. "He is 'scaped from de 'Merican general, and is come o'er to de English."

The report of the piece had raised an alarm, and many now came running from the fort to know the cause, and among them was Sir Edgar Lee himself, who, when he found it was Colonel Sefton, and that he was badly wounded, expressed great anxiety and was all attention. He had him immediately removed into the fort; a surgeon was soon in attendance, who extracted only some of the charge, for it was a heavy one. His opinion was that he might linger some time, but that his recovery was impossible. The sentinel, when examined, said "that he did not hear any reply to his challenge." The fact was, the wind was high, and in a contrary direction, which might have prevented him from hearing the reply, even had he not drank more than his usual quantum.

Sir Edgar Lee, though he felt sincerely sorry for, and sympathized deeply with his wounded guest, yet could not help feeling pleasure in the thought that the accident would be the means of bringing Florence to the fort, as he could not doubt but that, when she heard of her father's dangerous situation, she would come to him without delay. The Indian and Thornton re-crossed the river as noiselessly as they had crossed it, with orders not to go where Miss Sefton would see them, or to let her know what had occurred.

It was only an hour after Florence had reached her home, under the protection of the minister, when a boat might have been seen, with a white flag, crossing from the English to the American fort. There was an officer seated in it, beside the two men who rowed it. He was sent with information to General Van Rensselaer of the dangerous condition of Colonel Sefton, and a request that he would permit his daughter to come to him. Of course, humanity forbade a refusal. The officer proceeded to Sefton Hill, and, though the intelligence was broken to Florence by Miss Aylmer—to whom he first imparted it—in the tenderest manner, yet it was a great shock. She, however, prepared herself directly to accompany him; and, notwithstanding Mary's pressing entreaty to be allowed to accompany her, she refused, telling her that Henry, at his return—which, not knowing of the accident that had happened him, they looked for hourly—would only be the more distressed if she was thus to put herself in the power of the enemy; that the tidings he would hear would be sorrowful enough, without having that pang added to them. "She would take only her faithful Alice with her." And, hearing that Minesto and Thornton had now come, she thought that Caleb, with them and three other men on the place, would render it secure, more especially as the American fort was so near. Pressing Mary to her heart, and taking an affectionate leave of the good housekeeper and servants, she was assisted into the carriage with Alice by the officer, and, in a brief time, was at the side of her father's bed.

The meeting between Colonel Sefton and his daughter we shall not attempt to describe; it was painfully affecting. We will only say that the most devoted and tender care was lavished on him by Florence, who seldom left his room, except to take the rest and relaxation that were absolutely needed to support her strength. It was only on such occasions that Colonel Sir Edgar Lee had an opportunity of seeing her, as the surgeon had forbidden visitors, or anything that would cause excitement in the room of the patient. These occasions he would watch for, until it became perfectly annoying. She could not take a short walk, accompanied by Alice, which her father would insist upon her doing, without being intruded on by Sir Edgar. If, after leaving her apartment, she retired to a small parlor, which had been assigned to her use, he would find some excuse for entering, and almost compel her to listen to his protestations of love and adoration. All this rendered her life very wretched. But a ray of hope now cheered the gloom which had surrounded her for the first two weeks of her residence at the fort: the surgeon thought it possible her father might recover. This assurance nerved Florence to bear all her trials with more resignation and hopefulness.

We must now return to Howell Meredith. He, with his trusty follower, Godlieb Pretz, had arrived at Fort Detroit safely, by avoiding places where they thought it was likely they would meet any party belonging to the enemy. It was on the night of the fifteenth of August they reached it. All day the British under General Brook had opened a heavy cannonade upon the town from the opposite bank of the river, but with little execution. Captain Meredith reported his return to General Hull, who ordered him to be admitted.

"Well, sir," said he, very abruptly, "where are the dispatches from headquarters in answer to my first, which, I suppose, must have arrived at Lewistown about the same time you reached there?"

"They had not yet arrived, your excellency," said Howell. "But General Van Rensselaer desired me to say he would forward them the moment they came."

"And why did you not wait until they did come, as was your duty to do, sir?" said the old officer, in a stern tone.

"Because I knew we were on the eve of a battle, and I hope a glorious victory, your excellency, and I did not wish to be absent from my post."

"Your conduct," he replied, "deserves arrest; but, in consideration of the motive"—and a slight sneer curled his lip—"it shall be overlooked. You may retire, sir."

Howell did retire, with his suspicions of treason more confirmed.

Brightly the beams of the morning's sun danced on the blue waters of the Detroit, as the army under General Brock crossed that stream, the scarlet uniform, with its bright gilt buttons, worn by the soldiers, with the golden epaulettes, the waving, graceful feathers, and silken sashes of the officers, and the fine manly forms, with but few exceptions, of both, contrasted fearfully with the savages who filled the boats in the rear, with the horrid war paint rendering their visages so hideous, and the glittering tomahawks and scalping-knives which they bore, to say nothing of the almost demoniac yells they set up on reaching the American shore—all which would almost cause you to believe that they were, indeed, infernal spirits clothed in flesh, instead of poor ignorant Indians, to whom the white man had taught his vices, and then bribed to slay and massacre his white brethren.

"The British soldiers, on landing, formed themselves in close column twelve deep. The Americans were advantageously disposed to receive them. The militia and volunteers were so stationed as to flank the enemy, the regulars defended the fort, and two twenty-four pounders, charged with grape-shot, were so planted as to sweep the whole British line."* Howell, by the side of his brave regiment, surveyed the approach of the enemy. Silently, and apparently without fear, they came on, as he thought, to certain death, and that fathers, husbands, sons, and brothers would be wept for in a far-off land by many a bright eye and many an aching heart. They had now advanced until within some hundred yards of the American lines, and his eye moistened as the idea presented itself to his mind of the mangled heap of dead and dying that would, in a few minutes, replace that moving mass of life, strength, and courage. There was a deep, solemn silence; every American that stood there expecting to hear the roar of the artillery instantly. At this moment, a touch on his arm caused Howell to turn.

"Captain Meredith," said Laxy O'Lear, "you are requested by his excellency, General Hull, to order your men to retire into the fort."

"What!" ejaculated Howell. "What mean you by this hoax at such a time?"

The sergeant moved further off, and then said—"They are the general's orders, sir."

In an instant, Howell, observing Hull near the fort, with several officers round him, was by his side.

"General," said he, forgetting, in his excitement, to salute his superior officer—"general, your messenger has, I believe, mistaken your orders; will you please give them to me yourself?"

"Yes, sir," he replied. "Order your men into the fort. It would be madness to resist," continued he, turning to the officers near him; "those red devils would tomahawk and scalp every man in the fort. I have certain information that Brock has sworn they should. For what do you wait, sir?" said he to Howell, as the soldiers sullenly and indignantly were marching past them. "To your post, and conduct your men into the fort."

"Never! so help me Heaven, never!" replied Howell. "I will never be a party to treason or cowardice!"

Hull grew white with rage. He half drew his sword, then replaced it, saying, in a voice of forced calmness—

"You would raise a sedition, young gentleman, would you? You will deliver your sword to Colonel Romney, who will see you conducted to the guard-house a prisoner." He then entered the fortress; the officers who had been expostulating with him followed, with the exception of Romney.

Howell, burning with indignation and contempt, was loosening his sword-belt, when that officer said to him—

"Captain Meredith, I will never take from a brave man his sword; nor will I send you to the guard-house. The enemy approach—fly! There is my horse. Tell Van Rensselaer I fear we are betrayed." And he disappeared.

There was no time to lose, the English were close at hand, and Howell, vaulting into the saddle, set spurs to the noble steed, and he flew like the wind. Several pieces were fired after him, and a ball entered the fleshy part of his arm, causing a painful, though not a dangerous wound. He kept his horse at a full gallop for several miles, when, finding he was not pursued, he dismounted and bound up his wounded arm with his handkerchief, as it had bled pretty freely. On casting his eyes back to the fort, he saw a white flag waving from its walls. "The old cowardly traitor!" said he to himself; "it is shameful!" He now traveled more slowly. As he was obliged, for his greater security, to avoid observation, he took the most unfrequented roads, going south towards Ohio. He rode all day, and, at nightfall, stopped at a comfortable farmhouse. He was much fatigued; but the people were very kind, dressed his wound as well as they could, and sent one of their boys for a surgeon, who lived at a short distance, who extracted the ball, which gave him much relief. Howell soon found they were true Americans. There was no man on the place but the old grandfather and his three grandsons, of the ages of sixteen, fourteen, and twelve; his son, their father, was at Fort Detroit; and, when they heard Howell's tale, both the old man and his son's wife expressed much grief and anger. After a good supper, Howell retired to a nice, clean bed, and slept soundly, notwithstanding his wound and the exciting events of the day.

He was greatly surprised, on descending from his chamber in the morning, to see Gottlieb Pretz busily engaged in constructing a squirrel-trap for the youngest boy. To Captain Meredith's questions as to "how he had escaped?" he gave a long account, which we may perhaps relate at a future time; at present, the reader must excuse us. We will merely say that he did escape, or he would not have been there. To Howell's question of "how he had traced him so accurately?" he replied—

"Why, capt'in, you don't 'pose I lived so long in old Kentuc' and larnt nothin'? I kin foller a trail of ither horse or man as well as any red skin that ever carried a scalpin'-knife."

After breakfast, when they were about leaving, Howell remembered that Gottlieb had no horse, and he was much pleased when the old farmer consented to dispose of one, not a very swift, but still a tolerably good animal. They still kept a southerly direction, Captain Meredith's intention being to enter Ohio, keeping as closely as consisted with safety along the southern shore of Lake Erie, until he should judge it safe to take a boat for Buffalo, from whence he could soon arrive at Lewistown.

CHAPTER IX.

We must now retrograde a little in our story. The reader will remember our having related that Lasy O'Lear's stock and trade of hardware had been purchased by his friend, Red Ashman. It so happened, after the trusty sergeant had left Lewistown for Detroit, after having betrayed Colonel Sefton, that Minesto, wishing to purchase some fishing-hooks, went into the shop now kept by Ashman. After selecting as many as he wanted, he offered a fifty cent piece in payment. Ashman took it, and, opening a drawer which was placed under the counter, in looking for change, he drew it very far out. The quick eye of the Indian perceived a small pouch in it, very gayly embroidered with the stained quills of the porcupine. He reached over, and, taking it in his hand, held it up before him, saying—

"Handsome! good! The white man's squaw make it for him, eh?"

"No," replied Ashman; "my 'squaw' don't make such things. So hand it here, and take your change," offering him the money.

But Minesto still continued to examine it. While this was passing, a customer, who appeared to know Ashman, had entered the shop, and, looking at the pouch, said—

"It is, indeed, mighty fine! You got it from some of the Ingins, I suppose?"

"No; it was given to me by my friend, Sergeant Lasy O'Lear. Let me see," said he, pausing, as if trying to remember, "it is three—yes—nearly four years ago, since he made me a present of it. It was worked by some of the Ingins, I suppose, as it was a red skin who gave it to him, he told me, for some kind office he had done him."

Minesto lost not a word; but, when Ashman had concluded, observed, still holding up the pouch—

"White man sell? Minesto will buy. How much?"

"Well, I don't care to sell it; but, since you have taken such a notion to it, you may have it for a dollar."

"One dollar," repeated the Indian—"one dollar. Minesto bring to-morrow." He then laid it down, and left the shop.

Early the next morning, he took his fishing-tackle, and, repairing to that part of the river where he usually caught the most fish, Minesto threw his line in the water, and had already taken one or two fine fish, when he observed the same man he had met in Ashman's shop approaching, evidently prepared for fishing. He advanced laughing, and asked the Indian "if fish were plenty;" and, on receiving an answer in the affirmative, he laid down his rod, and seated himself on the stump of a tree, as if to rest.

"I was telling Ashman, after you had left his shop yesterday," said he, "that I thought you were the same Indian who came to the sign of the King George, in Queenstown, about four years ago, when I was barkeeper there. I remember well, it was the very day I left to go to New York, and Mr. Lasy O'Lear came in just before you, and told me how that he wanted to cure an Ingin of drinking brandy, that you were a fine feller, and he thought it a pity you should become a drunkard—he belongs to meetin', Mr. Lasy O'Lear does, and is very pious; so he wanted me to do a good deed, and to put some powder, that he gave me in a paper, into the liquor when you asked me for it, and it would make you hate brandy all your life. So I put it in, 'cause I knowed that he wouldn't give you anything to hurt you. And so I thought I'd just ask you if you do hate brandy now, or if you ever drink any?"

During this long explanation, Minesto had stood leaning with his back to a large tree; the line, which was in the water when the stranger appeared, still remained there, the tip of the rod resting on the shore; the handle he appeared to hold unconsciously. He was standing a few feet in front of the man, and a statue could not have appeared more motionless while he was speaking, and, were it not for an expression of triumph which lighted his dark eye, he might have been taken for one.

"Did it really make you hate brandy?" continued the stranger, not receiving an immediate answer.

"Minesto does not drink fire-water now," returned the Indian, calmly. "It is not good for the red man; it makes him a fool, that his enemies may laugh."

"Well, then," said his questioner, springing up, "I'm glad that it had a good effect; and, for that kind turn I done for you, you must now show me where you get your bait."

Minesto pointed to the place, some paces farther down; and, after having caught some six or eight largo fish, he left his companion and took his way to Lewistown, where he soon disposed of them; then repairing to Ashman's, he laid down his dollar, and received the pouch.

He had now found out that which, in seeking to discover, had for nearly four years kept him from his tribe and friends. He felt joyful and elated at the discovery; for the certainty of revenge is the sweetest moment of an Indian's existence. Laxy O'Lear was the robber and would-be murderer. It was, indeed, so. Our readers will recollect that, on the day the pic-nic party discovered Minesto in the wood, he came down from an opposite direction inquiring for Colonel Sefton. He had that morning, after having had the liquor of his intended victim drugged, traced him to the wood, where he saw him lie down. From where he stood, he could likewise see the party of the Seftons and Merediths coming to the valley. The thought crossed his mind of his having a message from Captain Henry to Colonel Sefton, stating "that he would be at Sefton Hill that night;" and he thought this a favorable opportunity to prevent any suspicion of his having perpetrated the deed he intended to commit, by coming an opposite way from that where the Indian lay; and, after he had seen the colonel, taking the road to Queenstown, which he followed until he was certain he was out of sight. He then took a circuitous path, which brought him again to the wood; when, after gazing some time on Minesto, he began to try to extract the pouch, in which was the money he had received that morning from a New York merchant for his skins, and which was placed in a sort of bag or pocket made in his blanket; but he did not find this an easy task, as the Indian was lying upon it. After several vain attempts to draw the blanket from under him, Minesto moved, and partly opened his eyes. Laxy O'Lear immediately, in his fear of being discovered, drew his pistol, and shot him, as he thought, dead. The report at first alarmed him, lest it should bring some one to the spot; but soon he felt reassured, and conjectured rightly that it would be thought, by those who should hear it, to proceed from some hunter. He now made another attempt, and was successful, possessing himself of the pouch. He retraced his steps, and returned to Queenstown.

It is not likely that he would have been so imprudent as to give it to Ashman, had not the Indians been in the habit of bringing such to Lewistown to sell; nor could Minesto have known it at sight, had it not been a figure, which he himself had arranged by cutting out from pictures, which had been given to him, an otter and buffalo, surrounded by the flowers he best liked in them, and giving them to his sister to work for him. Minesto had never liked Laxy O'Lear; but that it was he who had attempted to murder and had robbed him, never occurred to his mind. It was but a few days previous to the visit Howell paid to Sefton Hill that he had made the discovery. His thoughts now were bent on revenge. He did not intend to follow O'Lear to Detroit; he would wait his time.

In the mean while, the news of the disgraceful capitulation, by which the whole territory of Michigan was given up to the British by its cowardly governor, with the fort and the brave men he commanded, who were made prisoners of war, spread through the Union, and excited universal indignation. It, in a manner, left the whole western frontier exposed to the enemy, and their dreadful allies, the Indians. It had also the effect of rendering the inhabitants and British on their border more daring; indeed, the war on the frontier now seemed to partake of all the horrors of a civil one. On both sides of the border the militia were in service, and there was scarcely a house, village, or town, on either side of the Niagara, which was not destroyed by one party or the other, or the scene of some skirmish. Fathers fought against their daughters' husbands, neighbor against neighbor, all ties of kindred and friendship were severed, and the contest seemed to be carried on with more hatred and rancor than if it was between utter strangers.

Shortly before this dreadful state of things, Lieutenant Sefton returned to Lewistown. He was still obliged to wear his arm in a sling. Grief and mortification, at Mary's recital of all that had taken place during his absence, filled his heart, though she tried to soften it as much as possible. They had no means of hearing anything from Florence or the colonel; and, as Henry was still unable to use the arm that he had broken, when thrown by his horse, and was yet weak from the effects of his late illness, General Van Rensselaer, who had received him most kindly, gave him a furlough until he would be able to bear arms, and advised him to conduct Miss Aylmer, as speedily as possible, to New York, where she would be in safety. Henry, who loved his sister tenderly, and now, if possible, more than ever, felt much grieved at being obliged to leave without hearing anything from her or his father; but, even did he remain, in his present condition, he could afford her no assistance, and he would only endanger the safety of Mary. They were, accordingly, privately married in the Episcopal Church of Lewistown, by the pastor, Rev. Mr. Norris, and immediately set off for New York.

During all these transactions, Caleb and Thornton had not been idle. After Colonel Sefton's flight, they had talked over the state of affairs, and what might probably take place, and the result was that, in the lower part of Mr. Meredith's garden, they had dug a hole, or, more properly, a cellar, in which the plate and most valuable articles of both Sefton Hill and Arcadia were deposited, in large boxes, packed with wool, cotton, and tow, to preserve them from the damp. They then placed a layer of boards over them, some few feet below the surface of the ground, and then filled up the cavity with mould, which they covered with sods. This had been done under the direction of Miss Aylmer before Henry's arrival. Mr. Meredith had been suffering much from gout, and, even had he wished, could not have visited Lewistown. It was Henry's intention to place his bride under his protection and that of his wife, and, as soon as he regained his strength, to return to the army.

September was drawing to a close, when Howell Meredith and Gottlieb reached the fort. Captain Meredith had much to listen to that was distressing; but that which wrung his heart was the situation of Florence in the enemy's camp, and his proud rival's power. Preparations were now being made for an attack on Queenstown, in which none took a more active part than Howell. It appeared to him as if they might be made far more expeditiously, and as if the day on which they were to make the assault would never arrive.

And wearily and sadly had the days passed to Florence Sefton since the surgeon, who had raised her hopes by thinking it possible her father might recover, was compelled, in answer to her repeated inquiries, to say that, unless a ball, which had lodged in his side, could be extracted, there was no hope of his living much longer, and that the operation would be attended with considerable danger. The agony Colonel Sefton now endured caused him to decide on having it performed; and, though he had never been a selfish man, yet his sufferings were so great that he would often forget what his daughter had endured for his sake, and reproach her that "she had not accepted the proposals of Sir Edgar Lee, which would have prevented all the misfortunes that had occurred." Though Florence felt this injustice keenly, yet she would try to soothe him, by kindness and attention, into a better mood, in which she generally succeeded, when he would regret his unkindness, beg her to forgive him, caress and call her his dear child, and the preserver of his life.

The operation was performed, and, as the surgeon feared, he sank under it; the great loss of blood was too much for him in his weak state. Taking Florence's hand in his own, he said, feebly—

"Bless you, my sweet, my noble child! You have your father's consent to wed Howell Meredith. I am sorry that I opposed it. Tell Henry I bless him and Mary." And, in a few moments, he expired.

Florence's grief was intense; she had loved her father with an heartfelt, deep, devoted love. She was carried from his chamber insensible; and it was some days before Alice could persuade her to take sufficient nourishment to support nature. Sir Edgar Lee was unremitting in his inquiries and attentions; every dainty was procured that could tempt her appetite; and he requested Alice to tell Miss Sefton "her father had been interred in the burial-ground of the Episcopal Church at Queenstown, and every respect paid to his memory, and that anything and everything in the fort was at her command."

After Florence had recovered from the first shock occasioned by her father's death, she began to think of her own situation, and of requesting Sir Edgar to permit her to return to her friends. She had heard nothing from Howell nor Henry since she had entered the British fort, and was extremely anxious on account of both. He had several times requested to be admitted, and she told Alice the next time he came to ask him in, and to remain herself in the apartment, which she did. Sir Edgar thought he had never seen Florence look so incomparably lovely. Her deep mourning contrasted finely with the alabaster fairness of her skin. She had become somewhat paler and thinner; but, if her beauty was less dazzling, it was more touching, at least so thought her suitor. He advanced bowing, and, with a look meant to express deep sympathy, "hoped he had the pleasure of seeing Miss Sefton recovering from her indisposition, and the grief in which he participated with her." Florence replied that "she felt better; thanked him for all his kindness and attention to her father, and requested, as she had nothing now to detain her at the fort, that he would permit her, with Alice, to return to her friends." Lee's brow grew dark, though he endeavored to smooth it, and affect a look of surprise at what he heard.

"Why, surely, Miss Sefton," said he, "you cannot mean what you say, when you know it was your dear father's wish that I should have the happiness, the unspeakable happiness, of being your protector for life. No, no, my dear girl, that is a hope that I cannot resign. And," continued he, seeing that Florence was about to interrupt him, "it is upon this very subject that I wished to speak to you. You will not, I hope, my sweet Florence, deem me precipitate or indecorous, so soon after the death of your dear father, to propose that our marriage take place in a few days at farthest. This gloomy fort is no place for so fair a being, and it is my wish to convey you from it as soon as possible. General Sir Isaac Brock has appointed me as messenger, with dispatches to England, and another officer takes my command here; then, my lovely!"—

"Stop, Sir Edgar Lee!" interrupted Florence, who, pale as a marble statue, had sat listening to him. "Stop; I cannot hearken to language of this kind addressed to me by you. I have already told you that I never will be your wife. I have appealed to your generosity, and told you also that I was the affianced wife of another; I have begged of you, as a nobleman and as a gentleman, to desist from this persecution, for so I consider it; but all in vain. Now hear me, Sir Edgar, when I solemnly assure you that no power on earth shall ever compel me to give my hand to a man I consider void of every gentlemanly principle, and that I never will be your wife."

Sir Edgar Lee had turned red and white alternately, while Florence spake. When she had finished, he rose, saying, in rather a sarcastic tone—

"You will excuse my differing from you, Miss Sefton, when I solemnly assure you that, in less than a fortnight, you will be my wife!" Then, bowing, he left the apartment.

When he was gone, Florence burst into tears, which she indulged for some moments; then, reproaching herself for her weakness, she entered her chamber and implored the protection of Him who can deliver from all evil, and who is a sure refuge in distress, pouring balm on the agonized heart when it cries to Him for mercy; and Florence felt it to be so.

On the thirteenth of October, a few days after Sir Edgar had visited Florence, an alarm was given that the Americans were in motion, preparing to cross the river and attack the town and fort. All was bustle and preparation. One thousand of our men, led on by Colonel Van Rensselaer, crossed the Niagara in open boats, the English pouring a heavy fire on them as they approached; but on they came, swiftly and fearlessly, and effected a landing. Van Rensselaer led on his men to the attack, and, in the onset, was wounded. He was conveyed to the boats. Colonel Scott then, with his brave regiment, pressed forward to the assault of the fortress under a galling fire. They were repulsed, and driven back. Again they rushed on after their noble leader, and a breach was effected.

"Captain Meredith," said Colonel Scott, who had observed the daring and bravery which he displayed, "carry that breach for me. I leave it to you." The colonel had directed his own attention to another point of attack.

"On, my brave fellows!" cried Howell, "on! Think of the honor of your country; think of De-troit, and redeem that honor!"

The men replied with a shout, as he led to the breach, where the conflict was fierce and bloody. Hand to hand—for they fought now with the bayonet—they encountered the enemy, who were driven back with great slaughter, and an entrance effected. At the same time, Colonel Scott had made and carried a breach in a different part. The fort was taken, and the British surrendered at discretion.

During the conflict, Florence had remained with Alice in her apartment. The cries of the assailants, the roar of artillery, and the crash of falling walls, with the shouts of the victors, they heard distinctly. But who were the victors? that was the question. Poor Florence's heart beat tumultuously when she heard a well-known voice—a voice that seemed to proceed from one possessed of the lungs of a Stentor—cry, "Hurrah! free trade and sailors' rights! Down with the Britishers!" It was Gotlieb Pretz; she could not be mistaken; and she knew Howell must be there, or his faithful follower would not.

At this moment the door was thrown open, and Sir Edgar Lee rushed in. Seeing a large shawl on the sofa, he seized it, and, throwing it around Florence, he said—

"Come, Miss Sefton; this place is no longer safe for you."

"Any place where my countrymen are is safe for me. I will not go!" she replied.

"You shall not choose!" said he, catching her up in his arms.

"Alice! Alice!" cried Florence, "save me!"

Sir Edgar had reached the door; and, as Alice flew after her mistress, whom he grasped firmly with one arm, he put her back with the other, closed the door, and, drawing the bolt on the outside, flew with his fair burden through an entry that led to a private door in the rear of the fort, of which he had the key, and through which he passed; and, as it shut with a spring lock, he was not detained by having to fasten it, or apprehensive of pursuit from that side. He took his way along the Niagara, but at some distance up from the stream, the fort itself serving to shield him from being seen, as the combat had raged chiefly in the front and northern side of the fortress. He continued this path for about half a mile, when, descending a small hill, at the foot of which the river took a bend, nearly hidden from the fort, he stopped, and two men leaped from a boat on its waters, and advanced to meet him.

"Is all ready?" said Sir Edgar.

"All, your lordship," replied the shorter of the two. "And I've got my trusty friend, Ashman, to help me row."

"Very well, Mr. Lazy O'Lear. In, in, and row for your lives; there is no time to lose," said he, seating himself, with the now insensible girl, in the boat.

Florence had continued to call for help while they were in the fort; but, when she felt herself conveyed away from it, she knew not whither, and so completely in the power of Sir Edgar, her senses left her.

In the mean time, Howell, the moment that an entrance was effected, and the victory sure, had flown through the fort, seeking in every room for Florence. At length, he came to the one in which Alice was confined, and the door of which she was vainly endeavoring to open. He unbolted it, and, seeing Alice, an exclamation of joy burst from his lips, as he was now certain of having found Florence.

"Where is Miss Sefton? Where is Florence?" said he.

"He has carried her off, Captain Meredith. Sir Edgar Lee has forced her away with him," she said, weeping; then, observing the blood oozing from under the sleeve of his uniform, she continued, "But you are wounded!"

He had, indeed, been wounded with the thrust of a bayonet, and in the same arm in which he had been shot when fleeing from Detroit. It is a vulgar saying that "misfortunes seldom come singly;" and Howell, having been wounded twice in the same arm, seemed to prove the truth of the proverb. He paid no attention to Alice's remark of his being wounded, but rushed out, and along the same entry through which Sir Edgar had passed, and reached the outer door, which, though furnished with heavy bolts, and was of great thickness, was now only fastened by its spring lock. Gottlieb Pretz, who had followed Howell in his search through the fort, now appeared, and, having a hatchet in his belt, soon severed the lock from the door. They followed the path in the direction of the river, and, when they had reached the small hill we have before spoken of, plainly saw the boat containing the fugitives. There was no other boat near in which they could pursue them; and, as Howell, almost frantic, ran along the bank, followed by Gottlieb, he suddenly stopped, "Good Heavens, the whirlpool!" he exclaimed, and bounded forward to throw himself into the stream. He could not see her perish without trying to rescue her; but Gottlieb caught him, and, struggling to keep him back, saying—

"Don't be so foolish, capt'in, as to throw away your life for a gal. You can't swim with your wounded arm; and, if you could, there's no how you could save her. But stop," he continued, "I see the Ingin. If anybody on airth can save her, he can."

This arrested Howell's attention, and, looking in the direction pointed out by Gottlieb, saw the black head of Minesto occasionally appear above the surface of the water.

"There's narer an oter that ever swum in water can keep up with that red skin; and, as for stayin' under water, you'd think sometimes that he was a takin' a nap at the bottom of the river," said Gottlieb.

Howell continued to advance some paces, looking, with an agony that cannot be described, on the danger of her in whom his whole heart was centered.

Those in the boat had seen their peril, and were now making ineffectual attempts to alter her course. A moment more, she had entered the fatal circle, and was whirled round with almost the velocity of lightning. Florence, a few moments before, had recovered from her insensibility, and, seeing Howell, she stretched out her arms to him, calling wildly for aid. This was too much for the young officer; he made a spring forward, and fell fainting on the sward. Loss of blood—for his wound was still bleeding—and the anguish he endured, had overcome him. The boat had now described about half of a second circle, when her course was arrested. A swarthy form had risen, as if by enchantment, from the water, and, holding the boat with almost the strength of an Hercules with one hand, while from the other a glittering battleaxe descended and clove the skull of the unfortunate Lazy O'Lear nearly in two. "A great brave strikes not twice!" said Minesto; and, before we can relate it, throwing the axe in the stream, he had caught Florence in his arms, saying, "The Yenghese chief can tell the great cave spirit that Minesto sends him the pale-faced robber!" He let go his hold on the boat, which, whirling rapidly round, in a few moments was swallowed up in the dreadful abyss, almost before its occupants could realise their situation. He then swam with Alice to the opposite shore.

The whole scene had passed with the rapidity of thought. His movements had been so quick, so sudden, as to cause even Gottlieb Pretz to doubt their reality. He rubbed his eyes, exclaiming, "Well, if that red critter don't go ahead of anything I ever seed! I'm right glad the gal's saved!" he continued, as he saw Minesto reach the opposite shore in safety with Miss Sefton. He now began to turn his attention to Howell. Perceiving the blood, for the first time, that flowed from his arm, he removed his coat and bandaged it with his handkerchief; then, taking some water in his cap from the river, he bathed his face and temples, saying—

"Cheer up, capt'in, the gal's safe and sound on t'other side of the river. Didn't I tell you the red skin could do it?"

Captain Meredith soon revived; and, hearing a full account of Florence's deliverance, scarcely felt the pain of his wound.

"But look," said Gottlieb; "if there ain't Caleb and Thornton! Yes; and the nigger's got his wife with him. So, you see, capt'in, the lady's got plenty of folks to look arter her. But how that red skin could have knowned that even a Britisher should have been such a fool, when he was a carrying off the gal, as to bring her right down to the whirlpool, that goes ahead of my understandin'."

The river at this point is, as we have already observed, very narrow, and Howell could distinctly see that every attention was being paid Florence. He now complied with Gottlieb's persuasions to return to the fort, and have his arm dressed by a surgeon.

"We've got both sides of the river now, capt'in," said Gottlieb, on their way back to the fort; "we've let the Englishers see that if old Hull warn't no more fit to be a general than I'm to be a president, all the Americans warn't jist like him, the old cowardly critter, and that we know how to pepper their jackets for 'em when we're on'y let.—Hurrah! Free trade and sailors' rights," shouted he as they met some soldiers coming from the fort, whom he knew belonged to Captain Meredith's company, "we're the boys that can whip the inemy; and now three cheers for our gallant capt'in." The men gave them heartily, and then three more for the brave Colonel Scott, who now commanded the place; and as Howell's head ached from fatigue and excitement, he was glad to escape into the fort from their noisy demonstrations of joy.

As our readers are probably as much puzzled as Gottlieb Pretz to understand why Sir Edgar Lee should have taken Florence to the "Whirlpool," we will explain. On the surrender of Fort Detroit to the British, General Brock had some communication to make to Sir Edgar, and had employed Lasy O'Lear as the most certain messenger he could employ, knowing that he could creep through the country like a weasel, almost without being seen. On his arrival at Queenstown, Sir Edgar, whose whole anxiety was centered in Florence, and who had only, as we have stated before, returned to America on her account, now daily expected an attack from the Americans under General Van Rensselaer, and, thinking it would not be safe to trust to the "fortune of war," determined, in case of a defeat, to secure the means of flight with her. He found it would be totally impracticable to descend the Niagara to Lake Ontario, as he wished to do, as it would have to be done in face of the enemy; besides, he would be obliged to pass the American fort at Lewistown, and an escape by land seemed equally impossible: he therefore proposed to Lasy O'Lear to have everything in readiness, and the boat at the bend in the river, as soon as the Americans should begin the attack, "in order," as he observed, that "if the Yankees should prove successful, he might have the pleasure of carrying away the only prize he thought worth fighting for on this side of the Atlantic."

Minesto had, from the day on which he discovered who it was had robbed and intended to murder him, remained almost entirely on the Canada side of the border, as he was well known both at Queenstown and Lewistown, and took part with neither party. Very quiet, and generally alone, he passed unnoticed or at least unsuspected. He was now much about the English fort, with fish or game to dispose of, but he seldom, if ever, lost sight of Lasy O'Lear. A few evenings before the battle he had heard Sir Edgar tell the former that he wished him to meet him at the bend in the river. Minesto repaired to the place before the appointed time, and having with an Indian's sagacity and cunning found a hiding-place in the branches of an immense oak, that grew near the bend, he was not disappointed when his intended victim and the baronet met under it, and thus he became possessed of the whole plot. On the morning of the attack on Queenstown, he had met Lasy O'Lear in one of the passages of the fort, looking for Sir Edgar Lee, to ask him some question which he had forgotten until then, relating to their flight. Minesto held in one hand a bottle, in the other a small cup made of horn, from which he appeared to have just drained the last drop. The Indian, who had watched the traitor closely, knew that he well loved brandy, so that he could take it without its being known: he therefore came up to him, at the same time pouring some liquor from the bottle into the cup, saying, as he held it toward him—

"Will white man no drink? it make him strong—he kill his enemy—he laugh at him."

"Well, I don't know that it is right to take it—it is what I never do; but, as we are going to have a battle, perhaps it may do me good," and he drank it to the dregs. "Thank you, red skin," he said; "and now tell me if you know where is Sir Edgar Lee?"

"The Yenghese chief is with his braves," said Minesto, pointing to a room on the left, to which Lasy O'Lear proceeded, while he, leaving the fort, walked rapidly along the bank of the river until, at the foot of the hill, he plunged in and soon swam to the opposite shore, where he found Caleb and Thornton with his wife, who, hearing they were going to try and rescue Miss Sefton, insisted on being there.

Minesto now having taken from the boat (which lay in the nook we have already described, and by the trees where Colonel Sefton deposited his letters) a long thick rope, wound it several times round the trunk of one of those trees, then taking the other end, he passed it twice round his waist; he then again entered the stream, directing Caleb and Thornton to let out the rope until he should have reached the whirlpool, and was within its first circle. They did so, and drew him from the vortex back into the stream. This he did in case he should be drawn into the whirlpool, that by means of the rope they might rescue him. The experiment he found would succeed; he could save Miss Sefton and take revenge on his enemy at the same time. The liquor he had given Lasy O'Lear contained an Indian poison that, after it had been taken a certain time, would produce insanity and the most excruciating agony before it caused death. It had begun to take effect on Lasy O'Lear even before Sir Edgar appeared with Florence; he felt some pain and dizziness, but thought it would pass off. After they had rowed some way, Ashman warned him to be careful they came not too near the whirlpool; but he only answered him with a wild glare of the eye and a stronger pull at the oar toward the fatal chasm. Sir Edgar's attention had been taken up with trying to revive Miss Sefton; and when Ashman called on him to notice the course they were taking, it was too late.

The chemise, or under garment, reaches to the throat, and has full, round sleeves. The bodice of the jupe is so covered with lace, embroidery, chains, and buttons of brass and silver, that the real material of which it is composed is scarcely perceptible. Frequently, too, the throat is surrounded with a broad frill, lying flat upon the bosom, not unlike the bands worn in England in the reign of Charles II. The stockings are always white and fine, and the shoes neat.

The women of Soleure are distinguished by a neat and elegant straw hat, fastened on to the head with a frill of black lace. Their hair is curled in front, and they frequently have a black handkerchief round the throat; a black petticoat, a green and scarlet bodice, and scarlet ribbons in their shoes. The upper jupe is often black, with a red border round the bottom; it just reaches to the knees, and below it are seen about two inches of a white under-petticoat, edged with pink. The white stockings are gartered with colored ribbons, with long ends; the sleeves of the shift are full, and cover the arms to the elbows. A large white muslin cap, with a plaited border, is often worn.

Near Bâle, the only head-dress is a frill of black lace, pinned into the plait of hair which surrounds the head. The petticoats are longer, and of a dark color, with a gayly striped bodice and handkerchief.

In the Grisons, the paysannes wear becoming black lace caps, which are pointed upon the forehead, but allow the hair on the temples to be seen, and are tied under the chin. They often have red stockings with white clocks, an orange bodice laced with green over a blue stomacher, a purple cloth petticoat bordered with green, a striped handkerchief and apron, and long white sleeves.

In Zurich, a white chemisette, which meets the bodice, and is finished at the throat with a frill, and the sleeves of which form three large puffs, is worn; the hair, which is plaited, hangs down the back, and has black lace entwined with it.

In the small canton of St. Gall, the head is frequently uncovered, the hair being made into one large plait on the back of the head, and adorned with long gold or silver pins. On Sundays, a pretty little cap made of white muslin, lined with green silk and with a small crimson crown, is frequently worn; it has a neat and becoming appearance. The hair is arranged quite flat upon the temples, and very little of it is allowed to be seen. The top of the chemise is often finished round the neck with a full frill, not unlike a ruff. On fête days, a neat little short jacket is worn; it is quite open in front, so as to show the stomacher, and is bordered with colored ribbons.

In Uri, the hair is worn in ringlets, and a pretty little straw hat, decked with bows of colored ribbons, is coquettishly perched on one side of the head. The striped petticoats are long, the bodice without a stomacher, and adorned with a silver chain, the stockings scarlet, and large buckles in the shoes.

In Unterwalden, the hair is drawn back from the forehead, leaving it quite bare; behind, it is formed into a broad plait, adorned with several gold pins, that stand round the head like stars. The rest of the dress resembles that in most of the other cantons.

In Appenzell, the bodice boasts every variety of color, and the petticoat is generally bright scarlet, with white stockings and black shoes. Beneath the stomacher and bodice is a kind of brown vest, fastened round the throat with a necklace. The hair hangs in small curls on the temples and neck, and a cap of black velvet adorns the head; the crown fits quite tight, and two black lace wings rise from the sides, and are supported by a crimson ribbon passed through them.

In Zug, the hair is curled in front, and a large straw hat is placed on the top of the head. A large white frill lies flat over the bosom, and the petticoat is frequently black for half its length, while the other half is blue or red; the stockings are colored, and the bodice gayly embroidered.

In Fribourg, the bodice is replaced by a long apron of white linen, which covers the front of the body of the dress; the petticoat is very long, the sleeves white, and above the top of the apron is seen a black and scarlet neckcloth, with a rosette in front. The hair is arranged in two plaits down the sides of the face, and the head is covered with a large straw hat, trimmed with black velvet.

Near Thurgovia, the paysannes' cap is very simple, being a tight caul of colored silk, with a frill of black lace round it: the hair is curled. The little brown jacket, with its blue stomacher and yellow bodice laced with scarlet, has a very pretty effect, which is increased by a yellow petticoat and a red sous jupe, bordered with black or green.

At Tessin, a long brown great-coat is frequently worn by the women; the broad-brimmed hat is tied on with a colored handkerchief, the petticoat is ornamented with fringe, and not unfrequently the paysannes are seen with bare feet and ankles.

At Oberhasli, straw hats are worn, with very long petticoats, shoes trimmed with scarlet, gay bodices, and colored aprons.

In the Valais, the usual mixture of gay colors is seen in the costume, but the petticoat is larger than in most of the other cantons, while the neat white sleeves, which are full and short, and the snow-white stockings and black shoes, give a picturesque appearance to the dress, which is heightened by the curiously shaped little straw hat, decorated with flowers and ribbons, and placed so as to show a broad plait of the hair which peeps from beneath it. Sometimes the hat is nearly as flat as a plate, surrounded with bows of ribbon and edged with black velvet.

At Neuchâtel and Geneva, probably from the visits of numerous foreigners, the paysannes have abandoned their national costume, and generally appear in gowns, caps, and shawls, of a French make.

In the Pays de Vaux, the bodice is worn without a stomacher; it is often green, the jupe striped in white, scarlet, and blue, the apron of snowy linen, fastened with a pink ribbon, and a pink fêche over the neck completes the dress. The large straw hat is placed on one side, and within it is a cap of black lace, which sets off the complexion most becomingly. The crown of the hat is curiously shaped.

Near Gougisberg, the head is adorned with a colored handkerchief, twisted round it like a turban. The little black jupe, bordered with scarlet, does not reach to the knees, which are uncovered, the stockings being gartered below them. The shoes have large red rosettes, the bodice is scarlet; above it the chemise reaches to the throat, where it is fastened with a black and scarlet collar; over this is worn a brown jacket with long sleeves, and a white apron.

ROME.

BY HELEN HAMILTON.

SHE lies beneath the South's resplendent skies,
Earth's royal purple, faded though its dyes,
Still folded closely o'er her silenced heart;
And all the radiant gems of lofty art
Set like a diamond upon her head—
Yet Rome is dead!
Though green around her grows the orange grove,
And glowing bend the azure skies above,
The enemy doth sit within her gate,
And she is desolate.

Instead of crowns, the death-damp gems her brow;
Instead of sceptres, chains are on her hands,
And through her kingdom sweep the Austrian's bands
Her sons are fettered now.

Heard'st thou thy children's moan? Rome, raise thy head!
Ah, Rome is dead!

Yet glorious art thou, Rome!
More beauteous in thy desolation,
More queenly in thy mournful lamentation,
Than other cities in their new-fledged glory;
For on thy brow the hand of History
Hath placed a diadem, whose light shall blaze
Adown the Future, with unclouded rays.
Long after Time hath crumbled tower and dome,
Thy name shall live, proud Rome!
Thy name shall live, O crushed and fallen Rome!

THE CAMPBELLS AND THE CLIFTONS.

A DOMESTIC TALE.

BY MISS META M. DUNCAN.

Our limits will not allow us to follow minutely Edward's career. It will be sufficient to say that he found his uncle quite as "odd" a person as he had any reason to expect, and that the task of pleasing him did not appear by any means an easy one. However, with patience, good humor, and unflinching perseverance, his task became light; and, as his character developed itself, Edward no longer felt these asperities. Either he grew accustomed to them, or they became softened down. Edward believed the latter to be the case, for he soon learned to regard the singular old man with a sincere affection, and to treat him with a frank confidence which must have often made him secretly smile. Edward had about him that feminine craving for affection, which may have been partly traceable to his peculiar education by a woman of great tenderness of nature. Certain it is, he never drew near to any one whom he liked and respected, without exhibiting this trait in his character. On his arrival in New Orleans, his uncle, who was an extensive shipping merchant, placed him in a desirable situation in his counting-house, with a handsome salary. Mr. Fairly was a close observer of character, and he watched his nephew narrowly for many months. When he discovered that half the money which he had sent to Edward in Philadelphia had been left behind with his step-mother, and that monthly more than half his pay was received in a draft on Philadelphia for the use of that mother, he, without comment, doubled his salary. At the expiration of two years, with an open expression of satisfaction at Edward's conduct while with him, he elevated him to one of the highest posts in his establishment, with an income so munificent as to enable him to provide for his mother as he wished. Edward's exultation may be well conceived at this early accomplishment of some of his brightest visions, and, during the visit to Philadelphia which quickly followed, he made every arrangement for placing his mother in a small but comfortable house of her own.

It was during this visit, in the summer previous to the opening of our tale, that the domestic affliction which Mrs. John Campbell had alluded to, in her conversation with her sister-in-law, occurred. Arthur Campbell, the twin brother of Elinor, had always been a peculiar child. His constitution, much less vigorous than his sister's, inclined him to inactivity, and a shy, reserved disposition rendered him far less attractive. Too indolent to study, he was nevertheless devoted to books, provided he could get them of the sort he preferred; and all his leisure hours, and many a stolen one, were devoted to the wild legends, volumes of poetry, and romantic tales that he loved best. Elinor, whose love for him was absorbing, was his friend, playfellow, and confidante. They were inseparable, and, during the summer, when in the country, they wandered together during a great part of every day, sitting in shady nooks, reading fairy tales, endless ballads, or, better than all, Crasoe's enchanting story, and shaping out, with all the extravagance of childish imaginations, adventures strange and wild for themselves. The boy, unknown to himself, to others was a poet; he lived in a poet's world, and it was through the force of this one strong pervading quality that he led the far better balanced mind and more vigorous intellect of his sister. She was spell-bound through her imagination, through her engrossing love for him, and drank from his mind with a blind thirst. Her girlish amusements and employments were distasteful, because he could not share them, and the rougher plays and boyish pursuits which he indulged in, became hers. Mrs. Campbell's authority was interposed to prevent this tendency to masculine habits in her daughter; but the boy's health was delicate, and the children too ardently attached to render it possible for her entirely to neutralize her son's influence. Thus they grew together till nearly the age of fourteen, leaning upon and loving each other with an ardor and enthusiasm common to both their natures.

One fine summer morning, to her great regret, Nora was called upon to accompany her mother and Mrs. Clifton to town, and Arthur was obliged to amuse himself alone. On their return, at dinner time, inquiry was made for Arthur, but he was not to be found. Dinner was served and eaten, and still he came not. As such deviations from established rules were not permitted, Mr. and Mrs. Campbell became extremely uneasy. Messengers were sent in all directions to the neighboring residences; but no tidings could be heard of him. That some accident had befallen him became now the universal feeling, and servants and laborers were sent out to search for him. Elinor's anxiety was distressing to witness. She begged, entreated, and prayed her mother to suffer her to go seek for her brother.

She knew his haunts better than any one, she said. She pleaded in vain, till Edward Clifton, seeing and pitying the agony her apprehensions made her endure, added his persuasions to hers, and offered to accompany her. Mrs. Campbell finally consented, and, led by the little girl, he followed her rapid steps as she led the way to a neighboring creek which ran, shallow and noisy, through piles of broken rock that lay in huge masses for several miles along its shore, shaded from the towering banks above by overhanging trees, which threw their dark shadows over the glistening waters. Elinor sped on, climbing the rugged pathway, searching in many a hidden nook and concealed hiding-place, which her knowledge of her brother's favorite haunts led her to, occasionally pausing to call upon his name in loud and frantic accents.

What is that? Is it a sound she hears? Her arms are suddenly flung up in the air, and she darts with the fleetness of the wind round a point of rock. Edward Clifton, who hears no sound, follows her. He scrambles over the broken and uneven rocks; he flings himself down an abrupt declivity, and beholds, in a little green dell at the bottom, Elinor kneeling upon the grass, supporting the head of her brother. The boy's countenance was deadly pale, but his eyes were open and fixed upon his sister's face; a stream of blood was welling from his side, and near him lay a fowling-piece, the silent exponent of the scene. Clifton immediately stanching the flowing blood with one of Nora's muslin skirts, with which she promptly supplied him, and, raising the boy in his arms, proceeded to carry him home, Nora leading the way by a less rugged path. Arthur was again senseless, and happily suffered little in the conveyance.

The shock which their arrival produced may be conceived. Physicians were summoned, and everything that skill and affection could suggest was done, but in vain; the boy's constitution was not strong enough to enable him to rally, and death released him in a few days. His senses were restored, however, and his mind was clear and calm, fully comprehending the great change which was about to take place. He explained how his wound had been received. Some neighboring boys having laughed at him for his ignorance of firearms, he had taken his father's gun, during the absence of the family, to a sequestered spot, to practice, and the result we have seen.

The sorrow which this painful event occasioned in the Campbell family was increased greatly by the distressing effects which it produced upon Nora. While her brother lived, it was scarcely possible to tear her from his side. She would not believe that he must die, and, when death came, her frantic grief terminated in a brain fever which, for many weeks, held her on the verge of the grave. When strength and health again slowly returned to her, her whole nature seemed changed. Hitherto wild, heedless, and brave as a boy, with all his insensibility to danger, she had become a timid, shrinking girl. Half-forced smiles, a slow and languid step, and low dejected tones had succeeded to the active movement, the merry laugh, the noisy sports, and independent habits in which she had formerly indulged. She shunned all her former haunts. She never spoke of her brother, but clung to her mother with a close and desperate earnestness, that, while it showed the state of nervous helplessness to which grief and illness had reduced her, proved also the depths of that love so rudely torn asunder, and now thrown back with sudden shock upon herself. Unresisting and meekly patient, she yielded herself to the guiding hand of her mother, and Mrs. Campbell turned from the sorrow which, she doubted not, had been sent to her in mercy, to rejoice in fear and trembling over the treasure which God had restored to her.

Mrs. Clifton, during these trials, had been a great support to Mrs. Campbell. Her unaffected piety and practical good sense rendered her an invaluable assistant in scenes of sickness and sorrow. Edward, too, though obliged to return to New Orleans before Elinor was pronounced out of danger, had been a great comfort to the afflicted family. Arthur had always been strongly attached to him. He was never satisfied, after his accident, unless Edward was near his bed, and, during the few days that his life was prolonged, Edward sat up a part of every night with him. His last audible words were addressed to him: "You will take my place, Edward, and be a brother to Nora if she should need it," he said, gazing upon his sister, who, in silent agony, leaned over him, her eyes fastened upon his face, around which the blue shades of death were already beginning to gather.

Edward, deeply moved, assented, and, bending down, he kissed both the children in silent token of his pledge.

Mr. and Mrs. John Campbell returned to town this autumn at an unusually early period, partly for the purpose of removing Nora from the scene of their recent sorrows, and partly out of consideration for Mrs. Clifton, whose own house was prepared for her to go into, and who would not leave her kind friends in the solitude of the country to their sad feelings.

As time passed on, Mrs. Frederic Campbell's hopes with regard to her daughter were fully confirmed. Emily grew up a beautiful girl, and Madame Foulard succeeded in her efforts to make her an accomplished woman, far beyond her expectations. Emily had naturally a good temper, and circumstances all conspired to keep it so. The plain, poor, and neglected are those whose natures are hardened, and whose tempers become embittered, by want of appreciation and by the cold sneers of indifference. Emily had everything in the world to make her satisfied with herself and others—beauty, wealth, station, and influence. She was the idol of her school-fellows, and a general favorite with her teachers. Careless of money, and lavish to all around, she reaped a harvest of adulation and love, for to the youthful mind there is no quality so dazzling as that of a free and generous nature. Her will was the law; no one opposed her, for no one had the inclination to do so.

When Emily approached the age of eighteen, her mother found it impossible to keep her any longer at Madame Foulard's. She was too impatient to taste the pleasures of that "society" for which she had been educated, and Mrs. Frederic consented to her leaving school; and, when she returned home, it is on record that no less than thirty-four daguerreotypes of her charming face were added to the private property of Madame Foulard's pupils.

The school days of Elinor, if less brilliant than those of her cousin, were equally satisfactory to her mother. Mrs. Osborne, though she did not wholly repudiate "polkas," considered "parsing" of more consequence, and, in her school, Paris was looked upon more in a historical point of view, as the capital of a great nation and the theatre of strange events, than as the place where the Magasin des Modes was issued, and whence "loves of bonnets" came. For the rest, Elinor's accomplishments were thoroughly acquired; her French and music would not have disgraced Madame Foulard's establishment. She drew well, and sang with a taste and feeling that touched the heart even more than it gratified the scientific ear.

Elinor's impetuosity and gay buoyant spirits had never returned after her brother's death. Time did its work in softening her grief and reconciling her to her loss, but the shadow which it had cast over her lingered with her still, giving to her manner a quietude and reserve which some called pride. But Elinor was not proud, according to the term as applied to her. If she wanted sympathy with her companions, it was because, like all those who have personally experienced moral convulsions, she was older than her years. The same strong feeling, the same deep but earnest enthusiasm that marked her earlier days, still belonged to her, though concealed beneath the subdued demeanor of a disciplined character. Elinor, as a child, gave but little promise of beauty; her eyes were large, changeful, and expressive, and her hair and teeth were fine; otherwise, her features were harsh. As she approached womanhood, however, her countenance grew more and more harmonious, as if the inward graces of her mind had moulded the lineaments which gave it expression. Finely formed, and above the middle height, Elinor possessed one of those springy, lithe, and active figures, such as it would be natural that her early unrestrained habits should have developed. No one ever thought of suggesting comparisons between the two cousins; but few ever turned from her to gaze upon the brilliant face and fairy-like little form of Emily, without being unconsciously impressed by her.

Elinor, who was more than a year younger than her cousin, remained a pupil of Mrs. Osborne's, while Emily made her first appearance in society. Mrs. Frederic consoled herself for the misfortune of having a grown-up daughter, by the éclat which Emily's début caused. Several persons told her, to be sure, that she and Emily looked like sisters, and she believed them! This, perhaps, helped to support her under the trial.

Emily's little head preserved a wonderful degree of steadiness amid all the whirl, excitement, and flattery of her first winter. She had had a pretty good seasoning at Madame Foulard's, however, and it was not easy to overwhelm the original of thirty-four daguerreotypes! At the end of the season, everybody acknowledged that Emily was a sweet girl. And so she was, for, though she had never had a drop to embitter her cup through life, we all know that there are people whom no blessing, no degree of prosperity, can sweeten! But Emily was sweet and pleasant to all. Unlike that unfortunate "miller who lived upon the Dee," she cared for everybody, for everybody cared for her.

Emily's dulcet character ran some risk of deserting her, however, the following summer, when she found that her father had purchased a neat country house, close to Clover Hill, the seat of her uncle, instead of taking them to a watering-place, as had been his custom. The opportune announcement of the expected arrival of Edward Clifton alone enabled her to bear the disappointment with some degree of fortitude. She remembered the admiration of her which he had exhibited two years before, on his former visit, when she was but a half-grown girl, and she thought how pleasant it would be to have such a tall handsome fellow as Edward to flirt with and make miserable during the summer. "I shall make mamma invite Mrs. Clifton to spend the summer with us, instead of with Uncle John, and then I can have him all to myself." Such were the pleasant thoughts that ran through Emily's little head!

Edward Clifton, during his residence with his uncle, had elevated himself so much in his opinion, and won so much of his regard, that Mr. Fairly signified his intention of taking him as a partner in his business—a step which insured to Edward ultimately, if no untoward events occurred, the possession of a handsome fortune. Those who speculated upon such matters decided that Edward must be his uncle's heir; but Edward himself, with a singleness of mind that was one of his peculiar characteristics, never even thought of such a contingency, and labored in his vocation as one who not only had vast returns to make for the generous kindness he had received, but as one whose future fortunes were dependent upon his daily efforts. Mr. Fairly was too observant a man not to have weighed thoroughly his nephew's character; and the confidence which he placed in him proved the high opinion which he had of him.

Edward Clifton arrived, and Mrs. Frederic, having signified to Mrs. Clifton the injustice she would be doing them if she always preferred Mrs. John Campbell's house to theirs, left the old lady no alternative but to accept her invitation to pass the summer with them in the country, which invitation of course included Edward.

This arrangement was more satisfactory to Mrs. Frederic than to Mrs. Clifton, who would have preferred her accustomed plan of passing the hot months at the younger brother's. She was warmly attached to Mrs. John, in whom she had found a congenial friend in her hour of sore trial; but she owed too many obligations to the Campbell families to wish to appear ungracious in refusing an invitation urged in such a shape, and she went, after enjoying Edward's society alone for a few days in town.

Emily's feminine instincts had not misled her when she decided that Edward Clifton admired her. He did, and, when he again saw her, he thought her the most perfect vision of beauty that had ever crossed his path. Edward was not what is called a susceptible young man, but his refinement of mind gave him an intense appreciation of beauty, and Emily had no reason to complain of his want of admiration of her.

Satisfied that he was not a man to fall in love with mere beauty of person alone, that he had other tastes to gratify than those of the eye, and that there were other and more important requirements necessary to make up his ideal of womanly perfection, Edward set to work to scan Emily's character after his imagination and senses were dazzled. With what success may be imagined. Amability and an affectionate loving nature were two indispensable in woman, according to his opinion, and these he perceived Emily possessed in a high degree. The "sweetness" for which she had always been so distinguished never shone with greater lustre than it did just now. She was in her happiest mood, and her numerous friends who visited them during the summer bore testimony to this acknowledged trait.

Edward sank deeper and deeper into love's meshes as he continued this pleasant inquisition, till finally he concluded that, as marriage was a thing he had looked forward to when he could afford it, the time was perhaps now come when he should make an effort to secure his future happiness. "If I can only be so fortunate as to gain such a prize, an engagement for two or three years, till I can see my way clear before me, will not be unreasonable; and think how pleasant it will be to have the dear girl loving me, and thinking of me all the while I am away!"

Edward thought so much on this subject that it was not long before he imparted it to Emily, who, to tell the truth, was surprised and considerably agitated as he poured out his confession, and told of his dreams and plans. Emily did not conceal her regard from him, but told him "she was frightened, very much frightened," and begged him not to "talk about it any more." But Edward was obstinate, and returned to the subject again and again.

"Why is it, Emily," he asked, upon one occasion, "if you love me, as you say you do, that you will not suffer me to speak to your parents, and ask their approval. I do not feel that I am acting honorably in thus secretly appropriating their daughter's affections, and this too while living under their very roof."

"If papa and mamma knew it," half sobbed Emily, "every one would know it, and I could never bear to go into society if everybody knew I was engaged. It is very unpleasant; you don't know how unpleasant it is for a girl to be going out when her"——

"Lover," suggested Edward.

"When the gentleman to whom she is engaged is absent."

"Well, Emily, I do not pretend to understand these feminine niceties; but it appears to me, if I was a woman, I should not object to the whole world's knowing I was engaged, provided I was not ashamed of the man."

"And I am very much ashamed of you, you know," returned Emily, looking up caressingly into his face. "Is that the idea, Edward?"

"No, Emily, I have not humility enough for that apprehension. But tell me, what am I to do about my own mother? I must tell her."

"Oh, dear, dear Edward, it would never do to tell Mrs. Clifton! She would inform papa of it directly. I can never consent to that!"

"But I have never kept a secret of my own from her in my life, Emily; and I am sure she already suspects that I love you."

"Tell her you love me as much as you please, Edward dear; but do not tell her I know it, I entreat."

And thus it was that Edward Clifton, who had never concealed a thought from his mother, consented to keep her in ignorance of the most important event of his life. Afraid to enter upon the subject for fear of saying too much, he seldom spoke to her of Emily, contenting himself with giving her to understand that, if he could "bend circumstances to his will," could feel free to do as he wished, &c. &c., he should not return to New Orleans without deciding a matter all important to his happiness.

At this revelation, Mrs. Clifton did not exhibit her usual eager interest in all that concerned Edward, but, on the contrary, looked very grave and unsympathizing.

"Why do you listen so coldly, dear mother?" he asked, noting this change. "You like Emily. You told me, the other day, that you thought her a very sweet girl. What fault do you find with her?"

"I do not wish to find any fault, dear Edward," sighed Mrs. Clifton. "On a point so important, you must suit yourself. It was, perhaps, a feeling of disappointment that made me unintentionally look so grave."

"Disappointment! how came you to feel disappointment? Tell me what it is you mean, dear mother."

"Oh! nothing, my dear boy," said Mrs. Clifton, a little nervously. "Only, some how, I had unconsciously fixed upon some one else as your wife, and that gave me the feeling of disappointment."

"You dear artful old soul," said Edward, playfully putting his arms round her, and kissing her cheek, "who would have dreamed of your turning match-maker, or thinking of such matters at all! Pray, who is the damsel whose hand you intended I should appropriate?"

But Mrs. Clifton shook her head, and would say no more.

Edward's devotion to Emily was too undisguised to escape observation; yet, in her own family, no notice was taken of it. Mr. Campbell was a kind, easy-tempered man, who never interfered with his wife in the management of his children, and Mrs. Campbell appeared to look upon such attentions as her daughter's due. Mrs. John privately communicated to her husband her suspicion as to what was going on, and Mr. John thought it would be "a very good match." Mrs. Clifton did not speak to any one on the subject, and Nora preserved an equally profound silence.

Emily and her cousin, though their intercourse was constant and familiar, were not what girls call "intimate." They did not tell their secrets to each other; there were no mysterious allusions going on between them about things which they, as the initiated, only could understand. No côte-à-côte confidences, or note-paper explanations. Emily, truth to tell, looked upon Nora very much as an "inexperienced chit," whose old-fashioned notions would render any effort to enlighten her hopeless. While Nora, who perceived the true state of the case, settled it with herself at once, by saying, "Emily and I have no sympathy with each other." Nevertheless, they were very good friends. They lent each other patterns, worked, talked, rode, and practiced together, passing much of their time in each other's society; but their inner lives rolled on in separate and hidden currents.

The intercourse between Mrs. Clifton and Nora, notwithstanding the difference of age, was much more justly entitled to the term of friendship. Congeniality of tastes, temper, and pursuits knit them closely together; and, next to Edward, Nora was the dearest object in life to her. Confiding in her as she did, it would have been most natural that Mrs. Clifton should speak of the state of things evidently existing between Edward and Emily; but, independently of the complicated state of her feelings on the subject, there was another reason which imposed silence upon her. Mrs. Clifton, from long habit, had yielded to a reserve which Nora had exhibited relative to Edward ever since the death of her brother. For a long time after that sad event, she could never hear his name mentioned, closely connected with it as it was, without agitation and tears, and, as all around her were sensible of the sacredness with which she guarded the memories of that painful period of her life, her sensitiveness was always carefully respected. When time had softened the poignancy of her feelings, she was able to speak of Edward with calmness, and meet him without emotion; but her shyness never entirely disappeared. She listened with kindly sympathy to the outpourings of Mrs. Clifton's grateful love and pride in her "dear boy," and was an attentive auditor to most of those "delightful letters" which Mrs. Clifton pored over as the miser does over his treasures; but she never led the conversation to him herself, and spoke of him only when necessary as one in whom her friend was interested.

In any other person, this apparent want of interest in one so loved would have been offensive to Mrs. Clifton; but she was satisfied, though Nora had never expressed it, that she had as high an appreciation of Edward's excellent qualities as she had herself, and she felt only sympathy for that sensitiveness which made her shrink from the painful past and all associated with it, hoping ever that the cloud would one day be lifted, and that she would feel for Edward all that she desired.

With this picture of the state of feeling in the parties described, we might be content, did it not become our duty, as faithful historians, to probe somewhat beyond the mere surface of things. The death of her brother, and her consequent illness, had, it is true, left Ellen's nerves so unstrung that the effects lingered long; but, when health and strength returned, these morbid feelings disappeared, giving place to an interest blended so closely with those tender memories that, though she never sounded its depths, her consciousness of its existence rendered it impossible for her to shake off her early shyness and reserve with regard to him. We, whose province it is to analyze more strictly, can detect in those hidden depths the germ of feeling that, like hidden waters, required only a touch of the true diviner's rod to well forth in purity and strength.

The period allotted to Edward Clifton's visit drew rapidly to a close. He and Emily parted, their faith mutually pledged, but unrevealed to her parents. With his natural frankness, such a state of things could not have continued had he remained at Mr. Campbell's much longer. The only circumstance that reconciled him to acting thus contrary to his feelings and judgment was that his attentions to Emily had been too undisguised to be mistaken, and, no objection having been made by her parents, he had every right to infer that they were not contrary to their wishes. "In another year," he said, "I will ask her father's consent; I shall then perhaps be able to fix a time for our marriage, and it would be cruel in me not to yield to the dear girl's wishes. She is young, light-hearted, and gay; and I must not be selfish. I shall meet with no repulse from Mr. Campbell; let her enjoy society now as fully as she can. One day, I shall want her all to myself."

The winter following was one of great gayety. Elinor "came out," and accompanied her cousin into society, where, if she did not occupy so prominent a position as Emily, her success was such as more than satisfied her modest appreciation of herself. Many an eye turned from the brilliant beauty of Emily to dwell upon the graceful girl, whose refined exterior and expressive countenance seemed to typify her mind.

Emily would not suffer Edward to write often to her, for fear of exciting "suspicion," and her own letters were not frequent. The spring was far advanced when she received a letter from him informing her that, instead of visiting Philadelphia the coming summer, as he had hoped, he would be obliged to sail immediately for Marseilles, to settle some important affairs connected with their "house," and urged upon her the propriety of informing her parents of their engagement. To which request Emily gave no heed.

The course of our history now obliges us to follow Edward Clifton to the distant lands in which he had become a wanderer. The business which called him to Marseilles was not accomplished till late in the autumn; and, being desirous of making a short run into Italy before his return home, he accepted the invitation of an old friend, who was a lieutenant on board an American man-of-war which had touched at Marseilles, to join their mess as a guest, as far as Genoa, to which port they were bound. Lieutenant Selby had numerous questions to ask of Edward about persons and things at home, for his ship had been absent three years, and he was thirsting for news. He was a Philadelphian, and his questions principally regarded the people of that town.

"Can you tell me anything about the Campbells?" he asked. "I don't know them myself, but one of our lieutenants is engaged to Miss Campbell, and we hear a monstrous deal about her. Is the father as rich as he is reported to be? He is one of the firm of Frederic and John Campbell."

"Engaged!" exclaimed Edward, coloring. "Impossible!"

"Not at all, my dear fellow; the engagement must have taken place after you left there. Indeed, it was late last spring, for he only joined us this summer. His name is Harvey. 'Handsome Harvey' he is called in the navy. He is a great lady-killer, and has an eye to the money-bag."

With some confusion, Edward remembered that

Emily was not the only Miss Campbell; that Elinor must be now "out," and the lady referred to.

"What is her name?" asked Edward. "Is it Elinor?"

"Yes, that is the name," replied Selby; "Elinor, a very sweet name, and a very sweet-looking girl she is, too. I have seen her miniature often. Harvey is very good natured," continued Selby, in a tone of careless irony; "he imparts his happiness freely. I have seen her letters too, very affectionate effusions!"

Edward Clifton's eyes flashed as he listened to these remarks. That any member of a family whom he respected so highly, and to whom he was knit by so many ties, should be thus spoken of, filled him with indignation; and, when he pictured to himself Elinor's modesty and refinement, and beheld her thus subjected to the free remarks of a ward-room mess-table, her picture and letters offered to the coarse jests of men who could not be expected to respect the delicacy of a woman whose lover thus exposed her, he felt eager to meet and call to account the man who could so far forget what was due to a woman whose innocent and unsuspecting mind, he doubted not, had led her to rely implicitly upon her lover's honor. At the same time, it was with a pang of deep regret that Edward felt himself obliged to yield to the conviction that Elinor, whose dignity of mind and high qualities he had always admired, had placed her affections upon one so unworthy of her.

Edward's desire to meet with Mr. Harvey was not gratified. That gentleman had decided to join the ship at Leghorn, his leave of absence having not yet expired, and Edward departed upon his travels with his wish ungratified. Mr. Fairly's request that he would see all he desired in Europe, while there, prolonged his stay several months later than he intended, and it was not until late in the following spring that he returned to the United States.

Meanwhile, disasters of a most distressing nature had overtaken the Campbell family. A commercial crisis had completely wrecked their fortunes. They failed. A mere pittance was saved from the ruin of their fortunes, and they were left, advanced in years, to begin the world anew. Houses, furniture, and plate, pictures, carriages, and horses, all fell under the hammer, and the brothers were obliged to retire to their country houses, the sole remains of all their vast possessions, and live in the most restricted manner.

The good sense and prudence exhibited in Mrs. John Campbell's method of education were now apparent. Elinor was able not only to assist her mother in educating her little brothers, but she was qualified to undertake many household duties which, with their establishment now reduced to one servant, she must perform herself, or submit to see left undone—duties which, if neglected, would render their home one of discomfort and discontent, and subject her parents to a thousand privations. With cheerful alacrity, she gave herself up to her new mode of life. She arose betimes, went through her household occupations with an activity that imparted itself to their "maid of all work," and found time, after all her duties were performed, to keep up her studies and accomplishments. All who knew her marveled at the change which had come over her. It seemed as if in her heart some secret well of happiness was overflowing, brightening her eye, lending smiles to her lip, and lightness to her step. No one, to look upon that cheerful sunny home, would have believed in the entire revolution which had so recently taken place in the circumstances and mode of life of the occupants. Elinor's satisfaction in the result of her active duties was increased tenfold by the grateful praises of her parents, whose pride in her had never been so great. The pillow which she smoothed for her mother was softer to her than down; and the pie which she baked, and the bread which she made, were sweeter to her father than any he had ever eaten before. It was a pretty sight to see Elinor occupied with her domestic duties, and with the innate elevation of her mind dignifying even the meanest household offices.

From this picture, we must turn to one wholly different in all its features. Mrs. Frederic Campbell and Emily were paralyzed by the reverses which had overtaken them. They were unable to accommodate themselves to their altered circumstances, or to turn with healthful minds to the blessings still left to them. To increase their many comforts by their own exertions, to exert themselves for the happiness of each other, never occurred to them as a duty they were called upon to perform. To dwell upon the past, and repine at their lot, was all that occupied them.

Elinor's example, and its happy results, had no effect on Emily; both she and her mother had unconsciously cherished an idea that they were very different people from Mrs. John and Elinor, which idea, put into words, would indicate that they believed themselves formed of a "finer porcelaine of human clay," incapable of being subjected to mean uses. The training of both had, in fact, been so devoid of moral discipline and practical lessons, that they were incapable of understanding what was their duty even when it was pointed out to them. The consequences of such a course may well be conceived; habits of luxury were to be reconciled with narrow means, and indulgences were yielded to that wealth alone could warrant. It was in vain that old Nanny Foster exerted herself with tenfold energy to stop every gap. She labored unceasingly, compensating herself the while by incessant grumbling; but it was all in vain. One servant could not do the work of six, and where no one stretched forth a hand to aid, and all required services, it was impossible that anything like domestic comfort could prevail. No servant staid long with them; neatness, cheerfulness, and content were unknown; and, when Mr. Campbell returned at night from the harassing cares of business, he came to a neglected hearth, a littered room, a repining wife, and a listless daughter, who scarcely thought it worth her while to rise from the sofa on which she was lounging to welcome him home, much less to minister to his comfort, or make his home more lively. The only bright things about the house were the children, and they, though neglected and suffered to run wild, were their father's chief comfort. Society was of course quite out of the question with the Campbells now. Economy and seclusion must be their lot for years to come. To Emily, however, it was "the breath of life;" and the only thing that supported her under her reverses was the hope of soon marrying and leaving her home, with its privations and dullness, to enter again into that world where beauty was admired and compliments paid.

Edward Clifton heard, on his arrival, with deep concern, the change which had taken place in the fortunes of his friends. In his first private interview with Emily, he told her that his uncle, to whom he had spoken of his wishes, had, in a recent letter, urged him to marry, making him the most liberal offers if he did so. "And now, Emily," he said, "as there is nothing to prevent our marrying, you must suffer me to speak to your parents, to tell them all." Emily, after musing a little while, signified her consent; and it was decided that, as soon as Mr. Campbell returned from Boston, where he had gone on business, the application should be made

(To be concluded.)

TO A GERANIUM LEAF.

PALM, withered leaf! this morning thou didst bloom
In all the freshness of thy native air;
To-night is wasted all thy sweet perfume,
And all thy greenness gone beyond repair!

Art thou an emblem of the gentle one
From whose dear hand I took thee, faded leaf?
Will all her loveliness so soon be gone,
And will her life of beauty be so brief?

Oh no! it must not be. There is a heart
That now is bathed in Hope's refreshing dews;
But all its gladness will at once depart,
When o'er her face shall steal Death's sickly hue.

True, she, like thou, must soon or later die;
Her form, like thine, must to the earth be given;
But thou shalt in the dust forever lie,
While she shall rise to live again in Heaven.

Not long on her shall rest the heavy clod—
Soon shall she burst the casement of the tomb;
And a sweet flower beside the throne of God,
In ever-during freshness there shall bloom.

WOOLING THE WIDOW.

Much Ado About Nothing.

EARLY marriages, every one protests, are very bad things. That is, middle-aged people will tell you so, with a grave shake of the head, and they make about as much impression upon their auditors as the like counsel did upon them when they wished to "see the folly of it, too." But, after all, how few people, who have had the patience or good fortune to wait until the judgment is matured, and impulse is in a measure subdued, make marriage anything more than a matter of simple worldly utility, or invest it with any of the romantic hues that fade soon enough into the sombre light of everyday domestic life!

So thought Colonel Hayward, or rather so mused he over a very fine cigar, as he sat with his feet elevated to the window-sill of a front room in the St. Charles, on his way home, after the fatigues and dangers of camp life were ended by the last treaty with Mexico. He had had his share of hallucination, as what cadet with bright buttons has not? There was a time—he could remember it distinctly—when a miniature-case received more of his devotion than the Bible his good mother had put into his hands at parting. He played the flute then to the annoyance of his immediate neighbors, and the disgust of the echoes in and around West Point—echoes supposed to have heard some very good music in their day. He had delicious reveries by moonlight of a home that was to be Paradise itself—in a small way—with a garden that grew prize strawberries, and a wife to choose them for his peculiar gratification. Adelaide was to be the wife's name; he scribbled it over his equations, and ornamented the margin of all his drawings with the mystic letters done in German text. But the fair Adelaide had come to the sensible conclusion that a lieutenant's pay could not furnish and maintain the above-mentioned cottage; perhaps it was with the advice of a mother, who had seen the folly of early marriages herself. So the dream of eternal fidelity that was to outlast evil and good report, or even a seven years' captivity, was rudely broken; for the lady of his dreams had accepted the home and grounds of a wealthy widower, "in the cotton trade and sugar line." What was military glory to winters in town, and a suite of rooms at the Astor!

Then later, when the young lieutenant had shone as the best dancer and rider—out of the dragoons—then at — Barracks, he had indulged in certain fancies he scarcely cared to recall now. There was the daughter of the commanding officer—he confided the story of his cruel disappointment to her attentive ears—holding her fair white hand the while, and looking up into her tearful eyes. He revived the flute practice for a serenade; but he was most mysteriously ordered away the very next week, though General —, her father, bade him a most cordial and regretful adieu, and wished him all distinction in the future. He never could quite understand it; for Tompkins, of the 4th, was retained, and that stupid Jones with the heavy moustache. They paid much more attention to the lady than he had done, and were despised by all their brother officers; although Tompkins was a son of Governor Tompkins, of Tompkinsville, and Jones had three thousand a year, besides his pay, left by his maternal grandmother. Hayward never heard from her until he received a delicate envelop, with the bridal cards of Mr. and Mrs. Tompkins.

There was the dashing Miss Smith, who had been a belle at Washington three winters; she won his heart—shall we say?—by a coup de main. She taught him the polka when it first came out, and clapped her hands so prettily at his slight mistakes, and called him "such a dear awkward fellow!" And with what a charming naïveté she addressed him as "Charlie," the second time of their meeting, and then begged his pardon so gracefully; for "she had had a cousin Charlie, who was a great favorite of hers, and she heard his brother officers call him 'Charlie' so much. He was such a favorite with them—did he know it?"

All this was very soothing, to say the least, until he heard the same remarks made to young Carson, who blushed up to his curls with delighted self-love.

These were some of the colonel's experiences. For a while, he took to men entirely—after his mother's death, and his sister's marriage. He talked knowingly over his wine of feminine vanity and deceit; that women had no hearts deeper than the end of a purse, and no souls above a Paris bonnet. Lieutenant Hayward was getting to be thirty, and had found several gray hairs in his dark locks. Fortunately, while thus endeavoring to convert himself into an established woman-hater, the affairs of our government with Mexico needed the slight interference of the army to bring things to rights again. Pity was quite wasted when given to those gallant men who went so willingly to the exposure of a wretched climate and a revengeful enemy. They felt their lives rusting out in the tedium of keeping an inland post from falling to decay, and frontier skirmishes were just enough to provoke one's appetite for military distinction. It was a good thing for the army, whatever it may have been in general, and none was braver than the discarded lover of Adelaide. Holding an important command, and having had the good fortune of turning the tide of one of the most decisive battles, he received the most rapid promotion ever known in our army. The war was ended now, and he found himself colonel, and the whole newspaper press of the country ringing with his praise. His arrival at the St. Charles, five days before, had been telegraphed northward under the head of "movements of distinguished individuals," and it was seeing this in a Baltimore paper, which he still held between his fingers, that had induced these serious reflections. He had bidden farewell to his best friends, who were hurrying to their families on leave. One told him of his wife he had not seen in two years, and whose letters he always wore about him. Another was so anxious to see his son and namesake, who was old enough to send messages to "papa," in a great scrawling hand, at the foot of "mamma's" letters. Somehow, he always envied these men when the post came in. It was nothing to him: a business letter or so; perhaps a dozen lines from some gentleman friend, talking of the races or the last theatrical star. These men always appeared so provokingly happy! And now, because he had no wife or family awaiting him, he was detained on a tiresome court martial, in the very height of a New Orleans summer.

Just-to-night the colonel wished he was married. He should not like to go about it himself; he would rather face a battery than lay siege to a lady's good will. But he thought how nice it would be if, without his aid or connivance, he could wake some fine day and find himself settled into the calm of matrimony, with a child on each knee, and a charming wife devoted to his comfort. He thought of Adam, and envied the brevity of our great progenitor's wooing. But where to find an Eve? He had entirely kept aloof from ladies' society for the past five years. His whole female acquaintance only included his sister, his friend Logan's mother—a charming old lady, always advising him to marry—and his laundress. He could not conveniently marry either of the three; he was principled against general society.

The colonel threw away the stump of his cigar, and put his hand to his head with a natural meditative gesture. He didn't like the bald place that met his touch; it reminded him that his thirty-sixth birthday was not far off.

It was the suddenness of the colonel's manoeuvres that had so disconcerted the enemy at Palo Alto; in little more time than it would take him to give the word of command, he had dashed off a letter to his friend, Major Porter, the happy father of the precious juvenile, wherein he had intrusted a most important commission—nothing less than to choose him a wife.

cious juvenile, wherein he had intrusted a most important commission—nothing less than to choose him a wife.

"I am heartily tired of this," said the applicant for matrimonial honors; "there's no one to talk to me when I'm melancholy, or count my things for me when they come from the wash. I want somebody to read to me, to keep house so that I can entertain my friends; in fact, to be a kind of general and invariable quartermaster. Never off duty, and always on guard. She must be sensible, economical, straightforward. I think I should prefer a widow. She would have no ridiculous sentimental notions, which I have outlived, and would thoroughly understand housekeeping. If she has two or three children, so much the better. They make a home cheerful, I've heard you say. Ask your wife about it.

"P. S. I should prefer girls; boys take too much managing."

When the colonel had once formed a plan, it was prosecuted with his characteristic vigor. He made a thousand admirable plans, as he battled with the heat and mosquitoes, that seemed determined to reduce what Mexico and the enemy's sharp fire had spared. These plans were a great assistance during the three long weeks that intervened before the well-known termination of Major ——'s trial, which interested even the community at large, though the charges did prove too frivolous to mention. At last, just before the court martial was broken up, giving the colonel liberty to report himself at Washington, came the looked-for letter from Major Porter. It must be confessed, the colonel opened it with alight trepidation.

"Sensible fellow," wrote the major. "I always told Eliza you had excellent common sense packed away, if you could only stop to get at it. Know just the lady to suit you. Intimate friend of Eliza's, schoolmates and all that. Amiable, a little money—enough to pay her milliner's bills, as she's tolerably economical—steps out well, good teeth, and has one child. The sooner you apply the better. Several are quite ready to take the command, Eliza says.

"P. S. My boy is a match for anything. Want to show him up, as you can't snub children any longer."

The colonel gave orders for immediate departure. Truth was, he feared that his valor, like that of the celebrated Bob Acres, might ooze out at his fingers' ends. He intended to "take time by the fore-lock;" and, as he sped northward with all the speed of railroads and steamboats, his reveries very naturally turned on the important step he was about to take.

"If Porter had been a little more explicit!" quoth the colonel, in confidence, to his cigar and the flag-staff of the deck he was treading. "Not a word about eyes or hair; and he knows, if I have a single weakness towards the sex, it takes the shape of fine eyes. But, now I think of it, I can't say I spoke of personal beauty. Can't say I did. Left it out of the question altogether, with the romance. Stout, good-natured woman, I suppose, about my own age, say; dark stuff frocks, black silk apron, cap and streamers." The colonel was unconsciously drawing on his recollections of Mrs. Logan, senior, and, save the age, the portrait was tolerably correct. "Motherly sort of a somebody; understands gruel and rheumatism, and all that sort of thing. Girl, I suppose; tall girl in pantalettes and curl papers; calls me papa, and wheedles me for mint-stick. By and by, just as her mother and I begin to get along comfortably, brings a lot of jackanapes into my quarters, who drink my wine and smoke my cigars, and talk nonsense to Mrs. Hayward. 'Mrs. Hayward!' Good! that's what I never thought of! She must have my name, of course."

Truth was that, by the aid of such inward cogitations, the colonel, like many another raw recruit, began to wish he had not enlisted. He registered his name on the books of the United States Hotel, Philadelphia, with a half hope that he should find no letter awaiting him; but he was fairly committed, as he saw by a dispatch from his friend Porter, dated Fort —, where he was now stationed, and saying that he had arranged for him to meet the lady referred to at his very pleasant quarters, where he soon hoped to introduce him to "Elisa," and that remarkable child whose sayings and doings had filled so many sheets of paper in times past.

It was a cool morning for August, and Chestnut Street remarkably quiet, the colonel's cigar unusually fine, and the hotel piazzas shady. He occupied a large arm-chair, with his feet in the elevated position he was so fond of, and watched the few customers that came at this early hour to shop at Levy's. Perhaps more than one glance was bestowed on his soldierlike figure, the close military cap drawn so as to shade his eyes, marking him as in the army, and, of course, one of those heroes at present the theme of public praise. The regulation, mowing the faces of our officers as clean as an English lawn, with a small bit of side shrubbery, had not yet gone into effect; and the colonel's personal pride—our hero was but human—centered in a ferocious, but decidedly military mustache, having an abrupt upward curl, the result of long twisting, usually the left hand accompaniment to his cigar.

Presently, his attention was arrested by a very graceful figure poised on the low step of the entrance to Levy's, while a very fine pair of eyes looked up and down the street as if for an omnibus. There were none in sight; though, as usual, when one appeared, a continuous line followed. The lady did not notice her opposite neighbor, but seemed annoyed at the detention. The colonel thought he should like a nearer view. That little foot looked remarkably well in the distance. Presently, he threw away his cigar, not half consumed; the lady had signaled a Chestnut Street stage, and he saw Fairmount upon it in large white letters. It was several years since he had been at Fairmount. There was the whole morning on his hands—what could he do better? Ah, colonel, the ruce was worthy a practiced man of the world! It was far too well conceived for a modest soldier. He must have moved quickly as usual, for he reached the centre of the street just as the lady did. Of course, she drew back, hesitated, and finally stepped in, while the colonel bowed politely, held open the door, and stepped in after her; but not until he had noticed he was quite right about the foot, and that the hand, in its dark glove, was equally slender.

As I said, it was early in the morning, and the Chestnut Street line being principally employed to carry up-town merchants to business, was nearly deserted on its return trip. There was a nurse maid with two children going to Fairmount for the fresh air, the fair unknown, and the gallant colonel. He could not look at the sunny side of the street forever; besides, it twisted his neck to a most uncomfortable position, and, when he turned, it was equally impossible to avoid looking his neighbor directly in the face. He tried not to, however. He examined the skirt of her dress until he had counted the tucks six times over: he could have sworn to the pattern of that neat blue cambrie years after. He even examined the seal and key of her watch-chain curiously; but, after all, his eyes reached her face, deliberately as they had traveled. It so chanced that their eyes met. It was very provoking, certainly. No wonder that the lady's color rose as she drew down her veil with a quick jerk; but it was one of those short veils so fashionable a little time since, scarcely more than a flounce of black lace, which only heightened the delicacy of her complexion, and left the chin and throat half revealed. The lady wound her purse tightly around her fingers, and began talking to the child next her in the most interested manner possible. It was a bright little creature, and smiled and caroled good-naturedly in return to her advances. The colonel began to notice it, too, and thought if all children were like it, the race would be tolerable. Then came a vision of the tall girl in pantalettes, who seemed to rise between him and his fair vis-à-vis menacingly. He turned away in disgust, and with a stronger disinclination than ever to taking his passage next morning for Fort —.

As the omnibus turned down Schuylkill Seventh Street, the lady made a faint attempt at the check-string, and the colonel had the extreme pleasure of arresting the stage, passing up the silver coin her hands had pressed, and holding open the door for her descent. He dared not offer his hand to assist her; but, as he had the last glimpse of her figure ascending the tall marble steps of the corner house, he contented himself with talking to the child she had honored with her notice. The colonel had not looked at a baby before, unless by particular request, in the last seven years; yet now the delighted nurse maid thought "the gentleman must be very fond of children!"

Alas for the widow's prospects! and the misfortune of having one's time on his hands on a bright summer morning in a strange city!

The colonel thought Fairmount had improved very much since he had visited it before. Whether it was the sunshine or not, everything had a pleasant glow. The marble Cupid, sending up a jet d'eau from his distended cheeks, seemed more smiling than ever. He looked at the Diana, and thought of the foot that had first arrested his attention; the musical murmur of the fountain recalled her voice, as she thanked him for his courtesy—the colonel, used to the rough tones of command, thought every woman's voice Æolian. At any rate, he passed a very delightful morning, and he did not think of the widow. He looked earnestly at the corner house when the omnibus passed again, but the shutters were jealously closed: no wonder, as it was mid-day. He looked closely at every blue dress he saw all the way down Chestnut Street; nay, he even strolled its full length, past the high marble steps again, that evening; but there was not even a glimpse afforded him of the fair incognito.

As he gave orders for an early departure, he thought uncomfortably of the morrow's engagement.

It was long before broad day when he rose from an unquiet sleep, wherein he had dreamed that he was walking at Fairmount with his acquaintance of the morning, enjoying a most delightful conversation, when the widow, still in cap and streamers, had suddenly appeared thrusting her over the dam in the most revengeful manner, and that he saw her drawn up under the huge revolving wheels, her long fair hair floating upon the tide, and her hands stretched out imploringly towards him! No wonder the colonel awoke with a start; but he saw nothing but the porter dashing Fairmount water upon the steps of the opposite Custom House, and a solitary milkman creeping along half asleep, in spite of his early drive. It was quite a relief when the jingling of bells, and the quick tread of waiters through the passage, announced the day fairly commenced.

The boat was not very regular in its trips, as it plied between the small towns on the river and Philadelphia, principally for the benefit of the market people. It was filled with this class of passengers and their wares, brooms, pails, and grocery sundries, in exchange for the potatoes and early peaches they had carried to town. The little cabin—he glanced in as he passed—had its complement of their wives and daughters, short, stout women with large baskets and bundles, and several children in chints sun-bonnets. The colonel's valise gave him very little to look after. He had read the morning papers at the breakfast-table, and he did not see a single person that he felt inclined to talk to. Just as the last bell rang, his interest was quickened by a party he saw moving through the barrels and boxes of the wharf—a gentlemanly, middle-aged man, a young boy, and a lady somewhat resembling the subject of his dreams. No, he could not be mistaken; the dark mousseline dress and cape, and the thick blue veil, could not disguise that face and figure. The colonel leaned forward, forgetful of place and etiquette; they were late, the gang-plank was withdrawn. The boat moved slowly from the wharf. He stretched out his hand just in time to assist her to spring upon the deck; the carpet-bag was thrown after her by the porter; the old gentleman and the boy waved their adieus. They were not going, then? for the boat moved out more rapidly, and there stood the gallant colonel by the side of his incognito, actually blushing from his late courtesy, and in a whirl of emotions he could not define, from this unexpected and most delightful meeting.

The lady, who, in her haste, had evidently taken him for the commander of the boat, was the first to recover composure. She thanked him very politely, without raising her eyes to his face, and disappeared within the cabin. The colonel's spirits sank again. If there had been any gentlemen with her, there were a thousand pretexts for addressing them, and at least learning her name. Or she would have walked on deck with them: he wondered how she could breathe in that horrid cabin, with those stupid people! The colonel managed to get into a heat between these cogitations, and a quick walk in the neighborhood of the machinery.

But he was hastening to the widow as fast as the revolutions of the wheels could carry him. The green banks of the unromantic island, upon which the fort was situated, began to emerge from the broad waters of the Delaware. He caught a glimpse of the stars and stripes fluttering in the light wind, and, as the long swells dashed in among the marsh grasses in anticipation of their landing, he distinguished his friend Porter waiting upon the miniature wharf to welcome him. The colonel forgot his errand, and, for an instant, his fair fellow-traveler, in the pleasure of the hearty welcome he received from his old companion in arms.

"And this is my Willy!" said the major, pointing to a shy juvenile in his "first pair," who stood eyeing the new arrival as if it had been an importation from a menagerie. "But is it possible Agnes has not come? Didn't you see her on board?"

As the colonel was entirely at sea with regard to the personnel, or even the locale of the said young person, his answer was not very satisfactory; but a lady, emerging from the cabin, and kissing her hand gayly to the major, gave conclusive affirmative evidence. It was no other than the fair incognito, answering to the title no longer, however, but introduced to our friend under her real name, Miss

Agnes Lawrence! And she, too, was a guest of the major, who, in his blunt, good-natured way, insisted upon "Hayward's offering his arm to her," while he looked after the carpet-bags and bundles.

The colonel was afraid he was dreaming again opposite the Custom House; the reality of knowing Miss Lawrence, nay, of feeling that light hand resting on his arm, seemed too great a happiness for waking bliss. The pressure, slight as it was, gave him a heart-thrill he had not experienced since the days of Adelaide and the flute practice.

I do not believe either spoke from the time they left the wharf until the Sally-port appeared before them, a graceful, but massive archway, and the dark guns peered curiously over the white wall down upon them. But the major made amends, keeping up a continual fire of interrogatories, half of which he answered himself, forgetful that the rest had ever been expressed. Willy was industriously assisting the orderly, who followed in the rear with their baggage. Once the wind blew a corner of the blue veil directly across the colonel's face, but the major had caught a view of his household, and did not notice it.

He did well in describing his quarters as pleasant. The neat yellow walls of the barracks, the green piazzas of the officers' quarters, the major's own house, which he occupied by right of commanding officer, were as neat, and, withal, as picturesque an arrangement as one could desire. The men in their blue jackets were lounging in and out of the building assigned to them, dinner being just over, and the shrill sound of a fife drowned the hum of the insects, as the small, but ambitious musician pursued the practice of a new quickstep.

"Eliza"—for that was all the introduction the major vouchsafed—came forth to meet her guests. She was a sensible, rather stylish-looking woman, with a merry glance in her black eyes, and a half-formed smile "chasing the dimples on her cheek." She wore a neat-fitting white muslin, and the most captivating black silk apron. The colonel was not in the least afraid of her, and watched the affectionate meeting with Miss Lawrence in a mood he could not attempt to define. The camp-weary soldier began to find the meaning of the word home, particularly when seated in the shaded parlor so neatly furnished, and so suggestive of a woman's tasteful presence. There was the sewing-chair by the work-table, with a little apron half hemmed, surmounted by a golden thimble, just as she had thrown it down to meet them. A wineglass held one delicate white rose, with its buds and foliage; a larger bouquet ornamented the open piano. Eliza was one of those rare wives who "find time to practice." The colonel threw himself down on the chintz-covered sofa in a dreamy and abstracted mood, while the ladies disappeared to deposit bonnets and shawls, and the major was detained near the guard-house for an instant. Now this was just what he had fancied for himself, only the picture was more delicately touched, and he began unconsciously to fill up his own rough outlines after the same fashion, only—Miss Lawrence would perseveringly remain seated in the widow's chair, and he had forgotten the stepdaughter altogether.

VOL. XLIV.—33

"Eliza! Eliza!" called the major, his heavy approaching step shaking the piazzas. "Mrs. Johnson hasn't come—I forgot to tell you—and won't be here until Monday; and here's Tom all this while!"

"Pray don't trouble yourself about me," exclaimed the colonel, starting up and striding to the window; for he comprehended by intuition that Mrs. Johnson could be no other than the widow. "I can wait very well, I assure you. I"—

"Why, my dear fellow," said the major, and the aggrieved colonel saw a twinkle in his merry eyes, "you are really very accommodating to put up with our society alone for three whole days! Now I think of it, the note says Tuesday instead of Monday; for she has some arrangements to make about Sallie's next term."

"Sallie," indeed! "Johnson and Sallie!" It spoke well for the romance of the future Mrs. Hayward. The colonel somehow hoped Miss Lawrence was not within hearing; and then the major could carry him off, just as he heard the ladies returning, to show him "the fixtures," as he said, and introduce Lieutenant Morris. What did he care for a trumpety lieutenant with a downy chin, who blushed when he heard Miss Agnes had arrived? What business had he to blush at any such intelligence?

But the colonel's star became more propitious. By a tacit consent, Mrs. Johnson and her prospects were not alluded to before Miss Lawrence; and he sat opposite to her at dinner, and near her on the piazza, when the ladies brought out their work to join them, and it was as quiet and domestic a party as one could wish to see. The colonel began to feel as if he had always been there, and in the habit of seeing Eliza and Agnes, as the major called them, every day. He stole a glance now and then; and, by the end of an hour, came to the conclusion that Miss Lawrence was about twenty-four, tall, but not too slender, with just the hair and eyes he preferred, and the most sensible woman he had ever met.

"And so time ambled, withal," through three days, comprising so much of rational enjoyment, that our hero looked back upon it as if years had passed since he had come to the quiet haven. Several times the major had evidently been bent upon disturbing his dream of happiness, by allusions to the lady so soon to arrive; once even he had called him "the oddest fellow he had ever seen, to have so little curiosity about the lady he was going to marry, especially a friend of Eliza's!" but he had invariably managed to change the subject as soon as possible.

Monday evening had come—the last day of grace drawing to a close; and the colonel found that, with their isolated position, the major's engagements, and Eliza's housekeeping, he had said more to Miss Lawrence than any lady he had ever met before. They had exchanged views on a hundred topics, some of which agreed wonderfully; and others had called forth gay bantering from the lady, and a playful war of words, that made them none the less good friends.

Monday evening—the sunset already fading from the clouds—and the colonel grew desperate. He felt that he had committed himself rashly, and, with characteristic coolness and calculation, sought the major to tell him so.

"It's no use!" said the unhappy victim of impulse; "I cannot see that horrid Mrs. Johnson! I don't wish to marry! I should make a most hard-hearted step-father. Tell her so; and that she's had a fortunate escape. I will go in the first boat to-morrow, and apply for a frontier station. I wasn't meant for a Benedick; but, if you think my word of honor is at stake"—and he fairly groaned.

"I must say," answered the major, stoutly, "this is what I never expected from you. Here you write, in the most unprovoked manner, to Eliza and myself to choose you a wife. We exert all our common sense, and choose one you virtually accept. She comes down here to meet you; you show the white feather, and run away from a pair of eyes! I must say that it's ungrateful, and Eliza and I feel hurt!"

The major was evidently offended, past present conciliation. The colonel was miserable, and went out of a neighboring sally-port, self-accused as a coward and a simpleton. He met Miss Lawrence coming slowly homewards from a ramble with Willy. He forgot everything but her presence, and gave the well-satisfied juvenile his cane for a horse. Back scampered the delighted equestrian, leaving them alone. Alone, and the moon coming up large and full over the quiet waters, the willows swerving silently to the pointed marsh grasses, and a low murmur as the advancing tide broke almost at their feet.

"You will walk with me—I am sure you will; and it may be the last time."

He could not see her face; but she walked on as he turned from the yawning archway, casting a broad shadow over their path.

An instant before, and the colonel had intended to depart at daybreak without seeing her again; but now the quick tide of impulse was turned, and he told her why he had wished to go. That she had become so dear, so very dear to him—united all he had ever imagined of sister and wife—had brightened his life with such pleasant dreams—marriage with any other seemed like sacrilege, and his whole soul revolted. He spoke with energy, passion, and tenderness combined. He looked into her face once more. It was not turned from him now, and large tears were standing in her eyes. His hand trembled as he covered with it her own lying upon his arm.

"And you love me?" she said, as if she were musing, rather than speaking.

"Love you?"

"And you will not marry the one your friends have chosen for you?"

"Never!"

It seemed so cruel and heartless in her to smile at the emphasis which he gave the word. He had not expected it; and he released her hand, grieved and growing colder.

"Not even if I should prove to be the lady?"

"Oh, Agnes!"

"It was Miss Lawrence a moment ago. And, now I think of it, Mrs. Johnson has been waiting for her husband's return from Washington."

"Mrs. Johnson! You—you surely have never been married?"

"Nevertheless, I am the lady referred to by the major; and my little Jeannie is to come down with Mrs. Johnson to-morrow. She is a most excellent person, and has not the most remote idea of killing her husband, even for the honor you propose doing her."

"Oh, Agnes, do not trifle with me! Tell me all your history. Why did they conceal your name? Can I ever hope to supply the place?"

"Of who? Jeannie is an orphan niece I have adopted. No one but yourself ever imagined me a widow. And you must blame no one else," she said, with a bright smile, and offering her hand again. "No mystery was intended until we discovered your mistake. And are you quite sure you will not marry the major's choice?"

The tea-table had been waiting an hour and a half; in fact, it was only the drum-beat that startled them into the thought of a return.

Eliza looked up with a questioning smile as they entered, and the major "hemmed!" loudly, as he asked what they had been doing all this time.

"Taking a lesson in coast survey," replied Agnes, for the somewhat abashed colonel; "and I had no idea it was so pleasant a study."

SONNET.—POWER OF TIME.

BY WM. ALEXANDER.

How mighty are thy ruins, Time! Along
The dark and lengthening vistas of the past
Look we to learn thy power. What wrecks! what vast,
What spectral forms do unto thee belong!
All nature quakes beneath thy iron rod,
O Desolation's lord! Thy ruthless sway
All own. Towers, cities, battlements decay;
And rocks fall headlong where thy feet have trod;
Palmyra, Balbec, Babylon, even they
With one, the mother of dead empires stand,
Sad ghost-like spectacle to every land—
O'er them thy car hath passed destroyingly;
E'en flinty pyramids—brass walls descend;
Before thee all but nature's God must bend.

MY BROTHER TOM.

BY PATIENCE PRICE.

THERE was a thought of naming him Isaac. At least that was my mother's thought when Tom was born, for he was the child of her old age. But my father would not listen to it; and although my mother did think of making a practical use of the sentence in the baptismal service, "Name the child," by popping Isaac into the clergyman's ear, and before my father could recover from his astonishment completing the Hebraism, she did not venture on it. So he was christened Thomas.

There were before him six of us, myself the eldest—Miss Price by courtesy, and of the same name still, for no one has thought of changing my patronymic. I am now aged—But no matter; while there is life there is hope, and I can boast the experience of four married women, and one married man. I will not anticipate, but begin at the beginning. It is of Tom that I am to speak, and not of myself; and if my own story comes out incidentally, I hope to be acquitted of egotism. Sure I am that I have been so Thomased all my life that I am not quite sure of my own identity.

When Tom was born, there was great rejoicing. For a short time there was also great contention; for my four younger sisters and I clamored which should hold the baby. Mother settled the dispute, and to my infinite complacency said, "Let Patience have him; she is the eldest." Short-sighted child that I was, I was delighted at this decision. I am older and wiser now. With what importance did I then assert my right and prerogative! Nobody could hold the baby but mother and I. The young tyrant soon learned to tolerate no one else, and he grew to us like a fixture. To his mother he clung from necessity; to me for recreation. He crowed and shouted with delight at my appearance, and gave his first tokens of appreciativeness by putting out his arms to me. I was in ecstasy. It was delight—triumph; and in the first magnificent feeling of womanly consequence, I twisted up my hair and put in a comb.

"Bless me!" cried my father, "how like an old woman cut short!"

"Indeed," said my mother, "Patience is quite a woman, and I should not know what to do without her."

"Humph!" said my father. But his eye caught the reflection of a gray hair or two in the mirror opposite, and he said no more—if saying "humph" be saying anything. And I inwardly resolved that the tucks in my present frocks should be "let out," if the baby ever gave me an opportunity, and that the next should be of greater longitude. Why not? I was in my fifteenth year. It is wonderful how in some respects brother Tom brought me forward; and if in others he has kept me back, perhaps that is only compensatory justice.

My father died when Tom was four years old. Poor little Tom! he was very fond of him, and showed a knowledge and a feeling quite beyond his years in his lamentations. Mother was inconsolable and helpless, and Tom was fastened on me more closely than ever. I was only sixteen, but seemed a woman grown, so much had household cares and duties brought me forward. I was the admiration of all our friends, and was pointed out as the model daughter. Such indeed I was; but, if there had been less model in me, my mother would have more wisely shaped herself, and my sisters would not have been quite so useless. I tried to direct them. They rebelled. I appealed to my mother, and she said, "You are a dear good girl, Patience, and it is easier for you to do all than to ask them." They felt the rebuke, and I the praise; and, while they tried to do more, I strove to anticipate them. So at eighteen I was housekeeper in fact, and my mother only my police force, in last resort, to quell rebellions. It was all on account of brother Tom, for he had placed me in my dangerous elevation.

As Tom grew to boyhood, he became the apple of my eye and the pride of my life. No lad in the neighborhood was better dressed. While my sisters slept, and my mother dozed and wondered, my frocks, scarce worn, were transformed into fancy costumes for little Tom. Oftentimes I scrimped a pattern, or bought just a little more, to fit him out in a jacket or sack of brilliant colors. I was delighted when the little rogue said, "All Patty's frocks made of a bit of mine!" That idea grew with him. He thought—bless the man, he thinks now—that I and mine, soul, body, and wardrobe, are part of him and his! This is true—with a difference. The boy's egotism and selfishness have merely reversed the fact. He is a type of his sex—begging the gentlemen's pardon—perhaps a little exaggerated, but not much. Such selfish and arrogant, self-sufficient and presuming—But I must be cool.

Young friends began to cluster about the house. There were five Miss Prices, and it would have been misprision of treason against Cupid if no man called on them. Young lady friends of my sisters brought their brothers, then the brothers came of themselves, and then their friends came with them. In our bloom we were quite the fashion. We were pretty and well bred, accomplished, and not very poor. In a word, we were respectable. And my eldest brother William, he had his friends too. So, on the whole, in our set we were quite the fashion.

We! I had forgotten. They, I should say—for where was I? Overshadowed by Tom—brother Tom—dear brother Tom! At eight years of age he would not go to sleep unless some one sat in his room. Sisters had company. The housemaid, like all housemaids, was always out. Mother was busy. "Couldn't I just sit in his room and draw up his day's rents, or sew a button on to-morrow's trousers?" I could just do nothing else. The company was always sisters'. And Tom waked up and cried so. It was croup, or earache, or colic, or cholera morbus, or terror, or—no matter what. Sister Patience was the catholicon, the panacea, the anodyne. The others always asked, "How can you hear him cry so?" It was as if I alone had the key of his vocal organs, and the charge of grand pacificator. Our guests must not hear his noise; but nobody thought of any one's quelling the riot, except Patience. All fell on poor me! And this was in part the reversion of my mother's praise—"Patience is the eldest. Patience is quite a woman." I submitted, and looked forward to the day—which I then trusted would come some time—that Tom could wipe his own nasal promontory. It was a sort of a dream life; but I had hope.

I waked from my dream to hear that sister Carry was to be married! She was the next oldest, and had fairly, or rather unfairly, stolen my turn. Thomas—dear brother Tom—consoled me. "You won't go and get married, and go away to leave us, will you, sister Patty?" And mother, with a sigh, said, "No, Tommy, sister Patty is such a good daughter! We could not live without her." There was a half tear in mother's eye, and a whole one in my own. It was not that I wanted to be married. Oh no! But any other servant who had been so long in the family would have been trusted with the secret before quite all the arrangements were determined on. However, I had some solace. Caroline grew affectionate. There were worlds to do, and sister Patience—dear sister Patty—was quite in request. She helped to get up various dresses, and even Tom was a little taken off her hands. I must say, however, that they neglected him. His hair was not half combed, and his jackets got all out at elbows; and, to crown all, they made him sick with cake, and I held him on my knees in the nursery, while my sister Caroline promised to love, honor, and obey, in the parlor. They were all so sorry! "But then," they said, "nobody could take care of Tom but sister, and they were afraid he would be sick." Why didn't they prevent it?

I need not dwell on collateral matters. All were married, brother Will bringing up the rear—all, I mean, except Tom. He grew up to a fine lad, and sister Patty became more obsolete than ever—obsolete except in cases of croup, convulsions, christenings, fittings out for the country and seaside, and the other demands of a baker's dozen of aunts and cousins. In the ailments of all their mothers, sister Patience is invaluable. But these things are not my theme. I only mention them in illustration of my boast, before spoken, that I have the experience of four married women, and one married man.

Now came Tom's youth, and now came my hardest trials. Four young married sisters and a brother kept open house for him. Sister Patience dropped in upon them with their mother in a sociable way. Brother Tom was the Mercury for each. He sang at their young parties, and turned over the pages for musical misses. Sister Patience never was asked, for they "knew she would not come." How they knew without asking is a mystery to my powers of divination. Sister Patience never would get married—for who could take care of Tom? Mother could "visit round," or keep house very comfortably alone—but poor Tom! They were horrified on his account, mother and all. And sister "was really getting old; she never liked society, and she could not begin now."

Heigh-ho! I found I had raised a brother for my sisters. I was always his favorite—when he was sick. I was his dear sister—when there was a vest to embroider. I was his angel—on slippers and watch-cases; his divinity—when he needed a new dozen of shirts. But the others found him such a delightful stop-gap when their husbands were morose or busy, and would not go out; so useful in summer picnics and winter parties and sleigh rides; so capital a hand to fight up to the box-office for star-tickets, that mother and poor I had no knowledge of him except to keep his wardrobe in order. And that all fell on me. Mother declared that Patience always was such an assistance to her! And to think that Tom has the assurance to offer me a quarter of a dollar's worth of entertainment at some wandering lecturer's levee once every winter, and, because I don't accept such fippennybit civility, goes away and declares that he would gladly wait on me out, but I prefer to be at home with mother! "She is so good and daughter-like!" Was there ever such kind appreciation!

I cannot understand where the man spends his evenings—all his evenings. I know that a portion of them are spent at his sister's; but where does he wind up? He is always out till eleven o'clock, and often until midnight. His clothing, his hair, his very imperial, and his red-republican hat and Kossuth plume smell dreadfully of cigars. And yet he is a great invalid, my brother Tom. He never has any appetite in the mornings, except when I can manage to get up something uncommonly tempting for him. He frequently begs me so gently to bring him a cup of coffee to his bedside, that I cannot refuse. I rebel inwardly; but when I see his face—Tom is handsome—and when he "dear sisters" me, what can I do? I am so afraid he will get married, and his wife will not take half care of him! He is so fragile and delicate! Several times he has attempted business, but is always driven back by indisposition. Indeed, the very thought seems to throw him into a fever.

My mother is as anxious as I am. She says Tom is the stay of the house, now that the others are all gone. (I am only a parenthesis, and can be dropped out.) Indeed, he does furnish us with occupation—mother with sighs, and wonders, and ejaculations; and me with labor, from morn till dewy eve, and so on till midnight. Something is always to be said, or feared, or hoped for Tom. That is mother's province. I have her to cheer, and Tom to labor for. I could wish that he were a thought more grateful and considerate; but mother says that all men are like him, and that they feel more than they express. Indeed, it is to be hoped they do.

There is an end to patience, and I fear sometimes Tom will make an end of me. He cannot pack his trunk. He cannot even hang up his coat. He does not so much as put away his tonsorial apparatus. He drops his dry goods and pocket furniture, his books, papers, pencils—everything but his loose change—all over the house, and for whatever he wants raises a hue and cry like Giant Grim for his supper. He borrows all the money I have, and anticipates mother's semi-annual dividend. He dines out on a five dollar note, wines and cigars included, and mother economizes fifty cents on her marketing and treats herself to "a tea dinner." All his shirts must be made in the house, and my eyes ache over the fine stitches. Mother says that the three or four dollars a pair it would cost to make them fit for Tom's wear are an item in housekeeping, and must be saved. That is true, and I submit. But I overheard him say the other day to a friend who sometimes calls to take him out, when he might chance to stay at home, that if he (the friend) could find cigars fit to smoke for twenty-five dollars a thousand, "it was an object." He (brother Tom) could find none under thirty. And I am sure he smokes a thousand in a week—I mean a month. Or suppose it three—are not one hundred and twenty dollars a year a pretty item to burn up? say, mamma! And must we eat cold mutton and hash to his ragouts and pâtés, and turn the carpets, and renovate the beds, and alter the curtains, and buy our frocks off the same piece, that my skirt may make her a new body, and vice versa, that he may figure in Chestnut Street, and quarrel about Jenny Lind and Catherine Hayes? Must I make fifty shirts to find him in smoke for a quarter? Must we do the shabby genteel to keep him in oyster suppers, and not save enough in a year to give him extras for a month—and after all he be "ashamed of our appearance!" O Tom, dear brother Tom—dear with a dollar mark, which is worse than dear with a vengeance! And yet I love the fellow!

It is wonderful the troops of friends he has, and the hopes he entertains from them. He is quite a Mæcenas in a small way; a patron of the fine arts. His portrait is extant in as many forms as a presidential candidate's—all presents; first attempts of aspiring genius, presented with compliments, but costing each, in the long run, more than a picture by Sully. He is always "forced by position" to take boxes at benefits, and figures in complimentary committees. Such very neat presents as he receives from various people! And so many, many times he has been groomsman. The brides all say he has such a delicate taste in his presents on such occasions! My bonnet has been altered the third time after Mr. Godey's invaluable fashion plates—and by my own fingers! I did intend to put new material in the last time, but dear brother Tom had a wedding tour to make. He couldn't be mean. He did not want to go, and he told me so, when he borrowed my last ten dollars, and mother's too. "Dear Patty," he said, "I wish I was out of it. My friend offers to pay all the expenses; but that would be small in me to accept, you know." So off he went. I did keep back a reserve fund, of which he knew nothing; but a tailor's bill came in, of his, while he was gone, and swept the last corner of my porte-monnaie. I did not want mother to hear of it, so paid it, and said nothing.

People say it is all our own fault—mother's and mine; that we have spoiled him: but his younger sisters and their set need not make him such extravagant Christmas and New Year's presents; they know he will not be outdone, though his mother and I go naked for it. If he is spoiled, how is he to be unspoiled? that's what I would like to know; and what am I to do? Do tell me, dear "Lady's Book," for, in a few months or years more, I shall be a ruined spinster. He has even now begun his approaches to induce mother to mortgage the house, which she holds in her own right, that he may "go into business." Business, indeed, it will be. I shall have to take up his notes for him, for anything harder to draw than a Spanish cigar will certainly make him hopelessly sick. He would be thrown entirely on his back by the danger of a protest, and go to his room in hard times, never to emerge till money was easy.

P. S. Tom is to be married!

I have just learned it, confidentially, from mother. And he has actually, the ingrate, served me as all the rest did. And they have combined to entertain mother at a round of visits among them; and the house, the old family mansion, is to be mortgaged, to furnish the parlors; and my room is to be taken for the bridal chamber; for Tom, dear brother Tom, says it is the best in the house. And I am already looked to for various exertions and preparations. Tom says he will give me a home as long as he lives. Will he, indeed! And am I to be Aunt Pattee quite into my grave by a troop of new-comers? Am I to hold the babies while my new sister receives her guests? Am I to take care of Tom's wardrobe while he and his bride are spending evenings out? O Tom, dear brother Tom!

Shall I submit? What else can I do?

SECOND P. S. I am to be married.

A widower with ten children has proposed, and I have accepted him. That is about the number I should have been entitled to if I had married at the proper time, instead of being brother Thomased into a nonentity. I would not accept my man if he had one child less, for ten is the very least number that will give me a title to stay at home and mind my own business. The care of my six sisters' and brothers' families threatens to be quite too onerous; and since Tom turns me out of my own house—fairly and properly mine—and then coolly offers me, with great condescension, a part of my own, "as long as I live," it is high time I sought a more permanent establishment.

Thomas is highly indignant. Even the Irish girl in the kitchen declares against my marrying a "widow man." My mother begs me, on account of "poor Tom," to think better of it. Poor Tom, indeed! Where is poor Patience? If the boy will get married, his wife may take care of him, and I wish her joy of it.

Here end the confessions of a maiden sister; for, before this appears in print, Miss Price will be no more. I ought, perhaps, to go back and correct the doubts at the beginning of my confessions—but, no matter. I might harmonize some apparent incongruities—but they are no matter either. The thing, as it stands, is a sort of a diary, which Miss Price leaves as a legacy to the mothers of our land, to warn them against patting and wheedling girls of domestic inclinations into old-maid nurses of brother Toms. Let the boy creatures learn to take care of themselves!

But then—after all—I do hope—when my son is born, that his ten elder sisters and brothers will be kind to him!

FLORINE GREENWAY.

BY MRS. S. A. WENTS.

"So, Florine, you expect to enjoy yourself this evening?" asked a young man of his charming sister, as she tripped gracefully into the room where he sat, and courtesied before him to display the fairy-like dress of pink gauze which floated airily around her person.

"Enjoy myself!" exclaimed the maiden, with an astonished air; "why, certainly; what should prevent? Well, how do you like me?" and she turned with a merry smile to a full-length mirror which revealed her radiant countenance, its fascinating beauty lit up with a world of eloquent pleasure that chided her thoughtful brother for even asking whether she anticipated enjoyment. How could it be otherwise, when she was always the idol of her circle, the flattered, the caressed, and (to whisper a truth which had not yet struck her own fancy forcibly), the coquette?

"You look very well!" replied her brother, after running his eye over her tasteful dress. He endeavored to check a smile of admiration; it melted into a sort of sober, comical curl of his under lip, which was peculiar to himself when he wished to throw a damper upon her. "I suppose you would look just as well baking pancakes in the kitchen!"

"O yes, I dare say!" returned Florine, half laughing and half vexed. "If you will carry a furnace and griddle to Mrs. Woods's, I'll take the batter and bake for the amusement of the company. You are so old fashioned in your notions, I verily believe that you would be delighted to see me make my appearance to-night in a calico frock and apron, with a bundle of sewing in my arms. But, my dear sir, it can't be! The wise declare that youth is the happiest period of life, and therefore I shall devote my exclusive attention to!"

"Flirting!" interrupted her provoking companion. Florine gave a quiet glance, and turned disdainfully away to tie on her bonnet and draw on her gloves. When she looked at him again, he was bending thoughtfully over his book.

"Well, I might as well be patient," thought the young girl; "I am not really a flirt; Horace is overstrained in some of his ideas. I will do better some of these days; but I can't bother my head with reform just now!" So, approaching him, she laid her hand over the page he was reading, and said, with an imperious shake of her queenly head, "Come, Horace, this minute! play the agreeable, and try to convince me that there is some chivalric feeling folded up in your loving nature!"

"Ay, ay, sweet sister, I have that within me which you wot not of," he answered, with affectionate gayety, taking up her prettily arranged little head, bonnet and all, between his hands, and saluting either cheek, as the good people did in the days of yore.

"You are spoiling my hair!" cried Florine, trying to release herself; "you know that I don't want you to do that! I wish, Mr. Horace, you would remember that your displays of affection are not agreeable to me, when I am all trimmed off. Fraternal love is entirely out of place at such times; it is the most annoying thing that I can conceive of, now! You are the greatest trial I have in the world. Just as I begin to think I look peculiarly well, you stir up the 'feeling infinite,' which prompts you to render my trouble useless. This is the fiftieth time I've had to tell you it sometimes happens that young ladies are to look at, not to touch; so save up your bursts of affection, until I sit placidly down in the kitchen, prepared to bake cakes. If I had time, I'd extend this Caudling to a more judicious length, but the carriage is at the door; so get your hat and follow sail!" The peerless scold swept out of the room, followed by Horace, who laughed at far oftener than he blamed her.

She was a beautiful and graceful creature, Florine Greenway; one of those bewitching beings who excite an interest in every heart; full of sweetness, and yet full of faults; self-willed, yet locking up within her bosom a well of tenderness to gush forth in grief over her own waywardness; possessed of high-souled feelings, and yet yielding with perfect heedlessness to present impulses. The gayety, enthusiasm, and thoughtfulness that marked her character threw about her a novel charm and freshness which made the observers desirous to penetrate beneath this changeful exterior, and to gain some knowledge of the heart that betrayed and yet hid itself. Too frequently uncontrolled by principle, Florine followed the promptings of a gay and ardent temperament which, it is true, sometimes led her right, but quite as often pointed in an opposite direction; and then, when reflection came, it brought regret and tears. The persuasions and reasonings of Horace were not without effect; but they were passed over, for the time being, with a put-off resolution to give up her dissipated life at a more convenient season. No circumstance had as yet arrested her feelings sufficiently to awaken her energies, and to call forth, on this subject, her powers of thought and action. Aware of her power, it seemed natural and right to her that all should worship at her shrine. She was a coquette, although without premeditation; surrounding circumstances were favorable to this. Living under a step-mother's roof, she had only Horace to lead her aright. He endeavored to imbue her mind with the pure principles which governed his own conduct; but, unlike him, she had not in childhood been privileged to listen to a mother's sacred teachings. Before her lips could breathe the name of parent, she was left an orphan. The difference of years between herself and Horace was not great; but, having early been thrust into the office of Mentor, he had never resigned it. Florine was too wild for that, he thought.

"You will meet with two gentlemen this evening who were old classmates of mine in college, Florine!" exclaimed Horace, breaking silence, as they rode along.

"Ah!" said his sister. "Well, are they very interesting? I hope so, if you are going to introduce them to me."

"Both of them are men of the finest talent. I will introduce both, and you can tell me the opinion you form of them afterwards. I would only recommend you to cultivate the acquaintance of one; you can easily judge which one that will be, after a short conversation."

"I shall do as I please!" said the young lady to herself; "Horace is forever telling me who I must like, and who I must not."

They soon alighted at Mrs. Woods's. On her entrance into the drawing-room, Florine was immediately made the centre of a fashionable circle. She glanced around for the friends of Horace. The expectation of being interested and entertained caused her to find it an effort to tax her capabilities of pleasing for those who had often wearied her. It was not long before her brother brought forward a pale and somewhat grave-looking young man, and introduced him by the name of Arnold. Florine was at first rather disappointed in the "prosy face," as she involuntarily termed it in her own mind; but, when the owner of that same face bowed and smiled with a dignified courtesy of manner, and bent upon her an observant eye, through which flashed his soul, a brilliant smile of surprise sprang to her lip, and she recognized, on the instant, a strong and noble nature. After a brief but mutually interesting conversation, Arnold led the fair girl forth to dance, which proceeding caused some lowering clouds to sweep momentarily over the brows of those that surrounded her, who, like many people in this wicked world, seemed to have the inveterate desire of always paying their homage just where the tide flowed, and simply because the tide did flow there. Knowing well that there were some such peculiar characters in the circle of her acquaintance, the respectful and yet independent manners of Arnold were far more gratifying to the observing Florine. She felt that she was valued, for herself alone, by one who could not be biased by the prejudices of others. She forgot, for a time, her own matchless attractions, and the un-Grecian cast of her new friend's features, in her admiration of the character which he revealed. To her surprise, she began to surmise that the English language might be equal to the silvery flow of her favorite Italian, as with patient ear she listened to the pure and elegant diction in which Arnold clothed sentiments worthy of being poetically expressed. Ah! bright Florine, that rebellious heart of thine is in danger; beware of coquetish impulses, and be not heedless as ever! After dancing, Arnold led his fair companion to a seat, and, as several flocked around her, he retired to a distant corner, and, more eagerly than he himself was aware of, marked every expression of her speaking countenance.

"Good evening, Arnold!" exclaimed a young man with an eminently handsome countenance, laying his hand familiarly upon his shoulder. "Quite a jam! Warm enough to melt all the sense out of a man's brains! I have just arrived. How have you amused yourself? Is Greenway here?"

"How many more questions, Harrington?" asked Arnold, smiling. "Yes, it is a jam. Warm also! I have been very well amused, tripping on the light, fantastic toe with a lady, and afterwards indulging my powers of observation upon this little stage of action. I have met Greenway; he is in the other room. Now, I believe, all the queries you propounded have been answered."

"Very satisfactorily!" returned Harrington. He bent forward, and sent a restless glance around the room; his eyes fell upon Florine. "Ah! who is that young lady?" he exclaimed, eagerly; "how very beautiful! I must get an introduction, if possible. I have been told that Greenway's sister is the belle; is it she?"

"It is," said Arnold, in as indifferent a tone as he could assume. "There is quite a collection of beauty here," he added, looking around. "There is a fine, classical face!" indicating a majestic woman who was leaning with graceful indolence against a heavy arm-chair.

"Yes!" answered Harrington, bestowing upon the lady a careless look; then exclaiming, as his admiring gaze returned to the unconscious Florine, "I must find Horace to pioneer me to his sister. Wish me success, for I shall doff my brightest plumes at her feet!"

"Success!" repeated Arnold, while the anxious beating of his heart said "a failure!" Lip and heart are often at war with each other. It was with earnest but regretful eyes that Arnold followed the splendid figure of his friend. He saw him grasp the hand of Horace warmly; and presently both advanced towards Florine, who smiled so graciously that the pleasure it conferred upon Harrington was about proportioned to the dissatisfaction of Arnold. Chiding himself for his selfishness, and wondering that his interest in a stranger should be so great, he left his corner, and sought new objects of interest. But that same bright face filled his thoughts, shining in their midst as a single star, outvying all others. Almost unconsciously, he turned to look upon it, and each time he saw, with displeasure, that it was quite as animated as when his own words had chased one expression after another over it. He also saw that his gifted classmate was calling forth his unrivalled powers of pleasing, and he could not but acknowledge that there were few men apparently so well endowed by nature. "I have no right to blame Miss Greenway for being interested," he thought; and yet he did blame her. A spirit of perversity had descended upon Florine. Perhaps every person possessing a good memory can recall times when all the wicked little spirits in their natures sprung up into busy life, and seemed to go on their way rejoicing, perfectly deaf to all whispers but their own. This was the case with the busy spirits that impelled Florine to vex Horace, by showing her independence in not heeding his caution with regard to one of his two classmates; that one she knew to be Harrington. She saw that his strong intellect and brilliant imagination were not united to a warm and gentle heart; she marked a certain recklessness in his sentiments; but she was led by the promptings of the moment, and, partly fascinated herself, she stooped to win the lion to her feet. She had never coquetted so heartlessly before. Arnold approached to take an early leave. There was a curious mixture of feeling in his heart as he bent his penetrating eyes upon the beautiful trifter. She blushed, and a sudden feeling that she was acting unworthily swept over her. Pride checked the outward display of that feeling, and brought a smile to her lip, as she said, with a friendly and perfectly self-possessed air—

"Good evening, Mr. Arnold! I should be happy to see you at our domicile. My brother's friends are always welcome."

"Thank you: good evening!" returned the young man, with a stately bow. Without any further remarks, he turned upon his heel and left the company, soliloquizing upon the faults of Florine. Her list of imaginary virtues also stood before him after awhile, as is usual in such cases. A cloud came and shadowed the wayward heart of Florine, as she pondered upon the altered manner of Arnold, and felt a consciousness that her lightness was the cause of it. She saw that she had fallen in his estimation: she was weary of herself, and of those around her. How great a luxury would have been the solitude of her own little room! An hour or two passed away slowly enough to Florine, for she was playing a part, and her naturally ingenuous character was little suited to disguise. To a careless observer she was the gayest of the gay; but the deep home within was filled with images of sadness: she had carelessly, nay purposely, done just as Horace wished her not to do. He had accompanied her, not to gratify himself, for he would have preferred a book at home, but to give her pleasure. She turned away from these reflections with a light sally upon her beautiful lip, but, like the restless waves, they rolled back upon the ocean of her thoughts, and she was powerless to bid them haunt her no more: therefore, she left abruptly, far sooner than she had intended.

"Did you anticipate too much pleasure?" questioned Horace, as they rolled along the silent streets on their return home.

"I am wearied now," replied Florine; "but I enjoyed the first part of the evening. I suppose you will be glad when I can say that I dislike a gay société like this?"

"Oh no! all things in moderation: but I shall be glad when you dislike to attend them so often. How did you like my friends?"

"I admired them very much!"

"Which of them had the larger share of your admiration?"

"Mr. Arnold."

"Then why, Florine, did you bestow nearly all your attention upon Harrington?"

The young girl was silent: darkness hid the crimsoning tide that rushed to her temples, the quiver of her lip, and the hot tear that rolled over her cheek; the busy little spirits that had led her on were no longer at command.

"Harrington is one of the handsomest men I ever saw," pursued Horace, a little vexed that his sister, in her usual careless way, did not give some reason, though slight, for her trifling. "I suppose you were vain of your power over the lion."

The word vain jarred on the feelings of the proud girl, and she answered with hasty bitterness, "You have no right to judge of my motives, Horace; why are you so cross to-night?"

"Perhaps if you scan your heart closely, you can guess why I appear cross. You fancy you see your ill feelings reflected in me, and"—

"When I cannot find any other amusement," interrupted Florine impatiently, "I'll scan my heart for your satisfaction, but not now; I am too sleepy to catch your ideas." She had no sooner ceased her bitter speech, than she regretted it: she folded her hands tightly together, and wept until she was perfectly wretched. "Oh! Horace, forgive me!" trembled on her lip a dozen times; but no, she could not admit that she was so entirely to blame as she felt that she was. How all the tender and watchful kindness of that devoted brother came before her mind! Each bygone word of love, each little act of self-sacrifice on his part, each bright smile of approval when she made ever so slight an effort to do right, went to her heart. "Even if I should humble myself and confess that I have been to blame," suggested a wavering fear, "I might do the same thing again. I can never be consistent. I despair of becoming different from what I am. Oh! my nature is so unfortunate, my wild impulses will forever lead me astray. Why am I not calm and unbroken, strong and even, like others? All the domestic virtues were left out of my composition; I am not fond of shedding a light around home; I am a miserable being; I do not deserve that Horace should love me. What shall I do?" These thoughts coursed rapidly through the mind of Florine. Horace sat in gloomy silence. Anxious to make him forget her unkindness, and yet unable to tame down the pride of her rebellious spirit, the wayward girl pondered upon a middle course, and turned over a thousand amiable sentences in her mind; but some objection arose in regard to each. She was bent upon not having the same subject renewed; at last she said, with a sort of timid desperation—

"Don't you feel cold, Horace?"

"No!" was the chilling reply.

It went like an ice-bolt to her heart, for her advances had always been met with more cordiality. She pressed her white hand over her eyes, and fervently wished that she had remained at home. "I deserve it," she mused, and felt almost glad that she was meeting with her deserts. The middle course was tried again.

"The wind blows in these windows, Horace; hadn't you better wrap your cloak more closely around your neck?"

"No!" he replied, in the same tone, without changing his position.

In a few moments they reached home. Florine sprang from the carriage the instant the steps were let down, and hurried into the house, weeping vehemently. She did not look back to say "good night," when her brother followed her rather hastily. She sought her chamber, and, throwing aside her bonnet, sank down in a chair; burying her face in the pillows of the bed by which she sat, she gave herself up to the unhappy feelings that crowded upon her. There came a "still, small voice" from out the depths of her soul, and its murmurs peopled that solitary apartment; she wept over the past, over the present, which was eloquent only to tell of misery. The future—it chanced to be the eve of her twentieth birthday, and, as the recollection struck her, her heart swelled with a half-defined dread of hours to come. All things seemed to whisper of past errors, of broken resolutions, and the guardian angels, who never desert us while below, implored a change. She listened to the pleadings of her softened nature, and the tenderness of repentance came to her bosom. Her tears flowed with that abandoning luxury which is so dear, after the barriers are broken down that would fain have imprisoned the influences of Heaven. She mused upon her unkindness to Horace.

"I must ask his pardon," she murmured. "My pride makes it a hard resolve. If that is made, it must be followed by resolutions harder still to keep. What would it avail for me to express my regret, and still do as I have done? No; I must either stop, or rush on and be led I know not where. I am growing more and more dissipated and confirmed in my habits. Shall I pause, or shall I yield to the thousand voices that still urge me on to seize a fleeting moment's bewildering pleasure? I never realized until now that beauty is an unfortunate dower; it has thrown into my hands an influence which I fear I have not hesitated to make others feel and regret. Oh, why have I done so? Had it not been for that, my spirit might perhaps have been clothed with a deeper beauty, that might outlast this transient casket, which must fade. It is not now too late; but can I hush the selfish heart that throbs for absorbing admiration? It has so long been fed and cherished by those who call themselves my friends. Each year has deepened within my bosom the impress of the world in which I have lived.

Oh, if society were but different, I would not be what I am—what I hate to look at by the light of truth! The corrupting influence that breathed around has tainted my very soul, and turned the whiteness of warm-hearted innocence into blackness. Why have I lived to stain the soul which God has given me? If I had but died in infancy, then the voice of conscience would never have rung so like a knell upon my ears, warning me that my daily life is building within me a Heaven for eternity or its opposite. And yet I hesitate; I try to blame society, when a deep-toned voice bids me look first within. I see my danger! Why do I wander so recklessly upon the brink of a precipice, when I shudder to behold the depths below? Have all good influences forsaken me?"

The last words broke despairingly from her half-closed lips; the pale face which she had uplifted in the earnestness of her feelings, drooped again; and she was silent with the heaviness of temptation that swept darkly over her. The hours wore on amid doubt, irresolution, and deep struggles, which nerve the heart with power, provided our better nature awakes to full life. She wearied herself at last into a troubled sleep. Daylight dawned into her apartment, and a warm sunbeam broke, in its loving brightness, over her young cheek, revealing there a single tear; yet it was worth more than the most joyous smile, for it had been chastened "far on her heart's deep sea." How often, in weariness of the soul, slumber comes to calm its restlessness, and give new life to its fainting purpose, hushing the throbs of passion, and dropping a veil of repose over excitement and gloomy disquiet! Thus it came to Florine; and, when she awoke, it was to think earnestly and clearly, and to decide. It required no slight effort for one so beautiful and courted to resign a desire for the adulation in which she had long breathed; but her course was taken, and, weak as she felt herself to be, she yet realized a heavenly support as in deep humility she prayed for a new spirit to direct her in future. She thought of Horace; there was no one in the wide world so dear to her as the brother who chided her, because he loved her deeply; no one could so soon melt her wayward spirit, and open in her heart the fountains of pure feeling that lay there, to prove, as they ever must, a blessing or a bane to the possessor. She did not quench the love that taught her her duty, but followed its leadings. Amid the changeful and mingling elements of her wild young heart, there flowed that tide of tenderness which saved her; love for a brother was the leaf that floated over the heaving waters of her soul, guiding its fate; that love, in its holy dignity, silenced all petty feelings, and made her truly noble in her meek-heartedness.

Wary and exhausted, she roused herself to lay aside the ornaments she had neglected in a heavy hour, while heedless of all but the stormy world within. Ever and anon, she bent her listening head to catch the sound of Horace's step as he passed her door. It was yet early. After neatly arranging herself for the day, she took up a book with an effort to read. Her eye ran unintelligibly over a few lines, and then came the step. The book went she knew not whither, as she sprang to the door, and, hastening out into the hall, exclaimed—

"Horace!"

"What is it?" he asked, quietly.

"Will you come here a moment?" she returned, opening the door of an apartment that joined her own.

"Certainly," he answered, his countenance softening, when he observed her pale face and slightly trembling lip. As they crossed the room to stand in their favorite window recess, he drew his arm around her waist. She lifted up a hasty glance: it told all.

"Forgive me!" she murmured, bursting into tears of mingled joy and pain. She laid her head upon his shoulder, reposing with perfect trust upon his goodness.

"I have been to blame as well as you, Florine," he said, with deep gentleness. "After this, I trust we shall both be more forbearing."

"Oh yes," sobbed the poor girl; "have patience with me, Horace, and I will try to be more worthy of your kindness. I will be more watchful. I am always hasty: how shall I ever help it? Last night I suffered for my follies; they came before me in bold relief, and made me miserable. Oh, I would not pass another such night for worlds! I was so stung with self-reproach for the past. I will not disregard your advice as I have so often done. I will endeavor to cultivate the virtues that give value to the character. But I will not promise much, for I have before this tried, in some degree, to do better; yet never, until now, have I paused and thought long and deeply; never before was there a firm, prayerful purpose set in my heart. I am conscious of my weakness, dear Horace; only help me when I seem to yield to the faults which it may take a long time to overcome fully. I trust that I shall not fail in the end, though I faint often by the way."

"Thank God for your resolutions! Oh, Florine, you cannot know how happy you have made me! I have grown sad, as I have watched you, many a time; I knew you to be capable of so much more goodness than you aimed at. I will not fear for you; look to the right Source, and you will be steadfast."

He clasped her to his heart with a pure thrill of joy, such as the angels feel over one sinner that repenteth. A tear rolled over his manly cheek, but he dashed the drop aside. Florine observed it, and the flood of grateful feelings that poured over her saddened spirit already rewarded her for what she had suffered. Horace remained with her but a short time. When alone, thought after thought came stealing through her mind with a serene and heavenly power; like the waves of the sea at sunset, so gently rose the waves of love in her heart, moved by new and tender sympathies. With all thy faults, Florine, thou needest not despair; wild and changeable as thou seemest, yet deep within thy nature has been sown the germ of many a noble and steadfast virtue—still shalt thou pursue thy way, and thy faltering step shall grow firm and free!

Several weeks after the evening which had brought so much sadness to Florine, she attended a similar assembly; a quiet softness breathed over her fair countenance, and her whole demeanor was marked by that modest grace which gives assurance of true worth. The same dark, deep eyes that watched with pain her motions on the previous evening now followed her with a satisfied interest. Arnold blessed her for the gentle reserve that revealed her character in the pure light he loved. She was not aware that he was present. He had placed himself in a retired room, by a reading-table, before she arrived; a glass door gave him ample opportunity to observe the busy scene within, which afforded him much amusement, until the light figure of Florine caught his eye. Her unusual quietness gave her a chance of being somewhat retired among the crowd. Attracted by the fragrance of some rare exotics, she entered the room occupied by Arnold. The fair girl thought she was alone, and Arnold fancied there was a shade of sadness upon her countenance. He started up and instantly met her. Her sudden smile of pleasure and recognition induced him to offer his arm; they paced up and down that charming apartment, and occasionally paused to look from the open windows upon the glory of the firmament, set with hosts of silent stars. They descanted upon the world in general, and the world of people around them; and, last of all, upon that beautiful world, a loving heart.

"How lightly falls the foot of time,
That only treads on flowers!"

Florine started, and blushed deeply, when she saw that all the company had left the parlors for supper without their observing it. Arnold laughed, exclaiming, "Will you allow me?"—Without finishing the sentence, he led the way to the supper-room, where they endeavored to enter into the gayety around them.

It is unnecessary to particularize upon the effects of the acquaintance. In about a year, Florine was settled into the amiable, home-delighting little wife of Arnold.

HELEN AND BELLA.

A LEAF FROM LIFE.

BY P. LANTUS.

READER, wish you a life-picture—one whose quiet nooks and green valleys the pencil of fancy has not tinged with an unreal hue? Read.

It was an autumn day in the country. Not yet had the snows bound their fleecy garlands upon the brows of the mountains, nor loaded the dark green hemlocks upon the hillside with their spotless treasure; but the winds were cold, and the bare trees shivered as they saw the sun sink in the clear west. Evening shades gathered thickly around the little school-house, and darkened its small patched windows. The children had long before gone frolicking to their cheerful homes and warm firesides, but still the teacher sat musing in the school-room. The fire sent out a few flickering rays of light, which played upon the wall, sportively tossing about his great shadow, sometimes pitching him in effigy headlong among the deep shadows of the old-fashioned seats, and anon twisting his face into the most uncouth contortions. But he noticed not their undignified proceedings, wrapped up in his deep reveries. At length, aroused by a fiercer blast howling around the building, rising with an abstracted air, he repeated these lines—

"Rouse thee, heart!
Bow of my life, thou yet art full of spring!

My quiver still hath many purposes;
Yet what is worth a thought of all things here?
How mean, how miserable every care!
How doubtful, too, the system of the mind!
And then the ceaseless, changeless, hopeless round
Of weariness and heartlessness and woe,
And vice and vanity! Yet these make life:
The life at least I witness, if not feel.
No matter, we are immortal! How I wish
I could love men! For, amid all life's guests,
There seems but worthy one—to do men good.
It matters not how long we live, but how!"

He closed the brown shutters, turned the creaking lock, and departed.

Walter Warren—for such was his name—was a friend of mine early and loved. Country-born, he had imbibed an enthusiasm for all its glorious scenery. He loved to listen at midnight to the hurrying tread of the wintry tempest along the tree tops, and to hear the creaking of the brave old oaks which for fifty years had shaded his home with their summer foliage. And he loved, too, the softer scenes of evening, when

"Far off in the distant east,
The mirror of the day-god rose, up borne
By angel hands."

Then would he sit and watch the silvered mountain peaks stretching their dark shadows out over the mountain lake, while the nimble rill, "dancing with prattling footstep" down the neighboring steep, made music soft and clear to chime with his own thoughts. Naturally retiring, he made few friends; but, in his seclusion, he awoke in his own breast a passion for books and quiet reverie, which afterwards became a distinctive trait in his character. In college, he lived secluded and almost alone in his little attic-room, with vines over its windows. A few extracts from an old diary, in which he used occasionally to jot down a thought, will give you a better peep into his heart than my pen is able to afford.

"Dec. —, —. The college halls are still, the hour of midnight is at hand. No sound save my little 'Gothic' upon the mantle tossing the seconds over into eternity. How solemn to watch one's very life, as steadily it is given and steadily returns to the Giver! That little pendulum very nearly measures our own heartbeats: and are not these all numbered? They are passing away—one less—one less—one less. It is a cold starry night, and the deep crispy snows cover the whole landscape. I love to look at those bright, beautiful stars—

'In their silver volumes writing
Vows of hearts in love uniting,
Truth and love forever plighting,
Lasting as their holy light'— and think of the scenes they witness: the dimple-cheeked child sleeping by the window, and dreaming of the angels she asked God a little while ago to send to watch over her; the ardent lover and soft-eyed maiden weaving their bright life-dreams; the dead sleeping in the churchyard—they see them all. Their rays linger upon the birth-couch, altar, and grave."

"April —, —. It has been a lovely day, and now the cool night breeze comes round from tree to tree and gently shakes their waving hands. An April mist curtains the hill tops, and the city below me is silent—still are the busy streets, dark the homes of the happy. As I sit here in my window-seat, thoughts promiscuous and strange come surging through my mind. Sometimes they seem born of the landscape before me, and linked with its own beautiful features, and anon whispered in my spirit's ear by silence itself. When

'Ten thousand stars are in the sky,
Ten thousand on the sea;'

when the leaves of the trees and window-vines are trembling in the evening breeze, and silvered over with holy moonlight; when the broad bosom of the river beyond mirrors the sparkling stars, or paves mist-built cities with silver—emotions will be stirred in my breast which I love. How solemn and still is it here! There are times when it seems as if we could hear the tread of angels about us. So seems it now! Hark! Are those heartbeats mine?

Is not this sighing wind a voice—a voice to my spirit? Does it not call me gently, like the words of early love? Here, angel, take my hand, if I am worthy, and lead me ever. I have, I honestly confess, at little tarrying-places along the road of life, raised my hand to take that of my angel, and almost thought I felt the gentle pressure of an angel grasp. Call it folly, if you will, but it is a beautiful, yea, a strengthening belief that an angel is watching over us. I remember one beautiful night like this, only more quiet and glorious, when it seemed, as now, that an angel stood by my side. The moon was sprinkling a silver shower of glory on all things—silence reigned profound. I attempted to give expressions to my feelings in a few lines of poetry, but never experienced so fully the poverty of language. These feelings, natives of the spirit world, cannot be woven into numbers of earthly texture. Their soft presence floats over the soul but seldom, and we should welcome them as visitors from that unseen world whose glories are too bright even for our dreams."

"May 1st, —. May-day again! Ay, it says another year is gone; but for this it brings consolation in every little flower that springs up in our pathway. A nice little bouquet is here on my table of wild flowers, of my own gathering. Ah, how their little heads seem crowding up into sight, some almost reproving me, as they look up from among the taller, gayer ones, for having plucked them to be crowded down among the rest, unnoticed, to perish! Poor flowers! ye are like many hearts in this world. Clouds gathered round the sun to check his course; he burst forth from their deep purple folds, threw a lovely woven crown of light upon the head of earth, and, sinking, crowned her his 'May Queen.' Where was my May Queen? I saw her all radiant in my heart; I wore a crown of beauty, and encircled her brow. My heart sung out a light May-song, and low I bowed before my 'queen.' Mary last night sang—

'You must wake and call me early, mother—
Call me early, mother dear!'

Who to-day have realized their song, will they ever sing the other parts? Few. The youth of most is as short almost as May, and, when it is gone, they sing no more—sing heart-songs, I mean. Ah, give me the one whose song and heart are as light and free when she beholds her last May flower, as when the rose-crown was twined in her ringlets!"

"May 2d. Last night, as I lay 'twixt sleeping and waking,' I saw from out my window the glad stars join their far-reaching hands and dance around the May Queen of the heavens—the green clad earth; and I could hear floating along the breeze the May-song of the stars!"

Walter, at the time of his introduction to you, kind reader, had been absent from college one week, engaged in teaching. It was Monday night, and he was going to a new boarding-place; for to "board around" was the inevitable fate of pedagogues in all that region. It was a nice white farmhouse, situated about a mile and a half from the school. As he pursued his way thither, he stopped often to see evening shake her dark locks over the wild hills about him, until he declared his belief that she was doing it just to delay him, and keep him there admiring her beauties. So, bidding the sly brunette good-night, he hastened on. Of his reception, you shall have his own account, which he gave me in a letter soon after.

"Dear P——, you cannot imagine what a complete little paradise I have found here at my new boarding-place—an actual oasis in the desert of school-keeping. Ah, that mindeth me of an old song we used to sing, of

'A mental oasis,
Where love and the graces
Prohibit long faces—
O yes! O yes!'

My oasis is not without flowers, P——. The first evening, I talked an hour or two with Mr. and Mrs. Minor, but could not resist the temptation to emigrate to the other side of the snug, nice parlor, where their daughter Helen sat holding 'Cousin Bella's' hand. Oh, I wish I could describe her to you as she was! Her light, graceful curls hung trembling down her neck; but in front they were drawn back like curtains from before a picture of heavenly beauty, as, indeed, they were. From the folds of these, soft-footed smiles would spring and race across her face, sometimes nestling in her sweet dimples, and again hiding in her mazy ringlets. Her lips were the most beautifully curved and kiss-provoking you ever saw. The rosy flush of seventeen was on her cheek, and her eye was as blue as distant mountains. Helen was one to whom you would love to give your last thought at night, dream about, and then wake to think of in the morning. Bella was a nervous little music-teacher, romantic, and passionately fond of poetry. She, too, had flaxen locks, and eyes of 'melting blue;' but one reads more years in her face. She has a heart complaint: it is said to be too small for its pericardium, and a little excitement makes it flutter like a prisoned bird. Had you seen me that night, you would have said, 'Walter has lost his heart now, notwithstanding his stout bachelor pretensions.' You know, dear P——, how troubled I have always been with my natural diffidence and mauvaise honte; but how strange the effect of time and circumstance! By some mysterious agency, a miracle was wrought, and the string of my tongue unloosed. Words and thoughts flowed so easily and smoothly, that I was surprised at myself. Whence the change? Do not interpret it after the manner of modern tale-writers, beaucoup you."

Next morning, our maître d'école, after a fine chat with his new-found agreeables, set out with a light heart for school. But his reveries in the old school-house were ended. The day seemed long and tedious. The scholars were dismissed with a brief good-night. "Copies" were "set" with a most reprehensible haste, and with a copy of "Festus" under his arm, Walter was again on his road to the residence of Mr. Minor. He found the ladies in the parlor as gay and lively as ever. Said he—
VOL. XLIV.—34

"I believe Satan made the most egregious blunder he ever committed, when he contrived expedients for trying the patience of Job. If he had known as much as I do, he would have commanded him to teach such a set of impenetrable blockheads as I hope, for the honor of my race, can be found nowhere in the realms of mortality, except in District No. 5, C——, Ct."

"Perhaps there were no such professional ordeals at that time," remarked Helen.

"I presume not," rejoined Walter; "and I wonder not that such a cruel and excruciating torment was beyond the ingenuity of his blackness, the Evil One himself. By the way, have you ever read 'Festus'? Look at these characters, dramatis personæ: God, Lucifer, angels, fiends, parson and student, Festus and Clara, Elissa and Helen; and these scenes: 'Heaven,' 'Hell,' 'the Sun,' 'the Center,' 'Elsewhere,' 'Anywhere,' &c. &c."

"What a strange book!" exclaimed Bella.

"Yes," continued Walter; "blasphemy, bombast, sublimity, and beauty are woven together as fantastically as the drapery of our dreams. You shall read it to-morrow while I am gone to my office, making my day-book entries in 'the red-leaved volume of the heart.' You cannot have it now, for I cannot compete with him in entertaining you; and, if he should succeed in attracting all your attention, who knows but 'Festus' and I would have a duel?"

"There is a kitten engrossing all Helen's attention now," said Bella. "I hope no such serious results will occur between you and Miss Kit. Is your jealousy as furious as that?"

"No, no, Bella; I am always very tender-hearted towards the dumb beasts, especially—entre nous—when they possess the regard of so fair a mistress, and, like Evangeline's heifer, walk 'as if conscious of human affection.' You remember those beautiful lines in the 'Rhyme of the Ancient Mariner?'—

'He prayeth best who loveth best
All things both great and small;
For the dear God, who loveth us,
Hath made and loveth all.'

A rare old piece is that, and I love it. I thought of it to-day, as I found this line in Festus—

'Love all below, and worship all above.'

See here, I have marked it."

"I declare," said Helen, "if you are not trying to prove it my duty to sit here and fondle this poor little, darling innocent, by all the authority of Old England's bards. I recommend that you quote Cowper next, 'with variations,' as Bella would say, where he declares he would not enter on his list of friends the man 'Who needlessly sets foot upon a cat.'

By the by, if some editor of Cowper's works would introduce that new reading into his edition, methinks he would receive a most decisive demonstration of gratitude from scores of poor, downtrodden grimalkins throughout the country. But cats aside," continued she, tossing a couple into the corner, "let's go to tea; here comes Charles to announce it."

After tea, our trio found themselves seated again in the parlor, industriously testing the motive functions of three huge rocking-chairs.

"You cannot imagine," said Walter, "the luxury of a good old rocking-chair to a student of lively sensibilities in college. Just think of him, shut out from the society of all, in his cold college world, meeting no roguish glances from roguish eyes, which make his heart thrill, and tell me if he will not prize the thought that, at his room, those arms are ever open to receive him. And how glorious, as one reclines in them, to know that they will never tire with the burden, and that they have no wicked little hands wherewith 'to make concussion loud' upon a fellow's auriculars! Verily, I fear my old rocking-chair has made a bachelor of me already."

"Rather your life, for a few years past, has given you a taste for seclusion," said Bella.

"Perhaps you are right, Bella; and perhaps it will soon disappear in mingling with the great world again. But, truly, I love solitude. I was one day walking thoughtfully along, at some distance from college, upon the country road; leaving this by a woody path, I soon came to as beautiful a spot as I had ever seen. It was a small secluded grove, carpeted with the softest moss, upon the bank of a deep ravine, along whose bottom, perhaps sixty feet below me, a mountain stream foamed and dashed. As I stood there, and beheld this beautiful scene, and listened to the gentle music of the proud old hemlocks above me—

'As o'er their mellow harp-strings ran
The fairy-fingered breeze'— mingling with the clearer melody of the silver waters far below, I worshiped the divinity of solitude. I searched around for a name for my newly-discovered retreat; one which, in its own significance, should be suggestive of the sacred feelings which rendered it so pleasant. I took 'Alone,' transposed, or rather reversed its letters, and named it 'Enola.'

"A beautiful name, truly," said Helen. "It sounds like Italian."

"It does," replied Walter. "Enola! it is as melodious as her own water-voices. Oh, I love to sit there upon the mossy bank, and read until Evening comes and lays her hand upon the page, saying, with her most witching smile, 'You must read no longer!' Then she sits down at my side, and we linger long, listening to the tales which the dark old trees whisper to each other; or we watch the leaves upon the distant hill, laying themselves against the warm, ruddy cheek of the West, blushing with the sun's last kiss. Sometimes the moon comes, and creates a fairy-land for us; the fleecy light-flakes, trembling upon the leaves, resemble silver lamps hung in the tree-boughs by some elfin hand to light the dim halls of their dance."

"You remind me of 'Raphael,'" said Bella. "What a complete love-sigh is that whole book!"

"And yet it must be that those are pages from the 'book of life' of some one. They are too lifelike to have been counterfeited. Still how hard to believe 'Raphael' the stern-browed statesman, Lamartine!"

"Can you believe that poets feel all they sing?" asked Bella. "If so, what a true and noble life is theirs—a life of soul-thought and feeling!"

"It seems almost impossible sometimes," returned Walter, "when we see them, and find them only poor mortals, whose coats will wear out at the elbows, and who must needs eat and drink three times a day, like other people. But we must believe that their words are but types and shadows of what fills their souls in the hour of their inspiration. I do believe that oftentimes their wildest hyperboles convey but faint and poor ideas to us, with the world's great tides sounding in our ears, of the noble thoughts of the writer. It is true that we are occasionally imposed upon by the pseudo-poet, who has learned to imitate the language of the heart, but knows nothing of its deep meanings. But I speak of the true poet. Experience is a great mine for the poet, from which to draw the material of which fancy will construct the most beautiful productions of mind. No wonder that Goëthe, after so rich and varied an experience, could portray all characters with such ability."

"One needs only to compare the character of Adelheim, in 'Göts Von Berlichingen,' with that of Clkroben, in 'Egmont,' to see his power in that respect," said Bella.

"The world of mind," resumed Walter, "is divided into the realms of intellect and sensibility. Most great men are great in but one of these. If great in the department of intellect, pursuing, with deep consecutive thought, the abstruse mysteries of the moral and physical world, they are almost total strangers to the finer and holier yearnings of our inner natures. And, on the other hand, those who have learned to paint the slightest shadings of tenderness, and to speak to the heart, know little of the great truths of philosophy, or canons of reasoning, but depend for life almost upon the sympathies of their fellow-beings. Not so with Goëthe. He was equally qualified for pursuing the occult speculations of metaphysics, and for describing the first whisperings of love in a young maiden's heart."

"But what think you of the fidelity of his love?" asked Bella.

"Indeed, by his own confession," said Walter, "he was very fickle. But his cruel and heartless conduct towards Fredrika, the vicar's daughter, merits our hearty and total disapprobation. Having insinuated himself into the warm love of this guileless maiden, and encouraged hopes which made her heart throb high, to cast her off from such a cold and worldly motive, has stained his character in our eyes with lasting disgrace."

"And who knows," added Bella, sadly, "but many of those beauties of thought, scattered through his works, are gems stolen from the casket of her heart when he rifled it?"

A silence of some minutes followed as they sat thinking of her remark, until it was broken by Helen taking up a copy of "Lalla Rookh," and saying how much she admired it. Walter did not concur in all the praise she bestowed upon it, but thought "Paradise and the Peri" a fine piece. Whereupon he commenced repeating it, and, by his animated recital, almost betrayed a deeper love for it than he had at first allowed it worthy.

"How thoroughly imbued Moore appears to have been, while writing that book, with the spirit of the East—that land over which poetry has woven a misty veil of deepest witchery," said Helen. "Oh! how I love the dim old East, with its lofty minarets glittering in such a sunlight as shines nowhere else! There have the rare old sciences of alchemy and astrology found their truest and most zealous devotees. And who loves not to go back in imagination and stand beside the wrinkled old magician in his fearful cell, surrounded by crucibles and alembics, and all around the preparations for his dark conjureries?"

"'Tis a superb jaunt," replied Walter, "and often have I performed it. I used to love, when the quick pulses of boyhood were in my veins, to dream of those wild old scenes in the twilight of the world. I have often looked for similar occupation among the moderns, for the love of the marvelous is confined to no clime or age; and, after investigating the handiwork and brain-work of almost every class of men, I think I have at last one as strange and mysterious."

"Pray, what is it?" asked both at a breath.

"Perhaps you have never heard of it," resumed Walter; "but it is strange if you have not, for it is practiced as frequently in the country as elsewhere, and surely, I think, more in accordance with the spirit of the old wizards. The proceedings are as deeply hid in silence and secrecy as was the black rite of the early days. As solemn incantations are muttered, accompanied by sounds totally unmeaning to the listener, as the planets ever heard from the eastern land."

"But what is the object of the rite?" asked Bella.

"Not to seek the Alkahest or Life-elixir; but perhaps it borders somewhat upon divination. The real object is difficult to be understood by the uninitiated, but——"

"Can we not try the experiment?" said Bella, eagerly.

"Capital, Bella! he'll be wizard, and we'll be witches!" added Helen.

"Perhaps we will in a few moments," replied Walter dryly; "but the ceremony must be performed by two only. Upon the night of the first day of the week usually, when the planets are all in peculiar places, they enter the darkened room, and perform the solemn ceremonies. They practice a rare and mysterious alchemy there, for, after regular meetings for long months, they come forth and announce the accomplishment of their object—they have exchanged hearts!—Shall we try the experiment now, Bella?"

"Oh no! no, you wizard!" said she, half laughing and half blushing; "I should never dare submit to your charms!"

Thus the evening passed away until both hands upon the old kitchen clock pointed upwards. Walter, regretting to leave his agreeable companions, at last retired, blessing all the stars that had ever exerted any influence over his destiny, that he had found such a nice retreat amid the vexations of school keeping. It was long before he could persuade his eyelids to close, so joyfully did the glad thoughts dance in his brain. At last, however, he fell asleep, half dreaming of the last sound he had heard—Helen's fawn-like footstep upon the old staircase.

Remembering that no city etiquette was making it incumbent upon him to remain in bed until eleven in the forenoon, Walter found himself in company with Helen and Bella at an early hour, standing at the eastern window of the parlor watching for the sun to rise. They were telling their dreams to each other when he joined them, and speculating upon the interpretation of them. Being asked to contribute his dream, he said, "I can remember nothing of mine, except that I saw your faces peeping in through the cold air-curtains of my bed, smiling all the time, just as you looked last night." Attention was attracted now to the East. It was, indeed, a splendid sight! Cloudy mountains stood upon earthly ones, and over their deep blue precipices played the first red rays of sunlight—now shooting through the deep dark ravine, and now trembling on a lofty cloud-spire in golden beauty. "How glorious! how beautiful!" was heard on every side.

"Look!" cried Helen; "there he comes! See him let fly that shower of golden arrows at the dun-bearded mountain-heads!"

"Rather say," said Bella, "though it be less romantic, See him lay his broad hands of light upon them in holy benediction!"

Breakfast was announced and dispatched; and, after a chat, Walter tore himself away to attend to his school duties. In this delightful manner passed the days and nights at the "Highland Home," until nearly the close of the week. Every poet from Homer to Holmes had passed under their review, and often did they laugh at what others would call their pedantry. Right merrily sped the hours for them, engaged in such conversation as related above.

Thursday evening came. "Uncle Minor," "Aunt Anne," and "Aunt Harriet" (Bella's mother), sat in the tidy kitchen, talking of their youthful days, as the cold wind mournfully swept round the corners of the house, suggesting sad and pensive thoughts. Walter and the young ladies were in the parlor, thinking that in a day or two more Bella would be in Albany, Walter boarding at one of the miserable old houses of which the neighborhood mostly consisted, and Helen left alone. I will not deny that sundry sighs were heard, and sad faces seen, as they cast their eyes backwards a few days, and met the rosy light of their joy, then forward to the ever-hidden future. At last, Walter broke their musings by a proposal as fanciful as appropriate. It was that they should all sit down at the table and write whatever each one chose; these writings were to be sealed up until one year from that hour, when—wherever they might be, in America or Europe, in city or country—they were to open and bestow a few moments' thought upon the happy "by-gones" of the days when they were together under that roof. His proposal met with hearty approval, and they immediately set themselves to work, much to the astonishment of the good aunts, who could not imagine the object of this unexpected call for pens and paper. They took their seats, dipped their pens in the standish, smoothed their paper; but no one could begin. They looked at each other, and laughed heartily at their embarrassment, until it was proposed that each should take the same text—"Look not mournfully into the Past," from "Hyperion." They did so, and soon all were busy. Helen's pen ran over the white sheet as swiftly and gracefully as a fawn runs across the plain. Bella's ran more slowly, as if she was addressing to herself what she might never read. Walter's page consisted mostly of short sentences, dashes, and hieroglyphics—each of which, should they ever meet his eyes again, would speak a deep meaning to his spirit. Bella, having written about a page and a half, her face growing more sad every moment, tore it off and declared she would burn it. "I have forgotten my text," said she. "I have been looking mournfully, too mournfully, into the Past. It will only make me sad if I ever read it." But she commenced again, and they all soon finished and sealed their self-directed letters with each other's seals, superscribing them—"Sacred to my own fingers. To be opened Nov. 21st, 18—, 10 o'clock P. M." . . .

A year rolled by, with its burden of human joys and woes. Winter frosts, spring breezes, and summer mists had passed away. Frosts had again tricked out the flowing forests with their gala dress, and the bacchan trees had quaffed at the huge flagons of the Air-king until, reeling with the intoxicating draught, they leaped and staggered in their wild and wanton dance, waving their golden plumes high in the sunlight, and glistening in their beauty. All this had gone by. November had come. It is the evening of the "21st," and the stars twinkle brightly in the clear frosty air. You see a light stealing out from the closely-curtained parlor window of the "Highland Home." Helen is waiting the appointed hour, at the same table where those letters had been written. There she sits, as smiling and beautiful as ever! Ah! who is that with her? Avaunt! we are trespassing. "Heart alchemy" going on here! But hold! let's wait and see if she keeps her engagement. Five minutes to ten! Hark! the front door closes. How fortunate! She will now be alone. Now let's peep again. She is sitting with the letter in her hand. Now she opens it. How the smiles and clouds chase each other over her face! Now she looks where each one sat—gone! Ah! now her bright eye dims. She leans forward upon the table, and is silent. . . . At last, she takes up a book mechanically, and the following, upon the flyleaf, strikes her eye for the first time—

"W. F. WARREN.

"When 'twere sinful
To be unhappy."

"HELEN."—Festus.

"HIGHLAND HOME, Nov. 21st, 18—."

Yes, Helen, he left that there for thee!

Bella is sitting in a city chamber. The rumbling tide of life in the street below has somewhat abated its surgings; yet an occasional dash is still heard along the brick-paved shores. She sits in her large easy chair, gazing into the bright, cheerful grate. But her thoughts chime not with its cheerful glow, for she is gazing backward, and her eye looks deeper as the heavens look higher at sunset, when the sun's rays fly back over the day's course. The clock strikes. A sigh! "The hour has come," she mused. "This is the letter I have so often charged mother to burn unopened should I go to my grave-sleep before this day. Where are Walter and Helen to-night!" She opens the double seals, and, as she runs over the remembered lines, her eyelid quivers. She throws it into the grate, leans back in her chair, and is lost in reverie. Bella! thou art "looking mournfully into the past!"

In his little attic room, which he still kept, though a "senior," for the memories he had associated with it, was Walter. He had not forgotten the day. As the concerted hour approached, he took, from a portfolio of souvenirs and other treasures in his trunk, his well-kept letter. He then locked the door and walked the room in deep meditation. He was but a few miles from the home of Helen, and might very easily have been there to read their epistles in common, but he dared not trust his heart. Now he feels lonely and sad. His "little Gothic" tells ten, and he opens the year-sealed page. Every word speaks to his soul. He bows his head, and tears glisten! He feels that he is alone in the wide world, and his heart is heavy. Presently, he goes to the window and gazes out upon the night-scene. The holy stars seem to soothe his spirit. Turning his eyes towards the hill visible at the home of Helen, he says: "They are thinking of me. I'm not alone. Does not this great blue dome cover us all? I'm not alone!"

Such was the night of November 21st. Who noted it, or thought of the interest some warm hearts were attaching to it? None. Who knows, reader, but to-night, so unnoticed by us, is another November 21st to other hearts as full of interest?

Other years passed on in the mighty rounds of time. It was a summer evening, and Helen of the lofty brow and "heaven-blue eye" sat in the piazza of a beautiful New England country-seat, surrounded by a prattling group of fair-haired and bright-eyed children—her own. All the beautiful scene before them was lit up with golden moonbeams, and, as she raised her eyes to the Giver in thankfulness for her lot, she pointed out to her little nestlings the beauties which God had scattered so profusely around them, and tried to lead their minds away to the fairer bowers of the better land. The name of one was Bella—of another, Walter.

That same golden evening of New England settled over lovely Italy in all the witchery of Italian moonlight. Walter was there. Having rambled through all her galleries, and drank deeply the inspiration of her master minds from the noble works they left behind them, he was this evening strolling among the less artistic monuments of a quiet little graveyard. Upon one he read—

"BELLA SLEEPS."

Struck by the beauty of the inscription, as well as by the language (the others all being Italian), he learned, upon inquiry, that it was the grave of a young American lady whose aged mother had consigned her to her last resting-place under the mild skies she used so well to talk of. They were on a tour for health, but the poor mother had gone back with a desolate heart, leaving her only daughter in the foreign land—and in the grave! Walter, remembering the enthusiasm with which she used to talk of visiting the home of music and painting, doubted not that this was "Bella's" grave, and she too, he remembered, was an only daughter. He sat down upon her grave and wept; his stout heart gave way. He culled a few wild flowers, and placed at her head, saying—

"You used to love flowers; but sweeter ones are yours now. You loved pictures; but, though you no longer see

"the one Which God hangs nightly on the ruddy West," yet brighter ones are yours in the galleries of the 'New Jerusalem.' Peace to thee, Bella—peace to me!"

He wrote the initials of his name upon the marble slab, and underneath—

"Whose heart was wrinkled long before his brow."

Then, taking one farewell look at the green-fringed grave, he took up his weary life-journey again, more lonely and sad than ever.

I have finished, dear reader. I promised but a life-scene, and I have given it. Ye who cannot endure a tale without the dénouement of a marriage, cast aside these simple pages, and say you have wasted your time.

THE ENTHUSIAST.

BY CLARA MORETON.

"I acknowledge that I love him, but he shall never come between me and Heaven. I am used to sorrow."

Oh, cruel heart that would my heart lay bare,
And seek with earthly love to spread a snare!
Oh, spirit strong, that would my spirit thrall,
And chain to earth its hopes and longings all!

I know thy power, yet hold myself to be Able to triumph o'er the world and thee—
Renouncing earthly love, if need require,
While in my breast there glows a purer fire.

Though troublous sorrows compass me around,
Though grief doth leave its ever rankling wound,
Yet still in duty's path I'll persevere,
Nor hardships great, nor hidden dangers fear.

Life hath ne'er been to me a field of flowers;
The world hath never built for me her bowers;
In youth, I found the thorn before the rose—
Seldom for me the buds their sweets disclose.

"Sometimes they're nipped by the untimely frost;
Sometimes by blight or hidden worm they're lost;
But, though I mourn, my sorrow I restrain—
God loveth those to whom he giveth pain.

Renounce the world!—its pomp, its gilded show—
And seek the well-springs of thy heart to know!
Its turbid waters then shall grow more pure,
And Folly's giddy whirl no longer lure.

Renounce the world! it yields nor peace, nor joy,
Nor aught of happiness without alloy:
Strive for the crown the humblest Christian wins,
And seek forgiveness for thy many sins.

For thee my heart shall frequent plead in prayer;
Though strong its love, it shall not prove a snare:
"I know thy power, yet hold myself to be Able to triumph o'er the world and thee."

MODEL COTTAGE.

A Dwelling with four rooms and other conveniences, and a large rustic portico.

Accommodation.—The entrance is direct into the kitchen, a, from which there is a passage, b, to the back-kitchen and to the cellar stairs; staircase to the bed-room c; d is the back-kitchen, from which there is a pantry, l; e is the parlor; f, a bed-room; g, a place for fuel; h, a dust-hole; i, a place for poultry; and k, a water-closet. THE SOLDIER'S SON; OR, THE TRIUMPH OF VIRTUE.

BY MARY, OF FLEMINGTON, N. J.

"Cast thy bread upon the waters, and thou shalt find it after many days."

"SHALL I take your baggage, sir?" said an intelligent-looking boy to a traveler, who had just arrived at one of the principal hotels at Louisville.

"My servant takes charge of it," replied the gentleman.

But, struck with the peculiar expression of his countenance, as the boy retired, he flung him a piece of money. The boy looked at it with hesitation, and his pale cheek reddened to crimson. Picking it up at length, he approached the traveler with an air of embarrassment.

"Excuse me, sir; I sought employment, not alms."

"True, my little son," said the gentleman, laughing; "but you surely will not return so small a trifle on my hands."

The boy stood for a moment in silence; his young spirit evidently recoiled from the idea of appropriating the humiliating gift. He remained twirling it in his fingers. There was an expression of mingled haughtiness and gratitude in his manly features, and his slender form assumed all the irregular attitudes of indecision. At this moment a beggar approached, and his countenance brightened.

"Permit me," said he, bowing gracefully to the traveler—"permit me to transfer your bounty." And, presenting the coin to the humble mendicant, he instantly disappeared.

The little incident made a strong impression on the mind of the stranger. Two days afterwards, he distinguished the elastic figure of the boy amongst a group of laborers. Pleased at again seeing him, he immediately approached him.

"May I ask your name, my young acquaintance?" he inquired, in a tone of kindness.

"Wilder Lee," replied the boy; and he still continued to ply the instrument of labor with increasing diligence.

Our traveler, whose name was Wilton, looked at him with increased interest. The extreme beauty of his countenance, its marked expression of high and noble feeling, strongly contrasted with the coarseness of his dress and the rudeness of his employment.

"Have you no parents?" inquired Mr. Wilton.

"I have yet a father."

"And what is his vocation?"

"He is a worn-out soldier, sir, of the Revolution."

And the boy applied himself to his task with an intensity that seemed intended to prevent any further interrogation. The tenacious stranger, however, was not to be shaken off.

"Do you live with your father?"

"Certainly, sir."

"And where?"

The boy pointed in silence to a decayed and miserable-looking dwelling. Mr. Wilton sighed. A keen November blast, which at the moment whistled around him, told him the inadequacy of such a shelter.

"A soldier," he mentally exclaimed; "and perhaps his blood has been shed to secure the rights of those who now revel in luxury."

A few hours afterwards, he knocked at the door of the shattered habitation. If an interest in the father had been already awakened by the son, it was at once confirmed by the appearance of the old man now before him. He had raised his head slowly from his staff, on which he was leaning, at the entrance of the stranger, and discovered a countenance on which the lines of sorrow and suffering were distinctly traced. Still, there was something in his high, though furrowed brow, that told his affinity with the proud Wilder; and the ravages of infirmity had not altogether robbed his wasted form of the dignity of the soldier.

"Will you pardon the intrusion of a stranger?" said Mr. Wilton. "I have been led hither merely to chat an hour with a Revolutionary veteran."

"He who comes to cheer the solitude of darkness must be welcome," said the old man.

And Mr. Wilton now perceived that he was entirely blind. The events of the Revolution afforded an easy clue to conversation, and they chatted without effort.

"I would," said Mr. Wilton, "that every one who assisted in our glorious struggle might individually share the prosperity it has confirmed to our nation. I fear, however, that there are many whose blood cemented the proud fabric of our independence that are themselves left in want and obscurity."

"True," said the old man; "the decayed soldier, whose strength was wasted in the conflict, has but little for himself at home. But I trust his posterity will reap the harvest he has sown."

"You have a son," said Mr. Wilton, "worthy of such a harvest. Is the youth called Wilder your all?"

"All that survives of a large family. He alone, the child of my old age, has been spared to save me from utter dependence."

"Have you been long deprived of sight?" asked Mr. Wilton.

"Only two years."

"And, during that period, have you had no resource but the labor of your son?"

"None. But the wants of a soldier are few, and the filial piety of my boy renders him cheerful under every privation that affects only himself. He labors incessantly, and I have no regret but that of seeing him thus fettered to servitude."

"I would," said Mr. Wilton, with enthusiasm—"I would I could place him in a sphere more suited to his worth! With the advantages of education, he would become an ornament to society. But this, under your peculiar circumstances, he cannot have even in an ordinary degree."

"But for his taste for learning," said the old soldier, "he must have been utterly destitute. There were hours, however, when he could not labor, and, as these were always devoted to study, he has gradually acquired its common principles."

The entrance of Wilder himself interrupted the conversation. He had brought some little delicacies for his father, the avails of his day's labor.

"I have just been thinking," said Mr. Wilton, "of making some arrangements, with the approbation of your father, for your future establishment. I grieve to see a boy of promise thus losing the spring-time of life."

"You forget, sir," said Wilder, respectfully bowing, "that I can accept no proposal that would separate me from my father, however advantageous."

"Certainly not, in his present situation; but I have friends here who will readily assist me in making a suitable provision for his support; and you may then be put to business that will secure you a future competence."

"Impossible, sir. My father can have no claims like those on his son. 'Tis but a short time since my weakness required his support; and shall I now transfer the duties of filial gratitude to the hand of charity?"

Mr. Wilton knew not what to reply.

"Do not think me ungrateful for your proffered kindness," continued the boy, while his dark eyes swam in tears, and every trace of pride suddenly gave place to the liveliest expression of gratitude. "I feel most deeply your solicitude for my interest; but, indeed, sir, I am perfectly happy in my present condition. My father, too, is satisfied with the slender provision which my labor affords; and, should it hereafter become insufficient, I will not scruple to ask the aid of benevolence."

Mr. Wilton was affected. The soldier again leaned his head over his staff, and was probably invoking blessings on the head of his son. A storm had commenced, and the sleet was even then dripping through the broken roof. Mr. Wilton rose to depart.

"Must I then go," he exclaimed, "without rendering you any service? Will you not even accept?"—and he put his hand into his pocket.

But Wilder drew back with an expression that answered the unfinished sentence.

The old man gave him his hand with an air of benignity—

"Accept my thanks, sir; and suffer me to inquire the name of him who has thus sought the dwelling of poverty?"

The stranger gave him his name and address, and, receiving a promise that they would seek him in future need, reluctantly left them.

Mr. Wilton was a man of feeling, but he was also a man of pleasure; and, with the votaries of dissipation, the soft and holy whisperings of benevolence are too often lost in more seductive strains. The scene he had now witnessed had, however, awakened all his better principles. The dignified submission of the father, the proud humility of the son, preferring the most servile labor to the shadow of dependence, his deep, but quiet tenderness for his unfortunate parent, and his perfect exemption from selfish feeling, all were vividly impressed on the visitor. If intercourse with the good influences even cold and torpid hearts, that influence must be strong, indeed, on the soul of feeling.

For a little time, the pageantry of the world lost its power on the gay Wilton, and all the haunts of pleasure were forgotten. He shuddered as he contrasted the elegancies that surrounded him with the destitution he had witnessed. The straw pallet of age and infirmity, the picture that memory drew, seemed even yet more vivid than the reality. The following day, Mr. Wilton had left the city; but a blank cover, inclosing two hundred dollars, had been placed, by an unknown hand, in that of the old soldier.

Years passed away, and the glow of unearthly pleasure that the traveler then experienced was gradually forgotten. The blandishments of pleasure resumed their wonted influence, her glittering wave hurried him onward without the power of reflection; and, if a momentary wish would have led him to inquire the further fate of Wilder Lee, the bright phantasms that surrounded him diverted his purpose. Death had deprived him of an amiable wife, whose influence might have won him from the sphere of illusion; and his only child, early accustomed to the rounds of fashionable pursuits, thought not of opposing them.

The exalted sentiments, however, which, even in childhood, she had imbibed from her mother, preserved her from that contaminating influence; and, amid the blights of a gay world, the purity of her character remained stainless as the snows of the unapproachable cliff. Gentle as the reed of summer, she yielded to the impulses of those with whom her lot was cast; but her mind, supported by high and frequent communion with the memory of her sainted mother, escaped the thralldom which habit might otherwise have secured. At the age of fifteen, she accompanied an invalid friend to the medical springs of Harrodsburg. This village, at that time, was a place of fashionable resort, and, to a mind like that of Isabel Wilton, afforded themes of limitless reflection. The buoyancy of health was here contrasted with the languor of disease; the hectic of death with the laugh of revelry; palpable images of mortality mingled with the votaries of pleasure; the listless who strove to annihilate time, and the dying who sought to add yet a few more days to those they had now to number.

Soon after the arrival of Isabel, she was one day struck, on entering the common sitting-room, by an old man, who sat alone, and apparently unnoticed. His sightless eyes, his palsied limbs, and the white locks that were thinly scattered over his pallid features, all at once riveted her attention. Her heart throbbed with pity, but reverence mingled with compassion, as she marked the settled and placid expression of his countenance. At no great distance, a group of ladies were indulging in bursts of merriment, which, at this moment, struck discordantly on her heart. She felt that the presence of unfortunate age should at least inspire respect, and, involuntarily approaching the unheeded old man, she was half resolved to address him. Her natural timidity, however, withheld her, until she was at length called by one of the gay group to partake of some strawberries. The irresolute expression of her countenance at once changed to that of pleasure.

"I will beg some," she said, unhesitatingly, presenting her work-basket, "for this old gentleman." And she then approached him without embarrassment. "Will you accept some strawberries, sir?"

The voice of Isabel was like the low, sighing tones of an instrument; it touched every chord of the soul. The old man received them with a smile that spoke a benediction; while an elegant, though youthful stranger, who stood reading a newspaper with his back towards them, suddenly turned round and fixed his eyes on the blushing girl with mingled admiration and surprise. She instinctively retreated, and joined the group she had hitherto shunned, mingling in their trifling.

Soon after, the youth himself approached with her basket. Presenting it with a look of indescribable import, he said, "Accept, miss, the thanks and blessings of age for your delicate attention." He then disappeared. In a short time, he returned, and addressed the old man in a tone of respect and tenderness: "I have at length found more quiet lodgings, sir, and will attend you whenever you feel able to walk." The old man rose, and, leaning on the arm of the youth, they left the apartment.

"They are to be temporary sojourners in the village," thought Isabel, and a sensation of pleasure, of which she was perhaps unconscious, arose from the idea of again meeting them.

They met the next morning at the spring, and again and again met.

Who shall describe the mingling of kindred spirits? Who shall trace the intricate and delicate sources of that mysterious passion which sweeps like a torrent over the human soul? Scarcely a word had passed between the youthful strangers; they knew nothing of each other beyond the limits of a few short days; yet the years that preceded had become to them as a tedious dream, their present was their all of existence, and resembled the renovated life of the chrysalis, when it "sails on new wings through summer air."

As yet, however, unconscious of the dangerous source of this new sense of enjoyment, they met without embarrassment. The blush that dyed the cheek of Isabel in the presence of the stranger was that of abstract pleasure; and the light which flashed upon his eye at her approach was brilliant as the rays of heaven. The failing health of the old blind man, whom he daily attended to the spring, afforded their only clue even to a passing remark. The deep interest which his appearance excited in the bosom of Isabel conquered the scruples of vestal reserve, and she frequently ventured a timid inquiry respecting the aged invalid.

There are a thousand nameless attentions too trifling for description, that come with a cheering influence over the feeling heart, like the imperceptible breeze that stirs the delicate leaf. Such were the attentions which misfortune invariably elicited from the hand of Isabel, no matter how narrow her sphere of action. Her voice, her step, were already known to the discriminating ear of the old man; and, if his cane was dropped, or a seat brought, he knew the ready hand that presented them. He was, however, evidently and rapidly failing; and, at length, Isabel met the interesting stranger no longer.

Three days elapsed, and her attendance on her friend became a penance. A walk was proposed, and, weary of herself, she gladly became one of the party. As they passed within view of the village cemetery, her attention was arrested by a funeral procession. Their duties were finished, and they were returning; but there was one who yet lingered, and, with folded arms, leaned over the new-made grave. Could it be?—yes, it was the young stranger, and Isabel comprehended the melancholy scene! The party proceeded, and, ere their return, the surrounding landscape was flooded with the silver light of the full moon.

The feelings of Isabel were rendered yet more intense by the softening influence of the hour, and, almost unable to proceed, she leaned on the arm of her friend, whose health was yet but imperfectly restored, and fell behind her gayer companions. Again her eye was turned towards the last asylum of humanity; the solitary mourner had left the spot, and, with a faltering step, was slowly returning to the village. Their paths intersected, and he was already before her. He bowed, and both were some moments silent. He at length said, in a voice of suppressed emotion—

"The cause that brought me hither is now terminated in the grave. I leave this place to-morrow. Permit me, then, miss, even at this moment of sorrow, to thank you for the interest you have evinced in the sufferings of my departed father, and for the soothing attentions you have paid him. If the cup of affliction is ever yours, may some spirit gentle as your own temper its bitterness—some being, bright and lovely as yourself, hover around your pillow!"

Isabel could not reply. Her party had now halted, and she rejoined them.

The young stranger uttered a stifled farewell, and, striking into another path, disappeared.

On her return, the subdued Isabel was pressed to the bosom of her father. If anything at that moment could have given her pleasure, it was his arrival, as she was anxious to leave a spot that was now utterly devoid of interest. The light adieu of ceremony were easily concluded, and, early the following morning, she was equipped for departure.

As her father handed her into the carriage, he stopped to speak to an acquaintance, while a young man, who was passing at the moment, suddenly paused, and, clasping his hands, exclaimed—

"Mr. Wilton, my benefactor!"

"I do not understand you, sir," said the astonished Wilton. "I know of no one who can give me so flattering a title."

"Ah!" said the young man, whose countenance and voice were but too familiar to the trembling Isabel, "am I then so changed? I am Wilder Lee, the soldier's son, whom seven years ago you rescued from poverty."

Mr. Wilton pressed his hand with emotion.

"You mean I would have rescued, but for his intolerable pride."

"Ah, sir, evasion is unnecessary. We could not mistake the hand that relieved us. Have you, then, no interest in hearing—will you not suffer me to tell you what has been the effect of your bounty?"

"I shall gladly listen to anything in which you are concerned," said Mr. Wilton.

"Two days after you left us, my father was removed to a more comfortable dwelling, and I was entered at school. I could yet attend to the personal wants of my father; and, incited to exertion by every claim of gratitude and duty, I could but progress in my studies. I was soon a ready penman and accountant; and, a year afterwards, was received into a wealthy mercantile house as a clerk. My wages enabled me to make immediate provision for my father, and they were yearly augmented; and now," he added, in a subdued tone, "since he is called to receive far higher wealth than that of earth, my first exertion will be to discharge the pecuniary part of my obligation, which has so greatly influenced my present destiny."

"The obligation you speak of does not exist," said Mr. Wilton. "An ample equivalent was at once received, in the pleasure of assisting those who were worthy. Do not, then, wound my feelings by so unjust an allusion. But, tell me, is your venerable father no more?"

Wilder briefly sketched the late events. And Mr. Wilton now shook him warmly by the hand.

"Farewell, dear Wilder; my carriage has been some time waiting. Believe me that I rejoice in your prosperity, and remember that you may always command my friendship."

Wilder looked wistfully after him as he departed, but the form of Isabel was not visible. She had shrunk back in the carriage at his approach, and had thus escaped observation. From her father, who was himself too much excited to notice the agitation of his child, she now heard a description of his first knowledge of Wilder Lee. She made no comments, but every word was treasured up in her heart; and, though years passed away without a single event to recall his memory, every vision of her fancy, every idea of romantic excellence in the imagination of Isabel, was identified with his image. This imperishable attachment, however, partook of the high tone of her mind. It was a deep and sacred principle, hidden in the recesses of her heart, and leaving no trace on the surface of her character.

Isabel was far too lovely to remain unsought, and Mr. Wilton was astonished at her decided rejection of repeated and splendid offers. He expostulated, he entreated, he taxed her with perverseness. She deprecated his anger with seraphic gentleness. She anticipated his every wish; but her firmness remained unshaken. His attention was at length called to objects of yet deeper anxiety. His love of pleasure, his recklessness of gain, had gradually wasted an estate which, though sufficient for all the chaster elegancies of life, was inadequate to the support of prodigality.

He now stood on the verge of ruin, and those who had shared his substance looked coldly and carelessly on his wreck; while the unhappy Wilton, driven to madness, could scarcely believe the perfidy of the world he had implicitly trusted. The family seat was to be publicly sold, and the fearful day arrived. While it was yet under the hammer, a new bidder appeared, apparently from a distance; his horse dripped with sweat, and his countenance was pale and agitated. The property, as usual in such cases, was going at half its value, and the stranger bid it off. Mr. Wilton was still the occupant, and the new proprietor waited on him immediately. Isabel had that moment left her father for some domestic call, and the unfortunate man was musing on their impending expulsion from their recent residence, when Wilder Lee stood suddenly before him.

"Welcome, most welcome to my heart, dearest Wilder," he exclaimed; "I can no longer welcome you to my home. You have come to witness my removal from all that was once mine. I am now here only on sufferance. To-morrow I may have no shelter for my head."

"Not so," cried Wilder; "you have yet a shelter; your present home is still yours; and no earthly power can expel you from it."

"What mean you?" said the astonished Wilton.

"Fourteen years since," he replied, "you presented my father a sum which then preserved him from want, and secured my subsequent wealth. He received it but as a loan, and that debt devolved on me. True, you disclaimed it; but it was yet uncancelled. Reluctant to offend you, I delayed its discharge, though the amount was long since appropriated in my imagination for that purpose. It has not, however, lain idle. The profits of the house in which I some years ago became a partner have been considerable. Your little capital has acquired its share, and its amount has this day redeemed your forfeited estate. By a mere accident, I had seen it advertised, and I lost no time in hastening hither; and now," he added, with a smile, taking the hand of Mr. Wilton, "will you not welcome your Wilder to your home? It is not long since you gave me a check on your friendship; I have come to claim it: and surely you can no longer refuse the title of my benefactor, when from your bounty I derived not only wealth, but the pleasure of this moment."

Mr. Wilton wept. The thoughtless man of the world wept at the sacred triumph of virtue. Wilder himself was overcome by the scene, and paced the floor in silence. A portrait of Isabel hung directly opposite him, and it now caught his eye. Starting back with amazement, he gazed at it as a lovely phantom. It looked indeed like a thing of life. The blue eye seemed to beam with expression through its long dark lashes, and there was surely breath on the deep red lip. Just so the auburn hair was parted on her white forehead when he last saw her. Just so its shining ringlets strayed over her snowy neck.

"Tell me," he at length exclaimed, turning to Mr. Wilton, "who is the original of this picture?"

Surprised at the agitation of his manner, Mr. Wilton replied—

"Have you never seen her?"

"Seen her! oh yes; her image has long been engraved on my heart; but of her name I am yet ignorant."

"Her name is Wilton," said the astonished father. "She is my only child."

"Gracious heavens!" exclaimed Wilder, "what new excitement awaits me!"

"May I ask the cause of this emotion, Wilder? How, or in what manner, have you known my beloved Isabel?"

Wilder gave a wild and passionate description of their early and limited acquaintance, and the long concealed attachment of his daughter was at once revealed to Mr. Wilton.

"Tell me," he said, taking the throbbing hand of his friend, "tell me, Wilder, in sacred faith, if this imperfect knowledge of my child has awakened a sentiment of tenderness."

Wilder flung himself into his arms.

"Ah, sir, have I not cherished her memory through the long season of utter hopelessness? has not my spirit turned from all allurements of the world, to commune with the recollection of her virtues?"

Mr. Wilton left the room in silence, and returned with the trembling Isabel.

"You are worthy of each other," he said, and joining their hands, he invoked the blessings of heaven on the dearest objects of his heart. He then left them to pour out his gratitude to Him who had thus redeemed the everlasting promises.

"Cast thy bread upon the waters, and thou shalt find it after many days."

SKETCHES OF SOUTHERN LIFE.

BY PAULINE FORSYTH.

It is seldom that a great man has not some imitators, a troop of meeker minds who follow more or less obediently in the footsteps of their exemplar. A man is possessed by some new idea—it gives him no rest till he brings it before the world in the shape of words or deeds; instantly up start a throng of people to whom that idea has come as the embodiment of their life-dream; and as Correggio, when, ignorant and untought, he stood before the pictures in the old cathedral, exclaimed, "And I, too, am a painter!" so do they gird up their loins and set out on the path which their great pioneer has hewn for them through the wilderness. Somewhat like these were my reflections when I read the "Confidences of Lamar-tine." Not that he can claim the merit of perfect originality, which even in the days of Solomon was a departed glory, for Rousseau far surpasses the poet and politician of Paris in the fullness of his self-revealings. But few would venture to hold themselves up to blame or contempt like Rousseau; while there is hardly one among us who looks back over some forty or fifty years, who could not, if he chose,

"Shoulder his crutch and fight his battles over again," and tell tales of tender love and youthful adventure, of strange scenes and very peculiar people, that would both amuse and astonish the heavens to find that such common-place persons should have seen so much. And so I have been looking for

"Tales of my Youth," by Mrs. Jones, or "Revelations of Bygone Years," by Mrs. Smith; but as, so far, no one seems inclined to soar into immortality in the track made illustrious by Lamartine, the thought struck me that I might supply the desideratum, and give the public some of my own adventures "a long time ago."

I woke up one morning when I was "just seventeen," no matter how many years ago. I have refused for a long time to tell any one, even the census man, who I thought pressed the question in rather an inconsiderate manner, to say the least: he said the law required him to do so; but what business have laws with women's ages? So I stood on my reserved rights, and the poor man does not know to this day how old I am, and I do not see but the country gets along as well as ever. When I woke up I remembered that my education had been finished, technically speaking, three months before; that I had spent time enough in visiting my relations; and that now I must do something for myself. I could do nothing but teach, and the thought that then perplexed me was as to the place in which I should exert my untried powers. In the city in which I was educated teachers swarmed, and filled to overflowing every nook and corner, and I was too young and diffident to push my way through the crowd. But an opportunity soon presented itself. One of my relations had a friend who had established a large and flourishing academy in Alabama. I had been for some time in the habit of reading her letters; and as they spoke of picnics, and roses, and balmy breezes, at a time when we were wrapped in furs, wading through the snow or slipping on the ice, with our noses blue from the east winds, and our cheeks stiff with the frosty air, Loudon in Mississippi had become a perfect paradise of delight in my imagination. To have the whole year hardly anything but one long and glowing summer, was such a contrast to the 'three hot days and a thunder shower,' as that fitful season in my own State has been too truly described, that I was seized with a desire to see for myself the beauties described, and enjoy the pleasures of the far-off southern land.

I brooded over my wish in silence for several days, not dreaming that it could be accomplished. At last I ventured to speak of it to my aunt, who, to my astonishment, said instantly, "Yes, certainly; it will be the very thing for you; it will give you confidence: I will write to Mrs. Carrington about it directly." In the course of a few weeks' matters were settled entirely to my satisfaction. Mrs. Carrington was very glad to receive the niece of her old friend, and wrote to me to come on as soon as possible, with a music teacher whom she had engaged from the same city. We had but a few days for preparations and adieu, and almost before I had time to reflect, I found myself seated in the cars, and waving a smiling farewell to my cousin, who came to see me off. My companion, Miss Johnson, a lady no longer in her "first youth," was so astonished at my hard-heartedness that she forgot the tears she had intended to shed, in seeing that I laughed, actually laughed when the cars started, and looked round at her for sympathy. I did not understand her gaze of scorn and superiority, I merely thought she looked cross; but before long she enlightened me. At the first opportunity, though we were almost strangers, she took her handkerchief from her eyes and assured me that she thought me worse than stony-hearted—pebble-hearted—and that if I did not feel any sorrow at leaving my friends, I ought to have the grace to feign a little. I stared at her and laughed again, and she again buried her face in her handkerchief.

The gentleman who had the charge of us was a good sort of a man, and certainly did his duty by our baggage faithfully: he would have done the same by me if I would have permitted him, but he was guilty of a great indiscretion, which entirely lost him my favor; he attempted to pet me in a fatherly sort of way, and that being contrary to all my preconceived ideas of a woman and a teacher, I decidedly withdrew from him and retired into myself. His next offence was to ask me at every jolt of the stage, and whenever we were going up and down hill, "Are you frightened, my dear Miss Pauline?" In those days nothing ever frightened me; I had "no nerves and no sensations;" and my indignant denials created a great deal of amusement for the rest of the company at our expense. I had no idea that they were observing us till, in the midst of a thunder shower which overtook us in the middle of the night on the top of one of the Alleghanies, there came a flash of lightning so vivid and near that the peaks of the mountains all around appeared for a moment on fire; in a second followed a tremendous crash of thunder rattling among the hills, and seeming almost to shake them from their foundations. Never, before or since, have I witnessed a scene of such terrible beauty; I was entranced by the sight, but no thought of terror entered my breast. In fact, all my powers were so absorbed that, when my tormentor asked, as usual, "Are you frightened, Miss Pauline?" my reply of "At what?" was given with such evident surprise and unconsciousness, that it was received with a burst of laughter from all the rest of the company, excepting Miss Johnson, who scolded me severely at our next stopping-place for my very unfeminine conduct. As for herself, she shrieked and caught hold of our old gentleman every two or three minutes; and he, declaring that I had too much philosophy for him, devoted himself to her for the rest of the journey.

It had been settled that the first few weeks of our residence in Loudon should be spent at a planter's hospitable house, till we could make other arrangements for ourselves. This pleased me very much, for in my imagination a Southern planter held a sort of a middle place between a baron in the old feudal times of Europe, and a northern farmer. Visions of magnificence, of boundless liberality and hospitality, rose before me whenever my thoughts turned to my future home. I recalled a country-seat near Boston, remarkable even there for its beauty; I enlarged and improved it to suit my own ideas; I laid out around it extensive grounds in groves, orchards, and gardens; within the house all was luxury, without all was beauty and order; and well-trained servants, each performing the duties allotted to them with faithfulness and devotion, completed the picture.

Full of these thoughts, I stepped into the carriage that was to take us from the last inn to Mr. Percy's, our hospitable host. We said good-by to our old gentleman, and rattled off over a road that at any other time I should hardly have considered passable; but I was trembling with excitement, and underwent the formation of several new phrenological developments on Squire Easy's principle, without a murmur, and almost without consciousness. Not so with Miss Johnson.

"Did you ever see such an old rattle-trap as this carriage?" she exclaimed, after having tried in vain to settle herself comfortably. "I wonder if this is their state affair?"

I examined it with more care, and found that it had a rather battered and shabby look. It had evidently seen good service, and the springs seemed to be resting from their labors. They probably thought they had done their duty, and that it was our turn to take the jolting, which we did per force in our own way; I laughing heartily, while Miss Johnson's groans would have silenced Heracitus. Laughter has always been my besetting weakness—I will not call it sin; it has carried me too lightly and buoyantly over many of the minor miseries of this life for me to treat it so ungratefully, though now and then, I must confess, it has pitched me upon some terrible rocks.

Just as it was growing dark, a little ragged boy—colored, of course—jumped down from behind the carriage, and threw open a gate, which formed part of an unpainted fence that seemed to divide the road from a dense forest.

"Where on earth are we going?" groaned Miss Johnson, as the carriage turned into the woods. "We might be killed and buried here, and nobody know anything about it! Driver"—putting her head out of the window—"are you sure this is the right way?"

"Yes, mistress," was the reply, and we heard him chuckling to himself all the rest of the way.

After threading the mazes of the forest for about half a mile, the carriage stopped at a smaller gate, round which were clustered any number of little black children, with some two or three white ones among them, some on the top of the fence, and others holding the gate open and peeping from behind it to see the strange ladies alight. Standing in the porch of the house were Mr. and Mrs. Percy.

They were the same stately and courteous persons, and had the same gracious and cordial manner that I had prefigured to myself. There was nothing to cause disappointment either in their manners or appearance, and never shall I forget the spontaneous kindness with which they welcomed us poor way-worn wanderers. If we had been rich relations, their reception could not have been warmer. But the house! Poor Miss Johnson's eyes almost started from her head, as well as her heart from her mouth, while she gazed upon it. It was a low, square edifice, built of unhewn logs, and whitewashed. There was neither front nor back door; but, as we stood on the porch, we looked directly through a broad passage upon another porch, and then into the open air. On each side of this passage were two rooms; a parlor and library on one side, on the other, a dining and sleeping-room. The kitchen was separate, and at a little distance from the house.

We were ushered into the parlor, where, in an immense chimney, a bright fire was burning. There was a Brussels carpet on the floor; on one side stood a rosewood piano, and in the corner a side-board loaded down with silver—more silver than I had ever seen in one family in my life. The incongruity between the furniture and the house struck me, wearied as I was; and I found out, afterwards, that this was a mere temporary shelter, only intended to be used till a more commodious dwelling could be erected. A snug, comfortable house is not so essential at the South as at the North, and is, consequently, more readily dispensed with. That, of course, I did not know at the time, and could only sit and wonder in silence at the strangeness of everything around me. I found it impossible to reconcile the elegant and highly polished manners of Mr. and Mrs. Percy with the rudeness of their dwelling, and the apparently careless and slipshod way in which everything seemed to be managed.

The evening was uncomfortably cold, and I drew close to the blazing fire; but yet my shoulders ached with the chilling night winds that blew about them almost as freely as if I had been in the open air. I looked behind, to see if a window were open, and, between two of the logs, where a part of the "chinking" had fallen out, I caught a star peeping down at me as placidly and unblinkingly as if the hole had been made at its own particular request. It caused a new sensation, and new sensations are rare—to sit at the fireside, with doors and windows closed, and look at the stars through the chinks. I was glancing over my shoulder, at short intervals, and saying nothing, all the rest of the evening.

The only person, besides Mr. and Mrs. Percy, whom I particularly remember as connected with my first evening at Loudon, was their eldest daughter, Virginia, but who was called Tom, because, as she was the eldest, she ought to have been a boy; but, as she unfortunately did not turn out to be one, Mr. Percy determined to keep up the illusion as long as possible; and, though now she was a little older than I was, the name still clung to her. She came in, looking as if just roused from an afternoon nap, with her hair falling in tumbled, but picturesque curls about her neck. She was a tall, pale, slender, pretty girl, with a lustrous gleam in her dark-blue eyes, which gave her, to my bewildered fancy, an uncanny look. Seating herself nearly opposite to me, she gazed at me unflinchingly for two mortal hours; but we spoke not a word. Between fatigue and the mesmeric effect of those elfish eyes, I began to show symptoms of sleepiness, which kind Mrs. Percy observing, said—

"Tom, show the ladies where they are to sleep. I am sorry I cannot accommodate you better; but I hope you will soon feel at home."

Our sleeping apartment was a large room, standing a little detached from the main building; and, as we were crossing a covered passage-way that led to it, Miss Percy stopped, and, turning to me, began "to shiver and to shake" violently.

"I believe I have a chill," said she, gazing at me.

"I should think you had," was my internal rejoinder, not understanding then the meaning she attached to the word "chill." In my vocabulary as yet, it only meant to feel cold.

"Shall I carry the candle?" asked I, seeing that it nearly dropped from her hand.

"Oh no," said she, smiling, and at the same time opening the door of our room, or rather house. It was quite a large apartment, and there were two beds in it. "My little sister and I sleep here," said Miss Percy, pointing to one bed. "That one," motioning to the other, "is for Miss Johnson and you."

The one allotted to us loomed up from its corner of the room like one of the snow-covered mountains of my own State. The bedstead was high, and on it were heaped any number of feather beds and mattresses. We went up to it by three carpeted steps placed at the side, and even from them it was something of an exertion to reach safely the top; but, when I was fairly ensconced, my sensations were delightful. I was, indeed, "enthroned in lofty state," uplifted above all common cares; for all the "Marthas" in these "lower grounds of sorrow," as the Baptist minister at Loudon used to call the world, I would recommend just such an elevated resting-place. As a proof of its efficacy, Miss Johnson sank into the arms of Morpheus without unburending her heart of a single complaint.

I was roused in the morning by a wail so loud, so long, and so mournful, that I started up, half expecting to see the cold, gray figure of a Banshee. At the open door stood Miss Percy, in her night-gear, and screaming, at intervals, "O—h, Elsie! e—h, Elsie!" I despair of conveying any idea to those who have not heard the sound, of the dismal cadence given to the exclamation.

"What is the matter?" asked I, in some alarm.

"Nothing; only I want Elsie to dress me," was the reply.

"I wonder if she cannot dress herself?" thought I, as I sprang up and began the operation.

"Wait a minute," said she; "Elsie will come to help you." And she began her cries again.

A stranger would have thought some one was murdering us. Presently, a stout, good-natured colored damsel appeared.

"Elsie, dress Miss Forsyth," said Miss Percy.

"Oh no, I thank you," was my reply; "I do not need any assistance."

A look of surprise appeared on Miss Percy's countenance, as she languidly resigned herself to the charge of her waiting-maid, and was dressed somewhat after the fashion of a big doll. Presently, Elsie disappeared on some errand, and, half attired, Miss Percy sank into a chair. She waited patiently for some time, and at last recommenced with her "O—h, Elsie!" Elsie returned.

"Why have you not given me some water?" asked Miss Percy.

And Elsie filled the ewer from the pitcher.

"She has been waiting all this time for some one to pour out her water for her" thought I. "I wonder if Elsie washes her face?"

No, Miss Percy did that herself; and, for the rest, I saw no more, for I went out to take a short survey of the premises, and see if the fresh morning air had improved their appearance. But I cannot allow the reader to form so hasty and incorrect a judgment of Miss Percy as I did, and class her among those helpless young ladies who have been aptly likened unto the lilies of Solomon. When once the arduous task of dressing was accomplished, Tom appeared another being. With a large basket of keys on her arm, she went about the house, "giving out dinner, breakfast, and supper," for the servants as well as for the family. In the course of time, I discovered that she fitted and made all her own dresses—an art still an inscrutable mystery to me; that she cut out nearly all the clothes for the servants; and that very day I went down with her to the "negro-quarter," a collection of little dwellings about half a mile from the house, where she gave a sick woman some medicine that she needed, and attended to the dressing of an injured limb with the patience and kindness of a nurse, and yet with the authority of a mistress. Then I began to learn not to make the mere peculiarities of place or education a standard of right or wrong.

We spent part of the morning in walking through the town, a rambling, untidy-looking place, very unlike the trim, yet simple and rural appearance of our New England villages. The houses, built either of brick, which seemed but half-baked, or of wood that had once been painted white, but was now dingy and discolored, stood immediately upon the street. The gates to the gardens swung loosely upon their hinges, and the fences were woefully out of repair. Of course, there were some exceptions, but the general appearance of the place was suggestive only of indolence and unthrift. This was the exterior more, and would be noticed only at first. I had not been there many weeks, before the warm, cordial hearts that dwelt in those neglected houses threw such a glamour over them that I became as unmindful of the "outward walls" as the inhabitants seemed to be.

Miss Johnson insisted on going into several of the shops and pricing everything, from a spool of thread to a piece of muslin; and great was her indignation, and long and loud her complaints, even to the merchants themselves, when she found that not a single article could be obtained for the price she had been accustomed to pay for it. They suggested the expense of bringing the goods so far; but she would not listen to their explanation. You would have thought, by her manner, that they were committing some great injustice upon her.

When we returned to the plantation, we found dinner ready, and the most striking peculiarities of that repast were the hot corn bread, which is used in the South at almost every meal, and at dinner supplies the place of wheaten bread entirely, and the practice that prevailed there of drinking milk instead of water at the dessert. After dinner we received our first call; and I must describe it, premising that the lady is by no means a fair sample of the rest of the inhabitants, but was considered an oddity ever at home. She was an ignorant, uneducated woman, who had married a wealthy man, and had lately spent several winters in Washington, where she had developed a strong love for dress and fine talking. I was then, of course, quite new to the world, and her conversation was so unique that much of it still remains in my memory.

Our visitor, who was introduced as Mrs. Robinson, was a tall, showy-looking woman with an aquiline nose, and restless little black eyes. Her dress was green velvet covered with gimp and bugles, a red Cashmere shawl, a bonnet which seemed to be all feathers and flowers; and, as it was a cold day, her feet, although she came in a carriage, were encased in strong substantial shoes and black woolen stockings.

"What do you think of our place?" asked she of Miss Johnson.

"Well," was the reply, "I must say I am disappointed in the country. I have always lived in the city, and I had imagined something entirely different. Now, for instance, at Boston Common—you have heard of the Common at Boston of course;—well, then, whenever you pass it there is always the smell of new-mown hay until the ground is covered with snow, and here I do not perceive anything of the kind."

"Oh, you are mistaken," interrupted I; "you are thinking of the times when they mow the grass."

"No, indeed, it is always the same," asserted Miss Johnson in her most dogmatic manner. "I have lived in Boston all my life, and I ought to know."

"You will be more disappointed perhaps when spring comes," said Mrs. Robinson, consolingly. "It is really quite ridiculous then to walk in the fields and see the multitude of little flowers all about."

"And there is another thing that strikes me as very strange," said Miss Johnson; "to see so few houses built of brick, and none at all of stone; now many of our public buildings in Boston are of granite, and you have no idea how handsome they are. I am surprised to see that you do not use it at all."

"This is not a granite country," I observed timidly.

"Why, Pauline, how can you be so ignorant? There is granite everywhere. The whole world rests on it. A geologist told me so."

"Ah, yes," said Mrs. Robinson, "the transition must be indeed severe to you; and how are you pleased with our poor village?" turning to me.

"Very well," said I, more politely than truthfully.

"I am glad to hear that, my dear; I hope you will like it so well that before long you will make it the place of your nativity. We have some very nice gentlemen here, I assure you." And Mrs. Robinson smiled, and nodded, and bridled, and plumed herself for several minutes, so well pleased was she with her gentle insinuation.

"By the way, Miss Forsyth," continued she, "do you know Mr. Newton, a representative from your State?"

"Very well," I replied; "he is my cousin."

Instantly two long arms were thrown round me, and I was pressed to her maternal bosom. A sense of suffocation, a conviction that my nose would be flat for the rest of my life, and that my face was taking an impression of the countless bugles on the velvet dress, is all that remains to me of that terrible moment.

"Forgive my enthusiasm," exclaimed Mrs. Robinson, releasing me; "I am a creature of impulse, and a relation of Mr. Newton's must be my mutual friend. Is he well?"

"Very well, I believe," I replied.

"I am delighted to hear it. I saw something about the death of Sir Isaac Newton in the papers lately; but his name is not Isaac, is it?"

"No, ma'am; it is Joseph."

"Ah, yes; I knew it was one of them old antediluvians. I admire him more than I can express."

"I am surprised as well as pleased to hear you say so, for I understood that he was not very popular in Washington," said I.

"No, my dear, I must allow that he was not; but persecution always brings out one's qualities in such base relief that it endears them to me immediately. Are you fond of reading, my dear?"

"Yes, ma'am, very fond," I replied.

"I knew you would be if you were Mr. Newton's cousin. You must come out to my place; Washington Woodlands I call it. Mr. Robinson has quite a library, and you can amuse yourself with it whenever it is agreeable. Bulwer is my favorite. I have just been reading his 'Pilgrim's Progress.' Have you seen it?"

"You mean the 'Pilgrims on the Rhine,' do you not?" asked I.

"Oh yes, I believe that is the title; it is all the same, though; not much difference, I fancy. What is that volume you have in your hand?"

"Shakspeare, ma'am."

"Ah, my dear, I am sorry to see that. I cannot understand why people think so much of Shakspeare. In my opinion, he is positively immoral, and quite improper for young ladies. The manner in which that Romeo and Juliet conversed together when they first met at some party, so shocked all my refinement that I have never endured the book since. Have you read all his plays?"

"Almost all of them," replied I; "but some time ago, when I was too young to care for anything but the story."

"Story! my dear; why, there is no story to them—nothing but questions and answers."

With this sweeping but certainly original criticism, Mrs. Robinson rose to take leave. After giving us a very cordial invitation to "Washington Woodlands," and making us several gracious courtesies, with mincing steps and fluttering feathers she walked out to her carriage.

"What a singular woman!" said I.

"But how beautifully she was dressed!" observed Miss Johnson. "That velvet must have cost at least ten dollars a yard."

"Her husband is one of the richest and most influential men in the country," said Miss Percy, whose eyes were not yet satisfied with gazing at me. It seemed as though she expected at each minute that I would throw off the quiet and subdued manner natural to me, and appear in some startling and unexpected character. I cannot express the embarrassment her unwearied watchfulness caused me. It almost paralyzed my powers of mind and body. The evening drew on dark and stormy. No other visitor appeared to enliven us; and, for the first time since my departure from home, a feeling of desolation and homesickness stole over me. I cried myself to sleep that night, from emotions excited more by those remorseless eyes, that reminded me at each moment that I was "a stranger in the land," than from any other cause. I had not realized, till then, the full importance of the plunge which I had taken into the stream of real life; and, though I have since learned to float upon its uneasy waters with as much hardihood as most other people, I have never forgotten the shudder with which I first felt its cold waters encompassing me round.

WILD FLOWERS.

BY HARLAND GOULTAS.

THAT department of the natural sciences which treats on the laws governing the development and distribution of plants on the earth's surface, is exceedingly beautiful, important, and interesting.

Much time and care is expended in the cultivation of the flowers of foreign lands; and it is undeniable that they are more noticed than the flowers which spring up spontaneously around us. We spare no expense in procuring foreign flowers, and in transporting them from their native habitats. They are brought to us from all parts of the civilized world, and even from spots where civilization has not yet planted her footstep. I am far from denying that, in warmer climates, vegetation assumes a richer growth and luxuriance, a more gorgeous and resplendent appearance than in the colder regions of the earth. But the flowers which we cultivate with so much care in the greenhouse, and in the tropical atmosphere of our stoves, are, after all, nothing but an expensive collection of the pretty wild flowers and weeds which grow in foreign countries, and ought not to be permitted to exclude from our thought and admiration the many beautiful and interesting wild flowers of our native land.

There is much native and neglected beauty growing in the woods, on the rocks, and beside the streams, within a few miles from this city. The wild flowers around Philadelphia! There are spots which our city botanists love to visit, where wild flowers grow, which, though they have neither the warm sun nor the bright sky of tropical lands, nevertheless far surpass in attractive beauty and delightful fragrance the choicest cultivated exotics of the conservatory.

What, for instance, can be more beautiful and interesting than some of the rock plants now in bloom, the Aquilegia canadensis, or American columbine, with its bright scarlet flowers; and the Kalmia latifolia, or mountain kalmia, with its curious contrivance in the corolla for fertilisation? Then there is that ever-welcome little flower, herald of early spring, the Epizea repens, or trailing arbutus, whose blossoms are so sweet-scented; and the Houstonia cærulea, or innocence, whose flowers cluster together and look so lovely on the mossy bank and green hillside. The readers of the "Lady's Book" must have noticed these beautiful flowers, and many more equally pretty and interesting, and, I have no doubt, will cheerfully read any communication which is written to afford information about them, and to increase the pleasure of their rambles in the country at this delightful season of the year.

In a letter which I received from Dr. Gray, the author of that most admirable work entitled "The Botanical Text Book," there is this passage: "For botany alone, there is little encouragement in this country. Whoever prosecutes it must make many sacrifices." My own experience offers a mournful confirmation of this sad truth. The wild flowers around Philadelphia, so attractive in beauty, so curious in organisation, so much prized abroad, are, comparatively speaking, a neglected race. I have been laboring for years to introduce the study of wild flowers into the schools and families of the residents in this city. I have gone out and collected the most beautiful mosses and ferns, the native denizens of their rocks, hills, and streams, that they might be induced to notice them as well as the wild flowers of distant lands. I have succeeded with a few minds; and have seen, when the snow was on the ground, specimens of wild flowers gathered in early spring, dried, pressed, and preserved, so that they looked as beautiful as when first collected. What pleasure in looking at such a collection on a stormy winter's evening, when the world is wrapped in shade and desolation, and in being thus reminded of the warm sun, the healthy breeze, the bright stream, and all the loveliness of rejoicing earth!

I have intimated that flowers, cultivated with so much care under glass, are but a collection of the wild flowers and weeds of foreign countries. They are unquestionably interesting, and deserve the care and science which are bestowed on their culture. But all wild flowers and weeds are interesting.

Let us take, not the rare and costly exotic, but any common wild flower or weed. What exquisite symmetry and elegance of form! The choicest works of art, the most finished productions of genius, are but as the poor efforts of savages when contrasted with this wonderful work of nature! We know that this humble flower grows when fanned by winds, watered by rains, warmed by the sun, and that it must derive some portion of its substance from the soil. But how does Nature form this green and this beautiful blossom? We see her constantly engaged in building up these living forms, and weaving the earth, the air, and the water into every imaginable variety of vegetable form and fabric. The whole earth is, in fact, one vast workshop or chemical laboratory, where Nature is ever operating with an untiring industry in fabricating living beings out of rude inorganic matter. Let us endeavor to trace the movements of this glorious mechanism framed by the hand of the Almighty; let us "consider the lilies of the field, how they grow." Leisure time is well spent which is devoted to the study of those wild flowers which have again arisen from the darkness of the sepulchre and the ruins of the grave, and now cover the hills and beautify the valleys.

MR. HARRISON'S CONFESSIONS.

CHAPTER I.

THE fire was burning gayly. My wife had just gone up stairs to put baby to bed. Charles sat opposite to me, looking very brown and handsome. It was pleasant enough that we should feel sure of spending some weeks under the same roof, a thing which we had never done since we were mere boys. I felt too lazy to talk, so I ate walnuts and looked into the fire. But Charles grew restless.

"Now that your wife is gone up stairs, Will, you must tell me what I've wanted to ask you ever since I saw her this morning. Tell me all about the wooing and winning. I want to have the receipt for getting such a spicy little wife of my own. Your letters only gave the barest details. So set to, man, and tell me every particular."

"If I tell you all, it will be a long story."

"Never fear. If I get tired, I can go to sleep, and dream that I am back again, a lonely bachelor, in Ceylon; and I can waken up, when you have done, to know that I am under your roof. Dash away, man! 'Once upon a time, a gallant young bachelor ——' There's a beginning for you!"

"Well, then, 'Once upon a time, a gallant young bachelor' was sorely puzzled where to settle, when he had completed his education as a surgeon.—I must speak in the first person; I cannot go on as a gallant young bachelor.—I had just finished walking the hospitals when you went to Ceylon; and, if you remember, I wanted to go abroad like you, and thought of offering myself as a ship-surgeon; but I found I should rather lose caste in my profession; so I hesitated; and, while I was hesitating, I received a letter from my father's cousin, Mr. Morgan—that old gentleman who used to write such long letters of good advice to my mother, and who tipped me a five pound note when I agreed to be bound apprentice to Mr. Howard, instead of going to sea. Well, it seems the old gentleman had all along thought of taking me as his partner, if I turned out pretty well; and, as he heard a good account of me from an old friend of his, who was a surgeon at Guy's, he wrote to propose this arrangement: I was to have a third of the profits for five years; after that, half; and, eventually, I was to succeed to the whole. It was no bad offer for a penniless man like me, as Mr. Morgan had a capital country practice; and, though I did not know him personally, I had formed a pretty good idea of him as an honorable, kind-hearted, fidgety, meddlesome old bachelor; and a very correct notion it was, as I found out in the very first half-hour of seeing him. I had had some idea that I was to live in his house, as he was a bachelor and a kind of family friend; and I think he was afraid that I should expect this arrangement, for when I walked up to his door, with the porter carrying my portmanteau, he met me on the steps, and, while he held my hand and shook it, he said to the porter, 'Jerry, if you'll wait a moment, Mr. Harrison will be ready to go with you to his lodgings, at Jocelyn's, you know;' and then, turning to me, he addressed his first words of welcome. I was a little inclined to think him inhospitable; but I got to understand him better afterwards. 'Jocelyn's,' said he, 'is the best place I have been able to hit upon in a hurry, and there is a good deal of fever about, which made me desirous that you should come this month—a low kind of typhoid, in the oldest part of the town. I think you'll be comfortable there for a week or two. I have taken the liberty of desiring my housekeeper to send down one or two things which give the place a little more of a home aspect—an easy chair, a beautiful case of preparations, and one or two little matters in the way of eatables; but, if you'll take my advice, I've a plan in my head which we will talk about to-morrow morning. At present, I don't like to keep you standing out on the steps here, so I'll not detain you from your lodgings, where I rather think my housekeeper is gone to get tea ready for you.'

"I thought I understood the old gentleman's anxiety for his own health, which he put upon care for mine, for he had on a kind of loose gray coat, and no hat on his head. But I wondered that he did not ask me in doors, instead of keeping me on the steps. I believe, after all, I made a mistake in supposing he was afraid of taking cold; he was only afraid of being seen in deshabille. And as for his apparent inhospitality, I had not been long in Duncombe before I understood the comforts of having one's house considered as a castle into which no one might intrude, and saw good reason for the practice Mr. Morgan had established of coming to his door to speak to every one. It was only the effect of habit that made him receive me so. Before long, I had the free run of his house.

"There was every sign of kind attention and forethought on the part of some one, whom I could not doubt to be Mr. Morgan, in my lodgings. I was too lazy to do much that evening, and sat in the little bow-window which projected over Jocelyn's shop, looking up and down the street. Duncombe calls itself a town, but I should call it a village. Really, looking from Jocelyn's, it is a very picturesque place. The houses are anything but regular; they may be mean in their details, but altogether they look well; they have not that flat, unrelieved front, which many towns of far more pretensions present. Here and there a bow-window—very now and then a gable, cutting up against the sky—occasionally a projecting upper story—throws good effect of light and shadow along the street; and they have a queer fashion of their own of coloring the white-wash of some of the houses with a sort of pink blotting-paper tinge, more like the stone of which Mayence is built than anything else. It may be very bad taste; but, to my mind, it gives a rich warmth to the coloring. Then, here and there a dwelling-house has a court in front, with a grass-plot on each side of the flagged walk, and a large tree or two—limes or horse-chestnuts—which send their great projecting upper branches over into the street, making round dry places of shelter on the pavement in the times of summer showers.

"While I was sitting in the bow-window, thinking of the contrast between this place and the lodgings in the heart of London, which I had left only twelve hours before—the window open here, and, although in the centre of the town, admitting only scents from the mignonette boxes on the sill, instead of the dust and smoke of — Street—the only sound heard in this, the principal street, being the voices of mothers calling their playing children home to bed, and the eight o'clock bell of the old parish church bim-bomming in remembrance of the curfew;—while I was sitting thus idly, the door opened, and the little maid-servant, dropping a courtesy, said—

"Please, sir, Mrs. Munton's compliments, and she would be glad to know how you are after your journey."

"There! was not that hearty and kind? Would even the dearest chum I had at Guy's have thought of doing such a thing? while Mrs. Munton, whose name I had never heard of before, was doubtless suffering anxiety till I could relieve her mind by sending back word that I was pretty well.

"My compliments to Mrs. Munton, and I am pretty well: much obliged to her.' It was as well to say only 'pretty well,' for 'very well' would have destroyed the interest Mrs. Munton evidently felt in me. Good Mrs. Munton! Kind Mrs. Munton! Perhaps, also, young, handsome, rich, widowed Mrs. Munton! I rubbed my hands with delight and amusement, and, resuming my post of observation, began to wonder at which house Mrs. Munton lived.

"Again the little tap and the little maid-servant—

"Please, sir, Miss Tomkinsons' compliments; and they would be glad to know how you feel yourself after your journey.'

"I don't know why, but Miss Tomkinsons' name had not such a halo about it as Mrs. Munton's.

Still, it was very pretty in Miss Tomkinsons to send and inquire. I only wished I did not feel so perfectly robust. I was almost ashamed that I could not send word I was quite exhausted by fatigue, and had fainted twice since my arrival. If I had but had a headache, at least! I heaved a deep breath: my chest was in perfect order; I had caught no cold; so I answered again—

“Much obliged to the Miss Tomkinsons; I am not much fatigued; tolerably well; my compliments.”

“Little Sally could hardly have got down stairs, before she returned, bright and breathless—

“Mr. and Mrs. Bullock’s compliments, sir; and they hope you are pretty well after your journey.”

“Who would have expected such kindness from such an unpromising name? Mr. and Mrs. Bullock were less interesting, it is true, than their predecessors; but I graciously replied—

“My compliments; a night’s rest will perfectly recruit me.”

“The same message was presently brought up from one or two more unknown kind hearts. I really wished I was not so ruddy-looking. I was afraid I should disappoint the tender-hearted town when they saw what a hale young fellow I was. And I was almost ashamed of confessing to a great appetite for supper when Sally came up to inquire what I would have. Beef-steaks were so tempting; but perhaps I ought rather to have water-gruel, and go to bed. The beef-steak, however, carried the day. I need not have felt such a gentle elation of spirits, as this mark of the town’s attention is paid to every one when he arrives after a journey. Many of the same people have sent to inquire after you—great, hulking, brown fellow as you are—only Sally spared you the infliction of devising interesting answers.

CHAPTER II.

“THE next morning Mr. Morgan came before I had finished breakfast. He was the most dapper little man I ever met. I see the affection with which people cling to the style of dress that was in vogue when they were beaux and belles, and received the most admiration. They are unwilling to believe that their youth and beauty are gone, and think that the prevailing mode is unbecoming. Mr. Morgan will inveigh by the hour together against frock-coats, for instance, and whiskers. He keeps his chin close shaven, wears a black dress-coat, and dark-gray pantaloons; and in his morning round to his town patients, he invariably wears the brightest and blackest of Hessian boots, with dangling silk tassels on each side. When he goes home, about ten o’clock, to prepare for his ride to see his country patients, he puts on the most dandy top-boots I ever saw, which he gets from some wonderful boot-maker a hundred miles off. His appearance is what one calls ‘jemmy’; there is no other word that will do for it. He was evidently a little discomfited when he saw me in my breakfast costume, with the habits which I brought with me from the fellows at Guy’s; my feet against the fire-place, my chair balanced on its hind legs (a habit of sitting which I afterwards discovered he particularly abhorred), slippers on my feet (which, also, he considered a most ungentlemanly piece of untidiness ‘out of a bedroom’); in short, from what I afterwards learned, every prejudice he had was outraged by my appearance on this first visit of his. I put my book down, and sprang up to receive him. He stood, hat and cane in hand.

“I came to inquire if it would be convenient for you to accompany me on my morning’s round, and to be introduced to a few of our friends.’ I quite detected the little tone of coldness, induced by his disappointment at my appearance, though he never imagined that it was in any way perceptible. ‘I will be ready directly, sir,’ said I; and bolted into my bedroom, only too happy to escape his scrutinizing eye.

“When I returned, I was made aware, by sundry indescribable little coughs and hesitating noises, that my dress did not satisfy him. I stood ready, hat and gloves in hand; but still he did not offer to set off on our round. I grew very red and hot. At length he said—

“Excuse me, my dear young friend, but may I ask if you have no other coat besides that—‘cut-away,’ I believe you call them?—We are rather sticklers for propriety, I believe, in Duncombe; and much depends on a first impression. Let it be professional, my dear sir. Black is the garb of our profession. Forgive my speaking so plainly, but I consider myself in loco parentis.”

“He was so kind, so bland, and, in truth, so friendly, that I felt it would be most childish to take offence; but I had a little resentment in my heart at this way of being treated. However, I mumbled, ‘Oh, certainly, sir, if you wish it!’ and returned once more to change my coat—my poor cut-away.

“Those coats, sir, give a man rather too much of a sporting appearance, not quite befitting the learned professions; more as if you came down here to hunt than to be the Galen or Hippocrates of the neighborhood.’ He smiled graciously, so I smothered a sigh; for, to tell you the truth, I had rather anticipated, and, in fact, had boasted at Guy’s, of the runs I hoped to have with the hounds, for Duncombe was in a famous hunting district. But all these ideas were quite dispersed when Mr. Morgan led me to the inn-yard, where there was a horse-dealer on his way to a neighboring fair, and ‘strongly advised me’—which in our relative circumstances was equivalent to an injunction—to purchase a little, useful, fast-trotting, brown cob, instead of a fine showy horse, ‘who would take any fence I put him to,' as the horse-dealer assured me. Mr. Morgan was evidently pleased when I bowed to his decision, and gave up all hopes of an occasional hunt.

"He opened out a great deal more after this purchase. He told me his plan of establishing me in a house of my own, which looked more respectable, not to say professional, than being in lodgings; and then he went on to say that he had lately lost a friend, a brother surgeon in a neighboring town, who had left a widow with a small income, who would be very glad to live with me, and act as mistress to my establishment; thus lessening the expense.

"She is a lady-like woman,' said Mr. Morgan, 'to judge from the little I have seen of her; about forty-five or so; and may really be of some help to you in the little etiquettes of our profession; the slight delicate attentions which every man has to learn, if he wishes to get on in life. This is Mrs. Munton's, sir,' said he, stopping short at a very unromantic-looking green door, with a brass knocker.

"I had no time to say, 'Who is Mrs. Munton?' before we had heard Mrs. Munton was at home, and were following the tidy elderly servant up the narrow carpeted stairs into the drawing-room. Mrs. Munton was the widow of a former vicar, upwards of sixty, rather deaf; but, like all the deaf people I have ever seen, very fond of talking; perhaps because she then knew the subject, which passed out of her grasp when another began to speak. She was ill of a chronic complaint, which often incapacitated her from going out; and the kind people of the town were in the habit of coming to see her and sit with her, and of bringing her the newest, freshest, tid-bits of news; so that her room was the centre of the gossip of Duncombe;—not of scandal, mind; for I make a distinction between gossip and scandal. Now you can fancy the discrepancy between the ideal and the real Mrs. Munton. Instead of any foolish notion of a beautiful blooming widow, tenderly anxious about the health of the stranger, I saw a homely, talkative, elderly person, with a keen observant eye, and marks of suffering on her face; plain in manner and dress, but still unmistakably a lady. She talked to Mr. Morgan, but she looked at me; and I saw that nothing I did escaped her notice. Mr. Morgan annoyed me by his anxiety to show me off; but he was kindly anxious to bring out every circumstance to my credit in Mrs. Munton's hearing, knowing well that the town-crier had not more opportunities to publish all about me than she had.

"What was that remark you repeated to me of Sir Astley Cooper's?" asked he. It had been the most trivial speech in the world that I had named as we walked along, and I felt ashamed of having to repent it: but it answered Mr. Morgan's purpose, and before night all the town had heard that I was a favorite pupil of Sir Astley's (I had never seen him but twice in my life); and Mr. Morgan was afraid that as soon as he knew my full value I should be retained by Sir Astley to assist him in his duties as surgeon to the royal family. Every little circumstance was pressed into the conversation which could add to my importance.

"As I once heard Sir Robert Peel remark to Mr. Harrison, the father of our young friend here—"The moons in August are remarkably full and bright."—"If you remember, Charles, my father was always proud of having sold a pair of gloves to Sir Robert, when he was staying at the Grange, near Biddicombe, and I suppose good Mr. Morgan had paid his only visit to my father at the time; but Mrs. Munton evidently looked at me with double respect after this incidental remark, which I was amused to meet with, a few months afterwards, disguised in the statement that my father was an intimate friend of the Premier's, and had, in fact, been the adviser of most of the measures taken by him in public life. I sat by, half indignant and half amused. Mr. Morgan looked so complacently pleased at the whole effect of the conversation, that I did not care to mar it by explanations; and, indeed, I had little idea at the time how small sayings were the seeds of great events in the town of Duncombe. When we left Mrs. Munton's, he was in a blandly communicative mood.

"You will find it a curious statistical fact, but five-sixths of our householders of a certain rank in Duncombe are women. We have widows and old maids in rich abundance. In fact, my dear sir, I believe that you and I are almost the only gentlemen in the place—Mr. Bullock, of course, excepted. By gentlemen, I mean professional men. It behooves us to remember, sir, that so many of the female sex rely upon us for the kindness and protection which every man who is worthy of the name is always so happy to render."

"Miss Tomkinson, where we next called, did not strike me as remarkably requiring protection from any man. She was a tall, gaunt, masculine-looking woman, with an air of defiance about her, naturally; this, however, she softened and mitigated, as far as she was able, in favor of Mr. Morgan. He, it seemed to me, stood a little in awe of the lady, who was very brusque and plain-spoken, and evidently piqued herself on her decision of character and sincerity of speech.

"So, this is the Mr. Harrison we have heard so much of from you, Mr. Morgan? I must say, from what I had heard, that I had expected something a little more—hum—hum! But he's young yet; he's young. We have been all anticipating an Apollo, Mr. Harrison, from Mr. Morgan's description, and an Æsculapius combined in one; or, perhaps, I might confine myself to saying Apollo, as he, I believe, was the god of medicine!"

"How could Mr. Morgan have described me without seeing me? I asked myself.

"Miss Tomkinson put on her spectacles, and adjusted them on her Roman nose. Suddenly relaxing from her severity of inspection, she said to Mr Morgan—"But you must see Caroline. I had nearly forgotten it; she is busy with the girls, but I will send for her. See had a bad headache yesterday, and looked very pale; it made me very uncomfortable."

"She rang the bell, and desired the servant to fetch Miss Caroline."

"Miss Caroline was the younger sister—younger by twenty years; and so considered as a child by Miss Tomkinson, who was fifty-five, at the very least. If she was considered as a child, she was also petted, and caressed, and cared for as a child; for she had been left as a baby to the charge of her elder sister; and when the father died, and they had to set up a school, Miss Tomkinson took upon herself every difficult arrangement, and denied herself every pleasure, and made every sacrifice in order that 'Carry' might not feel the change in their circumstances. My wife tells me she once knew the sisters purchase a piece of silk, enough, with management, to have made two gowns; but Carry wished for flounces, or some such fal-lals; and, without a word, Miss Tomkinson gave up her gown to have the whole made up as Carry wished, into one handsome one; and wore an old shabby affair herself as cheerfully as if it were Genoa velvet. That tells the sort of relationship between the sisters as well as anything, and I consider myself very good to name it thus early, for it was long before I found out Miss Tomkinson's real goodness; and we had a great quarrel first. Miss Caroline looked very delicate and die-away when she came in; she was as soft and sentimental as Miss Tomkinson was hard and masculine; and had a way of saying, 'Oh, sister, how can you?' at Miss Tomkinson's startling speeches, which I never liked—especially as it was accompanied by a sort of protesting look at the company present, as if she wished to have it understood that she was shocked at her sister's outré manners. Now, that was not faithful between sisters. A remonstrance in private might have done good—though, for my own part, I have grown to like Miss Tomkinson's speeches and ways; but I don't like the way some people have of separating themselves from what may be unpopular in their relations. I know I spoke rather shortly to Miss Caroline when she asked me whether I could bear the change from 'the great metropolis' to a little country village. In the first place, why could not she call it 'London,' or 'town,' and have done with it? And in the next place, why should she not love the place that was her home well enough to fancy that every one would like it when they came to know it as well as she did?"

"I was conscious I was rather abrupt in my conversation with her, and I saw that Mr. Morgan was watching me, though he pretended to be listening to Miss Tomkinson's whispered account of her sister's symptoms. But when we were once more in the street, he began, 'My dear young friend'—

"I winced; for all the morning I had noticed that when he was going to give a little unpalatable advice, he always began with 'My dear young friend.' He had done so about the horse."

"My dear young friend, there are one or two hints I should like to give you about your manner. The great Sir Everard Home used to say, 'a general practitioner should either have a very good manner, or a very bad one.' Now, in the latter case, he must be possessed of talents and acquirements sufficient to insure his being sought after, whatever his manner might be. But the rudeness will give notoriety to these qualifications. Abernethy is a case in point. I rather, myself, question the taste of bad manners. I, therefore, have studied to acquire an attentive, anxious politeness, which combines ease and grace with a tender regard and interest. I am not aware whether I have succeeded—few men do—in coming up to my ideal; but I recommend you to strive after this manner, peculiarly befitting our profession. Identify yourself with your patients, my dear sir. You have sympathy in your good heart, I am sure, to really feel pain when listening to their account of their sufferings, and it soothes them to see the expression of this feeling in your manner. It is, in fact, sir, manners that make the man in our profession. I don't set myself up as an example, far from it; but—This is Mr. Hutton's, our vicar; one of the servants is indisposed, and I shall be glad of the opportunity of introducing you. We can resume our conversation at another time."

"I had not been aware that we had been holding a conversation, in which, I believe, the assistance of two persons is required. Why had not Mr. Hutton sent to ask after my health the evening before, according to the custom of the place? I felt rather offended."

CHAPTER III

"THE vicarage was on the north side of the street, at the end opening towards the hills. It was a long, low house, receding behind its neighbors; a court was between the door and the street, with a flag walk and an old stone cistern on the right-hand side of the door; Solomon's seal growing under the windows. Some one was watching from behind the window-curtain; for the door opened, as if by magic, as soon as we reached it; and we entered a low room, which served as a hall, and was matted all over, with deep, old-fashioned window-seats, and Dutch tiles in the fireplace; altogether, it was very cool and refreshing, after the hot sun in the white and red street."

"'Bessy is not so well, Mr. Morgan,' said the sweet little girl of eleven or so, who had opened the door. 'Sophy wanted to send for you; but papa said he was sure you would come soon this morning.

and we were to remember that there were other sick people wanting you.'

"Here 's Mr. Morgan, Sophy,' said she, opening the door into an inner room, to which we descended a step, as I remember well; for I was nearly falling down it, I was so caught by the picture within. It was like a picture; at least, seen through the door frame. A sort of mixture of crimson and sea-green in the room, and a sunny garden beyond; a very low casement window, open to the amber air; clusters of white roses peeping in, and Sophy sitting on a cushion on the ground, the light coming from above on her head, and a little, sturdy, round-eyed brother kneeling by her, to whom she was teaching the alphabet. It was a mighty relief to him when we came in, as I could see; and I am much mistaken if he was easily caught again to say his lesson, when he was once sent off to find papa. Sophy rose quietly, and of course we were just introduced, and that was all, before she took Mr. Morgan up stairs to see her sick servant. I was left to myself in the room. It looked so like a home, that it at once made me know the full charm of the word. There were books and work about, and tokens of employment: there was a child's plaything on the floor; and against the sea-green walls there hung a likeness or two, done in water colors: one, I was sure, was that of Sophy's mother. The chairs and sofa were covered with chintz, the same as the curtains—a little pretty red rose on a white ground. I don't know where the crimson came from, but I am sure there was crimson somewhere; perhaps in the carpet. There was a glass door besides the window, and you went up a step into the garden. This was first, a grass plot, just under the windows, and beyond that, straight gravel walks, with box-borders and narrow flower-beds on each side, most brilliant and gay at the end of August, as it was then; and behind the flower-borders were fruit trees, trained over woodwork, so as to shut out the beds of kitchen-garden within.

"While I was looking round, a gentleman came in, who, I was sure, was the vicar. It was rather awkward, for I had to account for my presence there.

"I came with Mr. Morgan; my name is Harrison,' said I, bowing. I could see he was not much enlightened by this explanation; but we sat down and talked about the time of year, or some such matter, till Sophy and Mr. Morgan came back. Then I saw Mr. Morgan to advantage. With a man whom he respected, as he did the vicar, he lost the prim artificial manner he had in general, and was calm and dignified; but not so dignified as the vicar. I never saw any one like him. He was very quiet and reserved, almost absent at times; his personal appearance was not striking; but he was, altogether, a man you would talk to with your hat off wherever you met him. It was his character that produced this effect—character that he never thought about, but that appeared in every word, and look, and motion.

"Sophy,' said he, 'Mr. Morgan looks very warm; could you not gather a few jargonelle pears off the south wall? I fancy there are some ripe there. Our jargonelle pears are remarkably early this year.'

"Sophy went into the sunny garden, and I saw her take a rake and tilt at the pears, which were above her reach, apparently. The parlor had become chilly—I found out afterwards it had a flag floor, which accounts for its coldness—and I thought I should like to go into the warm sun. I said I would go and help the young lady; and, without waiting for an answer, I went into the warm, scented garden, where the bees were rifling the flowers, and making a continual busy sound. I think Sophy had begun to despair of getting the fruit, and was glad of my assistance. I thought I was very senseless to have knocked them down so soon, when I found we were to go in as soon as they were gathered. I should have liked to have walked round the garden, but Sophy walked straight off with the pears, and I could do nothing but follow her. She took up her needlework while we ate them: they were very soon finished, and, when the vicar had ended his conversation with Mr. Morgan about some poor people, we rose up to come away. I was thankful that Mr. Morgan had said so little about me. I could not have endured that he should have introduced Sir Astley Cooper or Sir Robert Peel at the vicarage; nor yet could I have brooked much mention of my 'great opportunities for acquiring a thorough knowledge of my profession,' which I had heard him describe to Miss Tomkinson, while her sister was talking to me. Luckily, however, he spared me all this at the vicar's. When we left, it was time to mount our horses and go the country rounds, and I was glad of it.

CHAPTER IV.

"By and by, the inhabitants of Duncombe began to have parties in my honor. Mr. Morgan told me it was on my account, or I don't think I should have found it out. But he was pleased at every fresh invitation, and rubbed his hands, and chuckled, as if it was a compliment to himself, as in truth it was.

"Meanwhile, the arrangement with Mrs. Rose had been brought to a conclusion. She was to bring her furniture, and place it in a house of which I was to pay the rent. She was to be the mistress, and, in return, she was not to pay anything for her board. Mr. Morgan took the house, and delighted in advising, and settling all my affairs. I was partly indolent, and partly amused, and was altogether passive. The house he took for me was near his own: it had two sitting-rooms down stairs, opening into each other by folding-doors, which were, however, kept shut in general. The back room was my consulting-room—the library, he advised me to call it; and gave me a skull to put on the top of my book-case, in which the medical books were all ranged on the conspicuous shelves; while Miss Austen, Dickens, and Thackeray were, by Mr. Morgan himself, skillfully placed in a careless way, upside down, or with their backs turned to the wall. The front parlor was to be the dining-room, and the room above was furnished with Mrs. Rose's drawing-room chairs and table, though I found she preferred sitting down stairs in the dining-room, close to the window, where, between every stitch, she could look up and see what was going on in the street. I felt rather queer to be the master of this house, filled with another person's furniture, before I had even seen the lady whose property it was.

"Presently, she arrived. Mr. Morgan met her at the inn where the coach stopped, and accompanied her to my house. I could see them out of the drawing-room window, the little gentleman stepping daintily along, flourishing his cane, and evidently talking away. She was a little taller than he was, and in deep widow's mourning; such veils and falls, and capes and cloaks, that she looked like a black crape hay-cock. When we were introduced, she put up her thick veil, and looked around, and sighed.

"Your appearance and circumstances, Mr. Harrison, remind me forcibly of the time when I was married to my dear husband, now at rest. He was then, like you, commencing practice as a surgeon. For twenty years I sympathized with him, and assisted him by every means in my power, even to making up pills when the young man was out. May we live together in like harmony for an equal length of time! May the regard between us be equally sincere, although, instead of being conjugal, it is to be maternal and filial!"

"I am sure she had been concocting this speech in the coach, for she afterwards told me she was the only passenger. When she had ended, I felt as if I ought to have had a glass of wine in my hand to drink, after the manner of toasts. And yet I doubt if I should have done it heartily, for I did not hope to live with her for twenty years; it had rather a dreary sound. However, I only bowed, and kept my thoughts to myself. I asked Mr. Morgan, while Mrs. Rose was up stairs taking off her things, to stay to tea; to which he agreed, and kept rubbing his hands with satisfaction, saying—

"Very fine woman, sir; very fine woman! And what a manner! How she will receive patients, who may wish to leave a message during your absence! Such a flow of words, to be sure!"

"Mr. Morgan could not stay long after tea, as there were one or two cases to be seen. I would willingly have gone, and had my hat on, indeed, for the purpose, when he said it would not be respectful,

'not the thing,' to leave Mrs. Rose the first evening of her arrival.

"Tender deference to the sex—to a widow in the first months of her loneliness—requires this little consideration, my dear sir. I will leave that case at Miss Tomkinson's for you; you will perhaps call early to-morrow morning. Miss Tomkinson is rather particular, and is apt to speak plainly if she does not think herself properly attended to."

"I had often noticed that he shuffled off the visits to Miss Tomkinson's on me, and I suspect he was a little afraid of the lady.

"It was rather a long evening with Mrs. Rose. She had nothing to do, thinking it civil, I suppose, to stop in the parlor, and not to go up stairs and unpack. I begged I might be no restraint upon her, if she wished to do so; but—rather to my disappointment—she smiled in a measured, subdued way, and said it would be a pleasure to her to become better acquainted with me. She went up stairs once, and my heart misgave me when I saw her come down with a clean folded pocket-handkerchief. Oh, my prophetic soul!—she was no sooner seated than she began to give me an account of her late husband's illness, and symptoms, and death. It was a very common case, but she evidently seemed to think it had been peculiar. She had just a smattering of medical knowledge, and used the technical terms so very mal-à-propos that I could hardly keep from smiling; but I would not have done it for the world, she was evidently in such deep and sincere distress. At last, she said—

"I have the 'dognoses' of my dear husband's complaint in my desk, Mr. Harrison, if you would like to draw up the case for the 'Lancet.' I think he would have felt gratified, poor fellow, if he had been told such a compliment would be paid to his remains, and that his case should appear in those distinguished columns."

"It was rather awkward; for the case was of the very commonest, as I said before. However, I had not been even this short time in practice without having learnt a few of those noises which do not compromise one, and yet may bear a very significant construction if the listener chooses to exert a little imagination.

"Before the end of the evening, we were such friends that she brought me down the late Mr. Rose's picture to look at. She told me she could not bear, herself, to gaze upon the beloved features; but that, if I would look upon the miniature, she would avert her face. I offered to take it into my own hands, but she seemed wounded at the proposal, and said she never, never could trust such a treasure out of her own possession; so she turned her head very much over her left shoulder, while I examined the likeness held by her extended right arm.

"The late Mr. Rose must have been rather a good-looking jolly man; and the artist had given him such a broad smile, and such a twinkle about the eyes, that it really was hard to help smiling back at him. However, I restrained myself.

"At first, Mrs. Rose objected to accepting any of the invitations which were sent her to accompany me to the tea-parties in the town. She was so good and simple, that I was sure she had no other reason than the one which she alleged—the short time that had elapsed since her husband's death; or else, now that I had had some experience of the entertainments which she declined so pertinaciously, I might have suspected that she was glad of the excuse. I used sometimes to wish that I was a widow. I came home tired from a hard day's riding, and, if I had but felt sure that Mr. Morgan would not come in, I should certainly have put on my slippers and my loose morning-coat, and have indulged in a cigar in the garden. It seemed a cruel sacrifice to society to dress myself in tight boots, and a stiff coat, and go to a five o'clock tea. But Mr. Morgan read me such lectures upon the necessity of cultivating the good will of the people among whom I was settled, and seemed so sorry, and almost hurt, when I once complained of the dullness of these parties, that I felt I could not be so selfish as to decline more than one out of three. Mr. Morgan, if he found that I had an invitation for the evening, would often take the longer round, and the more distant visits. I suspected him at first of the design, which I confess I often entertained, of shirking the parties; but I soon found out he was really making a sacrifice of his inclinations for what he considered to be my advantage.

CHAPTER V.

"THERE was one invitation which seemed to promise a good deal of pleasure. Mr. Bullock—who is the attorney of Duncombe—was married a second time to a lady from a large provincial town; she wished to lead the fashion—a thing very easy to do, for every one was willing to follow her. So, instead of giving a tea-party in my honor, she proposed a picnic to some old hall in the neighborhood; and really the arrangements sounded tempting enough. Every patient we had seemed full of the subject; both those who were invited and those who were not. There was a moat round the house, with a boat on it; and there was a gallery in the hall, from which music sounded delightfully. The family to whom the place belonged were abroad, and lived at a newer and grander mansion when they were at home; there were only a farmer and his wife in the old hall, and they were to have the charge of the preparations. The little kind-hearted town was delighted when the sun shone bright on the October morning of our picnic; the shopkeepers and cottagers all looked pleased as they saw the cavalcade gathering at Mr. Bullock's door. We were somewhere about twenty in number; a 'silent few,' she called us; but I thought we were quite enough. There were the Miss Tomkinsons, and two of their young ladies—one of them belonged to a 'county family,' Mrs. Bullock told me, in a whisper; then came Mr. and Mrs. and Miss Bullock, and a tribe of little children, the offspring of the present wife. Miss Bullock was only a stepdaughter. Mrs. Munton had accepted the invitation to join our party, which was rather unexpected by the host and hostess, I imagine, from little remarks that I overheard; but they made her very welcome. Miss Horsman—a maiden lady who had been on a visit from home till last week—was another. And last, there were the vicar and his children. These, with Mr. Morgan and myself, made up the party. I was very much pleased to see something more of the vicar's family. He had come in occasionally to the evening parties, it is true, and spoken kindly to us all; but it was not his habit to stay very long at them. And his daughter was, he said, too young to visit. She had had the charge of her little sisters and brother since her mother's death, which took up a good deal of her time, and she was glad of the evenings to pursue her own studies. But to-day the case was different; and Sophy, and Ellen, and Lizzie, and even little Walter, were all there, standing at Mrs. Bullock's door; for we gone of us could be patient enough to sit still in the parlor, with Mrs. Munton and the elder ones, quietly waiting for the two chaises and the spring-cart, which were to have been there by two o'clock, and now it was nearly a quarter past. 'Shameful! the brightness of the day would be gone.' The sympathetic shopkeepers, standing at their respective doors with their hands in their pockets, had, one and all, their heads turned in the direction from which the carriages—as Mrs. Bullock called them—were to come. There was a rumble along the paved street; and the shopkeepers turned and smiled, and bowed their heads congratulatingly to us; all the mothers and all the little children of the place stood clustering round the doors to see us set off. I had my horse waiting; and, meanwhile, I assisted people into their vehicles. One sees a good deal of management on such occasions. Mrs. Munton was handed first into one of the chaises; then there was a little hanging back, for most of the young people wished to go in the cart; I don't know why. Miss Horsman, however, came forward, and, as she was known to be the intimate friend of Mrs. Munton, so far was satisfactory. But who was to be third?—bodkin with two old ladies, who liked the windows shut? I saw Sophy speaking to Ellen; and then she came forward and offered to be the third. The two old ladies looked pleased and glad—as every one did near Sophy—so that chaise full was arranged. Just as it was going off, however, the servant from the vicarage came running with a note for her master. When he had read it, he went to the chaise-door, and I suppose told Sophy, what I afterwards heard him say to Mrs. Bullock, that the clergyman of a neighboring parish was ill, and unable to read the funeral-service for one of his parishioners who was to be buried that afternoon. The vicar was, of course, obliged to go, and said he should not return home that night. It seemed a relief to some, I perceived, to be without the little restraint of his dignified presence. Mr. Morgan came up just at the moment, having ridden hard all the morning to be in time to join our party; so we were resigned, on the whole, to the vicar's absence. His own family regretted him the most, I noticed, and I liked them all the better for it. I believe that I came next in being sorry for his departure; but I respected and admired him, and felt always the better for having been in his company. Miss Tomkinson, Mrs. Bullock, and the 'county' young lady were in the next chaise. I think the last would rather have been in the cart with the younger and merrier set, but I imagine that was considered infra dig. The remainder of the party were to ride and tie; and a most riotous, laughing set they were. Mr. Morgan and I were on horseback; at least, I led my horse, with little Walter riding on him; his fat, sturdy legs standing stiff out on each side of my cob's broad back. He was a little darling, and chattered all the way, his sister Sophy being the heroine of all his stories. I found he owed this day's excursion entirely to her begging papa to let him come; nurse was strongly against it—"cross old nurse!" he called her once, and then said, "No, not cross; kind nurse; Sophy tells Walter not to say cross nurse." I never saw so young a child so brave. The horse shied at a log of wood. Walter looked very red, and grasped the mane, but sat upright like a little man, and never spoke all the time the horse was dancing. When it was over, he looked at me, and smiled—

"You would not let me be hurt, Mr. Harrison, would you?" He was the most winning little fellow I ever saw.

"There were frequent cries to me from the cart, 'Oh, Mr. Harrison! do get us that branch of blackberries; you can reach it with your whip-handle.' 'Oh, Mr. Harrison! there were such splendid nuts on the other side of that hedge; would you just turn back for them?' Miss Caroline Tomkinson was once or twice rather faint with the motion of the cart, and asked me for my smelling-bottle, as she had forgotten hers. I was amused at the idea of my carrying such articles about with me. Then she thought she should like to walk, and got out, and came on my side of the road; but I found little Walter the pleasanter companion, and soon set the horse off into a trot, with which pace her tender constitution could not keep up.

"The road to the old hall was along a sandy lane, with high hedge-banks; the wych-els almost met overhead. 'Shocking farming!' Mr. Bullock called out; and so it might be, but it was very pleasant and picturesque-looking. The trees were gorgeous, in their orange and crimson hues, varied by great dark-green holly bushes, glistening in the autumn sun. I should have thought the colors too vivid, if I had seen them in a picture, especially when we wound up the brow, after crossing the little bridge over the brook—what laughing and screaming there was as the cart splashed through the sparkling water!—and I caught the purple hills beyond. We could see the old hall, too, from that point, with its warm, rich woods billowing up behind, and the blue waters of the moat lying still under the sunlight.

"Laughing and talking is very hungry work, and there was a universal petition for dinner when we arrived at the lawn before the hall, where it had been arranged that we were to dine. I saw Miss Carry take Miss Tomkinson aside, and whisper to her; and presently the elder sister came up to me, where I was busy, rather apart, making a seat of hay, which I had fetched from the farmer's loft for my little friend Walter, who, I had noticed, was rather hoarse, and for whom I was afraid of a seat on the grass, dry as it appeared to be.

"Mr. Harrison, Caroline tells me she has been feeling very faint, and she is afraid of a return of one of her attacks. She says she has more confidence in your medical powers than in Mr. Morgan's. I should not be sincere if I did not say that I differ from her; but, as it is so, may I beg you to keep an eye upon her? I tell her she had better not have come if she did not feel well; but, poor girl, she had set her heart upon this day's pleasure. I have offered to go home with her; but she says, if she can only feel sure you are at hand, she would rather stay."

"Of course, I bowed, and promised all due attendance on Miss Caroline; and in the mean time, until she did require my services, I thought I might as well go and help the vicar's daughter, who looked so fresh and pretty, in her white muslin dress, here, there, and everywhere, now in the sunshine, now in the green shade, helping every one to be comfortable, and thinking of every one but herself.

"Presently Mr. Morgan came up.

"Miss Caroline does not feel quite well. I have promised your services to her sister."

"So have I, sir. But Miss Sophy cannot carry this heavy basket."

"I did not mean her to have heard this excuse; but she caught it up and said—

"Oh, yes I can! I can take things out one by one. Go to poor Miss Caroline, pray, Mr. Harrison."

"I went; but very unwillingly, I must say. When I had once seated myself by her, I think she must have felt better. It was, probably, only a nervous fear, which was relieved when she knew she had assistance near at hand; for she made a capital dinner. I thought she would never end her modest requests for 'just a little more pigeon-pie, or a merry-thought of chicken.' Such a hearty meal would, I hoped, effectually revive her, and so it did; for she told me she thought she could manage to walk round the garden, and see the old peacock yews, if I would kindly give her my arm. It was very provoking; I had so set my heart upon being with the vicar's children. I advised Miss Caroline strongly to lie down a little and rest before tea, on the sofa in the farmer's kitchen; you cannot think how persuasively I begged her to take care of herself. At last she consented, thanking me for my tender interest; she should never forget my kind attention to her. She little knew what was in my mind at the time. However, she was safely consigned to the farmer's wife, and I was rushing out in search of a white gown and a waving figure, when I encountered Mrs. Bullock at the door of the hall. She was a fine, fierce-looking woman. I thought she had appeared a little displeased at my (unwilling) attentions to Miss Caroline at dinner-time; but now, seeing me alone, she was all smiles.

'Oh, Mr. Harrison, all alone! How is that? What are the young ladies about to allow such churlishness? And, by the way, I have left a young lady who will be very glad of your assistance, I am sure—my daughter, Jemima (her step-daughter, she meant). Mr. Bullock is so particular, and so tender a father, that he would be frightened to death at the idea of her going into the boat on the moat unless she was with some one who could swim. He is gone to discuss the new wheel-plough with the farmer—(you know agriculture is his hobby, although law, horrid law, is his business). But the poor girl is pining on the bank, longing for my permission to join the others, which I dare not give, unless you will kindly accompany her, and promise if any accident happens, to preserve her safe.'

'Oh, Sophy, why was no one anxious about you?'

CHAPTER VI.

"Miss BULLOCK was standing by the water-side, looking wistfully, as I thought, at the water party; the sound of whose merry laughter came pleasantly enough from the boat which lay off (for, indeed, no one knew how to row, and she was of a clumsy flat-bottomed build) about a hundred yards, 'weather-bound,' as they shouted out, among the long stalks of the water-lilies.

"Miss Bullock did not look up till I came close to her; and then, when I told her my errand, she lifted up her great heavy, sad eyes, and looked at me for a moment. It struck me, at the time, that she expected to find some expression on my face which was not there, and that its absence was a relief to her. She was a very pale, unhappy-looking girl, but very quiet, and, if not agreeable in manner, at any rate not forward or offensive. I called to the party in the boat, and they came slowly enough through the large, cool, green lily-leaves towards us. When they got near, we saw there was no room for us, and Miss Bullock said she would rather stay in the meadow and saunter about, if I would go into the boat; and I am certain from the look on her countenance that she spoke the truth; but Miss Horsman called out in a sharp voice, while she smiled in a very disagreeable knowing way.

"'Oh, mamma will be displeased if you don't come in, Miss Bullock, after all her trouble in making such a nice arrangement.'

"At this speech the poor girl hesitated, and at last, in an undecided way, as if she was not sure whether she was doing right, she took Sophy's place in the boat. Helen and Lizzie landed with their sister, so that there was plenty of room for Miss Tomkinson, Miss Horsman, and all the little Bullocks; and the three vicarage girls went off strolling along the meadow side, and playing with Walter, who was in a high state of excitement. The sun was getting low, but the declining light was beautiful upon the water; and, to add to the charm of the time, Sophy and her sisters, standing on the green lawn in front of the hall, struck up the little German canon, which I had never heard before—

'Oh wie wohl ist mir am abend,' &c.

At last we were summoned to tug the boat to the landing-steps on the lawn, tea and a blazing wood fire being ready for us in the hall. I was offering my arm to Miss Horsman, as she was a little lame, when she said again, in her peculiar disagreeable way, 'Had you not better take Miss Bullock, Mr. Harrison? It will be more satisfactory.'

"I helped Miss Horsman up the steps, however, and then she repeated her advice; so, remembering that Miss Bullock was in fact the daughter of my entertainers, I went to her; but though she accepted my arm, I could perceive she was sorry that I had offered it.

"The hall was lighted by the glorious wood fire in the wide old grate; the daylight was dying away in the west; and the large windows admitted but little of what was left, through their small leaded frames, with coats of arms emblazoned upon them. The farmer's wife had set out a great long table, which was piled with good things; and a huge black kettle sang on the glowing fire, which sent a cheerful warmth through the room as it crackled and blazed. Mr. Morgan (who I found had been taking a little round in the neighborhood among his patients) was there, smiling and rubbing his hands as usual. Mr. Bullock was holding a conversation with the farmer at the garden door on the nature of different manures, in which it struck me that if Mr. Bullock had the fine names and the theories on his side, the farmer had all the practical knowledge and the experience, and I knew which I would have trusted. I think Mr. Bullock rather liked to talk about Liebig in my hearing; it sounded well, and was knowing. Mrs. Bullock was not particularly placid in her mood. In the first place, I wanted to sit by the vicar's daughter, and Miss Caroline as decidedly wanted to sit on my other side, being afraid of her fainting fits, I imagine. But Mrs. Bullock called me to a place near her daughter. Now I thought I had done enough civility to a girl who was evidently annoyed, rather than pleased by my attentions, and I pretended to be busy stooping under the table for Miss Caroline's gloves, which were missing; but it was of no avail; Mrs. Bullock's fine severe eyes were awaiting my re-appearance, and she summoned me again.

"I am keeping this place on my right hand for you, Mr. Harrison. Jemima, sit still!"

"I went up to the post of honor, and tried to busy myself with pouring out coffee to hide my chagrin; but after forgetting to empty the water put in ('to warm the cups,' Mrs. Bullock said), and omitting to add any sugar, the lady told me she would dispense with my services, and turn me over to my neighbor on the other side.

"Talking to the younger lady was, no doubt, mere Mr. Harrison's vocation than assisting the elder one.' I dare say it was only the manner that made the words seem offensive. Miss Horsman sat opposite to me, smiling away. Miss Bullock did not speak, but seemed more depressed than ever. At length Miss Horsman and Mrs. Bullock got to a war of innuendoes, which were completely unintelligible to me; and I was very much displeased with my situation. While at the bottom of the table, Mr. Morgan and Mr. Bullock were making the young ones laugh most heartily. Part of the joke was Mr. Morgan's insisting upon making tea at that end; and Sophy and Helen were busy contriving every possible mistake for him. I thought honor was a very good thing, but merriment a better. Here was I in the place of distinction, hearing nothing but cross words. At last the time came for us to go home. As the evening was damp, the seats in the chaises were the best and most to be desired. And now Sophy offered to go in the cart; only she seemed anxious, and so was I, that Walter should be secured from the effects of the white wreaths of fog rolling up from the valley; but the little, violent, affectionate fellow would not be separated from Sophy. She made a nest for him on her knee in one corner of the cart, and covered him with her own shawl; and I hoped that he would take no harm. Miss Tomkinson, Mr. Bullock, and some of the young ones walked; but I seemed chained to the windows of the chaise, for Miss Caroline begged me not to leave her, as she was dreadfully afraid of robbers; and Mrs. Bullock implored me to see that the man did not overturn them in the bad roads, as he had certainly had too much to drink.

"I became so irritable, before I reached home, that I thought it was the most disagreeable day of pleasure I had ever had, and could hardly bear to answer Mrs. Rose's never-ending questions. She told me, however, that from my account the day was so charming that she thought she should relax in the rigor of her seclusion, and mingle a little more in the society of which I gave so tempting a description. She really thought her dear Mr. Rose would have wished it; and his will should be law to her after his death, as it had ever been during his life. In compliance, therefore, with his wishes, she would even do a little violence to her own feelings.

"She was very good and kind; not merely attentive to everything which she thought could conduce to my comfort, but willing to take any trouble in providing the broths and nourishing food which I often found it convenient to order, under the name of kitchen-physic, for my poorer patients; and I really did not see the use of her shutting herself up, in mere compliance with an etiquette, when she began to wish to mix in the little quiet society of Duncombe. Accordingly I urged her to begin to visit, and even when applied to as to what I imagined the late Mr. Rose's wishes on that subject would have been, answered for that worthy gentleman, and assured his widow that I was convinced he would have regretted deeply her giving way to immoderate grief, and would have been rather grateful than otherwise at seeing her endeavor to divert her thoughts by a few quiet visits. She cheered up, and said, 'as I really thought so, she would sacrifice her own inclinations, and accept the very next invitation that came.'

CHAPTER VII.

"I WAS roused from my sleep in the middle of the night by a messenger from the vicarage. Little Walter had got the croup, and Mr. Morgan had been sent for into the country. I dressed myself hastily, and went through the quiet little street. There was a light burning up stairs at the vicarage. It was in the nursery. The servant, who opened the door the instant I knocked, was crying sadly, and could hardly answer my inquiries as I went up stairs, two steps at a time, to see my little favorite.

"The nursery was a great large room. At the farther end it was lighted by a common candle, which left the other end, where the door was, in shade, so I suppose the nurse did not see me come in, for she was speaking very crossly.

"Miss Sophy" said she, 'I told you over and over again it was not fit for him to go, with the hoarseness that he had, and you would take him. It will break your papa's heart, I know; but it's none of my doing.'

"Whatever Sophy felt, she did not speak in answer to this. She was on her knees by the warm bath, in which the little fellow was struggling to get his breath, with a look of terror on his face that I have often noticed in young children when smitten by a sudden and violent illness. It seems as if they recognized something infinite and invisible, at whose bidding the pain and the anguish come, from which no love can shield them. It is a very heart-rending look to observe, because it comes on the faces of those who are too young to receive comfort from the words of faith, or the promises of religion. Walter had his arms tight round Sophy's neck, as if she, hitherto his paradise-angel, could save him from the dread shadow of Death. Yes! of Death! I knelt down by him on the other side, and examined him. The very robustness of his little frame gave violence to the disease, which is always one of the most fearful by which children of his age can be attacked.

"Don't tremble, Watty," said Sophy, in a soothing tone; 'it's Mr. Harrison, darling, who let you ride on his horse.' I could detect the quivering in the voice, which she tried to make so calm and soft to quiet the little fellow's fears. We took him out of the bath, and I went for leeches. While I was away, Mr. Morgan came. He loved the vicarage children as if he were their uncle; but he stood still and aghast at the sight of Walter—so lately bright and strong—and now hurrying alone to the awful change—to the silent mysterious land where, tended and cared for as he had been on earth, he must go—alone. The little fellow! the darling!

"We applied the leeches to his throat. He resisted at first; but Sophy, God bless her, put the agony of her grief on one side, and thought only of him, and began to sing the little songs he loved. We were all still. The gardener had gone to fetch the vicar; but he was twelve miles off, and we doubted if he would come in time. I don't know if they had any hope; but the first moment Mr. Morgan's eyes met mine, I saw that he, like me, had none. The ticking of the house-clock sounded through the dark quiet house. Walter was sleeping now, with the black leeches yet hanging to his fair, white throat. Still Sophy went on singing little lullabies, which she had sung under far different and happier circumstances. I remember one verse, because it struck me at the time as strangely applicable.

'Sleep, baby, sleep!
Thy rest shall angels keep;
While on the grass the lamb shall feed,
And never suffer want or need.

Sleep, baby, sleep.'

The tears were in Mr. Morgan's eyes. I do not think either he or I could have spoken in our natural tones; but the brave girl went on, clear though low. She stopped at last, and looked up.

"He is better, is he not, Mr. Morgan?"

"No, my dear. He is—ahem!"—he could not speak all at once. Then he said—"My dear! he will be better soon. Think of your mamma, my dear Miss Sophy. She will be very thankful to have one of her darlings safe with her, where she is."

"Still she did not cry. But she bent her head down on the little face, and kissed it long and tenderly.

"I will go for Helen and Lizzie. They will be sorry not to see him again.' She rose up and went for them. Poor girls, they came in in their dressing-gowns, with eyes dilated with sudden emotion, pale with terror, stealing softly along, as if sound could disturb him. Sophy comforted them by gentle caresses. It was soon over.

Mr. Morgan was fairly crying like a child. But he thought it necessary to apologize to me for what I honored him for. 'I am a little overdone by yesterday's work, sir. I have had one or two bad nights, and they rather upset me. When I was your age, I was as strong and manly as any one, and would have scorned to shed tears.'

"Sophy came up to where we stood.

"Mr. Morgan! I am so sorry for papa. How shall I tell him?" She was struggling against her own grief for her father's sake. Mr. Morgan offered to await his coming home; and she seemed thankful for the proposal. I, new friend, almost stranger, might stay no longer. The street was as quiet as ever; not a shadow was changed; for it was not yet four o'clock. But during the night a soul had departed.

"From all I could see, and all I could learn, the vicar and his daughter strove which should comfort the other the most. Each thought of the other's grief—each prayed for the other rather than for themselves. We saw them walking out, countrywards; and we heard of them in the cottages of the poor. But it was some time before I happened to meet either of them again. And then I felt, from something indescribable in their manner towards me, that I was one of the 'Peculiar people whom Death had made dear.'

That one day at the old hall had done this. I was, perhaps, the last person who had given the little fellow any unusual pleasure. Poor Walter! I wish I could have done more to make his short life happy!

CHAPTER VIII.

"THERE was a little lull, out of respect to the vicar's grief, in the visiting. It gave time to Mrs. Rose to soften down the anguish of her weeds.

"At Christmas, Miss Tomkinson sent out invitations for a party. Miss Caroline had once or twice apologised to me because such an event had not taken place before; but, as she said, 'the avocations of their daily life prevented their having such little réunions except in the vacations.' And, sure enough, as soon as the holidays began, came the civil little note:

"The Misses Tomkinson request the pleasure of Mrs. Rose's and Mr. Harrison's company at tea, on the evening of Monday, the 23d inst. Tea at five o'clock.'

"Mrs. Rose's spirit roused, like a war-horse at the sound of the trumpet, at this. She was not of a repining disposition, but I do think she believed the party-giving population of Duncombe had given up inviting her, as soon as she had determined to relent, and accept the invitations, in compliance with the late Mr. Rose's wishes.

"Such snippings of white love-ribbon as I found everywhere, making the carpet untidy! One day, too, unluckily, a small box was brought to me by mistake. I did not look at the direction, for I never doubted it was some hyocyamus which I was expecting from London; so I tore it open, and saw inside a piece of paper, with 'No more gray hair,' in large letters, upon it. I folded it up in a hurry, and sealed it afresh, and gave it to Mrs. Rose; but I could not refrain from asking her, soon after, if she could recommend me anything to keep my hair from turning gray, adding that I thought prevention was better than cure. I think she made out the impression of my seal on the paper after that; for I learned that she had been crying, and that she talked about there being no sympathy left in the world for her since Mr. Rose's death; and that she counted the days until she could rejoin him in the better world. I think she counted the days to Miss Tomkinson's party, too; she talked so much about it.

"The covers were taken off Miss Tomkinson's chairs, and curtains, and sofas; and a great jar full of artificial flowers was placed in the centre of the table, which, as Miss Caroline told me, was all her doing, as she doted on the beautiful and artistic in life. Miss Tomkinson stood, erect as a grenadier, close to the door, receiving her friends, and heartily shaking them by the hands as they entered; she said she was truly glad to see them. And so she really was.

"We had just finished tea, and Miss Caroline had brought out a little pack of conversation cards—sheaves of slips of card-board, with intellectual or sentimental questions on one set, and equally intellectual and sentimental answers on the other; and as the answers were to fit any and all the questions, you may think they were a characterless and 'wersh' set of things. I had just been asked by Miss Caroline—

""Can you tell what those dearest to you think of you at this present time?" and had answered,

""How can you expect me to reveal such a secret to the present company?" when the servant announced that a gentleman, a friend of mine, wished to speak to me down stairs.

""Oh, show him up, Martha, show him up!" said Miss Tomkinson, in her hospitality.

""Any friend of our friends is welcome," said Miss Caroline, in an insinuating tone.

"I jumped up, however, thinking it might be some one on business; but I was so penned in by the spider-legged tables, stuck out on every side, that I could not make the haste I wished; and before I could prevent it, Martha had shown up Jack Marshland, who was on his road home for a day or two at Christmas.

"He came up in a hearty way, bowing to Miss Tomkinson, and explaining that he had found himself in my neighborhood, and had come over to pass a night with me, and that my servant had directed him where I was.

"His voice, loud at all times, sounded like Sten-tor's in that little room, where we all spoke in a kind of purring way. He had no swell in his tones; they were forte from the beginning! At first it seemed like the days of my youth come back again, to hear full manly speaking; and I felt proud of my friend, as he thanked Miss Tomkinson for her kindness in asking him to stay the evening. By and by he came up to me, and I dare say he thought he had lowered his voice, for he looked as if speaking confidentially, while in fact the whole room might have heard him.

""Frank, my boy, when shall we have dinner at this good old lady's? I'm deuced hungry."

"Dinner! Why, we had tea an hour ago! While he yet spoke, Martha came in with a little tray, on which was a single cup of coffee and three slices of wafer bread-and-butter. His dismay, and his evident submission to the decrees of Fate, tickled me so much, that I thought he should have a further taste of the life I led from month's end to month's end, and I gave up my plan of taking him home at once, and enjoyed the anticipation of the hearty laugh we should have together at the end of the evening. I was famously punished for my determination.

""Shall we continue our game?" asked Miss Caroline, who had never relinquished her sheaf of questions.

"We went on questioning and answering, with little gain of information to either party.

""No such thing as heavy betting in this game, eh, Frank?" asked Jack, who had been watching us. "You don't lose ten pounds at a sitting, I guess, as you used to do at Short's. Playing for love, I suppose you call it."

"Miss Caroline simpered, and looked down. Jack was not thinking of her. He was thinking of the days we had had at the Mermaid. Suddenly he said, "Where were you this day last year, Frank?"

""I don't remember!" said I.

""Then I'll tell you. It's the 23d—the day you were taken up for knocking down the fellow in Longacre, and that I had to bail you out ready for Christmas-day. You are in more agreeable quarters to-night."

"He did not intend this reminiscence to be heard, but was not in the least put out when Miss Tomkinson, with a face of dire surprise, asked,

""Mr. Harrison taken up, sir?"

"O yes, ma'am; and you see it was so common an affair with him to be locked up that he can't remember the dates of his different imprisonments."

"He laughed heartily; and so should I, but that I saw the impression it made. The thing was, in fact, simple enough, and capable of easy explanation. I had been made angry by seeing a great hulking fellow, out of mere wantonness, break the crutch from under a cripple; and I struck the man more violently than I intended, and down he went, yelling out for the police, and I had to go before the magistrate to be released. I disdained giving this explanation at the time. It was no business of theirs what I had been doing a year ago; but still Jack might have held his tongue. However, that unruly member of his was set a-going, and he told me afterwards he was resolved to let the old ladies into a little of life; and accordingly he remembered every practical joke we had ever had, and talked and laughed and roared again. I tried to converse with Miss Caroline—Mrs. Munton—any one; but Jack was the hero of the evening, and every one was listening to him.

"Then he has never sent any hoaxing letters since he came here, has he? Good boy! He has turned over a new leaf. He was the deepest dog at that I ever met with. Such anonymous letters as he used to send! Do you remember that to Mrs. Walbrook, eh, Frank? That was too bad!" (the wretch was laughing all the time.) "No; I won't tell about it—don't be afraid. Such a shameful hoax!" (laughing again.)

"Pray do tell," I called out; for he made it seem far worse than it was.

"Oh no, no; you've established a better character—I would not for the world nip your budding efforts. We'll bury the past in oblivion."

"I tried to tell my neighbors the story to which he alluded; but they were attracted by the merriment of Jack's manner, and did not care to hear the plain matter of fact.

"Then came a pause; Jack was talking almost quietly to Miss Horsman. Suddenly he called across the room—"How many times have you been out with the hounds? The hedges were blind very late this year, but you must have had some good mild days since."

"I have never been out," said I, shortly.

"Never!—whew!—! Why I thought that was the great attraction to Duncombe."

"Now was not he provoking? He would condole with me, and fixed the subject in the minds of every one present.

"The supper-trays were brought in, and there was a shuffling of situations. He and I were close together again.

"I say, Frank, what will you lay me that I don't clear that tray before people are ready for their second helping? I'm as hungry as a hound."

"You shall have a round of beef and a raw leg of mutton when we get home. Only do behave yourself here."

"Well, for your sake; but keep me away from those trays, or I'll not answer for myself. "Hould me, or I'll fight," as the Irishman said. I'll go and talk to that little old lady in blue, and sit with my back to those ghosts of eatables."

"He sat down by Miss Caroline, who would not have liked his description of her; and began an earnest, tolerably quiet conversation. I tried to be as agreeable as I could, to do away with the impression he had given of me; but I found that every one drew up a little stiffly at my approach, and did not encourage me to make many remarks.

"In the middle of my attempts, I heard Miss Caroline beg Jack to take a glass of wine, and I saw him help himself to what appeared to be port; but in an instant he set it down from his lips, exclaiming—"Vinegar, by Jove!" He made the most horribly wry face; and Miss Tomkinson came up in a severe hurry to investigate the affair. It turned out it was some black currant wine, on which she particularly piqued herself; I drank two glasses of it to ingratiate myself with her, and can testify to its sourness. I don't think she noticed my exertions, she was so much engrossed in listening to Jack's excuses for his mal-à-propos observation. He told her with the gravest face that he had been a teetotaler so long that he had but a confused recollection of the distinction between wine and vinegar, particularly eschewing the latter, because it had been twice fermented; and that he had imagined Miss Caroline had asked him to take toast-and-water, or he should never have touched the decanter.

CHAPTER IX.

"As we were walking home, Jack said, 'Lord, Frank! I've had such fun with the little lady in blue. I told her you wrote to me every Saturday, telling me the events of the week. She took all in.' He stopped to laugh; for he bubbled and chuckled so that he could not laugh and walk. 'And I told her you were deeply in love'—another laugh—'and that I could not get you to tell me the name of the lady, but that she had light brown hair—in short, I drew from life, and gave her an exact description of herself; and that I was most anxious to see her, and implore her to be merciful to you, for that you were a most timid, faint-hearted fellow with women.' He laughed till I thought he would have fallen down. 'I begged her, if she could guess who it was from my description—I'll answer for it she did; I took care of that; for I said you described a mole on the left cheek, in the most poetical way, saying Venus had pinched it out of envy at seeing any one more lovely—oh, hold me up, or I shall fall, laughing and hunger make me so weak:—well, I say, I begged her, if she knew who your fair one could be, to implore her to save you. I said I knew one of your lungs had gone after a former unfortunate love affair, and that I could not answer for the other if the lady here were cruel. She spoke of a respirator; but I told her that might do very well for the odd lung; but would it minister to a heart diseased? I really did talk fine. I have found out the secret of eloquence: it's believing what you've got to say; and I worked myself well up with fancying you married to the little lady in blue.'

"I got to laughing at last, angry as I had been; his impudence was irresistible. Mrs. Rose had come home in the sedan, and gone to bed; and he and I sat up over the round of beef and brandy and water till two o'clock in the morning.

"He told me I had got quite into the professional way of mousing about a room, and mewing and purring according as my patients were ill or well. He mimicked me, and made me laugh at myself. He left early the next morning.

"Mr. Morgan came at his usual hour; he and Marshland would never have agreed, and I should have been uncomfortable to see two friends of mine disliking and despising each other.

"Mr. Morgan was ruffled; but, with his deferential manner to women, he smoothed himself down before Mrs. Rose; regretted he had not been able to come to Miss Tomkinson's the evening before, and consequently had not seen her in the society she was so well calculated to adorn. But, when we were by ourselves, he said—

"I was sent for to Mrs. Munton's this morning—the old spasms. May I ask what is this story she tells me about—about prison, in fact? I trust, sir, she has made some little mistake, and that you never were—that it is an unfounded report.' He could not get it out—'that you were in Newgate for three months!' I burst out laughing; the story had grown like a mushroom indeed. Mr. Morgan looked grave. I told him the truth. Still he looked grave. 'I've no doubt, sir, that you acted rightly; but it has an awkward sound. I imagined from your hilarity just now that there was no foundation whatever for the story. Unfortunately there is.'

"I was only a night at the police-station. I would go there again for the same cause, sir.'

"Very fine spirit, sir—quite like Don Quixote; but, don't you see, you might as well have been to the hulk at once?'

"No, sir; I don't.'

"Take my word, before long, the story will have grown to that. However, we won't anticipate evil. Mens conecia recti, you remember, is the great thing. The part I regret is that it may require some short time to overcome a little prejudice which the story may excite against you. However, we won't dwell on it. Mens conecia recti! Don't think about it, sir.'

It was clear he was thinking a good deal about it.

CHAPTER X.

"Two or three days before this time, I had had an invitation from the Bullocks to dine with them on Christmas day. Mrs. Rose was going to spend the week with friends in the town where she formerly lived; and I had been pleased at the notion of being received into a family, and of being a little with Mr. Bullock, who struck me as a bluff, good-hearted fellow.

"But this Tuesday before Christmas day, there came an invitation from the vicar to dine there; there were to be only their own family and Mr. Morgan. 'Only their own family!' It was getting to be all the world to me. I was in a passion with myself for having been so ready to accept Mr. Bullock's invitation—coarse and ungentelemanly as he was; with his wife's airs of pretension, and Miss Bullock's stupidity. I turned it over in my mind. No! I could not have a bad headache, which should prevent my going to the place I did not care for, and yet leave me at liberty to go where I wished. All I could do was to join the vicarage girls after church, and walk by their side in a long country ramble. They were quiet; not sad, exactly; but it was evident that the thought of Walter was in their minds on this day. We went through a copse where there were a good number of evergreens planted as covers for game. The snow was on the ground; but the sky was clear and bright, and the sun glittered on the smooth holly leaves. Lizzie asked me to gather her some of the very bright red berries, and she was beginning a sentence with—

"Do you remember'—when Ellen said 'Hush,' and looked towards Sophy, who was walking a little apart, and crying softly to herself. There was evidently some connection between Walter and the holly-berries, for Lizzie threw them away at once when she saw Sophy's tears. Soon we came to a stile which led to an open, breezy common, half covered with gorse. I helped the little girls over it, and set them to run down the slope; but I took Sophy's arm in mine, and, though I could not speak, I think she knew how I was feeling for her. I could hardly bear to bid her good-by at the vicarage gate; it seemed as if I ought to go in and spend the day with her.

CHAPTER XI.

"I VENTED my ill humor in being late for the Bullocks' dinner. There were one or two clerks, towards whom Mr. Bullock was patronizing and pressing. Mrs. Bullock was decked out in extraordinary finery. Miss Bullock looked plainer than ever; but she had on some old gown or other, I think, for I heard Mrs. Bullock tell her she was always making a figure of herself. I began to-day to suspect that the mother would not be sorry if I took a fancy to the stepdaughter. I was again placed near her at dinner, and when the little ones came in to dessert, I was made to notice how fond of children she was; and, indeed, when one of them nestled to her, her face did brighten; but the moment she caught this loud-whispered remark, the gloom came back again, with something even of anger in her look; and she was quite sullen and obstinate when urged to sing in the drawing-room. Mrs. Bullock turned to me—

“Some young ladies won’t sing unless they are asked by gentlemen.” She spoke very crossly. ‘If you ask Jemima, she will probably sing. To oblige me, it is evident she will not.’

“I thought the singing, when we got it, would probably be a great bore; however, I did as I was bid, and went with my request to the young lady, who was sitting a little apart. She looked up at me with eyes full of tears, and said, in a decided tone, which, if I had not seen her eyes, I should have said was as cross as her mamma’s—‘No, sir, I will not!’ She got up, and left the room. I expected to hear Mrs. Bullock abuse her for her obstinacy. Instead of that, she began to tell me of the money that had been spent on her education; of what each separate accomplishment had cost. ‘She was timid,’ she said, ‘but very musical. Wherever her future home might be, there would be no want of music.’ She went on praising her till I hated her. If they thought I was going to marry that great lubberly girl, they were mistaken. Mr. Bullock and the clerks came up. He brought out Liebig, and called me to him.

“‘I can understand a good deal of this agricultural chemistry,’ said he, ‘and have put it in practice—without much success, hitherto, I confess. But these unconnected letters puzzle me a little. I suppose they have some meaning, or else I should say it was mere bookmaking to put them in.’

“‘I think they give the page a very ragged appearance,’ said Mrs. Bullock, who had joined us. ‘I inherit a little of my late father’s taste for books, and must say I like to see a good type, a broad margin, and an elegant binding. My father despised variety; how he would have held up his hands aghast at the cheap literature of these times! He did not require many books, but he would have twenty editions of those that he had; and he paid more for binding than he did for the books themselves. But elegance was everything with him. He would not have admitted your Liebig, Mr. Bullock; neither the nature of the subject, nor the common type, nor the common way in which your book is got up, would have suited him.’

“‘Go and make tea, my dear, and leave Mr. Harrison and me to talk over a few of these matters.’

“We settled to it; I explained the meaning of the symbols, and the doctrine of chemical equivalents. At last he said, ‘Doctor, you’re giving me too strong a dose of it at one time. Let’s have a small quantity taken “hodie;” that’s professional, as Mr. Morgan would call it. Come in and call when you have leisure, and give me a lesson in my alphabet. Of all you’ve been telling me, I can only remember that C means carbon and O oxygen; and I see one must know the meaning of all these confounded letters before one can do much good with Liebig.’

“‘We dine at three,’ said Mrs. Bullock. ‘There will always be a knife and fork for Mr. Harrison. Bullock, don’t confine your invitation to the evening.’

“‘Why, you see, I’ve a nap always after dinner, so I could not be learning chemistry then.’

“‘Don’t be so selfish, Mr. B. Think of the pleasure Jemima and I shall have in Mr. Harrison’s society.’

“I put a stop to the discussion by saying I would come in in the evenings occasionally, and give Mr. Bullock a lesson, but that my professional duties occupied me invariably until that time.

“I liked Mr. Bullock. He was simple, and shrewd; and to be with a man was a relief, after all the feminine society I went through every day.

(To be concluded.)

THE MOTHER’S LAMENT.

BY A LADY OF VIRGINIA.

I LOVE to listen to the murmured song
Of sephyrs reveling over beds of flowers;
Their airy music, as it floats along,
Speaks to my heart of past and hallowed hours
When that sweet rainbow of my life—our boy—
Solaced each care, and heightened every joy.

Brilliant in beauty as the humming-bird
When its soft plumage glistens in the sun;
Blithe as the lambkin of the snowy herd—
As gentle, too, was our lamented one!
His merry laugh still echoes in mine ear;
His fairy footsteps still I seem to hear!

And can it be? Oh! is it not a dream,
That he has left forever earth’s fair scene?
He that was so loved, so beautiful, so bright!
Who to my soul was breath, was life, was light!
In the dark tomb has that dear form been laid?
Was’t by his bier we knelt, and wept, and prayed,
While funeral rite and psalm, at twilight dim,
Were said and chanted, O my God! o’er him?

’Twas even so! Death claimed him for his own,
And made me desolate, heart-stricken, lone
Now oft, like Cain, I feel as if my share
Of earthly woe is more than I can bear.
Now, soon to rest within that deep, cold grave,
Where sleeps my child so still! is all I crave,
Till the last trump shall peal along the skies,
And the awakened, conscious dead arise!
Then, in communion sacred, blest, and sweet,
Our angel cherub we again shall meet.

S.-M. C.

SCENES IN REAL LIFE

BY CHARLES BLACKBURN.

"READ on, Charles, read on," said my uncle; "I am in the vein for Carlyle to-night, and his rough, strong sentences are to me wonderful exciters of thought and remembrance.

Before complying with this command, we would inform our reader that we were seated in the library of an uncle to whom I was much attached, and who in his turn felt all the interest in me which most men feel in those whom they have adopted as their peculiar protégés. He was a man whose life had numbered almost sixty years, with undiminished vigor of body and mind. His active life had been passed as a lawyer of eminence in the city of B—, and now he had retired from business in the possession of a large fortune, and with the consciousness of having discharged well the duties he owed to himself and to his fellow-men. A few miles from the city in which he had lived he built an elegant mansion, and, having surrounded himself with everything necessary to his comfort, determined to spend the rest of his days in the ease and quiet which none can expect or possess, save the polished, kind, and affluent old bachelor.

It was a winter evening in January, 1843, that we were beguiling its tedium, by reading the "Sartor Resartus" of the author above mentioned, relieved and enlivened by many pithy remarks, and sometimes by scenes from the history of his own life, thrown in by my uncle as illustrations of the author's thoughts. Without, all was dark and cold. The wind was whistling through the old forest trees that surrounded the house, with that peculiar sound which makes every one within draw closer to his friend, and closer to the blazing hearth. The stars could only now and then be seen through the window; and, by their faint light, large masses of cloud could be observed driven swiftly across the face of the heavens. With an involuntary shiver, caused by the bleakness of the night, my uncle stirred up the crackling hickory, and again commanded me to read on. I resumed just where he had interrupted me with a remark concerning his fear of death—

"Nevertheless, the unworn spirit is strong; Life is so healthful that it ever finds nourishment in Death; those stern experiences planted down by memory in my imagination, rose there to a whole cypress forest, sad but beautiful, waving, with not unmelodious sighs, in dark luxuriance, in the hottest sunshine, through long years of youth:—as in manhood also it does, and will do; for I have now pitched my tent under a cypress tree; the tomb is now my inexpugnable fortress, ever close by the gate of which I look upon the hostile armaments, and pains and penalties of tyrannous Life placidly enough, and listen to its loudest threatenings with a still smile. O ye loved ones that already sleep in the noiseless bed of Rest, whom in life I could only weep for and never help; and ye, who wide-scattered still toil lonely in the monster-bearing desert, dyeing the flinty ground with your blood, yet a little while and we shall all meet there, and our mother's bosom will screen us all; and oppression's harness, and sorrow's fire-whip, and all the Gehonna bailiffs that patrol and inhabit ever-vexed Sime, cannot thenceforth harm us any more!"*

"The Clothes-Philosopher speaks well," exclaimed my uncle; "there is a voice in my heart that answers to his words. A world of remembrances are stirred up within me, and you may lay aside the book and listen for a while to me. I have planted in my life many a cypress tree, 'over loved ones that now sleep in the noiseless bed of Rest.' I have been one of many different circles, and I have lived to see those who stood on my right hand, and on my left, stricken down; to behold the circles thinned, until but two or three are left standing with me. The passage you have read has brought vividly to my mind the gayest and most joyous of all those circles, my college class. Alas! how many are sleeping beneath the cypress tree. Those who remain, 'wide-scattered, still toil lonely on in the monster-bearing desert.' And 'yet a little while, and we shall all meet there, and our mother's bosom will screen us all.'

"Charles Woodworth was the genius of the class. His mind was of the first order; brilliant, without gaudiness, overflowing with thought, and always under the dominion of strong common sense. He had an exquisite sympathy with of everything that was beautiful in thought, or graceful in expression; and as a moving power to all his fine qualities, he had that lofty, self-sustaining enthusiasm which insures the performance of whatever its possessor fully purposes to do. It was universally conceded that, wherever he chose to exert his abilities, he was sure to surpass all others. Woodworth, however, had but two main wishes, to wit: to be the most eloquent man, and the most popular fellow in college. He succeeded in both. The professors praised his performances, and prognosticated his future greatness. The students admired him for his dashing gayety, and his generous and noble qualities. His classmates were proud of him, and those who were his most intimate friends absolutely worshiped him. The aristocracy of the village welcomed him to their dwellings. The idol of the college became the observed of all observers in society. Beauty smiled on him with her rarest and most bewitching smiles. Mammās, inexorable to every one else, were propitious to the 'handsome, the talented, the rich Mr. Woodworth.' The best proof of his real worth was that all this adulation failed to spoil him. He was still the noble, open-hearted, kind 'Charley Woodworth.'

"Well do I remember the commencement-day, on which, with many kindly counsels, and many blessings, we were sent forth from the walls of 'old Nassau Hall.' The scenes of that day resembled very much the scene of similar days everywhere else. A number of speeches, 'good, bad, and indifferent,' were made, which the audience patiently bore. It was evident that all were waiting for some one from whom they anticipated much. The programme announced that Mr. Woodworth was to pronounce the valedictory address. As he rose to perform the duty assigned to him, stillness spread itself over the vast audience, and every eye turned intently towards the speaker. Woodworth was a model of manly beauty, and the excitement of the occasion had thrown a fine glow over his expressive face. He was sensible that much was expected from him, and for this reason his speaking at first was less faultless than usual. There was evidently a little straining, as if the speaker was determined to exceed all anticipations—to excel himself. Those who had heard him before remarked that there was an absence of that ease and grace that marked his ordinary style of speaking. These faults, however, were soon lost. Woodworth forgot himself, and his position, and the expectations of his friends, in the tumultuous crowd of emotions that rushed upon him. His feelings were always deep and ardent, so as to be at times altogether uncontrollable, and the duty which he was performing was one suited to call forth all his emotions. A change was perceptible in his speaking. His voice had deepened as he advanced, and its tones evinced that he was expressing the feelings of his heart. His deep tones sank into the hearts of those around him, and tears soon testified how much they sympathized in his feelings. The interest, so exciting as to be almost painful, increased as he went on. It was evident to all that his emotions would master him, for tears were rolling down his cheeks, and his utterance was now and then choked, and his voice faltered, and his whole frame was trembling under the power of his awakened and agitated spirit. The struggle to conquer his feelings was intense, but he succeeded. Rising to his fullest height, as if in the strength of a final and most resolute purpose, he pronounced the last sentence and the final 'Farewell!' But the exertion was too much. The chord had been stretched too tightly, and it rebounded suddenly and fearfully. He sank back, exhausted and almost senseless, into the arms of his classmates. The audience were all in tears. From all parts of the vast assembly there came a sound of suppressed sobbing, in which old and young, stern man and gentle woman, the refined and ignorant—all joined. As the tide of feeling subsided, a venerable man arose, and, in a fervent prayer, commended us to the guidance and guardianship of Him by whose guidance alone we can walk safely in life, and by whose guardianship alone we can be preserved from the manifold evil that is in the world. On the next morning with sad and heavy hearts we separated, each to enter upon his chosen walk in life. Woodworth returned to his home in the far South.

* * * * *

"For several years after our graduation I heard but little of Woodworth. I knew that he had studied law, and was practicing his profession in his native town; and occasionally rumors of his increasing fame reached my ears. Seven years after we separated, I was called by business to the city of Washington. I arrived late in the evening, and was whiling away an hour or two before going to bed in reading the newspapers of the day. While thus engaged, I heard a gentleman near me mention the name of Woodworth, and after listening a few minutes to the conversation, gathered that my quondam classmate was to appear on the morrow before the Supreme Court in behalf of his native State. The case was one which excited much interest, on account of the important principles involved, and because of the serious consequences that were expected to ensue, should the decision be adverse to the State for which Mr. Woodworth appeared. I silently determined to hear my old friend, without, if possible, being recognised by him, and accordingly, in the morning, I mingled with the multitude that crowded the court room, called there either by the character of the suit, or the rumors of the eloquence of some of the lawyers engaged in it. Having succeeded in obtaining a position from which I could view the whole room, I glanced hastily around for the face of Woodworth. He was standing in the midst of his associates and antagonists, calm, dignified, and thoroughly self-possessed, awaiting the opening of the court. He was somewhat altered in appearance and manner since we parted. He was then in the fresh beauty of youth; he had now ripened into manhood. The freshness was gone from his face, but it had left in its place a calm, contemplative look which agreed better with his present age. His manners had lost much of their freeness, and with more of reserve had also more of polish. Woodworth had evidently mingled much with the world, and learned to keep his warmest feelings for his dearest friends, and give to the rest of the world only respectful kindness.

"My criticisms on my friend were interrupted by the noise and bustle attending the opening of the court, and a glance towards the bench informed me that all the judges were present, and also that the argument was about to commence. Woodworth was standing before the bench, with his brief in his hand. I watched him narrowly for some sign of trepidation, for this was the first time that he had appeared before that august court, and his fame was all at stake. I could discern nothing of fear in his aspect, and he afterwards told me that all private and personal considerations had been completely overshadowed by the fact that he was contending for the rights of his native State before that venerable court to whose bar alone the States could be brought, and whose decisions are law alike in the forests of Maine, and the verandahs of Louisiana. He prefaced his speech by a succinct history of the case from its origin, and then proceeded to unfold his argument. And a noble one it was. It was not encumbered with ornament, or with any extraneous matter, yet no part was deficient. Everything necessary to the completeness of the argument was there, arranged with wonderful skill, and placed in such a position as to give to it its highest force; so that when he had completed it, the whole of it rose up to the mind's eye as clear, as well defined, as severe in its simplicity as ever did the Parthenon to the eye of the Greek. A murmur of admiration passed through the crowd as he sat down, while those near him, both friends and antagonists, pressed around him to offer congratulations. His triumph was complete. His fame as a lawyer was fully established by this one successful and splendid effort.

"Soon after this, I called on Woodworth, and spent a few happy hours in recalling the past, and communicating our anticipations of the future. I found that his prospects were bright. He was amassing wealth by the practice of his profession. His reputation was as great and wide-spread as in his wildest dreams he had wished it to be. He had bound to him a circle of warm and true friends; and he was in a few days to be married to the only daughter of one of the judges of the court before which he had made so flattering a débüt. He invited me to be a witness of the ceremony, and rarely have I seen more of that nobility of carriage and of appearance which we instinctively look for in great men; or more of that glorious beauty which has so often made the greatest of men the slaves of woman, than were vouchsafed to Charles Woodworth and his bride. The suit in which he had been engaged having been decided in his favor, he left, a few days after his marriage, for his home in the South. The next news that I heard of him was that he had been elected one of the representatives in Congress, from his native State. I felt sad when I read this, (although no premonition of the fearful end of his political life visited me,) as I always do when I see young men turn away from the calmness of professional life to the ruinous excitement, and the hoarse and angry disputing of the political world. Sadly did Woodworth pay for obeying the impulses of ambition. I was called, the winter he took his seat in Congress, to the seat of government by some business before the Supreme Court. When I arrived, I was informed that my friend was probably at that time making his maiden speech in the House, and without delay I hurried to the Capitol. The Senate chamber was deserted, but the magnificent hall of the Representatives was thronged. It was well known that Woodworth was to speak on that day, and all crowded to hear the new and eloquent member. The subject was one of interest, being one of those painful cases of oppression which has most justly made the Indian the foe of the white man. It was generally believed, also, that one of the leading members of the House had shared largely in the profits of the iniquitous transaction. With all the honesty and with all the enthusiasm of his nature, Charles Woodworth spoke out against the cruelty of the proceeding. He was closing his speech, when I entered the hall, in a strain of the fiercest invective, and the excitement was intense. Members crowded around the orator, catching every word. Directly opposite to him sat the member implicated in the disgraceful business, with his face turned towards Woodworth, as if determined to hear the worst. The orator gradually became more unguarded in his language, and grew fiercer in his invective as he drew near the end of his speech. He had all along been hinting at the guilty member without naming him. In the last sentence, however, fixing his eye intently upon him, he hurled against him the accusation in the most unqualified terms.

"For a moment after he concluded, the silence of the grave reigned in the House. Next came the sharp, clear voice of the accused, and the words 'It is a lie' rang upon the ear of every listener. The next moment all was confusion. The House adjourned informally, and every one went home with a beating heart, anticipating the next step. What followed may be briefly sketched. According to the laws of the society to which Charles belonged, a duel must be fought. It was fought, and he was shot through the heart at the first fire. His young wife died, a maniac, in two weeks from that day. In the congressional cemetery there is a monument to the memory of the Hon. Charles Woodworth, and few pass it without feeling sad as they remember the history of one so noble, so gifted, and so early called.

"It would be idle to conceal the fact that the unhappy fate of my classmate made a deep impression on my mind. Especially did it give to me an invincible repugnance to that bloody law of 'honor,' as it is called, which demands blood for every petty insult. I have never ceased to make war upon that ill-formed and monstrous public opinion which yearly is sending so many young men, with blood on their souls, to the presence of their Judge; and while I yet remember the fate of Charles Woodworth, may Heaven forbid that I should ever cease to be earnest in this most holy war! Never, Charles, never consider yourself amenable to such a law. Bow not to the opinion, were it the opinion of millions. You will have enough to bear in this life, without bearing the just curses of the widow and orphan. You will have guilt enough to carry to the bar of God, without carrying there the weighty burden of murder. Be not governed by this law of savages, generated by revenge, and perpetuated only by the fiercest and basest passions of man. Be more. Be governed by a higher and holier law, which descended from heaven to bring peace and good-will to man, and obedience to whose precepts will make holy your life and happy your death."

We rose from our seats as my uncle concluded his sad story, and found that it was already past midnight. The fire had burned low on the hearth, the wind was howling still among the trees, and the dark clouds still rapidly passing over the sky. We parted for the night, wiser it may be, but surely sadder men. We had walked beneath the cypress tree, and its shadow rested on our souls.

COOKS.

BY KATE SUTHERLAND.

(See Plate.)

MR. JOHN BROWN was a man of orderly mind and systematic habits. His business went on like clock-work; and he would have it so. If the least irregularity appeared, you may be sure he would see it and know the reason.

"All you have to do," he would sometimes say, "is to will to have things right. A resolute purpose is everything."

This doctrine he uniformly preached to Mrs. Brown on the occasion of every domestic irregularity; and especially when she complained that she could not make cook, nurse, or chambermaid do as she wished.

"Establish a certain rule, and see that it is obeyed," he would say to her. "That's my plan, and I have no trouble. An employee of mine knows that it is as much as his place is worth to go contrary to rule; and, if you made the keeping of a place in your household dependent on strict obedience to your orders, you would have far less trouble."

"It is very easy to talk," Mrs. Brown would generally reply to these suggestions.

"And just as easy to act," would respond Mr. Brown. "I know. I've tried it. You have only to resolve to have a thing done right, and it is done. Nothing more easy in the world. There is Judson, my neighbor, an easy sort of a man, with no order in his mind. Well, of course, everything around him is at sixes and sevens; and he's always complaining that he can never get anybody to do as he wishes. Give him the best clerk in the city, and he'll spoil him in three months. And why? There is no order in the man's business. He has no system. I have two young men in my store who were so worthless with Judson, according to his own account, that he had to send them off. I wouldn't ask for better clerks. In the beginning, I let them understand that I was a man who would have things my own way; and they soon understood that this was not a mere matter of words. It's the order, Jane—the order. Fix an order in your household, and all this trouble will cease."

"Order among intelligent clerks may be easily enough attained," said Mrs. Brown to her husband, one morning, after some remarks of this kind, which had arisen from the fact of company being expected to dinner; "but I'd like to see the order you would maintain with a parcel of subordinates like our Biddy to deal with. I imagine you'd find your hands full. Ignorant Irish girls are not so easy to bring into order."

"A good system and a good resolution are all that is wanted."

"You think so?"

"I know so."

"I wish you had the trial for a week."

"You'd see a different state of things," confidently replied the husband.

"No doubt of it," returned Mrs. Brown, who was hurt by her husband's rebuking manner, and showed it in her tone of voice.

Mr. Brown was a kind-hearted man—what cannot always be said of every orderly people—and was pained to see the effect of his words.

"Oh, well, never mind, Jane," said he, soothingly. "We can't all do alike. I know you manage excellently on the whole. But won't you, to-day, watch Biddy a little closer, and see that she has dinner at the hour? She is so apt to be late. I wouldn't like Mrs. Clark and Mrs. Agnew to notice anything irregular in our household economy."

"I presume our household arrangements are fully as good as theirs," said Mrs. Brown, a little sharply, for she was more fretted in mind than her husband supposed.

"That may all be; but won't you see that Biddy has dinner precisely at three?"

"I'll do the best I can, but can't promise anything," said Mrs. Brown, whose mind her husband had chafed so much that she did not attempt to conceal her annoyance.

Mr. Brown went away grumbling to himself, and Mrs. Brown went into the kitchen, and, in no very amiable tone of voice, said to Biddy—

"We're to have company to dine with us to-day, and Mr. Brown expects dinner on the table precisely at three. Now, pray, don't let it be a minute later."

Biddy always made it a point to be cross whenever there was company. This announcement alone, no matter in how amiable a tone it had been made, would have sufficed to arouse her ill nature; but coming as it did, in a fretful voice, she was filled instantly with a spirit of opposition. Not the slightest reply did she make—not the smallest sign that she heard escaped her.

Mrs. Brown stood a few moments, and then said, angrily—

"Did you hear what I said?"

"I'm not deaf, marm," pertly returned Biddy.

"Then why didn't you answer me?"

Biddy turned away with a contemptuous toss of the head, and resumed her work.

"See here, my lady!"—But Mrs. Brown checked herself, for she knew Biddy's temper, and understood that, in entering into a regular contest with her, the question of victory would be doubtful. In all probability, it would end in her being compelled to order the insolent creature out of the house; and, then, who was to cook the dinner? This thought caused Mrs. Brown to curb her feelings, and to put a bridle upon her tongue.

"Biddy," said Mrs. Brown, after pausing a few moments to compose herself. She spoke calmly, "we are to have company to-day, and I wish dinner on the table precisely at three o'clock."

Then Mrs. Brown left the kitchen, and went up to her sitting-room, feeling, as may well be supposed, no little "out of sorts." As to dinner being ready at three precisely, she had no expectation of the thing whatever. Mr. Brown would be seriously annoyed, and all her pleasure would, of course, be destroyed. No very agreeable anticipation this, in view of having company.

An hour after Mr. Brown went away, one of his men brought home a basket of marketing. On its arrival, Mrs. Brown descended once more to the lower regions of her house, in order to ascertain the nature of the provision that had been made, and to give some directions to her cook. Biddy received her mistress in no very amiable mood. In fact, she cast upon her a glance of defiance as she entered. The basket looked over, and a few brief directions given, Mrs. Brown retired. There was to be trouble that day with Biddy—nothing was more apparent.

VOL. XLIV.—37

About twelve o'clock the ladies, who were engaged to dine, arrived. Their husbands would come at three, with Mr. Brown. Mrs. Brown's heart was full; and, as from the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh, she entertained her visitors during the first hour with her troubles with servants. The subject was an interesting one to them, for they were housekeepers, and prepared to sympathize. They had also their own trials to relate, and were eloquent upon their sufferings. As for cooks, they were all voted to be a most horrible set of creatures, and the authors of more domestic misery than was to be charged to any other account. In the midst of an interesting discussion of this kind, Mrs. Brown excused herself, and went to pay a visit of exploration into Biddy's department. Things didn't look very encouraging. She had been intrusted with the work of preparing certain articles of dessert; but Mrs. Brown saw at a glance they were destined to be spoiled unless she took charge of them herself. So, without remarking on the subject, she told Biddy to go up to her room and get her an apron.

This was done with a certain air, the meaning of which was not mistaken. But Mrs. Brown didn't choose to be drawn into a regular quarrel. She took the apron, and, tying it on, went to work at the puddings, and soon had them just to her liking. After giving careful directions to have the ovens in good order before they were put in, she went up stairs and rejoined her company. At two o'clock, Mrs. Brown visited the kitchen again. Nothing was as forward as it should have been, and cook was in as bad a humor as ever.

"You'll be late, Biddy, after all," said Mrs. Brown. "This is no kind of a fire."

"The coal won't burn," replied Biddy.

"It always has burned. Strange that it doesn't burn now!"

And Mrs. Brown began to examine the range.

"No wonder," said she, "with this damper half closed. How could you expect coal to burn without a free draft? There, you can see the fire increasing already. Now do, Biddy, stir yourself; it's after two o'clock."

Biddy didn't deign an answer to this appeal; and Mrs. Brown, after standing as an observer of her movements for a little while, went up stairs, satisfied that no dinner would be ready at three o'clock.

Just at a quarter before three, Mr. Brown arrived, with Mr. Clark and Mr. Agnew, whose wives had already made their appearance.

"Dinner most ready?" said he to Mrs. Brown, whom he found in the dining-room, soon after his entrance.

"I believe so," replied Mrs. Brown.

"It's ten minutes of three."

"I can't help it," said Mrs. Brown.

"But I hope, Jane, that dinner isn't going to be late." Mr. Brown spoke in a nervous manner.

"It won't be ready at three, that's certain. Bid dy's been in a dreadful humor all the morning, and has done nothing right."

"Oh, dear! This want of punctuality does distress me! Why do you keep such a creature about you?"

"Do, Mr. Brown," said his wife, in an appealing voice, "go into the parlor and wait as patiently as you can until dinner is ready! I'm so nervous now that I can hardly hold a thing in my hands."

Mr. Brown did as he was desired to do; but his organ of punctuality was in a state of active excitement. Ten, fifteen, twenty, thirty, even forty minutes passed, and there came no welcome sound of the dinner-bell. Unable to curb his impatience any longer, Mr. Brown left the parlor, and once more sought his wife. She was still in the dining-room, where the table was set, but where no other sign of the hunger-quelling banquet was discernible.

"In Heaven's name, my dear!" said Mr. Brown, "what has made all this delay?"

"Go and ask Biddy," replied the over-tired lady; "and, if you get any satisfaction from her on the subject, you will be more fortunate than I am."

Upon this hint, and acting on the spur of the moment, Mr. Brown hurried off towards the kitchen. He would regulate the matter in quick order! He would have dinner on the table in a twinkling, or know the reason! Such were his thoughts and purposes. Mrs. Brown, anticipating trouble, followed close after her husband.

"See here, my lady!" was the salutation with which Mr. Brown met Biddy, as he entered the kitchen. "What's the meaning of all this work today? Why isn't dinner ready? Are you to be the arbiter of affairs in my house?"

Now Biddy, as the reader understands by this time, was in a defiant humor. The kitchen she felt to be her castle, and was ever inclined to dispute with any and every one the right of entrance. Had Mrs. Brown kept away during the morning, dinner would have been ready at the hour. But, every time the mistress appeared, the cook's temper was more and more ruffled, and her spirit of opposition more and more aroused. Since her husband's arrival, Mrs. Brown had manifested herself to Biddy not less than half a dozen times, and, at each appearance, made some fretful and irritating remarks touching the lateness of dinner. The climax to all this was the sudden entrance of the incensed Mr. Brown. As he came in, Biddy was in the act of turning from the range with a dish in her hands, on which was a large sirloin of beef. The words of Mr. Brown did not have the effect of subduing the spirit of Biddy, as he had anticipated. For a moment, she glared at him with a look of defiance, while her face grew scarlet with anger; then tossing the dish and its contents with a crash at his feet, and plentifully scattering the gravy over his pantaloons and the silk dress of his wife, who came to his side at the moment, she exclaimed, fiercely—

"There's your dinner! And I hope you're satisfied!"

There was a long pause of consternation on the part of Mr. and Mrs. Brown, during which Biddy retired from the kitchen with a dignity that may be imagined, but not described. Mr. and Mrs. Brown also retired, and in a manner quite as indescribable; and, seating themselves in the dining-room, collected their scattered wits for a council of war. The lady's silk dress was a sight to be seen. It was perfectly ruined, large patches of grease being freely distributed over the front breadth for the distance of more than half a yard from the bottom. The gentleman's pantaloons were in no better condition.

"Oh, dear! what is to be done?" said Mrs. Brown, with pale face and panting bosom. "I declare, I'm right sick!"

"Well, if that doesn't get ahead of me!" exclaimed Mr. Brown, who, struck with the ludicrousness of the whole scene, hardly knew whether to laugh or give an angry vent to his feelings.

"But what are we to do? It's nearly four o'clock now, and the beef is lying upon the kitchen floor!" said Mrs. Brown, in great distress.

Mr. Brown was a man for an emergency. He was not to be put down teetotally under any circumstances. He had met and conquered many difficulties in his time, and he was not to be overcome by this one.

"Do the best we can, Jane," said he, speaking with a sudden cheerfulness of manner. "Go and tell Nancy to come down and serve up the dinner, while you change your dress as quickly as possible. I will see our friends in the parlor, and make an apology for the delay. Put a good face on it. Laugh at the joke, and all will be well."

Mrs. Brown, after demurring a little, went up and did as her husband suggested, while he, becoming more and more alive every moment to the ludicrousness of the scene he had just witnessed, entered the parlor laughing. Here, to the amusement of all parties, he related, in his own way, what had just occurred, exhibiting, at the same time, some evidences of the recent scene in his soiled garments.

"And now, ladies," said he, smiling, "if you'll take pity on my poor wife, who is changing her dress, and go down and see that Nancy, our good-humored chambermaid, serves up the dinner in some kind of order, you will help to turn a serious matter into a source of merriment."

Up sprang the two ladies at this hint, and were off to the kitchen in a jiffy; and, with such right good will did they go to work, that the dinner-bell rang ere Mrs. Brown had finished her toilet.

A pleasanter dinner-party never assembled at the table of Mr. and Mrs. Brown before nor since. There was good humor, and free and easy conversation in plenty. The cooking stories that were told, if written out, would fill a volume. Cooks were voted to be the veriest torments on the face of the earth. Mrs. Clark and Mrs. Agnew, in relating some of their experiences, frequently set the whole party in a roar.

"One girl I had," said Mrs. Agnew, "went ahead of everything for ignorance; although, when I hired her, she said that she had been one of the cooks for four years in the United States Hotel. One day, late in the fall, Mr. Agnew brought home some very nice Jersey sausages. A couple of friends from the country dropped in during the afternoon, and, as I knew them to have good appetites, I said to Madge—it was the third day after she came to me—'We'll have some of the sausages with the tea.' At supper time, I served out the tea, and soon noticed, as one and another sipped it, that a very unsatisfactory expression of countenance followed. 'What ails this tea?' said my husband. 'It has a curious taste.' 'I'm sure I don't know,' was my reply. Just then, I noticed that the Jersey sausages I had directed to have cooked for tea were not on the table. I rang the bell, and Madge entered.

"Did you understand me about the sausages, Madge?" I asked.

"O yis, mum," returned Madge, confidently.

"Where are they, then?"

"Wid the tee, mum. Ye said yees wanted 'em wid the tee."

"And, sure enough, they were 'wid the tee;' for, on removing the tea-pot cover, and thrusting a spoon within, I fished up a couple of links of half-boiled sausage! Of course, Madge and I parted on the spot. I was too angry with the ignorant creature."

"Madge—Madge," said Mrs. Clark, when Mrs. Agnew ceased speaking. "Was she a short, fat, vulgar-looking girl, with brown hair?"

"Yes."

"I know her very well; and had my own time with her for a month."

And then followed half a dozen more laughable stories about cooks, that prolonged the good humor, and which we would relate for the reader's amusement, if we had not already extended our article its appropriate limit.

POETRY

SISTER, I MISS THEE.

BY J. B. DURAND.

Summ, I miss thee in those hours of gladness
When round me flit the beautiful and gay;
Then o'er my spirit comes a tinge of sadness,
And from the scene I fain would turn away.
Bright eyes may sparkle, and soft words may greet me;
Companions may be winning—sweet their smile;
Yet, if there be no answering eye to meet me,
My heart, 'midst all their joy, is sad the while.

Sister, I miss thee when day-cares are pressing
Upon my mind, usurping every thought:
Oh! 'tis such times as those I miss the blessing
That once a sister's cheering influence wrought.
They pass away without the power of soothing—
Those earth-born strifes, and bustling, rankling cares,
When hope and peace a loved one round are breathing,
When hopes are brightened by a sister's prayers.

Sister, I miss thee when the day is waning—
When comes the love-inspiring vesper hour,
A breathing stillness all around us reigning—
The heart given o'er to inspiration's power.
Once, in such moments, with responsive feeling,
You wandered, gazed, and did admire with me;
But now around me memories are stealing,
And all my thoughts, dear sister, are with thee.

Sister, I miss thee ever. Scenes the brightest Cannot thy fancied image from me part;
Forms that are fairest, and gay hearts the lightest,
Drive not the lonely feelings from my heart.
But to that hour Hope points her cheering finger,
When, home returning, I again shall greet
A smiling sister, and with her shall linger,
At morn and eve, again in converse sweet.

STANZAS.

BY A STRAY WAIF.

SHUN the words that anger urge;
Restrain them ere they leave thy tongue:
Sadder rocks than ocean merges
By passion on life's strand are flung.
Hearts by dearest bonds united,
Outraged and estranged forever;
Friendship lost; affection blighted;
Hate aroused, to slumber never.

Ah! what avails the sharp retort?
A fierce wave shivered on a rock!
Emotion wasted, winning naught
But selfabasement from the shock.
A firebrand flung, to kindle hate;
A scorpion born, whose venomous fangs
Of cherished friends may fies create,
Yet leave behind still sharper pangs

Vain the anguish of the morrow
O'er the ties by passion riven;
Words will leave a sting of sorrow,
Unforgotten though forgiven.
Through the mind like phantoms gliding,
Startling mem'ry 'mid its treasures;
With a vell fond hearts dividing;
Words plant quicksands 'mid our pleasures.

Check, oh check each angry feeling;
Leave the bitter words unspoken.
Will the wounds thy tongue is dealing
Pay for self-respect so broken?
Is thy fellow 'gainst thee sinning?
Thy anger will but steal his heart.
Art thou wrong? Thou art but winning
A scourge 'neath which thyself will smart.

SABBATH EVENING ON THE BALTIC SEA.

BY NADREHDA.

It is the evening hour,
 Yet not a single star
 Its modest radiance o'er the waters sendeth;
 For still the cloudless sky
 Hath the soft roseate dye
 That the bright orb of day so richly lendeth!

The fair blue Baltic's wave
 Our gallant bark doth lave,
 And now, like a young steed all wildly prancing,
 They lightly spring and leap,
 And to their music deep,
 Light as the sea-nymphs, they are gayly dancing.

This lovely Sabbath eve,
 Its memory may not leave
 My soul, while it the power to think shall keep!
 For it hath glided by
 In garb so heavenly,
 It seemeth like a vision of my sleep!

The sun, in gory red,
 Hath sought his briny bed—
 Yet all around, his farewell rays are gleaming;
 And, ere the lovely dye
 Leaveth the evening sky,
 The moon's cold light upon us will be streaming.

How solemn 'tis to be
 Thus tossing on the sea,
 Naught save "the blue above and blue below!"
 And yet no thought of fear
 Creepeth upon me here—
 For He, the Mighty One, our course doth know!

He, that the voice hath heard
 'E'en of the tiniest bird,
 When unto Him its feeble chirp ascendeth,
 Oh! He our souls doth keep Whilst here upon the deep
 Our solitary bark its pathway wendeth.

Oh! how the thoughts of home
 Involuntarily come
 Upon us in this solemn evening hour!
 O Father! wilt thou not Protect the dear, loved spot?
 For Thine alone, O Holiest! is the power.

And, oh! should tempests sweep
 The bosom of the deep,
 While we are dreaming, we will doubt thee never!
 So thou art watching here,
 Thou, who art everywhere,
 And we, thine own, will trust in thee forever.

THE FLOWING RIVER.

BY G. R. READ.

Down within an olden valley,
 Where the shadows are at play,
 Glides a brooklet musically
 All the blooming summer day;
 There the sweetest murmurs dally
 In the glowing morns of May.

Down its winding course it floweth
 To its parent in the deep;
 Like a silver flash it gloweth
 When the sunbeams o'er it creep;
 Starry night its music knoweth,
 When the world is rocked in sleep.

And the fairy tune it singeth
 Trembles in the upper air,
 And an echo ever ringeth
 From the forest everywhere,
 Telling all it only bringeth
 Echoes to a holy prayer.

Thus the soul is flowing ever,
 Breathing music's undertone,
 Down the valley of Life's river,
 Where the phantom shadows moan
 And its echoes seem to quiver
 Upward to the Holy One.

And it floweth upward, onward,
 To its parent, still and broad;
 And its breathings, gliding onward,
 Are the whispers to its God—
 Are the whispers, scattered downward,
 But to sanctify the sod.

THE CONSUMPTIVE.

"My guardian angel, tell
 What thus infatuates. What enchantment plants
 The phantom of an age 'twixt us and death,
 Already at the door. Yours.

They tell me I am dying; that the eager hand of death
 Is knocking at life's portal, to claim my passing breath:
 My youthful frame is yielding to a slow but sure decay,
 And with this glorious springtime I too must pass away.

I watch them move about me with a soft and noiseless tread—
 But their whispered words of pity ne'er fill my soul with dread;
 For life beats strong within me, and my spirit knows no fear,
 While Hope is ever whispering, "the end is not yet near."

If my soul indeed were quitting this tenement of clay,
 And from its earthly prison-house struggling to break away,
 The strong life-cords that bound it, with anguish sure would break,
 And hues of gloomy sorrow its parting hour would take.

But my brow is all unruffled by the rude touch of pain;
 My eye undimmed by suffering—only through my frame
 There steal a dreary languor and a longing for repose,
 As twilight lulls the world to rest, and gently shuts the rose.

If the grim shadow hovered so close above my head,
 And the dark valley opened to my reluctant tread,
 Would not the darkness of those wings enwrap my soul in gloom—
 My trembling footsteps shrink and fear this foretaste of the tomb?

But not a cloud disturbs my peace; the morning sun, that steals
 And lingers in my darkened room with bright and hopeful beams,
 Is not more cheering in his rays than the sweet thoughts that come
 To people all my solitude with Fancy's motley throng.

What though this form is weak and frail? The mind burns strong and bright;
And what seemed distant once, and dark, it grasps with firm delight;
And things forgotten long ago, by memory brought back,
May vanish like the meteor—yet leave a shining track.

And all my dreams are full of joy—there seems no room for fear;
The sound of laughter when I wake is ringing in my ear:
I wake to feel my sister's tears fall hot upon my cheek—
To meet my mother's mournful gaze: ah! wherefore do they weep?

I know the birds have come again—I hear their merry
trill;
And the fresh flowers are springing far down the sunny hill;
And the streams in all the meadows are laughing as they flow:
The world ne'er seemed so beautiful—I cannot, cannot go!

THE SUNNY SOUTH.

BY SHUQUALAK.

The morning breaks! What cavalcade is high?
What laughing echoes on the gale are borne?
What girls—what wreaths—what choral revelry?
What melting melodies of pipe and horn?
Let bells ring out! let trumpets shake the sky!
For this is May's mad, merry-making morn,
Returned to greet us in a realm as fair
As e'er was flattered with the kiss of air!

On every hedge hath Heaven dropt a rose!
Past violet-banks the gilded vessels swim,
Where emerald meadows in the eye repose,
And forests, nodding o'er the river's brim,
Gaze, like Narcissus, as the current flows,
Upon their azure image, which, though dim,
And dark, and tremulous, can never pass,
But beams as though 'twere written on a glass!

And far and near the clouds in amber stray,
Where rosy cherubs might repose and dream,
And seraphs wear the balmy time away
In soft abandon; for the rising beam
Paints bowers of bliss, too exquisite to stay,
On skyey canvas, till we almost deem
That we can people them; and scan the sphere,
As though we thought an angel would appear.

Match me, ye soft and warm Italian skies,
With these serenest heavens! Can ye show,
In storm or calm, such fascinating dyes
As kindle here, and gladden while they glow,
And spread their gorgeous treasures to the eyes,
As if in mockery of all below?
Or vaunt your classic glories, as you can,
Your landscape smiles, but not the face of man!

Yet brighter than the skies that cover me
Are sparkling eyes that flash upon me now;
And redder than the blooms upon the tree
Are cheeks that ripen in the mead below;
And sweeter far than buds that feast the bee
Are lips, where kisses never fail to glow,
With nectar steeped (as roses dashed with dew),
Pouting defiance, while they ravish you!

The children shine, in merry masquerade,
Like Cupids tricked more beautiful to seem,
And some with plumes and pennants are arrayed,
That toss sublimely in the morning's beam:
They sail the lake, or gambol in the shade,
And some run races with the laughing stream
That scrambles past them in uproarious glee,
As if its wave partook their revelry.

Around—around—a giddy-hearted throng,
There thum the ground with charivari feet,
And ever to their steps soft hearts prolong Entrancing murmurs, which the rocks repeat
Until the earth and air are filled with song
So wild, and clear, and ravishingly sweet,
The heart with huge Titanic joy is dumb;
But the eye speaks its loud delirium.

Some crown the wine—some weave the living flowers—
Some playful place them on their sunny brows—
And some apart, in sentimental bowers,
Decline their ear to Love's delicious vows:
Above, no cloud upon their beauty lowers;
Below, the trees extend their slanting boughs,
Whose fruit, rejoicing in the jocund hour,
Descends, like Danâe, in a golden shower.

And every sweet carnation that you spy
Is some fair face that half conceals its charm,
But grows upon the vision till the eye
Aches with its sweetness! First a rosy arm
And lip of nectar make the bosom sigh—
Until, in perfect loveliness, her form
Breaks forth all radiantly, like Beauty's birth,
And brings the heavens nearer to the earth.

Not in the vales of pleasant Arcady,
Not where the Brenta pours its azure stream,
Not in the realms that round Circassia lie,
Not in the musings of my deepest dream,
Not where the Houris dwell beyond the sky,
And nightly with the stars in concert beam—
Are sweeter heavens, zephyrs, girls, or flowers,
Than woo and bless us in this land of ours!

A CONFESSION.

BY BEATA.

'TWAS I, poor pretty Katy, I who did
Refuse thee shelter in my pleasant room;
I searched, and found thee in the curtain hid,
And thrust thee forth to midnight gloom.

In vain thy plaintive cry, and all in vain
Thy struggles, clinging to the fold;
Perchance a rival watched thee through the pane,
And thou wert filled with jealous pangs untold.

I did it, Katy—yes, and to my shame
I must confess, no sorrow felt;
Nor did the chirping of thy rustle name,
Nor bright green coat, my feelings melt.

So now, at last thou knowest who could turn
A deafened ear to such deep woe;
And from thy dire distress a lesson learn—
Into a lady's sanctum never go.

CHEMISETTES.

No. 1.

No. 2.

THESE are, of course, still worn as the gilet, and marquisse waists continue to be in vogue. We give cuts of two entirely new styles.

No. 1 is in the form of a habit shirt, with sleeves to correspond. It is intended to be worn with a vest. The front is ornamented with alternate rows of lace and needlework, disposed horizontally, with a narrow edge of the same surrounding it. The collar is somewhat larger than has been worn, and is finished with a neat tie. The sleeves have cuffs of needlework and lace, to correspond with the chemisette, made to turn over square. The whole has a very elegant effect, with a neat silk vest.

No. 2 is of cambric, a peculiarly rich and elegant pattern, the work so disposed that it may be worn with a low-necked dress; the front arranged for an open corsage. The small fluted collar may be dispensed with, and in its place a simple edging of rich Valenciennes lace added.

A LADY'S NIGHTCAP IN CROCHET.

Explanation: ls, long stitch; dc, double crochet; ch, chain; sq, square.

Three reels No. 20 Evan's Boar's Head Cotton. No. 4 Penelope hook.

Make 386 chain, turn back, work 1 ls, 2 ch, 1 ls into 3d loop, make 138 squares.

2d row.—Insertion.—6 sq, * 9 ls, 3 sq, repeat from *, end with 9 sq.

3d.—Decrease a sq, by dc on 1st ls, 3 ch, 1 ls on 2d ls, then 6 sq, * 9 ls, 3 sq, repeat from *, end with 7 sq, decrease a sq.

4th.—Decrease a sq, then 6 sq, * 9 ls, 3 sq, repeat from *, end with 5 sq, decrease a sq.

5th.—Decrease a sq, then 2 sq, * 9 ls, 3 sq, these

3 sq should come over the 9 ls of last row, repeat from *, and end with 1 sq, decrease a sq.

6th.—1 sq, 9 ls, 3 sq, repeat from *, end with 3 sq.

7th.—9 ls, 3 sq, repeat from *, end with 4 sq.

8th and 9th.—2 rows of squares.

10th.—Decrease a sq, then 8 sq, 5 ch, 1 ls under every 2 ch till within 9 squares of the end, then 3 sq, decrease a sq.

11th.—Decrease a sq, then 7 sq, 5 ch, 1 ls under every 5 ch, then 7 sq, decrease a sq.

12th.—7 sq, 5 ch, 1 ls under every 5 ch, 7 sq.

13th.—Decrease a sq, then 6 sq, 5 ch, 1 ls under every 5, 6 sq, decrease a sq.

14th.—6 sq, work as before, end with 6 sq.

15th.—Decrease a sq, 5 sq, work as before, then 5 sq, decrease a sq.

16th.—5 sq, 1 ls, under every 5 ch, with 2 ch between each 5 sq.

17th and 18th.—2 rows of squares.

19th.—Begin with 6 squares, then work the same as at 1st row of insertion, and end with 9 sq.

20th.—Begin with 7 sq, work as 2d row of insertion, end with 10 sq.

21st.—Begin with 8 sq, work as 3d row of insertion, end with 5 sq.

22d.—Begin with 5 sq, work as 4th row of insertion, end with 5 sq.

23d.—Begin with 4 sq, work as 5th row of insertion, end with 6 sq.

24th.—Begin with 3 sq, work as 6th row of insertion, end with 7 sq.

25th, 26th, and 27th.—3 rows of squares.

To slope the back of the Cap.—Begin on the right side of the work, under the 1st 2 ch, work 2 ls with 2 ch between each, then 2 ch, 1 ls on next ls, this must be carefully attended to, otherwise 1 stitch will be lost; after this, work 38 sq, then 2 ch, do on next ls, turn on reverse side, 3 ch, do on 1st ls, then 2 ch, 1 ls on next ls, then 38 sq, 2 ch, 1 ls under the last 2 ch, 2 ch, 1 more ls under same, turn on reverse side, 5 ch, 1 ls under the 1st 2 ch, 2 ch, 1 ls on next ls; after this, work 16 sq, 2 ch, do on next ls, turn on reverse side, 3 ch, do on 1st ls, 2 ch, do on next ls, 2 ch, 1 ls on next ls; after this, work 15 sq, 2 ch,

1 ls into the 5 ch at the end, turn on reverse side, 5 ch, 1 ls under 1st 2 ch, 2 ch, 1 ls on next ls; after this, work 8 sq, 2 ch, do on next ls, turn on reverse side, 3 ch, do on 1st ls, 2 ch, 1 ls on next ls; after this, work 8 sq, 2 ch, 1 ls under the 5 ch, turn on reverse side, 5 ch, 1 ls, under 2 ch, 2 ch, 1 ls on 1st ls; after this, work 5 sq, 2 ch, do on next ls, turn on reverse side, 3 ch, do on 1st ls, 2 ch, 1 ls on next ls; after this, work 5 sq, 2 ch, 1 ls under 5 ch, turn on reverse side, 5 ch, 1 ls under 2 ch, 2 ch, 1 ls on next ls; after this, work 3 sq, 2 ch, do on next ls, turn on reverse side, 3 ch, do on 1st ls, 2 ch, 1 ls on next ls; after this, work 3 sq, 2 ch, 1 ls under the 5 ch, turn on reverse side, 5 ch, 1 ls under the 2 ch, 2 ch, 1 ls on next ls; after this, work 2 sq, 2 ch, do on next ls, turn on reverse side, 3 ch, do on 1st ls, 2 ch, 1 ls on next ls; after this, work 2 sq, 2 ch, 1 ls under 5 ch, turn on reverse side, 5 ch, 1 ls under 2 ch, 2 ch, 1 ls on next ls; after this, work 1 sq, 2 ch, do on next ls. This finishes the slope on one side; now slope the other side the same, only beginning on the wrong side of the work instead of the right. Now crochet the two sides together, and under every space, and under the chain stitches which form the slope, all round and where the crown is to be sewed in, work 2 dc stitches; and round the front and back, where the border will be worked, crochet 3 dc stitches into every space, making 7 dc at the 2 corners.

For the Crown of the Cap.—Make 7 ch, unite, 7 ch, dc into every loop, thus making 7 chains of seven. The cotton must be cut off at every row.

2d.—Do into centre loop of 7, 7 ch, repeat.

3d.—Do into centre loop of 7, 7 ch, dc on dc stitch, 7 ch, repeat.

4th.—Same as 2d.

5th.—Same as 3d.

6th.—Same as 2d.

8th.—Same as 3d.

Now repeat again 2d, 3d, and 2d rows.

12th.—Do into centre loop of 7, 5 ch, repeat.

13th.—1 ls, 2 ch, 1 ls into 3d loop all round, including the dc stitches. In this row there are not sufficient stitches for the next row by 5, therefore, for 5 times miss 1 loop instead of 2, at different intervals. There must be 114 squares in this row, therefore it is not very material whether 1 loop or 2 be missed occasionally, so that 114 squares are made.

14th.—10 ls, 3 sq, * 9 ls, 3 sq, repeat from * all round.

15th.—10 ls the 1st on 4th ls of the 10 ls, * 3 sq, 9 ls, repeat from *.

16th.—The same as last.

17th.—10 ls the 1st on the last of the 9 ls, * 3 sq, 9 ls, repeat from *.

18th.—10 ls the 1st on the last ls of the 2d sq, * 3 sq, 9 ls, repeat from *.

19th.—The same as last row. This pattern is simply the same as the insertion in the front 20th.—1 ls, 2 ch, miss 1 loop, repeat.

21st.—5 ch, dc on every ls.

22d.—5 ch, dc into centre loop of 5 ch, repeat.

23d, 24th, 25th, 26th, and 27th.—The same as 22d.

28th.—1 ls into the centre loop of the 5 ch, 2 ch, repeat.

29th.—Begin on a ls, 10 ls in the next 7 loops, including the 1st stitch, 3 sq, 9 ls, in the next 7 loops, 3 sq, 9 ls, in the next 7 loops, * 3 sq, 9 ls, in the next 9 loops, repeat from *; the reason for commencing the row in this manner is, that there were not squares enough in the last row for the pattern. This row is the same as 14th row. Now work as at 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, and 19th rows.

Now 1 ls, 2 ch, 1 long into 3d loop.

Now 1 ls on ls, 2 ch, repeat.

2 dc under every 2 ch, worked tightly. Now sew the crown into the front, gathering it in as may be required.

Border.—1st Row.—Work all round 1 ls into every loop, with 2 ch between each.

2d.—5 ch, 1 ls, under every 2 ch, all round.

3d and 4th.—1 ls under the 5 ch, 5 ch, repeat.

5th.—Work an extra row the same as the last, along the front, beginning and ending at the ears, just where the chains of 5, in the centre of the 2 rows of insertion, begin.

6th.—Work all round, * 5 ls with 3 ch, between each, under the 5 ch, 3 ch, dc under next 5, 3 ch, dc under next 5, 3 ch, repeat from *, under next 5.

7th.—3 ch, dc under every 3 ch, all round.

Narrow ribbon, or wide white cotton braid, may be drawn in round the crown and along the front, but it is not actually necessary excepting for ornament.

BERLIN WORK.—GENTLEMAN'S BRACES.

Materials.—One yard and an eighth of white silk canvas, one nail in width; two shades of green, two ditto of blue, two ditto of scarlet, and one of amber embroidery silk. Black silk will also be required for the grounding.

Work, in cross stitch, the outline of the medallions with amber; the stems and the lower portion of the leaves with dark green; the upper part with the light shade. Work the five stitches in the centre of the flowers with amber, the lower portion with the dark shade, and the upper with the light. Work alternately a scarlet and a blue flower. Leave the spaces within the medallions, but fill in the remainder of the ground with black. Line with white ribbon, and make up in the usual style.

EMBROIDERED PURSE.

Materials.—Half a yard of French canvas, No. 40, 5 inches wide, 2 hanks of large gold beads, 8 strings of transparent white, of the same size, 4 skeins of emerald green floss silk, 2 skeins of netting silk to match, and half a yard of sarsnet ribbon of the same hue; 2 fringed purse-ends and rings.

The mode of working this purse, by doing the ends on fine canvas, is one now first introduced to the public. It is particularly suitable for those who carry a good deal of money about with them, as the ends can never tear or give way. We all know the consequences of a dropped loop in knitting, and of a stitch giving way in crochet; and how often a handsome purse is thus rendered utterly useless. Embroidered ends are quite free from this defect, and have a very handsome appearance.

A diagram is given of one side of the canvas work. The two sides of each end are worked on one piece, divided only by a cross stitch line of floss silk, on which the fringed garniture is sewed. The pattern must be worked from the diagram given, the gold beads being first put on; these are distinguished by a \times in the centre of a white square. The white beads are then to be added: they are marked by a white round on a black square. The grounding is done in green floss silk. Of course, the canvas must be properly stretched on a frame before it is worked. The beads are put on with strong silk. Leave an inch or two of canvas between the pieces, for the two ends.

The space for the rings is knitted in the following manner: Green netting silk, and two needles, No. 17. Cast on 84 stitches, and knit one plain row.

Pattern: \times knit 1, make 1, knit two together \times . Repeat this to the end, and continue it for every row, until sufficient is done: then knit one plain row, and cast off.

To make up the Purse.—Sew up the sides of the canvas as closely as possible—which can only be done by sewing them on the right side. Make linings of the ribbon to fit the ends, put them in, and run them together at the seams and ends. Sew the knitting to one end, letting the opening come in the centre of one side; slip on the rings and run on the other end. Conceal the joins of the sides of the canvas, and those where the knitting is sewed on, by a row of gold beads, fasten on the fringe, and the purse is complete.

KNITTED BERRIES AND FRUIT.

ACORN AND OAK LEAVES.

ACORN.

CAST on eighteen stitches on three needles (No. 20); six on each needle, with a very light shade of China silk, wound double, or rather with fine purse twist single. Work a number of plain rounds sufficient for the length of a real acorn, then one round, knitting two stitches, as one in the middle of each needle; another plain round, and gather all the stitches with a sewing needle. Then on the top of a double wire make a tuft of green wool, sufficient in length and thickness to fill the silk acorn just knitted, fasten neatly the gathered stitches to the top of the tuft, gather the stitches of the other aperture, fasten off the silk, and your acorn is ready for its little cup.

CUP OF THE ACORN.

Cast on eighteen stitches; six on each of three needles, with green Berlin wool, split in two, of a darker shade than the acorn.

First round.—Knit one, purl one; throughout the round.

Second round.—Purl one, knit one; throughout the round.

Third round.—Knit one, purl one; throughout the round.

Fourth round.—Purl one, knit one; throughout the round.

Fifth round.—Knit together as one the two first, and the two last stitches of each needle; the other stitches plain.

Sixth round.—Plain, and gather the stitches with a rug needle.

Place the acorns in the cup, and fasten them together by a few stitches round the edge of the cup.

LEAF.

Needles, No. 19.—Cast on one stitch, with green wool split, or purse twist, rather fine.

First row.—Make one, knit one.

Second row.—Make one, purl two.

Third row.—Make one, knit three.

Fourth row.—Make one, purl four.

Fifth row.—Knit two, make one, knit one, make one; knit the remainder of the row.

Sixth row.—Purled.

Continue in alternate plain and purled rows, making one stitch before, and one after the middle stitch in every knitted row, till you have thirteen stitches on the needle; then, in the next front or knitted row, slip one stitch, knit two, turn back, purl the same stitches; slip one, knit three, turn back, purl the same stitches; slip one, knit two together, turn the slipped stitch over the knitted ones; knit two more together, turn the stitch last made over them, and knit plain all the stitches on the left hand needle. Next row, (a purled one,) slip one stitch,* purl two, turn back, knit the same stitches; slip one, purl three, turn back, knit the same stitches; slip one, purl two together, turn the slipped stitch over the purled ones, purl two more together, and turn over them the stitch last made, purl the remainder of the row. Then resume the alternate plain and purled rows, making, in the plain row, one stitch before and one after the middle stitch, and one at the beginning of every row, plain or purled. When you have about twenty stitches on the needle, knit one plain row, increasing as before, but in the middle only; and purl one row without increase, then, slip one stitch, knit seven, turn back, purl the same stitches; slip one, knit five, turn back, purl the same stitches; slip one, knit three, turn back, purl the same stitches. Cast off eight stitches, knitting two together each time before turning over them the preceding stitch, and knit plain the remainder of the row. Then, slip one stitch, purl seven, turn back, knit the same stitches; slip one, purl five, turn back, knit the same stitches; slip one, purl three, turn back, knit the same stitches; and cast off eight stitches, purling two together each time before turning over them the preceding stitch; purl the remainder of the row. Work one or two more scallops like this last, according to the size of the leaf which you intend to make; then, one much smaller, and finish your leaf by decreasing one stitch at the beginning of the front, and one at the beginning of the back row, cast off the few remaining stitches; cover a wire with green wool split, sew it neatly round the leaf, preserving carefully the shape of the scallops; sew another wire, covered with green wool, along the back of the nervure in the middle of the leaf; twist together all the wires, and cover them with green wool, to make the stem of the leaf. Half a dozen leaves of different sizes and shades, and about as many acorns make a very handsome branch. Too much regularity in the size or shape of the leaves ought to be rather avoided than aimed at; as it is not in nature. Acorns and oak leaves might be used with excellent effect for ornamenting the fringe of very handsome mats, and two acorns, back to back, filled with emery, are pretty and useful in a work-box.

* All slipped stitches in the purling rows are to be taken from the back.

EDITORS' TABLE.

MAY! The very word is poetic, and seems naturally followed by flowers. We look out, expecting to catch a glimpse of buds and blossoms among the unfolding leaves and soft green grass that, whispering of the youth of Nature, almost tempts age to believe in the rejuvenescence of humanity. It is pleasant to be young, even in fancy; to live over the hopes of those bright, long days of childhood, when it seemed as though the sun would never go down.

"O Spring! of hope, and love, and youth, and gladness,
Wind-winged emblem! brightest, best, and fairest!
Whence comest thou, when with dark winter's sadness
The tears that fade in sunny smiles thou sharpest?"

But it matters not whence she comes; or, rather, we feel—though Shelley might not—that Spring comes by the purpose and from the love of Him who promised that, "while the earth remaineth, seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease." This divine promise assures the material condition of humanity. Nature obeys God. On this obedience even the atheist reckons, when he hopes for the return of Spring. But how poor and cold are his hymns to Nature, to which he ascribes this regularity in the wonder-working power of the Seasons, compared with the love and gratitude animating the heart of the Christian, who thanks God for thus watching over the "round world, and they that dwell therein!"

THE PRESENT.—If ever there was a time that required deep and fervent faith in God and in his Word, it is now. The Old World is quaking with fears that the great deeps of humanity are soon to be broken up. A storm seems impending which makes proud England tremble, and turn, in her forebodings, for help to our new nation. The Mother feels she must lean on the strong arm of the Daughter, or she may be overwhelmed. Every mail from abroad brings fresh indications of the coming struggle. This must be met and managed by men;—but who are to be the helpless victims, the weepers who "will go about the streets," the mourners who "cannot be comforted?" Will not the saddest lot fall, where it has hitherto always fallen from the sins of men, on the home and heart of woman? Take the sin of INTemperance, that, in our land, is the great sin, as that of WAR is in Europe, and calculate its effects on the condition of the drunkard and his family. He destroys himself, to be sure—but he does have some enjoyment, some gratification of his debased appetites and passions, during the debauch with his boon companions; while his wretched wife and helpless children—hungry, cold, ragged, and diseased—are suffering all these extremities of misery from his wickedness, and that of the greater criminal, the vile RUM-SELLER!

A drunken man in Baltimore, not long since, drove his wife from their home by his abusive cruelty, and then murdered their two children. He killed himself also;—and thus the broken-hearted, childless mother is left to weep alone for the crimes of her husband as well as over his death. And yet editors of public journals, giving pathetic account of this awful tragedy, caused by the selling of spirit uous liquors, can still disparage the "Maine Liquor Law," and try, covertly if not openly, to hinder its being passed by the Legislatures of other States!

We have never echoed the cry of "Woman's Rights," but only sought to encourage her to do her DUTIES. Not at the polls, but in the parlors, must she canvass this subject of Temperance. Her voice, not her vote, is what the times require.

Women of America, be true to your duties! Persuade, entreat, advise those men—over whose happiness and homes you—as mother, wife, sister, friend—have the guardianship next to that of the angels—to abolish by law the manufacture and traffic in Rum and its substitutes. Then America may stand proudly forth as the hope of the world. Then Great Britain may look to our land as to the pillar of fire that is to lead her through the night of darkness that she fears is coming upon her. America, breaking the bands of Intemperance from off her breast, and trampling the intoxicating bowl under her feet, would become the best, the strongest, the noblest champion of humanity the world ever saw, and might well take the lead in all that makes the true glory of mankind!

"AN EXPENSIVE WOMAN.—An economist the other day observed a lady who carried one day's labor of two thousand men upon her shoulders, and that of as many more hanging from her ears. There was not a limb in her body which did not call for the work of an entire day of one hundred men or women; and if it were usual to adorn the person with gold, like a Chinese pagoda, instead of silks and furs and textures of lace and wool, what was expended on her dress would have plated her all over with the precious metal."

We copied the above from a religious paper. Without intending to deny the facts stated, or dissent from the conclusions drawn, we would respectfully ask the writer to calculate the cost of the tobacco used in smoking and chewing by professing Christian men in our land. The jewels and finery about the lady's person were not all wasted—they had some real worth, which might be of use to her in a reverse of fortune. Of what worth or advantage is the habit of using tobacco? This habit not only requires the cost of much labor from those who raise and prepare the dirty weed, but takes the precious time of those who give themselves up to its power. Even clergymen—ministers of the Gospel—often waste, amid the fumes of tobacco smoke, those minutes they should employ in prayer, those hours they should devote to the poor among their people.

But we are not designing to cover, even by a merited rector, the wrong doings of our own sex. Women are too much given to fashion. They spend too much time in dress, idle gossip, and light reading. Whose fault is it that women are thus trifling? It is the fault of men. They neither give their daughters a sound, liberal, soul-enlightening education, nor will they permit them opportunities of using their talents in a way that might be of any profit to themselves or others.

Look at a rich father—a Christian of high standing in his church. He will listen to the words of St. Paul, "He who liveth in pleasure is dead while he liveth," and thin-the rebuke of female vanity is well merited. But how does this father train his own daughters? At the fashionable female schools, or by the music-master, chiefly. Years are wasted by girls who have no talent for music, in thrumming the piano—because it is fashionable for young ladies to play. The father who gives his son an education which he can make useful, allows his daughters to waste their time in pursuits that are only meant, in their highest accomplishment, to give pleasure. Yet "she who liveth in pleasure is dead while she liveth."

But it will be said, Woman's destiny is to marry, and she does not want a profession. How is woman's destiny any more connected with marriage than man's? They must marry together. If she need an education that will make her a good wife, he equally needs an education that will make him a good husband. Woman wants something to do—an aim and pursuit for life—which will harmonize with her condition as an accountable being, as well as enable her to discharge with better knowledge her duties as daughter, sister, wife, and mother, and mistress of a family, should all be her lot. There are three pursuits that harmonize with woman's character and condition, viz: teaching, ministering to the sick, and having the care of charitable institutions, which are chiefly designed for their own sex and for children.

The daughters of rich men should be as thoroughly educated as their sons. Such young ladies should be able to give instruction to others, even if never needed to act as teachers. And how can woman, to whom God has given a body more complicated than that of man, be safely kept in ignorance of her own wonderful formation? God has placed her at the fountain of life, given into her care the new-born child. Has He not given her capacity to learn how the child should be ordered, and how her own peculiar diseases should be treated? Many rich young men study medicine because they wish to have a pursuit—not that they intend to practice. Many rich young ladies might, most advantageously, devote the time they waste on frivolous pursuits or foolish accomplishments to this science. Then they would know how to take care of their own health—and they might do many acts of kindness to the sick poor by this knowledge; thus gaining strength of mind and peace of conscience.

Christian fathers, which do you give your daughters—an education that makes them dependent on fashion and show for their happiness, or one that will qualify them to do good and to communicate blessings to others?

STATISTICS OF FEMALE TEACHERS.—Massachusetts has in her public schools about 8,000 (in round numbers) teachers. Of these, 6,000 are females, or in the proportion of three to one compared with the male teachers.

Brooklyn City, L. I., has in its public schools 120 teachers—17 males, 103 females, or in the proportion of seven to one.

Philadelphia employs 781 teachers in its public schools, viz: 82 males, 699 females, or the proportion of eight to one.

Is not this view encouraging for the prospects of female education and employment? A blessed circumstance it is to our country that the men are learning to value and employ rightly the talents of woman.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.—The following articles are accepted: "Even Measure," "The Altar of Earth," "The Wedding Ring," "Woman, Rights and Writing," "Parting Words," "Evening Hymn," "Stanzas—There is a glow of purest light," "Address to the Soul," "The Soldier's Dream of Home," "Love and Truth," "To Signora B*," "Moon light," "L'Amour," "God must be merciful to Kings," "Hermene," "Memory," "Rocks," "Last Words," "Our Three Marriages," "The Little Girl's Inquiry."

We are obliged to decline the following:—some of these, as we learn from their authors, have been already published (in "provincial papers"), which effectually prevents their appearance in the "Lady's Book"—"A Story in Three Parts," "Heaven," "Dawn," "The Two Sisters," "Desert not the Cottage," "The Heart that's Always True," "Ode on Spring," "The West Wind," "Spring Musings," "Clouds," "The Miniature Ring," "The Erring Son," "Oblivion," and "Angela."

THE LADIES' NEW ENGLAND ART-UNION OF NEEDLEWORK.—Mr. Godey returns his thanks to George Stimpson, Esq., for the "certificate of membership" to this "Union," which he has transmitted him. Mr. Godey is proud to receive such evidences of approbation from the accomplished ladies who are engaged in perfecting the art of needlework. He will endeavor to make his "Lady's Book" worthy of their patronage; then he is sure it will continue to win general favor.

As the plan of this society should be widely known, we subjoin the programme. The management is under the care of Mrs. C. A. Stimpson, No. 9 Bow Street, Charlestown, Mass.

During the last few years, much has been said, and many efforts have been made for the amelioration of the condition of those who obtain a livelihood by the use of the NEEDLE, and it may be admitted that something has been done worthy of commendation. But it is believed there is yet room for further advancement, and therefore the Manager begs leave to lay before the public her plan for a Ladies' Art-Union of Needlework, for the encouragement of those who would gain an honorable livelihood in this beautiful branch of art. If the Art-unions, which now find so much favor with the public, are deserving of encouragement, it is believed that this effort to give employment to a number of deserving females will meet with all the encouragement and support its most ardent friends anticipate.

The payment of Five Dollars will constitute membership for one year.

Every subscriber, upon the payment of Five Dollars, will receive a printed certificate of membership, which shall entitle him or her to—

1st. A copy of a new and splendid book, entitled "BEAUTIES OF SACRED LITERATURE." This work is embellished with eight beautiful steel-plate engravings, namely—"Suffer little children to come unto me," engraved by SADD.
 Moses smiting the Rock, - - - "DONEY.
 Daniel in the Lion's Den, - - - "
 The Raising of Lazarus, - - - "SADD.
 The Rescue of Moses, - - - "DONEY.
 The youthful Saviour in the Temple, - "ORMSBY.
 The Friend of Adversity, - - - "SADD.
 Jerusalem from the Mount of Olives, - "PELTON.

This work will be beautifully printed, and bound in a style equal to any of the Annals.

2d. A chance to obtain the beautiful piece of Embroidery, entitled "MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS RESIGNING THE CROWN AT LOCHLEVIN CASTLE." This piece measures three feet by four feet six inches, and is valued at $300.

Other works of this art will be given to the subscribers, according to the success of the Union.

OUR TREASURY.

OAK PLANTING.

BY WASHINGTON IRVING.

He who plants an oak looks forward to future ages, and plants for posterity. Nothing can be less selfish than this. He cannot expect to sit in its shade, nor enjoy its shelter; but he exults in the idea that the acorn which he has buried in the earth shall grow up into a lofty pile, and shall keep on flourishing, and increasing, and benefiting mankind, long after he shall have ceased to tread his paternal fields. Indeed, it is the nature of such occupations to lift the thoughts above mere worldliness. As the leaves of trees are said to absorb all noxious qualities of the air, and to breathe forth a purer atmosphere, so it seems to me as if they drew from us all sordid and angry passions, and breathed forth peace and philanthropy. There is a serene and settled majesty in woodland scenery, that enters into the soul, and dilates and elevates it, and fills it with noble inclinations. The ancient and hereditary groves, too, that embower this island, are most of them full of story. They are haunted by the recollections of great spirits of past ages, who have sought for relaxation among them from the tumult of arms, or the toils of state, or have wooed the muse beneath their shade. Who can walk, with soul unmoved, among the stately groves of Penshurst, where the gallant, the amiable, the elegant Sir Philip Sidney passed his boyhood; or can look without fondness upon the tree that is said to have been planted on his birthday; or can ramble among the classic bowers of Hagley; or can pause among the solitudes of Windsor Forest, and look at the oaks around, huge, gray, and time-worn, like the old castle towers, and not feel as if he were surrounded by so many monuments of long-enduring glory? It is, when viewed in this light, that planted groves, and stately avenues, and cultivated parks, have an advantage over the more luxuriant beauties of unassisted nature. It is that they team with moral associations, and keep up the ever-interesting story of human existence.

It is incumbent, then, on the high and generous spirits of an ancient nation, to cherish these sacred groves that surround their ancestral mansions, and to perpetuate them to their descendants. Republican as I am by birth, and brought up as I have been in republican principles and habits, I can feel nothing of the servile reverence for titled rank, merely because it is titled; but I trust that I am neither churl nor bigot in my creed. I can both see and feel how hereditary distinction, when it falls to the lot of a generous mind, may elevate that mind into true nobility. It is one of the effects of hereditary rank, when it falls thus happily, that it multiplies the duties, and, as it were, extends the existence of the possessor. He does not feel himself a mere individual link in creation, responsible only for his own brief term of being. He carries back his existence in proud recollection, and he extends it forward in honorable anticipation. He lives with his ancestry, and he lives with his posterity. To both does he consider himself involved in deep responsibilities. As he has received much from those that have gone before, so he feels bound to transmit much to those who are to come after him. His domestic undertakings seem to imply a longer existence than those of ordinary men; none are so apt to build and plant for future centuries, as noble-spirited men, who have received their heritages from foregone ages.

I cannot but applaud, therefore, the fondness and pride with which I have noticed English gentlemen, of generous temperaments, and high aristocratic feelings, contemplating those magnificent trees, which rise like towers and pyramids from the midst of their paternal lands. There is an affinity between all nature, animate and inanimate: the oak, in the pride and lushness of its growth, seems to me to take its range with the lion and the eagle, and to assimilate, in the grandeur of its attributes, to heroic and intellectual man. With its mighty pillar rising straight and direct towards heaven, bearing up its leafy honors from the impurities of earth, and supporting them aloft in free air and glorious sunshine, it is an emblem of what a true nobleman should be; a refuge for the weak, a shelter for the oppressed, a defence for the defenceless; warding off from them the peltings of the storm, or the scorching rays of arbitrary power. He who is this, is an ornament and a blessing to his native land. He who is otherwise, abuses his eminent advantages; abuses the grandeur and prosperity which he has drawn from the bosom of his country. Should tempests arise, and he be laid prostrate by the storm, who would mourn over his fall? Should he be borne down by the oppressive hand of power, who would murmur at his fate?—"Why cumbereth he the ground?"

WOMAN.

BY EDWARD D. MANSFIELD.

THERE is a beautiful parallelism between the condition of woman in her domestic life, and the character of a nation. She is the mother of men, and the former of their minds, at that early age when every word distills upon the heart, like the dew-drop upon the tender grass. There is to that young mind no truth or falsehood in the world but that whose words flow from the mother's lips. There is no beauty in character, nor glory in action, which has not been concentrated by her praise. There is to that climbing child no path where the mother's feet has not trod. Her mind is to his the supernatural pillar of fire which illumines his mid-night ignorance, and the silvery cloud which at mid-day precedes him in every highway to the world. And, even when science has conducted her pupil through the highest walks of knowledge; or when art has polished him into the accomplished citizen; or when power has dignified him with the memorials of office, she still lives in his soul, which she has imbued from her heart's

"pictured urn,

With thoughts that breathe, and words that burn."

It is thus that society is formed in its social and moral ideas, and thus that its condition must ever present, on a large scale, a parallelism in its moral life, to the condition of woman. It is not matter of fancy, but a great social fact.

Literary Notices.

From A. HART (late Carey & Hart), corner of Fourth and Chestnut Street, Philadelphia:—

MARCUS WARLAND; OR, THE LONG MOSS SPRING.

By Caroline Lee Hents, author of "Linda," "The Mob Cap," etc. In this work, the object of the authoress has been to present to the reader that which she conceives to be a fair view of the social institutions of the South. Her residence in several of the Southern States has enabled her to perform this duty impartially; and she claims that no one will accuse her of having set down aught in malice, and asserts that she has in nothing extenuated. This we believe. Mrs. Hents is a lady endowed with a superior mind, quick to perceive error, and ever ready to condemn it; but, at the same time, she is a lady of great charity, willing to concede that circumstances may have such an influence upon the conduct and the appearances of others as should induce us to weigh with great care all the facts relating to their positions before we pronounce an opinion. It is greatly to be regretted that writers generally do not partake more liberally of her kind sentiments in this regard, even if they do not possess her genius, and thus, where they cannot praise the condition of things, at least do justice to the circumstances of individuals.

FROM CHARLES SCRIBNER, New York, through A. HART, Philadelphia:—

A REEL IN A BOTTLE, FOR JACK IN THE DOLDRUMS: being the Adventures of two of the King's Seamen in a Voyage to the Oriental Country. Edited, from the Manuscript of an old Salt, by the Rev. Henry T. Cheever, author of "The Whale and his Captors," "Island World of the Pacific," etc. This is a very attractive book, written in a very pleasant style, on highly important subjects. Those who are fond of sea stories will find in it all the quaint peculiarities that belong to seafaring characters; but none of those features which so often render such portraits objectionable. It is, in fact, a kind of Pilgrim's Progress on the ocean, in which the author has been careful to display all the virtues, and all the duties of a Christian life. One who has, in times past, had some experience among seamen, thinks it would be an admirable book to put into the hands of such as traverse the deep, as well as in the hands of those who are not familiar with the shoals and quicksands that threaten destruction to all in the eventful voyage of life.

FROM J. W. MOORE, 128 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia:—
QUAKERISM; OR, THE STORY OF MY LIFE. By a Lady, who, for forty years, was a member of the Society of Friends. There are some peculiarities about this volume for which we do not intend to be in the remotest degree responsible. To tell the truth about it, it is a severe stricture upon the conduct and principles of a numerous and respectable religious society, against whom but little has heretofore been said that has had any lasting impression on the public mind. Indeed, much that the author has represented to be facts, and much that forms the basis of her arguments, has already been denied; but whether successfully refuted we are not able to say. We have spoken this candidly, but with a determination not to be involved in religious or sectarian disputes.

A LEGEND OF THE WALDENSES, AND OTHER TALES. By Mary J. Windle. This is the third edition of a volume of tales, which, on account of the interest they create in important historical events, will long remain favorites with readers of taste and discrimination.

CHAMBERS' PAPERS FOR THE PEOPLE. Volume 4. The historical and scientific merits of this work are so universally known, and so highly appreciated, that we deem we need only refer our readers to the fact of their publication, as the volumes appear.

FROM THOMAS, COWPERTHWAIT & Co., Philadelphia:—
THE STANDARD SPEAKER: containing Exercises in Prose and Poetry, for Declamation in Schools, Academies, Lyceums, and Colleges, newly Translated or Compiled from Celebrated Orators, Authors, and Popular Debaters, Ancient and Modern. A Treatise on Oratory and Elocution. Notes Explanatory and Biographical. By Epees Sargent. 1 vol. foyal 12mo., 558 pages. Boys who want "capital pieces for speaking," will not be long in finding out the attractions of this handsome and comprehensive volume. It contains, among the old masterpieces in the art, a variety of new and striking pieces for declamation, evidently compiled or translated with great research and labor on the part of the editor. Nothing could be better than some of the translations from Mirabeau, Victor Hugo, Massillon, and others, now for the first time presented. The poetical and dramatic extracts are numerous and well adapted, and the British and American Senatorial departments are admirably filled and arranged. The work will command attention generally from teachers and all persons interested in the good cause of elocution. It is well adapted for use in all sections of the United States.

FROM LINDSAY & BLAKISTON, Philadelphia:—
PHILADELPHIA AS IT IS, IN 1852: being a correct Guide to all the Public Buildings, Literary, Scientific, and Benevolent Institutions; and places of Amusement; Remarkable Objects; Manufactories; Commercial Warehouses; and Wholesale Stores in Philadelphia and its vicinity. With Illustrations, and a map of the city and environs. By R. A. Smith. Happily, the title of this work is so comprehensive, that we have little to say in relation to it, except it is to assure the reader that the work contains all the title claims. It gives us pleasure to add, however, that Mr. R. A. Smith is about to bring out a very beautiful work on the Cemeteries of Philadelphia, with numerous illustrations. Laurel Hill will be the first of the series, and form a distinct book.

FROM HARPER & BROTHERS, New York, through LINDSAY & BLAKISTON, Philadelphia:—

RECOLLECTIONS OF LITERARY LIFE; or, Books, Places, and People. By Mary Russell Mitford, author of "Our Village," "Belford Regis," etc. This is one of the most interesting and fascinating books that has come under our observation for many a day. Its variety, pleasantness, and truthfulness, all tending to leave the most refined and charitable impressions on the heart of the reader, will greatly endear the name of the author to her numerous readers and admirers on this side of the ocean.

THE ARCTIC SEARCHING EXPEDITION: a Journal of Boat-Voyage through Rupert's Land and the Arctic Sea, in Search of the Discovery Ships under command of Sir John Franklin. With an Appendix on the Physical Geography of North America. By Sir John Richardson, C. B., F. R. S., Inspector of Naval Hospital and Fleets, &c. This is a most valuable work, presenting to the reader a vast amount of new and valuable information in relation to a remote and interesting quarter of the globe.

FROM GOULD & LINCOLN, Boston, through LINDSAY & BLAKISTON, Philadelphia:—

ANNUAL OF SCIENTIFIC DISCOVERY; or Year-Book of Facts in Science and Art for 1852. Exhibiting the most important discoveries and improvements in mechanics, useful arts, natural philosophy, chemistry, astronomy, meteorology, zoology, botany, mineralogy, geology, geography, antiquities, etc. Together with a list of recent scientific publications; a classified list of patents; obituaries of eminent scientific men; notes on the progress of science during the year 1851, etc. etc. Edited by David A. Wells, A. M. The reader will find the annual to embrace every subject enumerated in the title.

FROM JOHN S. TAYLOR, New York, through H. C. BAIRD and J. W. MOORE, Philadelphia:—

MUSINGS OF AN INVALID. Second edition. The author of this book has had ample reasons for feeling gratified with the success it has met with. These feelings, however, were not confined, as we presume, to its rapid sale. He must have felt a higher gratification in the plaudits that were showered upon him from every quarter, exalting his wisdom, his quaint and gentle morality, his uncommon vigor, his kindly heart, and original and refined intellect, because, probably, he was conscious that he was not undervaluing of all that was said of him. In his preface to the second edition, he pleads "guilty to some little disingenuousness, in assuming a part that did not belong to him." He was not the sick and wretched being he had represented himself, but a hale and happy fellow, who never taken has so much as a pill in five years. We are glad to hear it. We hope he will long retain his good health and spirits, that he may the longer and more agreeably administer to the rational and spiritual comforts of his readers. We have some doubts, nevertheless, as to the propriety of making his secret known to the public.

From J. S. REDFIELD, Clinton Hall, New York, through W. B. ZIEBER, Philadelphia:—

THE BOOK OF BALLADS. Edited by Bon Gaullier. A new edition, with several new ballads. With illustrations. LAYS OF THE SCOTTISH CAVALIERS, AND OTHER POEMS. By William Edmondstone Aytoun, Editor of "Blackwood's Magazine," and Professor of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres in the University of Edinburgh. The poetry of this volume is founded on some of the most interesting facts detailed in the history of Scotland, sketches of which the author has taken the pains to present the reader in his notes and prose introductions.

From GOULD & LINCOLN, Boston, through DANIELS & SMITH, Philadelphia:—

THE HISTORY OF PALESTINE FROM THE PATRIARCHAL AGE TO THE PRESENT TIME; with Introductory Chapters on the Geography and Natural History of the Country, and on the Customs and Institutions of the Hebrews. By John Kitto, D. D., Editor of the "Pictorial Bible," "Pictorial History of Palestine," etc. With upwards of two hundred illustrations. This is a very valuable book, full of instruction for the young, and is therefore worthy of a place in every family library.

BEAUTIES OF SACRED LITERATURE. Illustrated by eight steel engravings. Edited by Thomas Wyatt, A. M., author of "The Sacred Tableaux," etc. etc. This is an elegant volume, in every particular worthy of the sublime subjects of which it treats. It comes to us from the "Ladies' New England Art-Union of Needlework," No. 9 Bow Street, Charlestown. The table of contents embraces articles from a number of the very best poets and prose writers of our country, which assure us at once of the purity and excellence of its moral and religious sentiments.

NOVELS, SERIALS, PAMPHLETS, &c.

From Harper & Brothers, New York, through Lindsay & Blakiston, Philadelphia: "The Head of the Family." A Novel. By the author of "Olive," and "The Ogilvies."—"Ravenscliffe." By the author of "Time, the Avenger."—"Adelaide Lindsay," etc.—Part 22d of "A Dictionary of Practical Medicine; containing General Pathology, the Nature and Treatment of Diseases, Morbid Structures," &c.

By James Copland, M. D., F. R. S. Edited, with additions, by Charles L. Lee, M. D.—No. 20 of the "Pictorial Field Book of the Revolution." By Benson J. Lossing.—"Darien; or, the Merchant Prince." A Historical Romance by Eliot Warburton, author of "The Crescent and the Cross," etc.

From E. S. Jones & Co., S. W. corner of Fourth and Race Streets: Nos. 8 and 9, for February and March, of "The Model Architect." By Samuel Sloan, Architect. A beautiful work, which has been greatly improved.

From A. Hart (late Carey & Hart): "As Good as a Comedy; or, the Tennessean's Story." By an Editor. This is a very amusing work, forming another neat volume to "Hart's Library of Humorous American Works." With illustrations by Darley.

Walker, Richardson & Co., Charleston, S. C., have commenced the publication of a series of popular southern books. The first No. of this series, price 37½ cents, is very beautifully printed, and contains "The Golden Christmas; a Chronicle of St. John's, Berkeley." Compiled from the Notes of a Briefless Barrister. By the author of "The Yemassee," "Guy Rivers," "Katharine Walton," etc. The readers of the "Lady's Book" will be pleased to recognize, in the author of "The Golden Christmas," an old and popular contributor, with whose merits as a writer they have had abundant opportunities of becoming familiar. The work is for sale by A. Hart (late Carey & Hart), Fourth and Chestnut Streets, Philadelphia.

From A. M. Spangler, publisher, Lancaster, Pa., through W. B. Zieber, Agent, South Third Street, Philadelphia: "Pennsylvania Farm Journal: devoted to Agriculture, Horticulture, and Rural Economy." S. S. Haldeman, Editor. This is one of the most valuable agricultural papers that comes to our office, and bids fair to be of vast importance in the laudable efforts that are now being made throughout our country to disseminate correct information among farmers and horticulturists, and among all who are interested in the progress and development of those powers and resources on which we are dependent as a nation for the seeds of "virtue, liberty, and independence." The March number of this journal contains the conclusion of a very valuable scientific paper, entitled "Remarks on Entomology, chiefly in reference to an Agricultural Benefit." This paper was contributed by W. D. Brincklé, M. D., of this city, whose efforts to enlarge the knowledge of agriculture and horticulture place him in an honorable position among the practical and scientific benefactors of his country.

P. S. Since writing the notice above, we have received the "Remarks" of Dr. Brincklé entire, in a pamphlet, published by W. B. Wiley, Lancaster. It was intended that the "Remarks" should have been read before the Agricultural Convention, which assembled in Harrisburg in December last; but, in consequence of a deep snow, the gentleman intrusted with the manuscript did not arrive until after the Convention had adjourned. This statement is due to Dr. Brincklé, as well as to the Convention.

"The Temple: devoted to Masonry, Literature, and Science." Edited by B. Parke and C. E. Blumenthal, Carlisle, Pa. The number for March is, as usual, neatly printed, and contains a number of articles interesting to the initiated. The Temple on the cover of our copy was rather obscure; too much so to be indicative of what we understand to be the press it bright condition of the order.

Godley's Arm-Chair.

ALTHOUGH we have been for nearly a quarter of a century in monthly converse with a large portion of the American people, distributed over our vast, and still progressive and still prosperous country, yet we have never, until very recently, assumed a positively distinct position in the pages of the "Book." And we must say that, in presuming to do so now, our natural modesty and diffidence will have to undergo a severe trial. We feel assured, however, that, when once firmly seated in this our venerable arm-chair, which we have occupied so deferentially for such a length of time, we shall be able to discourse, not authoritatively, as some of our friends do, but pleasantly and intelligently, to our readers. It is not possible, indeed, that we shall ever be greatly venerated for our wisdom, or highly esteemed for our wit; but we hope, at least, to gain some reputation for good humor and for sincerity of purpose in desiring to impart the greatest amount of innocent pleasure to the minds and the hearts of the greatest number.

A chair, dear reader, has been defined to be a species of seat, not fixed but movable, turned about, and returned at pleasure. It is precisely such a chair as that here described that we are now seated in, and from which we propose occasionally to address you—now turning to this subject, and now to that, as our fancy or best judgment may dictate.

In the prosecution of this task, we are aware that we shall be required by some readers to display a great deal more wit, wisdom, talent, and humor than we can justly or modestly claim to have fallen to our share. We feel not only admonished as to the folly of all high pretensions, but also feel free to admonish our friends not to expect too much. An excellent critic and an accurate observer of mankind has said, alluding to a class of funny writers who attempted to flourish in his day: "These poor gentlemen endeavor to gain themselves the reputation of wits and humorists by such monstrous conceits as almost qualify them for Bedlam, not considering that humor should always be under the check of reason, and that it requires the direction of the nicest judgment, by so much the more as it indulges itself in the most boundless freedom." Rather than a condemnation like this should be made applicable to our pretensions, we would be willing to have it said of us now, hereafter, and forever—

In him, nor wit nor humor shone—
No puns or bright conceits had he!

In shaping our own course, therefore, and in all that may fall from our pen while occupying this venerable chair, we shall endeavor to follow the teachings of common sense, and try to discriminate between

"Those that will evermore peep through their eyes,
And laugh like parrots at a bagpiper;
And others of such vinegar aspect,
That they'll not show their teeth in way of smile,
Though Nestor swear the jest be laughable."

GODEY FOR MAY.—One hundred and twenty pages! Well, if it is to be reading without engravings, so be it. Plenty of reading is now the vogue; and as we are a fashionable magazine, and bound to follow the fashions, here goes for a beginning. One hundred and twenty pages of reading! exclaims one. How can he do it and give such splendid illustrations? is the question. Yes, dear reader; here is reading, and beautiful engravings, and you shall have plenty of both in future. "January and May" is an engraving from an original picture by the celebrated Rothermel, whose painting of "Patrick Henry," the great Virginia orator, is now creating so great a sensation at the North—and, by the way, a most magnificent picture it is, worthy the fame of its distinguished painter. "May Day among the Juveniles" is also an original design by Pease. So is the engraving of "Cooks," making three original designs in this number. "The Dead Dove" is an engraving that speaks for itself: we expect to find a story, one of these days, illustrative of it; and if we do, will publish it. We may add that our 120 pages are equal to the greatest number of pages published by any other magazine.

FORCE OF CHARACTER.—In a work recently published by Miss Mitford, entitled "Recollections of a Literary Life," we find, among other interesting matters, a description of the private life and home circle of the late William Cobbett. That men should rise, in our own country, from indigence and obscurity to wealthy and elevated positions in society is by no means to be wondered at when we consider that all our republican forms not only permit, but invite and encourage, the honorable aspirations of every citizen. In the President of the United States we have, at this moment, a most striking, and, at the same time, a most gratifying illustration of this fact. But when we are told that, in England, where hereditary monarchy and hereditary aristocracy can thrust aside almost any individual who may attempt to oppose them in their assumptions of exclusive greatness, such a man as Cobbett, who was, at one time of his life, an illiterate private soldier in the British army—when we are told that a man who labored under such disadvantages, under such a government, finally reached a seat in the British House of Commons, we must certainly concede to him a force of character which but few men can lay claim to in any country. We, of course, have nothing to do with the man's public or political character. In the article referred to, we find him at his home, with wife, children, and friends, and we must confess that we were impressed with some amiable traits which we never before attributed to him. He told us, in his life, that, when he first saw his wife, he was a soldier on guard, and she was hanging out clothes from the washtub. Yet we see this soldier's wife, in the work before us, compared, in her family relations, to Allie Dinmont—one of the most amiably drawn characters in the Waverley Novels.

GODEY'S COTEMPORARIES.—We believe that we can very safely aver that no periodical ever had more generous or independent coteremporaries than are to be found on our long list of exchange papers—always generous in their praises whenever they deem our efforts worthy of just and honest commendation, and always independent and impartial in their criticisms when they feel themselves called
